Chapters in Edited Books

#title Clifford Geertz by His Colleagues

#author Richard A. Shweder and Byron Good

#date 15 March 2005

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/cliffordgeertzbyOOOOunse] [archive.org/details/cliffordgeertzbyOOOOunse]]>

#lang ene question of what form non

#pubdate 2024-07-24T01:05:06

#authors Richard A. Shweder, Byron Good

#topics Anthropology

#DELETED temporarily

#cover r-a-richard-a-shweder-and-byron-good-clifford-geer-1.jpg

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

CLIFFORD

GEERT,

by

HIS COLLEAGUES

Edited by Richard A. Shweder and Byron Good

The University of Chicago Press

Chicago and London

 [Copyright]

Richard a. Siiweder is the William Claude Reavis Distinguished Service Professor in the Committee on Human Development at the University of Chicago, and a Carnegie Scholar (2003).

Byron Good is professor of medical anthropology and chairman of the Department of Social]Medicine at Harvard University.

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637 the University of Chicago Press, Ltd., London © 2005 by The University of Chicago

All rights reserved. Published 2005

Printed in the United States of America

14 13 12 11 1 9 8 7 6 5 12 3 4 5

ISBN: 0-226-75609-2 (cloth)

ISBN: 0-226-75610-6 (paper)

Library of Congress Catalog-in-Pubhcation Data

Clifford Geertz by his colleagues / edited by Richard A. Shweder and Byron Good.

p. cm.

Presentations at a symposium held Nov. 23, 2002 in New (")!'leans. La., in celebration of the lOOth year anniversary of the formation of the American Anthropological Association.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-226-75609-2 (cloth : alk. pa per)—-ISBN ()-226-75610-6 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Geertz, Clifford—Congresses. 2. Anthropologists—United Stares—Biography—Congresses. 3. Anthropologists—Asia— Biography—Congresses. 1. Geerrz, Clifford. 11. Shweder, Richard A. HL Good, Byron.

GN21.G44C53 2005

301.092—dc22

2004017205

®The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of the American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48–1992.

 Contents

Preface vii

Richard A. Sbweder and Byron Good

Clift Notes: The Pluralisms of Clifford Geertz

Richard A. Shtveder

Passing Judgment: Interpretation, Morality, and Cultural

Assessment in the Work of Clifford Geertz 10

Lawrence Rosen

Celebrating Geertzian Interpretivism 20

Jerome Bruner

Coded Communications: Symbolic Psychological

Anthropology 24

Robert A. LeVine

Geertz’s Style: A Moral :Matter 28

James A. Boon

Clifford Geertz on Time and Change 38

Natalie Zenton Davis

Happenstance and Patterns 45

Amelie Oksenberg Rorty

Geertz’s Concept of Culture in Historical Context: How He Saved

the Day and Maybe the Century 52 !antes Peacock

Clifford Geertz and Islam 63

Dale F. Eickelman

Deep Play, Violence, and Social Reconstruction 76

Michael M. 1. Fischer

l I Speaking to Large Issues: The World, If It Is Not ill Pieces 89
ε///Hanners

12 On the “Subject” of Culture: Subjectivity and Cultural Phenomenology in the Work of Clifford Geertz 98

Byron Good and Mary-Jo DelVeccbio Good

Commentary 108

Clifford Geert;

Appendix /. the Original Symposium Schedule 125

Appendix 2. Academic Biography and Writings of Clifford

Geertz 127

Index 141

 Preface

This preface invites the reader to vicariously participate in a historic intellectual event. On November 23, 2002, on the occasion of the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the formation of the American Anthropological Association (AAA), the executive board of the Association sponsored a Presidential Session honoring “The Work and Life of Clifford Geertz.” This event, a full afternoon symposium held in a ballroom at the Hyatt Hotel in New Orleans, Louisiana, was cosponsored by the Society for Psychological Anthropology and organized by the editors of this book. An overflowing audience listened to eleven presentations followed by a riveting response and commentary by Clifford Geertz, who has been the single most influential American anthropologist of the past four decades.

Geertz's writings (see appendix 2) have defined, exemplified, and given character and depth to the intellectual agenda of a meaning-centered, nonreductive "interpretive social science," and have provoked much excitement and debate about the nature of human understanding and its relationship to social science explanations. In 1970 he founded the School of Social Science at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, New Jersey, which proved to be an ideal setting for the interdisciplinary articulation of his work, and where, although recently ascending to the status of the emeriti, he continues to be one of anthropology's greatest and brightest lights. Given the aims of the Presidential Session—to both honor Geertz's multifaceted academic career and critically engage his broad intellectual agenda—participants in the symposium included a historian (Natalie Davis); a psychologist (Jerome Bruner); experts on cultural locales where Geertz had done research, such as Morocco, Bali- and Java (James Boon, Dale Eickelman, James Peacock, Lawrence Rosen); and culture theorists, globalization theorists, and psychological anthropologists of various sorts and persuasions (Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good, Michael Fischer, Byron Good, Ulf Hannerz, Robert LeVine, and Richard Shweder). Due to a sudden but temporary illness the philosopher Amelie Rorty was unable to present her paper at the symposium, blit her contribution is made available in this book, as is Clifford Geertz's response to her essay (which he did not deliver at the symposium).

The organizers hoped to bring together Clifford Geertz and some of his most well known colleagues for a serious colloquy and reflection on the importance of his work. On that memorable afternoon in New Orleans Geertz's contribution to cultural anthropolog)' was interrogated (and celebrated) from a variety of perspectives. The substance and style of his writings were analyzed, praised, and cross-examined. Several of the presenters invited him to clarify issues, ranging from questions about the local versus the global, about the opposition between relativism and absolutism, and about the Geertzian conception of human psychology and mental functioning. The afternoon was divided into two sections, with a fifteen-minute break in between. The speakers for each section sat at an elevated table, and in turn spoke from a podium to the very large and very crowded room. Geertz himself sat in one of the forward rows, but amongst the audience, until the expectant moment when he rose, walked forward to the podium, and offered a response.

He had received drafts of most of the papers in advance and carried in his hands a bunch of notes on what he had read and what he had just heard. In his informative, witty, and utterly engaging commentary, he addressed the central points in each and every presentation. He gave advice to younger generations of anthropologists and concluded by giving his blessings to the field of cultural psychology and by spelling out the essential features of his theory of symbolic action. The huge audience—which seemed to appreciate the substance of the proceedings, the brilliance and intellectual seriousness of the commentary, and the historic character of the event—responded to Geertz by jumping collectively to its feet, thereby concluding the symposium with a rousing standing ovation.

This slim volume is neither a videotape nor an audiorape—the sights and sounds of that dazzling, riveting, and ultimately inspiring academic occasion are now but memories in the minds of those who were fortunate enough to have experienced them firsthand. Nevertheless, this book does preserve the main intellectual record of that afternoon's interrogation and appreciation of the work and life of Clifford Geertz, along with his illuminating and stunning response. Airhough our "Cliff Notes" are meant to be a historical record of sorts, we should note that our table of contents is not identical to the order of presenrations at the symposium (see appendix 1 for the original symposium schedule). Geertz's remarks are more or less unchanged flom those he gave at the symposium, although hard copies of three of the papers were available only after the event, thus providing an opportunity for comment in slightly more detail. The ordering of Geertz's responses to particular presentations is faithful to the ordering of his remarks at the symposium. His remarks unfolded according to their own logical flow and pattern of cross-referencing, which were not designed to mirror the temporal sequence of the program schedule.

We wish to thank several people for their dedication to this project, most especially Michele Wittels, who contributed in innumerable ways to the organization of the symposium event and the preparation of this book. Our gratitude extends as well to Don Brenneis (president of the American Anthropological Association), and Deborah Heath (program chair for the 2002 American Anthropological Association meetings), for their enthusiastic sponsorship of the symposium as a featured event at the AAA meetings; and to Geoffrey White (president of the Society for Psychological Anthropology) and Robert Desjarlais (program chair for the Society for Psychological Anthropology), for their cosponsorship of this Presidential Session and appreciation of the proceedings. The University of Chicago Press and Clifford Geertz are both icons of scholarly greatness in anthropology, and we are most grateful to David Brent, the Press's brilliant editor, for supporting this project and making the match.

Richard Shweder and Byron Good

 Cliff Notes

The Pluralisms of Clifford Geertz

Richard A. Shweder

For three decades Clifford Geertz has been the single most influential cultural anthropologist in the United States. Throughout his career he has put his vast intellectual and literary skills to work "ferreting out the singularities of other peoples' ways of life," cultivating a provocative variety of philosophical pluralism and. promoting the idea that there is no fixed kernel to human nature. No "mind for all cultures." No "deep down homo." "If anthropology is obsessed with anything," he writes, "it is with how much difference difference makes" (2000, 197). He goes on to say, "If you want a good rule-of-thumb generalization from anthropology I would suggest the following: Any sentence that begins, 'All societies have ...' is either baseless or banal" (135).

In many ways Cliff Geertz's sense of style has exemplified (and given distinctive character) to his beliefs. He is a master of distinctions who recoils at typologies, grand theories, and universal generalizations and rejects abstractionism and reductionism as methods for the social sciences. He is a discriminating writer who feels very much at home taking the measure of some complex scene. "Rushing to judgment," he writes, "is more than a mistake, it's a crime" (2000, 45). He believes that ultimate reality (if he is willing to speak of "ultimate" things at all) is a complex continuum of overlapping likenesses and differences that should not be placed in neat boxes, and certainly not two boxes. And as everyone in this anthropological audience surely knows he is the mahatma of "thick description." "I don't do systems," he writes, and his preference for portraying "cases," and his antipathy for general laws and formal principles will be obvious to anyone familiar with his work.

Cliff Geertz's critics are many. Almost everyone initially gets side-tracked by the visibility and distinctiveness of his writing style, which is like Cyrano de Bergerac's nose. It is conspicuous, it is spectacular, but it is best to just ignore it, for the sake of getting on with a discussion of his ideas, which is what we hope to do in this symposium. Reading Clifford Geertz is the perfect antidote to obscurantism in the social sciences, which is a very good thing for those of us who have been educated, inspired, or challenged by his writings. It is even good for those who care to be constructive critics or to interrogate various aspects of his work.

Looking beyond reactions to style, it seems fair to say that among Geerrz's critics the lumpers in the social sciences feel frustrated by him because he is a splitter who is nor so easy to dismiss. He arglies rhar knowledge is "local" and most social science generalizations restricted in scope, for which he has no regrets. Geertz writes, "I have never been able to understand why such comments as 'your conclusions, such as they are, only cover two million people [Bali], or fifteen million I Morocco I, or sixty-five million !.Java,, and only over some years or centuries' are supposed to be criticisms" (2000, 137). Nevertheless, the universalizers mistakenly think he is a radical relativist, the positivists mistakenly think he is anti-science. And the skeptical postmodernists (by which I mean those scholars who really are subjectivists, nihilists, and radical relativists, which Clifford Geertz is not), think he is an old-fashioned American anthropologist who still believes there is some good work to be done with the idea of “culture” (by which I mean human conceptions of what is good, true, beautiful, and efficient made manifest, and thereby expressed, in practice).

But I am a fan. And one reason I admire his work so much is because I believe cliff Geertz is one of the world’s most significant proponents of cultural, moral, and scientific pluralism (which is not the same as radical relativism and is certainly not the same as being “anti-science”).

If I had to identity some of the big philosophical or rheoretical themes in his writings I would name four, theme 1: Diversity is inherent in the human condition. Theme 2: There is no universal essence to human nature that strongly determines human behavior. Theme 3: Across time and space (history and culture) human nature is continuously transformed by the never-ending attempt of particular groups of human beings—Balinese, Moroccans, Northern European Protestants—to understand themselves and to create a social world that makes manifest their self-understandings. Theme 4: Securing universal agreement about what is good, true, beautiful, or efficient in life is rarely possible across cultures and, even more importantly, the ecumenical impulse to value uniformity (for example, convergence in belief) over variety and to overlook, devalue, or even eradicate difference IS not a good thing. Gulture is not icing, he writes. Biology is not cake. Differences are not necessarily shallow. Likeness is not necessarili deep (See Shweder 2000 for a smiikir but more expansive summary of Geertz’s contribution to the social sciences).

Cliff Geerrz has written that relativism “disables judgment” while absolutism “removes it from history.” He has strongly intimated that finding a middle path between relativism and absolutism is what culture theory ought to be about. For my own very specific SUbstantive contribution to this symposium I want to briefly focus on a not very small question concerning judgments about morality (good and bad, right and wrong) and on the issue of cultural critique. In particular I want to ask, is it possible to offer moral evaluations of the social practices of different societies without imposing one’s own parochial or ethnocentric conception of things on others? If the answer is yes, precisely how is that to be done? If the answer is no, precisely why is that so? In other words, what exactly is Cliff Geertz's implied third choice between relativism and absolutism; and what exactly does it look like (what shape does it take) when one is asked to judge whether, for example, such customary practices as polygamy, arranged marriage, adolescent circumcision, physical punishment, animal sacrifice, and so forth are good or bad, right or wrong?

In his well-known essay "Anti Anti-Relativism," Cliff Geertz offers this quote from Montaigne: "Each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice ... for we have no other criterion of reason than the example and idea of the opinions and customs of the country we live in." "That notion," Geertz then remarks, "whatever its problems, and however more delicately expressed, is not likely to go entirely away unless anthropology does" (2000, 45). He goes on to say, "What the relativists, so-called, want US to worry about is provincialism—the danger that our perceptions will be dulled, our intellects constricted, and our sympathies narrowed by the over-learned and overvalued acceptances of our own society" (45).

In the light of that remark it seems reasonable to raise the question: when it comes to evaluating the social norms of others what does the sharpening of our perceptions, the expanding of our intellects, and the widening of our sympathies actually amount to, and doesn't that process of sharpening, expanding, and widening imply that there is more to a moral judgment than Montaigne imagined? And if there is more, doesn't that process of in formed evaluation take US beyond the country we live in, making it possible for US to achieve a nonethnocentric understanding of the degree of moral value of the customs of other societies. Doesn't the process of cultural critique mean that it is possible (perhaps difficult, but possible) to separate the provincial aspects from the nonprovincial aspects of ones own moral judgments?

My guess is that Cliff Geertz, for a variety of reasons (some of them Wirtgensteinian; some not), will be reluctant to theorize in the abstract about such questions. So in the little time that remains I aim to simply open a conversation, the ultimate purpose of which is to answer such questions. I would begin by inviting Cliff to say how his own position on moral judgment and cultural critique compares to the positions of two other famous anti-universalists from two other disciplines—the legal scholar Richard Posner and the philosopher Isaiah Berlin.[1]

Posner, who is a United States appellate judge and senior lecturer at the University of Chicago, is also the most widely cited contemporary American legal scholar. Notably, he is a thoroughgoing anti-realist and a provocative moral relativist. When It comes to the study of moral judgments he fully appreciates the Geertzian generalization that “Any sentence that begins, ،All societies have ... is either baseless or banal; “ In his book rhe Problematics of Moral and Legal Theory (1 999) he (Posner) quotes approvingly from Geertz’s essay ^‘Anti Anti-Relativism” and has the following to say:

I shall be arguing first of all that morality is local, and that there are no interesting moral universals. There are tautological ones, such as “murder is wrong’’ where “murder” means “wrongful killing,” or “bribery is wrong,١١ where bribery means “wrongful paying.١١ But what counts as murder, (ر as bribery, varies enormously from society to society. T here are a handful of rudimentary principles of social cooperation—such as don’t lie all the time or don’t break promises without any reason or kill your relatives or neighbors indiscriminately—that may be common to all human societies, and if one wants to call these rudimentary principles the universal moral law, that is fine widi me. But they are too abstract to be criterial. Meaningful moral realism is therefore out, and a form (not every form) of moral relativism is in. Relativism in turn invites an adaptationist conception of morality, in which morality is judged—nonmorally, in the way tliat a hammer might be judged well or poorly adapted to Its goal of hammering nails into wood or plaster—by its contribution to the survival, or other ultimate goals, of a society or some group within It. Moral relativism implies that the expression moral progress must be used with great caution, because it is perspectival rather than objective؛ moral progress is in the eye of the beholder. (Posner 19)99), 6)

In his book (an extension of his 1997 Oliver Wendell Holmes Lectures at Harvard University) judge Posner offers a sustained attack on moial leahsm.

In his lectuies he suggests that “many moral claims are just the gift wrapping of theoretically ungrounded (and preferences and aversions.” He also argues that if any nonlocal moral facts exist at all they are completely useless for resolving any actual real world moral issue. He writes,

Every society, every subculture within a society, past or present, has had a moral code but a code shaped by the exigencies of life in that society or that subculture rather than by a glimpse of some overarching source of moral obligations. To the extent it is adaptive to those exigencies, the code cannot be criticized convincingly by outsiders. Infanticide is abhorred in our culture, but routine in societies that lack the resources to feed all children that are born. Slavery was routine when the victors in war could not afford to feed or free their captives, so that the alternative to enslaving them was killing them. Are infanticide and slavery “wrong” in these circumstances? It is provincial to say that “we are right about slavery, for example, and the Greeks wrong,” so different was slavery in the ancient world from racial enslavement, as practiced, for example, in the United States until the end of the Givil War, and so different were the material conditions that nurtured these different forms of slavery. To call infanticide or slavery presumptively bad would be almost as provincial as unqualified condemnation. The inhabitants of an infanticidal or slave society would say with equal plausibility that infanticide or slavery is presumptively good, though they might allow that the presumption could be rebutted in peaceable, wealthy, technologically complex societies, (Posner 1999, 19)

Three features of Posner’s position with regard to these and other cases are especially worthy of note. First, he describes himself as a moral relativist. As he stated in his Holmes Lectures he believes “that the criteria for pronouncing a moral claim valid are local, that is, are relative to the moral code of the particular culture in which the claim is advanced, so that we cannot call another 'immoral’ unless we add 'by our lights.’”

Second, he allows that he is a moral SUbjectivist in the sense that he believes that there are no “reasonably concrete transcultural moral truths.” In effect he argues that there is no independent or transcendent or objecfive domain of the right and the true (no “objective order of goodness”) to which one might appeal, as the legitimate source for one’s particular judgments about what is right or wrong, good or bad. (T he discourse of “inalienable” or “natural” rights is, of course, by Posner’s anti-realist account, thereby rendered either illusory or vacuous.)

Third, he claims that he is not a strong moral skeptic. There are moral truths worth knowing and judgments worth making, he argues. But they are merely facts about what is judged right and wrong in one’s own society, for example, the existing social norms, customs, and laws of one’s own land. These local norms and laws are knowable, he argues, and he is quite prepared to make parochial judgments about what is right and wrong for members of his parish or community, and to enforce them.

What Posner is not prepared to do is pretend that his judgments about the practices of other societies are anything more than reactions based on feelings of personal disgust. Perhaps as a result of personal temperament or cultural taste he might feel revolted by some practice (such as infanticide or suttee) and even inclined to intervene to stop the practice with the power at his command. Nevertheless he argues, in keeping with his anti-realist approach, “moral emotions” (shame, guilt, disgust, indignation) have no universal concrete moral content or objective foundation or source in some transcendental domain of the moral good.

fully consistent with his moral subjectivism, he also rejects that idea that there is ،١ universal moral obligation to tolerate cultures that have social norms different from one’s own. Ue comes close to saying that the experience of ،١ negative-feeling stare may restdt in the exercise of power to eradicate the practices of others, and that it is misguided to even ask whether such an intervention is justifiable or not. The moral domain by Richard Posner’s account of moral relativism and subjectivism is simply a natural scene in which different groups, each with their own distincfive social norms and equipped (in varying degrees) with powers and resources to dominate the local or global scene, compete with each other to perpetuate their own way of life. Some will succeed better than others do. Some will adapt or surrender their social norms under pressure to do so. Bur none of this social norm competition or social norm replacement represents true moral progress, and there are no rational discussions or arguments to be had about what the outcome of the competition or conflier ought to be. Why?

Because, according to Posner, there is no objective moral standard against which divergent claims about what is right and good can be assessed. ʌll that matters is power and the struggle to carry forward one s ⅄l) of life efficiently, and to survive in the competition with other groups.

Precisely how do Cliff Geertz's views on these issues differ from Posner s, if at all? The comparison of Geertz and Posner is instructive. If I understand him correctly. Cliff Geertz believes that is it possible to reject subjectivism and radical relativism while at the same time refusing to place anything (other than banalities) outside of culture. Yet if I understand I osnei correctly, he advocates moral subjectivism and relativism pieciseb because (Geeitz-hke) he refuses to place anything other than banalities outside of culture. Posner thereby forces US to ask the following question: If, as Cliff Geertz suggests, there is so very little in the moral domain that transcends culture and history, how it is possible for others to be both different from US in their social norms yet entitled to have their social norms valued by US, or at least tolerated by US, at the same time? Posner's version of anti-universalism (and his refusal to endorse tolerance or any other moral values as real or objective goods) provokes us to consider the possibility that a fully theorized stance of moral pluralism in anthropology must take US beyond any particular culture and outside of history, for the sake of the theory's own systematic jusrification. If one rejects both subjectivism and relativism, as Clifford Geertz (in apparent contrast to Richard Posner) recommends, what does one put in its place? In the absence of any objective values or nonethnocentric moral goods what type of value judgments survive the corrosive force of moral skepticism?

These are big questions, old questions, hard questions. Yet it is with regard to such questions that a comparison of Clifford Geertz to Isaiah Berlin is instructive. One wonders, how close is the connection between the Geertzian practice of anthropology and the philosophical theory of "value pluralism" elucidated by Berlin, and systematized in a thoughtful book by John Gray titled Isaiah Berlin (1996: also see Galston 2002). Berlin's theory is associated with the idea (quoting John Gray here and below) that "human values are objective but irreducibly diverse." And it is linked to an intellectual stance that affirms the "reality, validity and human intelligibility of values and forms of life very different from our own." One basic claim of the theory is that "fundamental hLiman vallies are many, that they are often in conflict and rarely, if ever, necessarily harmonious, and that some at least of these conflicts are among incommensurables—conflicts among values for which there is no single, common standard of measurement or arbitration."

In other words some moral dilemmas are insolvable and ultimately undecidable by rational reflection. For Berlin at least that is not quite the same as saying (Montaigne-like) that there is nothing more to moral evaluation than "the opinions and customs of the country we live in" or (Posner-like) that moral judgments are no more than an expression of culturally socialized preferences and aversions. What would Cliff Geertz say about Berlin's theory of "value pluralism"? Would he accept that moral values (e.g., liberty, justice, loyalty, equality, protection of the vulnerable, beneficence) are not only diverse and irreconcilable but also real and objective (and in that sense do stand outside of culture and history)?

In one sense or another Clifford Geertz, Richard Posner, and Isaiah Berlin are all deeply critical of universalized moral claims about the goodness or badness, rightness or wrongness of particular social practices. They have views of moral value that appear to be similar in some ways and different in other ways. If I understand them correctly all three would argue that as a matter of fact people around the world do not universally agree on what behaviors in particular are right or wrong, good or bad. All three accept the notion that there exist moral disagreements that cannot (even in principle) be settled by rational means, and that to the extent there exist universal maxims of morality (for example, the injunction to be fair minded in the sense of treating like cases alike and different cases differently) those maxims cannot in and of themselves resolve real world moral disputes. All three would presumably argue that moral judgments depend on circumstances. I can only guess whether Cliff Geertz would accept Posner's argument that there is no such thing as objective moral progress. I can only speculate whether he would accept Posner's view that even the presumption that infanticide is immoral is too presumptive and provincial to count as a moral universal; although I suspect that he would endorse the stance advocated by both Posner and Berlin that there is 1,0 determinate or universal way to choose between various alternative moral claims, for example claims of autonomy versus community, or liberty versus equality, or family values versus sexual pleasure? But I would certainly love to hear some of his answers to such questions.

A systematic comparison of Geertz's theory of value with the value theories of Posner and Berlin is sure to be helpful in the further development of a philosophically defensible anthropological theory of cultural pluralism. And it is one very timely way to be challenged by, and to honor, that great intellectual tradition that extends from Franz Boas to Clifford Geertz. I have been speaking here, of course, of an intellectual tradition that (nor by coincidence) is coincidental with the I ()O-year-old history of the American Anthropological Association itself. And, I might add, in a world in which triumphal "West Is Best" thinking has returned in full force to the international scene, it is an intellectual and critical tradition that IS just as important today as it was in I 902, during a former age of global empire.

[1] A more extensive discussion of Posner and Berlin appears in a keynote address, "The klea of Moral Progress: Bush versus Posner versus Berlin," which I delivered at the 21)0–5 Philosophy of Education Society meetings. Parts of that discussion are reported here as well.

Also see Richard A. Schweder, "Moral Realism without the Ethnocentrism: Is It just a List of Empty Truisms.;" in tinman Rights with Modesty: The Problem of Universalism, ed. Andras Sajo (Leiden: Martin us Nijhoff Publishers, 2004).

 References

<biblio>

Galston, William A. 2002 Liberal Pluralism: Tbe Implications of Value Pluralism for Political Theory and Practice. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Geertz, Clifford. 2000. Available Light: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical TopICS. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Gray, John. 1996. Isaiah Perlin. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Posner, Richard A. 1999. The Problematics of Moral and Legal Theory. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Shweder, Richard A. 2000. The Essential Anti-Essentialist. Review of Clifford Geertz, Available light. Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical Topics. Science 290 (November 24): 1511–12.

</biblio>

 Passing Judgment

Interpretation, Morality, and Cultural Assessment in the Work of Clifford Geertz

In the preface to Available Light, Clifford Geertz lists the issues he has sought to pursue empirically as “the role of ideas iir behavior, the meaning of meaning, the judgment of judgment.”[2] “Judgment,” of course, implies a wide range of practices. Although some anthropologists have spoken of “sick societies” and many others clearly have their own assessment of the people they study (as do the “natives” of them, there also being much truth in the ﻝll saw that “every anthropologist gets the society he or she deserves”), most anthropologists do nor—or at least they usually pretend they do not—judge other cultures in the sense of forming an opinion or conclusion about them.[3] At best the judgmental anthropologist may be more akin to a self-appointed referee engaged in authoritative guesswork even though the people studied may view the meaning of “judgment” as applied to anthropological writings as more like a misfortune inflicted through no fault of their own.

But these are not, of course, the senses of judgment to which Geertz is referring. Rather his is a very subtle blend of studying the ways in which others go about creating and comparing the construction of their own experience at the same time that, without literally adjudging them, the ethnographer does not remain impervious to the implications of their actions. Three elements thus converge in this regard in Geertz’s approach as an ethnographer, elenrents that may be posed as a set of interrelated questions. I he first is really about articulating our own scholarly Standards, for it asks: If ethnography is to be an interpretive enterprise what criteria should be used to assess interpretations not as right or wrong but rather as better or worse? Second, if interpretation does import at least relative standards, in what sense is interpretation a moral act, one that necessarily carries some implications of desirable conduct? And, finally, these questions allow the possibility for the third, more directly judgmentai question, by asking: In at least implicitly establishing such criteria does Geertz’s work, though that is certainly not its primary aim, point to ways in which we can also set some of the terms for the judgment of other cultures and our own? let me take each of these issues in turn.

Geertz does not give US a separate programmatic statement about how to tell better from worse interpretations. His approach, as in all such matters, is informed by his belief that one demonstrates the value of a theory by what it shows us about its subject, by its capacity to capture particularity as part of general propositions. “Theory ... grows out of particular circumstances and, however abstract, is validated by its power to order them in their full particularity, not by stripping the particularity away” (Geertz, Available Light, 2000 l hereafter AL|, 138).[4] Like William James (and unlike, say, Ernest Gellner), Geertz is a not a monist but a pluralist. He rejects (as one commentator has said of James) “the specious consolation and aesthetic charm of the former for the real moral challenge of the latter.”[5] Rejecting the “tendency to see diversity as surface and universality as depth” (AL, 59) in favor of the idea that “difference must be seen not as the negation of similarity” bur as “comprising it: locating it, concretizing it, giving it form” (226–27, original italics), Geertz asks us to appreciate that the “enormous number of similar intersections of outlook, style, or disposition, are the bases on which cultural complexity is ordered into at least something of an irregular, rickety, and indefinite whole” (254–55). Not all approaches, therefore, would seem to be equally meritorious in showing how such specific conceptual and relational patterns “come to have the force, the immediacy, and the consequences they have” (211), how they constitute a “system” that is, to borrow George Kateb’s phrasing from a different context, “not so much believable as capable of being believed in by others.”[6] Thus when he speaks of the “virtues of a ‚local knowledge’ sort of tack” (137) Geertz lists “knowledge of limits” (the rejection of authority “that comes from nowhere”), coupled with highly circumstantial accounts, comparisons that bring out contrasts and particularities (137–38), and a “grasp of the moral and political issues involved” as factors that, whatever else, may yield an account that is “surer, less prey to the confusing noises of the confused present.”[7] The idea that a culture may constitute a highly structured configuration or just “a bundle of parochialisms that somehow adheres” (255) also bears on the connection between the aesthetics of a better interpretation and the moral aspects of the process of interpretation itself.

Scientists have used replication and Occam’s Razor, social scientists have spoken of elegance and parsimony, humanists have applied notions of validity based on comprehensiveness and authorial intent—all of them means of trying to achieve criteria for interpretation.[8] Each involves a certain aesthetic and Geerrz would, I think, agree with Isaiah Berlin’s position (following Vico and Herder) that cultures, being incommensurable, require US to attend to their coherence without being censorious, to see the creativity of particular forms and styles as central.[9] Thus Geertz can criticize Cai Hua, who claims that the Na of China exhibit no forms of marital alliance or descent, because “we hear little of the tone and temper of Na life, of the color of their disposition, the curve of their experience.”[10] But he departs quite crucially from Berlin in that he does not think this places the understanding of cultures beyond nroral evaluation.[11] To the contrary, the place of morality in interpretation is crucial to Geertz’s own interpretive turn.

The act of interpretation is a moral act twice over for Geertz. It incorporates, first, the scholar’s involvement with others in casting up an understanding of their lives and in taking actions that will affect one another's well being.[12] And it is also a moral act to engage in the inrerpretation of one's own and others' morality itself. fhus, in the first instance the anthropologist must "look at persons and events (and at oneself) wirh an eye at once cold and concerned," realizing that "Detachment comes not from a failure to care, but from a kind of caring resilient eitough to withstand an enormous tension between moral reaction and scientific observation, a tension which only grows as moral perception deepens and scientific understanding advances" (AL, 40). And in the second instance, one cannot leave matters at the descriptive level of a "plurality of incommensurable cultures."[13] The act of interpretation involves nor only deciding what something is but, as Geertz's colleague Michael Walzer has argued, how to respond to the question "What is the right thing for Its to do?"[14] Like deciding what the law should be by portraying what the law is, or appraising the practices of a culture in terms of the effects of some people's acts on others, interpretation necessarily includes moral decision-making. "Deprived of a yardstick, ⁝writes Walzer, in ،ا vein that is certainly Geertzianl we rely on exegesis, commentary, and historical precedent, a tradition of argument and interpretation."[15] And as we give an account of any system of morality we necessarily give an account of our own that must intersect that of the others we address.

So, in the words of the medieval Welsh bard: "You must judge at the end."[16] If some of the criteria for judgment—of the quality of interpretations, of the met It of a particular moral stance, of what we make of OUI seis es in the ļıılocess of assessing other—appear at rimes vague or resistant to I ephcarion, that may, for (ieertz, be related to his view of both our capabilities as scholars and social life itself. "The puzzles of judgment," as he calls them,[17] bring together the uncertainties and ambiguities of social life with the limits of our own insights. Like Aristotle, who took it as the hallmark of a mature man that he did not try to describe an entity with greater precision than the thing itself possessed, or the later Wittgenstein, who said one should not try to depict a cloud with sharp lines, or unlike Ruth Benedict, who, no doubt unintentionally, demonstrated that by "trying too hard to be clear ... [one] can dim an arguntent best left oblique,"[18] Geertz seeks the appropriate measure of specificity for capturing the specific. Like Aristotle, too, he believes that political theory should (among other things) be a school for judgment, and that our own politics in a diverse world require a “unity of intent” (AL, 257) and “a liberalism with both the courage and the capacity to engage itself with a differenced world” (259).

To pursue simultaneously the understanding and the assessment of judgment nevertheless poses difficult professional and personal questions. Geertz is, as I have suggested, saying that we cannot judge other cultures as anthropologists. But we certainly can as individuals. This position does, however, present a dual dilemma. First, it means we cannot formulate with certainty criteria that would allow US to rely on anthropological data to reach any judgmental position. We may know that race does not correlate with social complexity or that gender and caste do not correlate with intellectual ability. In the absence of judgmental absolutes, however, we would only interfere with our primary task as anthropologists—namely, to understand how others’ ideas and practices fit into their own socio-cultural lives—if we let the belief that we could ultimately judge others predominate.[19] But there is also a second dilemma; namely, that even in our role as anthropologists we may not be able to use the insights of moral judgment to assess what is taking place in the subject culture if, lurking in the distance, there remains the expectation of ultimate judgments. A kind of anthropological uncertainty principle, akin to that developed in physics by Heisenberg, may be at work. We cannot as anthropologists make supportable moral judgments and simultaneously have the highest confidence in our ability to study the meaning people attribute to their own thoughts and acts.[20] Both perspectives may yield worthwhile insights, but in pursuing one perspective some uncertainty is necessarily introduced into the other. In short, what we can do as anthropologists is to look at how the people we study judge judgment. We cannot as anthropologists exercise absolute judgment over their judgment.

In Geertz’s view, anthropology can nevertheless improve, even though it cannot preserve, our personal appraisals—but only to the extent that it is grounded on adequate knowledge and humility. “We must learn to grasp what we cannot embrace,” he says (AL, 87)ذ “to judge without understanding constitutes an offense against morality” (40) and, indeed, “rushing to judgment is more than a mistake, it’s a crime” (45).[21] His position appears similar to that of one writer who has said, apropos one of Geertz’s favorite topics: “You have to pick your place to stand, and work by the light of informed intellect, before you can judge whether social institutions or indeed whole societies are accreting meaning or leaking it away."[22] The result is hardly moral paralysis. Geertz would, I think, agree with the him critic Pauline Kael, who wrote that "A mistake in judgment isn't fatal, bur too much anxiety about judgment is."[23] Judgment of self and others, necessarily entangled in the anthropological enterprise, cannot be totally avoided, but ought not, Geertz makes clear, to be the nrst or indeed the last reason for our studies. For him, anthropology is, therefore, neither a terrain for the enactment of what I would call "the higher personal politics" nor an invitation to mindless relativism.[24]

Accordingly, Geertz has not shrunk from making clearly judgmental statements when, for example, he speaks of people in the Third World for whom the problem is sometimes "not what to believe but how to believe it," or who display, in his view, great uncertainty over what, if any, meaning to assign to various aspects of their lives.[25] Similarly, on the political level, it is sometimes insufficiently appreciated how Geertz has spoken out about the massacres in Bali and java in the 1960s, or the political limitations of the regime of the Moroccan King Hassan II, and he has certainly been modest about the work he has done with the National Academy of Sciences on behalf of imprisoned Indonesian intellectuals.[26] It is, to borrow the tirle of one of his most important writings on this subject, that "Thinking as a Moral Act" is made all the more difficult and all the less avoidable when one attends to the profound differences among human cultures. To read his detailed ethnographies or his most theoretical of analyses without grasping the reasons why, for him, morality and ludgment suffuse his concerns, even when his judgments are neither trumpeted nor self-referring, would, therefore, be to miss one of the most essential aspects of his entire life's work.

Finally, on a somewhat personal note, I may very well be the only person who has ever bought a used car from Cliff Geertz. Now the purchase of a used car from one's teacher certainly constitutes an act of interpersonal trust and moral engagement, to say nothing of a source for intellectual speculation. 1 utme biographers ma)', therefore hotly debate the role of this car ill the formation of Geertz's thought and (rather less hotly, I suspect) my own. !some may see in his offer of the car to me the inspiration for his theory of the symbol as a "material vehicle of thought" while others, seeing It from the perspective of a hard-pressed graduate student who was getting a good deal, as contributing to my own view of certain symbols as “a thoughtful vehicle of materialism.” Admittedly, that 1964 Simca probably did little to inspire some of Geertz’s more important theoretical insights. It wasn’t much of a “model of” much less a “model for” anything, including the vaunted accomplishments of the automaker’s art. But the car got him and later me where we were going. So for the good deal, the memorable moments of those few months we overlapped in the field, and for sr, much else before and since, I am, like all thrrse within and beyond the academy, deeply indebted to Cliff Geertz—for his insights, his generosity, and, not least, for the self-effacing brilliance of his own judgment of judgment.

[2] ٢ل’١١هأًدلأ (lااتاآآ٠١. ١ Available Lfght: Anth٢٥١,ological Re١ ٦ectio١٦s on Philosophical آ(لا-ICS, Princc،t(،>n: Princeton University Press, 200(}, X.

[3] (ر٢l the idea of “sick societies” see, for example, Robert B. Edgerton, Sick Societies ،New York: ،Maxwell ،Macmillan International, 1 992); and Raoul Narroll, “Cultural Determinants and the Concept of the Silk Society,” in Chanf’inf’ Perspectives III Mental Illness, ed· Stanley c. Plog and Robert B. Edgerton (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1 969), 128–55.

[4] “What we need, It seems, are not enormous ideas, nor the abandonment of synthesizing notions altogether. What we need arc ways of thinking that are responsive to particularitics, to individualities, oddities, discontinuities, contrasts, and singularities, responsive to what C harles Taylor has called deep diversity,’ a plurality of ways of belonging and being, and that yet can draw’ from them—from it—a sense of connectedness, a connectedness that ١ neither comprehensive n(،>r uniform, primal nor changeless, but nonetheless real” (AE, 224).

[5] Houston Peterson, introducing James’s essay “On a Certain Blindness in Human Beings,” in Kssays in Philosophy, ed. Houston Peterson

(New York: Pocketbooks, 195/), 263 Peterson goes on to describe James’s position (and to quote internally James’s “T he Dilemma (A V)cۣerm\msmך’_١ Eom The l٧/l// to I3elieve and Other E.sscrys m Popular Pbilosophةتلم ,,ך. Erederick H. Burkhardt, Eredson Bowers, and Ignas K. Skrupskelis [Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1979), 177): “[James) admitted that his ،pluralistic, restless universe, in which no single point of view can ever take in the whole scene’ would have no appeal to a mind possessed of the love of unity at any cost.’ ” “A friend with such a mind once told me (James writes) that the thought of my universe made him sick, like the sight of the horrible motion of a mass of maggots in their carrion bed.” On Gellner’s monism versus Geertz’s pluralism as exemplified in the issue of segmentary tribal structure in North Africa, see Y<ose١١١ ך·he Culture of Islam: Changing Aspects of Contempo a لا Muslim Elfe (Chicago: University of ،’hicago Press, 2002), 42–43. See generally, Roland l !all, Monism and Pluralism,” in rhe Encyclopedia (,/rhdosophy,vol. 5, cd. Paul Edwards (New Tork: 5)-3)(,(١7)·9 ך1١·1 ١ ١111١1١

[6] Cicorgc Katcb, “Can ،:ulturcs Be lodged? Two Defenses of Cultural Pluralism in Isaiah Berlin’s Work,” Socidl Research (١)ך, no. 4 (1)9)9)): 1009–38, iU !()12. Geertz uses the term ه which was also the title (together with “eareers) of the core graduate course he helped to design during his)‘ears at Chicago, in numerous of his publications. Sec, ؛or example, Clifford Gccrtz, “Religion as a l ultural System and “Ideology as a (ultural System,” in his rhe Interpretation (,/ (.idtnres (New Tork: Basic Books, 1٤)7 3) Srl 2١١. “Common Sense as a C ultural System” anil “Art as a Cultural System,” in his Local Knowledge: birther Essays /// Interpretive Anthropol(مملم١ ج’ (New ١ork: Basic Books, I 983), 74–120. (),١ this period of his career at Chicago, see his “An Inconstant Profession: The Anthropological î ife in Interesting limes,” in Annual Review ()لم Anthropology (Palo Alto, CA: Annual Reviews, 2002), 1–19, at 11–12; and After the Fact: Iwo Countries, hour Decades. ()//,٤/مك()/,)(/() ((////١ (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995), 1 10–15.

[7] This latter is said in reference to the debate over the meaning of Captain Cook’s presence to the Hawaiians, ،١ debate in which Geert/ favors Sahhns’s treatment over that of c bcyesckcrc: “I perhaps should at this point come clean and say that, for my part, I find Sahlins, the Structuralist glitter surrounding his analyses aside, markedly the more persuasive. I lis descriptions are more circumstantial, his portrayal of both the I lawaiians and the British more deeply penetrating, and his grasp of the moral and political issues involved surer, less pre) to the confusing noises of the contused present” (٨1,10(١). Compare (icerrz’s crire ria of interpretation with those of Michael Walzcr, Interpretation and Social (rıtıcısnı (C antbridge: Harvard University Press, 198 30 l: “The best reailing |of a pocntl is not ilillerent in kind, bur 111 quality, trom the other readings: It illuminates the poem in a more powertul and persuasive way. Perhaps the best reading is a new reading, seizing upon some pi·e١ iousl) misunderstood symbol or trope and re-explaining the entire poem. I he case is the same ١١ Ith moral interpretation: It will sometimes confirm and sometimes challenge received opinion.”

[8] In the held of literature, for example, sec 1. 1). Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interprctation (Ƴ١١ Haven: Tale University Press, l 9(0; and rhe Alins of Interpretation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 190000000000.

[9] Sec Katcb, “،:an C ultures Be Judged?” at 101 I, 101 (١–18, and 1021. Stressing the relarion of incommensurability to the comparatb 1st project c iccrt/ says: “Santayana’s famous dictum, that one compares only when one is unablc to get at the hcaIt of the matter, is the precise reverse of the truth; It is through comparison, and of incomparables, that whatever heart we can actually get to is reached,” / oca! Knowledge, 233.

[10] (lifford c ieertz, “ I he \ isit: Review of Cai Hua, ·٨ Society without Fathers or Hushands: The Na of China,’ ” Xew ١’٧,·٤· Review of Rooks, October l 8, 2001,29. ،icertz goes on to say: “! here is nothing, or almost nothing, of individual feelings and personal judgments, of hopes, fears, dissents, and resistances, of fantasy, remorse, pride, humor, loss, or disappointment. The question that in the end we most want answered anil the one most insistently raised l١١ the very circumstantiality of Hua’s ethnography—‘What is it like to be a Na? —govs laigcl) unattciiilcil. ١٢ ن a re left with a compact, we 11-a rrangCll world of rules, institutions, customs, anil piacticcs: a kinship system, ،:an this be enough? ‘Na-ness’ as a foim-of hfc, ،l ١l of bcing m-thc-world, is, whatever it is, a much wilier, more ragged, unsittliil, less aiticulatid, anil less articulable thing. It is ١ mooil and an atmosjihcrc, a suffusing gloss on things, and it is hard to describe or systematize, impossible to contain in summary categories.”

[11] Thus anti-relativism does not, for Geertz, mean treating any practice as acceptable: “The objection to anti-relativism is not that it rejects an ir’s-allhow-you-look-at-it approach to knowledge or a when-in-Rome approach to morality, but that it imagines that they can only be defeated by placing morality beyond culture and knowledge beyond both” (AL, 6.؟). George Kateb says that for Berlin “the aesthetic observer must turn his back on the claims of morality and truth or resist their temptations; they arc aesthetically irrelevant” (“Can Cultures Be Judged.}” 1021). ‘،judging and ranking cultures by the extent to which they avoid or reduce injustice and untruth entangles US, Berlin seems to think, in indifference to creativity and hence to perils to the human stature” (ibid., 1037). Berlin’s distaste for pursuing the untidiness of much of social life is well captured by Adam Gopnik when he writes: ،‘Berlin lifts the curtain, peeks at the irrational, and then quickly closes it again, with a reassuring bow to his audience. It is squalid in there, but, fortunately, not too squalid to bear” (“The Porcupine: A Pilgrimage to Popper,” The New Yorker, April 1,2002, 88–93).

[12] “To recognize the moral tension, the ethical ambiguity, implicit in the encounter of anthropologist and informant, and to still be able to dissipate it through one’s actions and one’s attitudes, is what encounter demands of both parties if it is to be authentic, if it is to actually happen” (AL, 37).

[13] The phrase is from Kateb, “Can Cultures Be Judged?” 1020.

[14] Walzer, Interpretation and Social Criticism, 23 (original italics).

[15] Ibid., 22.

[16] Yr Hen Gyrys o lai. The Red Book of Hergest, 1397, quoted in Tristan Jones, Adrift (Dobbs Ferry, N\z.· Sheridan House, 1992).

[17] Speaking about cultural diversity, Geertz writes: “My purpose is to suggest that we have come to such a point in the moral history of the world (a history itself of course anything but moral) that we arc obliged to think about such diversity rather differently than we had been used to thinking about it. If it is getting to be the case that rather than being sorted into framed units, social spaces whose edges are unfixed, irregular, and difficult to locate, the question of how to deal with the puzzles of judgment to which such disparities give rise takes on a rather different aspect. Confronting landscapes and still life is one thing; panoramas and collages quite another” (AL, 8ʕ).

[18] Clifford Geertz, Works and Lines: The Anthropologist as Author (Stanford: StaIlford University Press, 1988), 113.

[19] This position can also lead to certain misunderstandings about Geertz’s position. Por example, in one interview Geertz, pressed by the reporter, was reluctant to condemn female genital mutilation. This seemed to the interviewer to be an example of relativism, the refusing to take a position on the matter altogether, whereas it would be more accurate to see it as Geertz’s refusal to pontificate as an anthropologist, emphasizing instead our need to know as much as possible about the context of the practice and then reach whatever judgments we may wish to reach separately (David Berreby, “Unabsolute I ruths: Clifford Geertz,” New York Times Magazine, April 9, 1993, 44–47). A more egregious example is Paul Rabinow’s accusation that Geertz has no politics at all, or Vincent Crapanzano’s charges of Geertzian “self-subversion.” For Geertz’s response, see his Works and Lives, 91–101. For an assessment of both commentators as exhibiting “(n]eurotic offendability together with a sort of childish lashing our” see Fred Inglis, Clifford Geertz: Culture, Custom and Ethics (Cambridge: Polity Press, 2000), 1 53–55. Each of these writers makes the mistake of confuting whar Geertz thinks we can (and realistically ought to) say as anthropologists with what we may be called upon to address as individuals.

[20] It may be worth asking whether Heisenberg himself was applying his indeterminacy principle to his own moral acts. Neither in Michael Frayn’s play C(Ipenhagen nor in the discussions occasioned by it have I noted any indication of this possibility. It might, however, account for sonic of Heisenberg’s action du ling the war. ١ OU cannot pursue a line of inquiry about the “pure” theory of atomic fission knowing it might result in an atomic bomb and, at the same time, rake a stance of moral opposition to it; you can only do one at a time, seeing different things through each focus, knowing that within each vantage there must be a natural uncertainty. The advantage of moving back and forth between two such perspecrives may have been that contradictions, even opposites, can appear, whether in physics or morality, as ،‘natural” equivalents capable of producing equally valuable, yer equally uncertain, results. The analogies to moral thinking in the human sciences are intriguing.

[21] Geertz thus quotes: “as a bar to ... moral presumptuousness ... what Jakob Burkhardt ... said in 1860 about the dubious business of judging peoples: 'It may be possible to indicate many contrasts and shades of difference among different nations, but to strike the balance of the whole is nor given to human insight. The tiltimate truth with respect to the character, the conscience, and the guilt of a people remains for ever a secret; if only for the reason that its defects have another side, where they reappear as peculiarities or even as virtues. ٠/٤٧ must leave those who find pleasure in passing sweeping censures on whole nations, to do so as they like. The people of Europe can maltreat, but happily not judge one another. A great nation, interwoven in its civilization, its achievements, and its fortunes with the whole life of the modern world, can afford to ignore both its advocates and its accusers. It lives on with or without the approval of theorists’ ” {The Civilization ىل the Renaissance of Italy [New ١ ork: Modern Library, 1 9541١ ؤ ١لاءا); quoted in Gccrtz, “Afterword: I he Politics of Meaning,” in Culture and Politics ill Indonesia, cd. Claire Holt (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1972), 319–35, at 335.

[22] Hilary Mantel, “NaipauPs Book of the World,” New York Reriew of Books, October 24 2()0)2 10–12, at 10.

[23] Pauline Kael, / Lost It at the Movies (1965), quoted in Rosalie ʌlaggio, compiler, rhe Beacon Book of Quotations by Women (Boston: Beacon Press, 1992), 178.

[24] (ieertz has at times opposed the anthropology association taking positions on pʏ)litical matters. It seems to him to smack of the old Soviet Academy of Sciences model, since (as we saw at the time of resolutions surrounding anthropological research anil the Vietnam War) there was a serious temptation to read certain people out of the profession on the basis of one’s position on the war dressed up as a particular form of action required in dealing with the peoples affected.

[25] See, for example, Clifford Geertz, Islam observed: Religions Development in Morocco and Indonesia (New Haven: ι’ale University Press, 1968), 98–1 17. For his most explicit assessment of developing nations and the criteria for appraising them, see Clifford Gccitz, Fhc Judging of Nations: Some Comments on the Assessment of Regimes in the New States,” Archives europeenes de sociologie/Enropean Journal of Sociology 18(1977): 245–61.

[26] Geertz also turned down an appointment at the Institute tor Advanced Study it was hist ottered in the late 1)60s because universities like Chicago (where students had taken over the administration building) were in such turmoil over the Vietnam War. Geertz felt an obligation not to abandon the university at a time when everything appeared to be politicized around that single event. That others took as political conservatism his refusal to let an issue of the moment lead to drastic repercussions for the institutions of higher education should more accurately be seen as concern that institutional alterations based on momentary events could be vastly destructive and lead to pressures for political conformity that universities above all should resist. Uis views as a person were very clear as concerned the war. What he rejected was not only the threat of political pressures within the academy; he resisted the idea that people should be able to claim political believability as anthropologists that could not be sustained on independent intellectual grounds.

 Reference

<biblio>

Geertz, Clifford. 20(1)0. Available Light: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical TopICS. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

</biblio>

 Celebrating Geertzian Interpretivism

LIFF GEERTZ (AUVERTENTEY or inadvertently) helped rescue me and my like-minded psychologist friends from the long, cold winter of anti-mentalism that had long ago stricken onr beleaguered field of psychology. That’s what 1 want to talk about, and 1 do so with gratitude.

In my own case, indeed the rescue extended even beyond psychology, for more latterly I have been increasingly preoccupied with psychological and cultural issues in law and jurisprudence. Cliff’s emphasis on the role of meaning-making in the law has been as important to me in the study of the law as it had been when, earlier, we were all in the midst of the Cognitive Revolution which, by the way, is now in the process of being ‘ culturalized”! So bravo to his 1 960ی Storrs Lectures at the Yale Law School, of which more presently, and of which you’ll find echoes in a recent book of mine and Tony Amsterdam.[27]

So what was this Geertzian influence? Let me go back to the beginnings, to the 1960s. Cliff fells an intriguing tale about how, during those early years of his at Chicago, he joined forces with “restless” colleagues there “to redefine the ethnographical enterprise whole and entire.”[28] The effort, as he tells it, “consisted in placing the systematic srudy of meaning at the very center of research and analysis to make of anthropology, or anyway cultural psychology, a hermeneutical discipline.” And the “move toward meaning,” indeed “proved a proper revolution: sweeping, durable, turbulent, and consequential,” to use his words again, a quarter century later.[29]

l ,ιι sure that none of that Chicago gang had it in mind to rescue psychologist from psychology’s chilling, objectivist self-made plight. They were fielding enough flak from their fellow anthropologists to have little time for rescue operations elsewhere. Yer, for all that, the new meaning-centered “interpretivism” in cultural anthropology began having its “unsetting” effects on psychologists very early on. I must say a word about the why and wherefore of these effects.

You see, at its start, psychology had been torn by two conflicting views about how to understand the human condition—through a day view or a night view, to traitslate founding-father Gustave Fechner’s lagesansicht and Nachtansicht. I he night view sought the idiosyncratic dramatic-historical patterns of human experience; the day view searched for content-free constants of experience that could be discerned in sensation, perception, memory—like Weber’s law to the effect that a just mtticeable difference in sensation, any sensation, was always a constant fraction of the sensation presently in force. Weber was our would-be Newton! Even as late as the turn of the century (at least in Europe) it was moor as to which approach had prevailed—the scientific Naturwissenshaftlich way of the hard sciences or the humanistic interpretivist way of the Geisteswissenschaften. But by the time my generation arrived on the scene, just as the Second World War was starting—rhe natural-science approach had been long, loudly, and officially declared the winner, at least on our shores. And since, at least in America, we love converting the outcomes of uncertain struggles into zero-sum form, interpretivism had been declared dead and gone. ι’es, there were still obscure pockets where the insights of the novelist or dramatist were provisionally acceptable, but only fa Ute de mieux until “ real” psychology could clean up the mess. Interpretivism was methodological weakness or just plain slovenliness: forgivable if provisional as with a Gordon Allport; unforgivable if insistent, as with psychoanalysis. We all read Freud anyway and I recall 1. A. Richards’s lectures on literary interpretation with relived delight, even getting a few of my fellow graduate students to trek next door to Sever Hall with me, sneaking across a corner of the Harvard Yard to get a breath of humanist air.

When it came to research, though, we all went strictly kosher, or at least we kept our yarmulkes well pinned on! If I wanted to explore anything that sounded “cultural,” I made it a point to use the most psychophysically exquisite cover I could find—as with the so-called New Look in perception where, with the most meticulous controls going, I showed that kids overestimated the sizes of coins proportionately to their value, the more so for poor kids than better-off ones. Or I used the soon-to-be-famous Harvard tachistoscope to demonstrate that a black four-of-clubs playing card took only 200 milliseconds to recognize visually, where a red one took 800 milliseconds of exposure. The word “culrure” does not appear in the papers reporting those results, nor does the term “meaning.” We’d already learned by then how to avoid quarrels with psychology journal referees! Even Gordon Allport got raised hackles at the idea (()nee mooted metaphorically by Kroeber at a Harvard seminar he gnesr-condncted) that mind might be the subjective side culture!

You can well understand that what Cliff and his early 19605 Chicago friends were proposing was (at least for a psychologist) far more radical than they may have realized. We listened with rather concealed interest. I hen Cliff’s ethnographic Held studies began appearing—I recall particularly the Balinese CockHghr—demonstrating what you could do by keeping your eye Hrmly on the meaning-making process. And what struck n١e at the rime was that meaning-making so often demanded storytelling, narrative for its realization —whatever that was psychologically. Oddly, to this day I wonder why Cliff doesn’t get more explicit about the place of narrative in meaning-making, and, for that matter, in culture-forming generally. Perhaps he’s still worried about the hard-nosed colleagues who like to attack him. Better to keep your literary backgromrd from showing too plainly in public! For all that, I’m very touched by the following rather covert and quire out-of-the-blue passage that ends the Preface to cliff’s 1988 Works and Lines: The Anthropologist as Author: “Finally, in lieu of a dedication, which would be presumptuous, I would like nterely to mention the name of the man, nowhere cited in the body of the text, who has had no direct connection to it or me, but whose works has served as its governing inspiration at almost every point: Kenneth Burke.”

For those not acquainted with Burke, his 1924 The Grammar of Motines, with its stunning concept of “dramatism” is the birth place of American literary consciousness about the role of narrative in culturally shaped meaning-making. For Burke, narrative is our mode for making sense of breaches in our culturally canonical expectations. And if you can Hnd no narrative, you are lost—like that poor Balinese Regreg in the Hrst of Cliff s Storrs Lectures, unable to accept the local narrative resolutions of his overturned expectancies, ones that might conventionalize his plight as a deserted husband. He Hnally goes out of his mind.[30]

Finally, to the law. I happen to believe that Cliff’s Storrs Lectures of thirty years ago may be his greatest contribution to intellectual life beyond anthropology. They reverberate in the legal academy today as never before, as exemplified, say, in Paul Kahn’s recent book.[31] For interpretation is, of course, the heart of law. Legal interpretation, we now know more clearly, is the assigning of factual accounts, usually in story form, to normative standards in the law that specify what’s a violation, what isn’t. Bur the normative standards specifed in the law must be congruent with, in some obvious way derivable from the norms of the culture. Fact itself can ne\ ei be independent of law— our vision and our verdicts rat if)’ one another, he sa)s. And law Itself cannot transcend the meaning-ways of culture. As Kahn puts it, “Law must rule the imagination before it can rule the state.”[32]

Cliffs masterly demonstration in his Storrs Lecture of this fact-law-culture interdependence in Islamic haqq law (presumably based on “truth”), Indic dharma law (presumably on criteria of “duty”), and in Malay-Polynesia adat law (on standards of “custom”) has had a powerful impact. It has not led so much to reform movements (the lawyer’s usual hyperactive response to new ideas), but rather to consciousness-raising about the inherent dangers and benefits in any system of law, including our own.

Let me sum up Cliff’s contribution in his own words: “The interpretive study of culture represents an attempt to come to terms with the diversity of the ways human beings construct their lives in the act of leading them.”[33]

And, to return to the beginning, ir was his dedicated effort to come to terms with that credo that inspired nor only anthropologists but also those dissident psychologists unhappy with their discipline’s proclaimed devotion to the one-way street of positivist science.

Thank you, Cliff. You once wrote me, after you’d read my 1990 book, Acts of Meaning,[34] “We really are doing the same thing, only you call it psychology, because you got your license there, and I call it anthropology, because that’s where I got mine.” I too am convinced that you can’t do either anthropology or psychology without coming to terms with meaning and the contexts in which it is made. And I think that truth makes the distinction between them not so much useless, but misleading. We’re all in the same boat now, never mind the seas aren’t quite yet charted!

[27] Anthony G. Amsterdam and Jerome Bruner, Minding the Law (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2000).

[28] Clifford Geerrz, After the Fact: Two Countries, Four Decades, One Anthropologist (Cambridge: Harvard University Press 1995), .14 l

[29] Geertz, After the Fact, 114–15.

[30] See Clifford Geertz, “Local Knowledge: Fact and Law in Comparative Perspective,” chapter 8 in his Local Knowledge: Further Essays in Interpretive Anthropology, 3rd ed. (New York: Basic Books, 2000).

[31] See, for example, the acclaimed The Cultural Study of Law: Reconstructing Legal Scholarship, by Yale law professor Paul w. Kahn (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999).

[32] Kahn, Cultural Study, 83.

[33] Geertz, Local Knowledge, 16.

[34] Jerome Bruner, Acts of Meaning (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1990).

 Coded Communications

Symbolic Psychological Anthropology

Robert A. LeVnie

r THE TO 1> OF MY LIST of books that will never be written is Prbiciphi Semiotica by Clifford Geertz. I he book jacket says, “ rhis book summarizes concisely all that is known about human symbolic systerns. A few simple axioms are shown to generate all cultural variations past and present, actual and possible, in just ten pages of text. I he deductive algorithm may be difficult for lay readers to understand, but the book comes with a compact disk that you can put into your computer to design your own symbolic system or simulate those of the Amazon or Himalayas. This work represents a new anthropological science eclipsing all previous efforts that were based on the crude approximations of ethnography—thus launching the discipline of anthropology as a science equivalent to particle physics and molecular genetics.”

It should be no surprise that Clifford Geertz never wrote this book, but there was a time in the 19705 when the rumor went around that something like it was in the works, that Geertz was going to unveil his Theory in a formal exposition that would revolutionize anthropological thought and research. It is now clear that Cliff has always been extremely allergic to this kind of theorizing (Geertz 2000), 3–20) and that he developed and pursued an alternative conception of cultural anthropology that has affected the thinking of a wide circle of those inside and outside the discipline, to our great benefit.

Cliff and I were students together in the Harvard Department of Social Relations during the early 1950s. He was three years ahead of me, but we breathed the same air, with its aroma of scientism, which I found intoxicating and he found distasteful—a reaction on his part already formulated in terms of phenomenology and informed by humanistic studies. l Ie already had the goal of finding a place for cultural anthropolog)' free of scientistic pretensions, that is, the formalizations of theory and method that simplify social and cultural realities in imitation of the natural sciences. Our views were far apart on this issue.

(11 fraud l ovei lapped again, this time on the faculty of the University of Chicago, from 1960 to 1970, wliere we both participated from its beginning in the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations. I spent a large part of that decade studying at the Chicago Institute for Psychoanalysis where, in contrast to anthropologists whose psychoanalytic training convinced them of Freudian un i versa Is—" pre-cultura l " and "extra-cultural" aspects of the human psyche—1 moved in the opposite direction, toward an appreciation of the clinical phenomenology of psychoanalysis rather than its grand theory. A major reason for this change was the influence of one of my teachers at the Institute, Heinz Koh lit, who appears in Cliff's "1 hick Description" as the author of the distincrion between "experience-near" and "experience-distant" concepts (Ko-hut 1971). Kohut saw clinical psychoanalysis as an exercise in "empathic understanding," and of course ethnography is based on empathic understanding too. In contrast to the approach of other Freudians faced with cultural phenomena, Kohut advocated working carefully from the surface available to observation to the depths of theoretical inference and reconstruction (LeVine 1992). He was teaching this psychoanalytic phenomenology during the 1 9605 but only gradually brought it out in print for fear of appearing too radical within the orthodox world of the American Psychoanalytic Association.

This was of course the same time that Cliff was publishing the papers collected in The Interpretation of Cultures (1973), which formulated the basic terms of his symbolic action theory. This theory, together with Victor Turner's (1967) work on ritual and Bob Levy's (1973) ethnopsychology, eventually convinced me that some combination of Geertz's symbolic action approach and Kohut's self psychology could lead to the most promising "person-centered ethnography," as I called it, for research in psychological anthropology (LeVine 1982). In the present context, however, I want to acknowledge the foundational importance of the culture concept as Cliff revitalized it in the 19605 and 19705. It is indispensable for psychological anthropology, and I shall illustrate briefly why I think so.

When I talk about Geertzian symbolic action theory I mean first ()fall the premise that all communicative action is coded, that is, it has reference to a shared symbolic code, like the wink that Cliff made famous—a code that is local and complex rather than universal and simple—and can require lengthy translation and explication. Communication is the very center of what we investigate in psychological anthropology, as Gregory Bateson taught US long ago; the understanding that it is always coded in terms that draw their meanings from the history, values, and conceptions of a community is f undamental to our research. Sec nd, by symbolic action theory I mean the metaphor of a cultural model that combines normative and descriptive dimensions and operates like computer software, selectively actualizing human potentials for cognition, emotion, motivation, and action. This view can breathe new life into the dullest corners of human existence.

Take childcare, for example. What could be more mundane, routine, and repetitive? Some think it should be understood simply in terms of strategic formulas for allocating the time and energy of mothers and maintaining the caloric intake of their offspring—as biologists analyze parental care in other vertebrate species (Wilson 1975). Looked at in terms of symbolic action, however, childcare in humans is freighted with moral ideology and emotion, particularly when examined in comparative and historical perspective. These cultural meanings are presumed by, embedded in, and signaled by the communicative actions of parents and others interacting with the child, drawing on population-specific codes of speech and conduct. Rick Shweder (Shweder et al. 1997), Sara Harkness (Harkness and Super 1996) and I, and our colleagues and students, make nuisauces of ourselves among psychologists by pointing this out with better and better evidence. We have made some progress in convincing child development researchers.

١’et cultural models of human parental care cannot simply be reduced to cultural values any more than they can be validly reduced to rational strategies. I have argued, following Geertz, that we have to see them as susceptible to both semiotic and utilitarian analyses, with the former identifying the moral directions and conventional norms of childcare practices, while the latter reveal the pragmatic strategies and logistical tactics involved (LeVine et al. 1994). Parent-child communication is culturally coded but its canonical forms in a particular community have their own logic and responsiveness to environmental pressures. The Geertzian perspecrive enables US to keep these two aspects in focus.

Thus cultural analysis following Geertz is crucial in psychological anthropology, not only for the understanding of childhood environments bur also in all other arenas of social communication. I thank him for taking it as his task from his student days onward to cut “culture” down to size, reiectmg the omnibus concepts formulated by anthropologists from Edward B. I ylor (1&71) to our teacher Glyde Kluckhohn (Kroeber and Kluckhohn, 1952), in favor of an ideational concept with “a determinate application, a definite sense and a specified use” (Geertz 2015 , نن); Ins success in this endeavor has not only deepened our insights into the cential subiect of the discipline bur also given US a tool for ethnographic investigation and interpretation.

But what of the arguments made by some psychological anthropologists (Ewing 1992: Strauss and Quinn 1997, Id-20) that Geertz denies the importance of private mental contents, psychological processes and personal experience in favor of public communication, leaving US to guess at what his psychology consists of—or worse yet, leading US to assume he believes that anthropology or symbolic action theory can do without a psychology.) I don’t believe that Geertz has no psychology, partly because I know he pays attention to the literatures of psychology and psychoanalysis and partly because I feel certain that he agrees with psychological anthropologists that every concept of culture makes psychological assumptions. So I shall end by asking him to join US in considering the psychology of culture, as Sapir called it, and make public his views about this difficult but fundamental subject.

 References

<biblio>

Ewing, Katherine. 1992. Is Psychoanalysis Relevant for Anthropology? In New Directions in Psychological Anthropology, cd. Theodore Schwartz, Geoffrey white, and Catherine Lutz. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Geertz, Clifford. 1973. The Interpretation of Cultures. New York: Free Press.

——. 2000. * Light: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical Topics.

Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Harkness, Sara, and Charles Super, eds. 1 996. Parents' Cultural Belief Systems. New York: Guilford Press.

Kohut, Heinz. 1971. The Analysis of the Self. New York: International Universities Press.

Krocber, Alfred L., and Clyde Kluckhohn. 1952. Culture: A Critical Review of Concepts and Definitions. Papers of the Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology 47, no. 1. Cambridge, MA: Peabody Museum.

LeVine, Robert A. 1982. Culture, Behavior and Personality, 2nd. ed. New York: Aldine Publishing.

——. 1 992. The Self in an African Culture. In Psychoanalytic Anthropology after Freud: Essays Marking the Fiftieth Anniversary of Freud’s Death, cd. D. H. Spain. New York: Psyche Press.

LeVine, Robert A., s. Dixon, s. E. LeVine, A. Richman, p. H. Leiderman, c. Keefer, and T B. Brazelton. 1994. Child Care and Culture: Lessons from Africa. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Levy, Robert L 197ؤ. Tahitians. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

shweder, Richard A., J. Goodnow, G. Hatano, R. A. LeVine, H. Markus, and p. Miller. 7(ıl)l .The Cultural Psychology of Development, w the Handbook of Child p sociology, vol. 1, ed. William Damon. New York: Wiley.

Strauss, Claudia, and Naomi Quinn. 1997. A Cognitive Theory of Cultural Meaning. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Turner, Victor w. 1967. The Forest of Symbols. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Tylor, Edward B. 1871. Primitive Culture. London: John Murray.

Wilson, Edward o. 1975. Sociobiology. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

</biblio>

 Geertz’s Style

A Moral Matter

James A. Boon

Like Bismarck’s sausages, [I) have seen |ir| made. Clifford Geertz, Acdildble Light

: Y title’s leading motive stems from Cliffs “Art as a Cultural System”—with its studiously strange comparison: veering from colloquially sculpted body slashes (Yoruba) and declamatory color-shapes (Abelard); to Quattrocento painting (that’s Italian) as a gauging (Piero della Francesca), a preaching (Fra Angelico), and a dancing (Botticelli); to radically unvisual performance art: Moroccan intersections of ()ur’anic memorization, Arabic media, and festive poetizing. In this third sort of world, Geertz suggests, verbal style is a moral matter. Now Cliff is no Muslim—nor anything else recognizably doctrinal (judging from After the Fact and “Passage and Accident”). So, how can his written “style” (think of it as a “thinking”) be a moral matter, a moral act even? (I’m thinking here of “ I !linking as a Moral Act,” Cliffs 1968 Antioch Review essay on mutual ironies pervading fieldwork encounters and inequalities. I hat fine piece missed two previous boats of collection. Although prior to “ rhick Description,” it was not found leven in translation! in / he Interpretation of Cultures; although unfootnotedly approachable (like “Blurred Genres,” another Antioch Review original!, it lacked in Local Knowledge. That it didn’t make the cut sooner has ɛ١ nice consequence !intended or un-|· Available Light, erring, if it errs, on the side of erudition, includes an un-up-t()-date item less taxing than now-neighboring pieces, e.g., “Anti Anti-Relativism”—that prickly disquisicion first delivered to the AAA in 1981, also now long-ago. But I digress.) 1 o resume: Can an offbeat, various, and assertively liberal corpus help impel—citing the final phrase of Available Light’s last paragraph that sports just one proper name: E. M. Forster (Two Cheers!!)—“the moral obligation to hope?” Did somebody say “liberal”? Yes, indeed; Cliff confesses as much, albeit in that flickeringly indirect way of his:

Those who would therefore, promote the causes for which these names, ’-”’-I others more nearly contemporary—Dewey, Camus, Berlin !“Isaiah,” this Tin-Pan Alley buff reminds himself], Kuron, Taylor—in their various ways variably stand (for “liberalism,” too, is neither compact nor homogeneous, and it is certainly unfinished) need to recognize its culturally specific origin and its culturally specific character. (Geertz, Available Light, 2000]hereafter AL], 259)

Like The Religion of Java and anything else “cultural” (“The Balinese Village,” say), each subject-interpreted varies, indeed variably varies. Whatever is “gotten at” (as Geerrz says) varies (e.g., “The Abangan Variant”)—including variable liberalism, such as Cliff’s own (and mine). A variant (Boasian) name for all this is “disaggregation”—an interpretive tactic enacting philosophical commitment to ironic certainties of cultures’ ever-translated unfinishedness. But that’s another essay.[35]

Let me, then, repeat (varyingly) a leading-motive of this one. Does Cliff’s more-than-mere rhetoric (think of rhetoric as thinking-style) do something? Are his exactingly shaggy sentences—fashioned into peculiarly persuasive juxtapositions, in essays re-collected, sometimes, non-chronologically —“agentive” (to recall Kenneth Burke)?

Or recall again those Moroccan]Muslims in Local Knowledge whose everyday speech-acts (agonistic “speech-actings,” I’d say) strike Cliff as efficacious, or nearly. Even their idle, catch-as-catch-can conversations—“a head-on collision of curses, promises, lies, excuses, pleading, commands, proverbs, arguments, analogies, quotations, threats, evasion, flatteries ... gives to rhetoric a directly coercive force; (’andu klam), “he has words, speech, maxims, eloquence,” means also, and not just metaphorically, “he has power, influence, weight, authority” (Geertz, Local Knowledge, 1983 [hereafter LK|, 1 14). Is there a kind of ’andu klam (pardon my Arabic; my tin-ear for it traces to loanwords in Indonesian)—a virtuoso forcefulness—to Cliff’s own eloquence, earthiness, and maxims (including maxims about ’andu klam)? Could be; I’ve a hunch there is; one might, sure ‘nuff, suppose so.

To catch-as-catch-can the “how” of Cliff’s corpus—the voice of his theory composed (like certain poetry) out of voices encountered—I’m trying here to emulate his “moral-matter” itself. Trying conspicuously, and surely flubbing. Because Geertz’s style is truly difficult—in George Steiner’s precise sense; and pastiche is easier (although in its precise operatic sense, less so than proverbially falling off the proverbial log). 1’11 try to get less pastichey (and patchy) later, but first a few random salutes to Geertzwerk—my name for the beast.[36]

GEERIZWERK: spanning half a century, bridging two millennia, crafting countless comparisons, in prose both manifold and singular, open any Geertzwerk anywhere—a bout Java, about Morocco, about Bali (e·g·, Bali: Interpretation cVnne cultureو with ‘Deep Play” rendered “jeu dɪenfer” (that’s “deep”!)); or about all three (“Muslims, Hindus, and one disguised as the other,” in Cliffs loving quip on Javanese)—and it’s still Geertz: one radically UN NF RM anthropology, The achingly plural style is nevertheless culturally (in Cliffs sense) American, a variant of our philosophical “catalogue rhetoric”—or so I have intimated elsewhere (Boon 1999). Yes, list-laden vernacular discursivity is Cliffs “special somewhere” (not a neutral nowhere)—his being here-and-there in open (liberal) conversation w th cultures everywhere, wondering how “people with differences can live among one another with some degree of comity” (AL, 260).[37]

Back in 1982, I impishly designated Cliff anthropology’s equivalent of “James, both William and Henry”; ensuing years have not dissuaded me.[38] Hardly stagnant, his signature generalization-eschewing grows ever more caveated, colloquial, caustic, scatter-shot—always courageous, and as corrosive as it is consoling: quite suited to our world, I’d say. A William James component is now patent in “the Pinch of Destiny”; to appreciate Geertz’s Henry James side, I recommend parsing such “sentences” as:

Bather than conceiving of a legal system, our own or any other, as divided between trouble over ɪvhat is right and trouble OVCI· what is so (to use Llewellyn’s piquant formulation, if only because it has been so influential among anthropologists) and of “juristic technique,” our own or any other, as a matter of squaring ethical decisions responding to the what is right sort with empirical determinations responding to the what is so sort, it would seem better—more “realistic,” if I may say so—to see such systems as describing the world and what goes on in it in explicitly judgmatical terms and such “technique” as an organized effort to make the description | 1>AUSE ... I correct. (LK, 174)

What reader negotiating this prosey maze could ever anticipate it’s conchiding word? Perhaps an aficionado of James (Henry). The containlation just delivered graces Cliff’s unremittingly circumstantial inquiry into “law and fact” (contrasting (Islamic/Hindu/Christian/“secular”/etc.). That study reads at moments like late-james: runaway nnance of affect and mood; yet it also offers crisp aphorisms such as Larry Rosen’s paper culled from Cliff 5 verbal hothouse of “comparative , ıes, didactic aspects remain key even in their relative abatement, as I a re I - Ceet tzw el k for sweat s theoretic synthesis acerbically yet also doubts easy declarations of absolute free-play or cozy proclamations of post-theoreticism’s triumph. Cliff perhaps remains not unopen (pardon my litotes) to relative systematishness, provided we recognize its contingent (“unfinished”) quality. And regarding that unfinishedness he is still liable to become, rarely, didactic, preachy even. (Recall the close of After the Fact, whose prose abruptly, and helpfully, halts to explain, figurative pointer in hand, punning undercurrents of its title. You’d almost SUSpect some editor had requested this, and Cliff had, perhaps grudgingly, obliged.)

Sermons I myself have published elsewhere, designate this family of style “relative (not absolute) relativism”; I somewhat prefer “relative relativism” to “anti anti-relativism” but only for the nonce. Either formulation (and they are close relatives) resists overblown theorizing (or anti-theorizing)—too intent on apotheosizing this or that, or demonizing that or this.[39]

One shining moment of “relative relativizing” is Cliff’s recent allusion to four centuries of critical consciousness (Montaigne through Foucault, say), with a provocative twist and thrust I’d characterize as: Neither Bentham, nor Foucault; perhaps Montaigne with Weber. In case you missed it, I quote:

If advances in the technical, fine-tuning control of social life (Bentham's dream, Foucault's nightmare) is what you are after, then universality talk is, I guess, the talk to talk. If you are after refinements in our ability to live lives that make some sense to US and of which we can on balance approve (Montaigne's skeptical hope, Weber's desperate one)—moral skills, not manipulative ones—then something less vaulting would seem to be called for.

That's Available Light, page 139, for those of US taking notes; and it provides my paper's second leading motive.

"Something less vaulting" (yet uncommonly learned!)—may just be what Cliff's cross-cultural writing has always been writing-about. What does ethnographer-Geertz do (practice): he writes-about, unmanipulatively. Not just ecrire, but decrire (ecrire de .. . right, Natalie?). Call it description, and call it thick. Yet, to paraphrase Lady Charterley's game-keeper (old what's-his-name, besides "Sir John"), "You have to ta'e the thick with the thin!" And Cliff has addressed (sometimes thinly) superficial play (versus deep) as well—including his sole reference to Doris Day and Montgomery Clift in The Religion of Java (page 307). I broached such thick/thin dilemmas as spiritedly as I dared (berani) in "Showbiz as a Cross-Cultural System" published in Cultural Anthropology, anno 2000. All of you please read that ardent effort (and buy the book I Boon, 1999 to which it serves as boutadeو aftermath, or sign-off). I hoped to sbotu why Geertz's writing-about (decrire) requires rereading {relire}. Indeed decrire-pour-relire is (for me, anyway) his Beriif.[40]

Cliff himself, of course, remains a reading-ethnographer, diversely educated you might say: and it was ever so. Remember The Religion of java (based on his ,955 dissertation "report," published with new framing devices in 1960, read by me in 1965 because of HIM !pointing to Jim Peacock I, the first year of the paperback version, my copy of which I marked in red, as sophomores then were inclined to do (studious ones, anyway). On page 337, I might have underlined (but stupidly failed to):

Perhaps Shaw’s comment I for those taking notes, that’s George Bernard Shaw, unreferenced and unindexed, in this book on Java (try to sound like Ray Roniano)1 that the only trouble with Christianity is that it has never been tried is applicable to religion generally; for certainly there is much rivalry anti backbiting among the various sects and a universal intolerance on their part for Islam, often on the grounds of its intolerance. But it is nevertheless true that the syncretistic, tolerant, relativistic outlook toward religious belief Hrs well with the whole tenor of prijaji mysticism. (Geertz, Religion of Java, 1976 (hereafter 1(11, 337)

That’s from “!he Prijaji Variant” (the courtlyfied civil-service gentry); the chapter is “Mysticism”—duly disaggregated by Cliff throughout; the topic is “religious relativism,” and it is chokingly sad to re-experience these pages, given Indonesian history today.

Yes, Cliff’s opening opus already began fashioning wildly well-read ethnography that nudged readers (or, this one anyway) to dip into stray sources: Shaw, even. Geertzwerk’s digressive decriture (writing-about) began and remained dramatically trans-disciplinarian and eccentrically solo. The approach seems cultivated to be engaged both companionably and edgily—not to be standardized or methodized. Indeed, standardized methodology Cliff’s corpus stands against.

ι et for ŏll its “unmethodicalness,” Geertzwerk manages to be “didactic enough” (as when “Thinking as a Moral Act” waddles (the verb is Forster’s! belatedly into Available Light}. His catch-as-catch-can craft cagily (and catchily) encourages novices to stay the course of learning to fathom, comparatively, the un-outlineable. Cliff’s pedagogic devices include so-called native s point of view (a Jamesian notion) and paradoxical gauges of expeiience near/distant. The latter idea repackages emic/etic —Itself too experience-distant sounding to capture the distinction “experience near/distance” in an experience-near fashion. I he helpful heuristic we cling to becomes fraught; crisp distinction melts away. Nor, by the way, does experience-near correspond to “native’s point of view”; for example:

The [Arabic] word for poetry, s’ir, means “knowledge,” and though no Muslim would explicitly put it that way, it stands as a kind of secular counterpoise, a worldly footnote, to the Revelation itself.

Here, what may seem experience-near for implied readers is precisely how no Muslim would (per Muslim) put it. ١’es, experience near/distant is as convo(invo?)luted as everything else in Cliff’s interpretive turns, including “thick.”

To reiterate: writing-about, rereadably, truly-tricky difficulties of humanity’s agonistic conversation (call it translation) is Geertz’s Beruf. That term was Luther’s (among others); its nondogmatic adaptation was Weber’s (after prolonged etymological parsing!). No more Lutheran than he is iMuslim, Cliff enacts, nevertheless, anthropology als Beruf (and a Is ‘audit klaui!}—a Weberian dimension implicit throughout his style. Whatever else a Beruf might be, it is a little like a religion: a moral act and a moral matter.[41]

Panically short on time, how might I frame Cliff’s “life and work” (I’bouime et le style; Bhoiuiue est le style) in a semi-systematisch way? Well, consider its tripartite modes:

L The oscillatingly contrastive (entrepreneurship in Java/Bali; irrigation in Bali/Morocco; three cases of anything “as a cultural system” or even “as an anti-anti.”

2. The unpanoptic panorame: spicy overviews, all pith and no abstraction, less “march of time” than wayward shuffle. Here’s one of hundreds:

<quote>

[Indonesia] is ... the product of an incredible stream of warring mind-sets—Portuguese, Spanish, Dutch, Indian, Chinese, Hindu, Buddhist, Confucian, Muslim, Christian; Capitalist, Communist, Imperial Administrative—carried by means of those great world-historical agencies, long-distance commodity trade, religious missionization, and colonial exploitation, into a vast, thousand-island archipelago occupied mainly ... by Malayo-Polynesians, speaking hundreds of languages, following hundreds of cults, and possessed of hundreds of moralities, laws, customs, and arts; hundreds of senses, subtly different or grossly, reasonably concordant or deeply opposed, of how life ought to go. (AL, 253)[42]

</quote>

3. The exponentially local, framed performatively. Here's an intimate for-instance:

Usually this is a lamp-lit space before the house of some wedding giɪ'er or circumcision celebrant. The poet stands, erect as a tree [whether for wedding or circumcision!) in the center.... Behind him are two lines of sidewise dancing men, ... heads swiveling as they shuffle a couple half-steps right, a couple left. He sings his poem, verse by verse, paced by the tambourines in a wailed metallic falsetto, the assistants join him for the refrain ... only generally related to the text, while the ،lancing men ornament matters with sudden strange rhythmic howls. (LK, 1 12)

111 sum, whether (1) oscillatingly, (2) unpanoptic-panoramically, or (3) local-performatively, decrire-pour-relire enacts intersensory condensations of time-over-space through "mots justes" that reverberate interpretive hunches and doubts.

Adjective-noun combos are Cliff's special knack ("rhythmic howls"); modulated, rather than merely mordant, wit his habit. An assonant prose-poetics deserves savoring; a few favorites: aVaiLable Light (note the tinhowling rhythm and delicate ring, a silkier title than “anthropology’s awkwardness” one key rheme (AL, 248). With “aVaiLable Light” in ear, listen back earlier: “simplicity flees”; “hypothesis hedgehogs”; “fugitive truth”; “almost monotonous” (as in “Next to Sefrou, Manhattan is almost monotonous”); “jural mimesis”; “legal imminglement (1 can think of no exacter a word)”; and come to think of it, “exacter a word” (LK, 32, 150, 18, 127).

Nor are Geerrzy mots necessarily mellifluous: “poets as horses.” Or, shifting cadences now, “bush Picasso,” “noisy Debussy”—coined to convey how Westerners might ethnocentrically process African art and gameIan music. All this in a book whose conceivable titles were: Colloquial Reason; Vernacular Wisdom; Vehicles of Meaning: Their Efbnograplry; Curves of Someone Else’s Experience; At-Home “S’fʏ”—none as catchy (and catch-can) as LoKKal KNoudedge, which concept by the way Cliff defends, and ardently, on seven pages of Available Light (I 340ﻭ).

Geertzwerk thus achieves sustained attention to human foibles of circumsrance (that’s “foibles of,” not “Pomp and ...))). Even when earlier studies assessed potentials of economic take-off (Peddlers and Princes) or envisioned nation-building solidarity (lhe Religion of lava), contradiction and contingency percolated through. Try opening, say, the latter to page 96, and read closely, closely, closely. Two print fonts—the smaller for held notes (slightly polished, and written-down some hours “after the fact, anyhow—check Cliff s afterword on “method” (sort of); the larger font f(),commentary and expert-sounding explanation (kind of). But the division of interpretive labor smudges; “natives” too are explaining, and anthropologist too is doubting, and vice versa, blurily. With space, I’d copy out the entire page to encourage you to read aloud—smaller print softer, and larger print, louder (or vice versa.))—to gauge how Cliff’s twinned fonts of descriptive prose should sound. Short of that here’s a flattened sample:

ISofter.ج] He said he is not a dukun but merely a pitulung (1 have never heard this term applied except by a man to himself; for everyone else, this man was a dukun). I asked him what the difference was, and he said a dukun takes money, but a pitidling doesn’t—just helps people out. He said he can’t always cure people; sometimes he can and sometimes he can’t. If he could say for certain, ،‘I can cure you,” there would be two gods. As it is, he just supplicates God.... although he admitted he said spells over three hen’s eggs ..., and accepted gifts from satisfied patients.

[Louder?] There are several factors clustering around the psychological relationship between the dukun and his patient which seem to account for the ambivalent attitude most people show toward dukuns. The first ... the uncertain outcome of treatment.... The second, the degree the dukun may become involved in his patient’s personal life.... And the last is the inherent ambiguity of the dukun’s power, trafficking as he does both with God and with devils—ndukuni (“to dukun someone”) means both to cure a person of a disease and to sorcerize a person into having one.... The major alternative term for dukun is tijang sepuh, which means (in the respectful speech style) “parent.”

As early as The Religion of fava, what at first blush looks caveated about “experience” (e.g., cure) becomes caveated about explanation as well. It’s as though evidence and interpretation were already doing a do-si-do, as though circumstantial doubt were as salient as so-called knowledge. Que, indeed, sais-je?

Since 1960, the loud (didactic) and the soft (descriptive) in Cliff’s corpus have often in a sense switched priorities; nothing, however, has been scotched; pedagogy too maintains a say, a voice. Engaged in reading and rereading Geertzwerk, I feel, today like yesterday, “obligated to hope” that its future include much more writing-about, hermeneutically looping hither and yon, perhaps addressing again the circumstantial opera of Max Weber. Yes, I love anticipating still further culminations (along with the Deweyan) of Clifford James Geertz’s inimitable style, a moral matter enacted and ... Unfinished ... !

The epigraph is from page 252, antecedents altered, with a fond wink.

Let me take this endnote-occasion to thank everyone responsible for and involved in the wonderful ʌʌʌ panel. My piece was devised in a performance-flavor I here try to preserve. In New Orleans I opened with an ad-libbed-admission that, unlike Rick shweder, I would assuredly not be ignoring Cyrano s nose. Cliffs scintillating proximity made me especially glad for the burst of applause after I risked delivering one of his amazing phrasings “my way.” I felt confident enough (but only just) that cliff recognized my efforts as neither parody nor pastiche (except operatically), but rather as a “pragmatic instantiation.” (I thank Judith Shapiro, and profusely, for her e-mail to this effect a few days later.) ʌt the event, sitting between Jim Peacock and Natalie Davis, hearing Cliffs responses to all the papers, and sensing the intensity of some 400 listeners engage،! in the a Its of pa r t ic i pa n trece pt i o n, I experience،! sudden hope that anthropology and her sister disciplines might have many years of effervescence ahead.

[35] On Boas’s knowingly impossible standards of ever more exacting comparative evidence and translation, see Arnold Krupafs “Irony in Anthropology: I he Work of Franz Boas,” in Modernist Anthropology: l run I Fieldwork to Text· ed. Ma rc iManganaro (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990), 155–45. For fresh senses of irony in anthropology overall (or as rd say, “underair), see James Fernandez and Mary Huber, eds.. Irony in Action: Anthropology, Practice, and the Moral Imagination (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2()()1).

[36] (ieorgc Steiner, On Difficulty (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978), following up on his After babel. On opera and anthropological hybridities (including pastiche), see James Boon, Verging on Fxtra-vagaiicc: Anthropology, History, Religion, Literature, Arts ... Showbiz (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999), 8–15, 284–86).

[37] Clifford Geerrz, Rall: Interpretation d’line culture (Paris: Editions Gallimard), chap. 5. The fond remark on Javanese is in EK, 1(). On catalogue rhetoric ami comparative interpretaiion, American-style, see Boon, Verging, xiii, 267–76, passim.

[38] James loon. Other r rihes, Other Scribes (New ١ ork: Cambridge University Press, .19)82), 2l [39] Geertz’s “Culture and Social Change: The Indonesian Case” (Man N.s. 19 [1884]: 51 1–52), does nearly demonize (and justihably) “economism”—reductionist assumptions riddling both development planners and Marxist theorists in their not-dissimilar reactions to his Agricultural Involution: an earlier theoretical foe, similarly reductionist, was “psychologism.” For more thoughts on ،·relative relativism,” see Boon, Verging, XV, chap. lذ Boon, Other Tribes, chap. 5.

[40] I cite Lady (.batterley s Lover’s lapse (vaulting?) into brogue from memory—more authoiitatoc (if we behe١e I lai old !؛loom on his) than the text. ٢ hat I am not native to this dialect may cause pause. On rereading (both style and substance) Geertz and others, see James Boon, Showbiz as a Cross-Cultural System: Circus and Song, Garland and Geertz, Rushdie, Mordden ... and More,” Cultural Anthropology 15, no. 5 (2000): 424–5(ş; and Boon, ١ eiging, chaps. 1, 3–6. Space restrictions here preclude noting other recent studies of Geertz’s work.

[41] Weber’s extiavagant parsing and etymologizing of Beruf expands over many footnotes in his The Protestant Ethic arid the spirit نCapitalism; several complete translations into English now exist, including Stephen Kalberg’s (Los Angeles: Roxbury Publishing, 200)2: see 180–87). Space restrictions here preclude adequate notes (if such a thing is imaginable) on Weber, or even on his notes. Following Geertz, I have stressed the challenge of Weberian sweep in four books: Verging; Affinities and Extremes (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990): Other Tribes; and The Anthropological Romance of Pall (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977): all of these try to address comparative institutional specifics. Navigating Weber’s vastness can be daunting; on Weber’s contrastive Verstehens of a “calling to commensality,” see James Boon, “The Cross-Cultural Kiss: Edwardian and Earlier, Postmodern and Beyond,” Skomp Distinguished Lectures in Anthropology, University of Indiana, 1997.

[42] See also AL, 255–56: and re-peruse Geertzwerk on back to Negara (1980), Islam Observed (1967), and the essays on “new states” in Interpretation of Cultures, an earlier appraisal of what has become today’s “world in pieces” (AL, chap. 11).

 References

<biblio>

Boon, James A. 1999. Verging on Extra-vagance : Anthropology, History, Religion, Literature, Arts ... Showbiz. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Geertz, Clifford. ٢ 1 9601976 l. The Religion of fava. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

——. 1983. Local „ * New York:

Basic Books.

——. 2000. Available Light: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical Topics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

</biblio>

 Clifford Geertz on Time and Change

Wondering how to tell of his life and thoughts as an anthropologist, Clifford Geertz wrote:

<quote>

Time, this sort of (ii١١c, I١،٦i·r personal pa!·(cocational, parr political, parr (١ ١1٤١)١١[that might mean) philosophical, doe·١ not flo١١’ like some ١ast ri١[·]er catching lip ،l l l Ills trıbııta lies and heading toward some final sea or cara ract, hut as larger and smaller Streams, twisting and turning and 1١١,)١ and then crossing, running together for ،١ ١1١11 separating again. Nor does It mo١e in shorter and longer cycles and durations, superimposed one upon another as a complex ١١١١ tor an harmonic analyst to factor our. It is nor histor) one IS faced with, nor biograph), but a contusion of histories, a swarm of biographies. I here is order m it all of some sort, but It is the order of Tsquall or ،l street market.[43]

</quote>

That quotation suggests some ot the reasons Clifford Geertz has had such a powerful impact on historians, immensely creatne tor some, irritating and frightening for others. In past)ears, he has taught historians especially 1(١١١ ١ to make sense of repeated forms of telling beha١ior—the restless movement and confrontations of a Moroccan marabout, the blood and betting ot the 1 ahnese cockfight. In future years, his work can provide historians W’ith ١١١١ s of thinking about and metaphors for describing longer-term change in a world that IS both precariously post-colonial and threatened with universal monarchy.

Clifford Geertz’s techniques for obsening, understanding, and writing about Indonesia and Morocco burst upon the horizon of historians like hl eworks back in the 1 Os. Iwo concerns drew’ younger historians to his ١١oik. ٢ ١lie \١as the need to understand ceremonial, liturgical, festi١e ،11 ١1Tothet foi ms of S)mbohc beha١ ior. Social historians often ignored these beha\iors as irrational ·· or reduced them to practical uses like gioup sohdai lt) ١: confessional historians simply took them for granted as (Ilk ،ר١ع١l God-gi١en. lר ١r me and m) students, it was (lift s Interpretation <)/ (liltines of 3 9 l that brought the message of the multiple meanings of religious belief and practice. I low many clues these essays gave US as we struggled to understand, say, the strange almost liturgical forms of religious violence in the sixteenth century.

The second appeal of Cliff's work to historians lay in its focus on a limited space—a town, a compotmd, a bazaar—and an intensely significant and observable local event, out of which could be teased a world of meaning and an enduring style of living. I am sure Cliff has had enough of historians who place themselves under the banner ofhis Balinese cockfight and thick description—sometimes delivering only sparse and ephemeral stories—but it is nonetheless true that his essays are, like Carlo Cinzburg's 1 he Cheese and the Worms, among the founding texts for North American microhistory.

Such moves had their critics among historians. What about historical change? they asked. Anthropology may be just fine for depicting systems and their fissures, but how does it account for, say, the change from the domination of the peoples of the East Indies by the Dutch to the domination of the archipelago by the Jakarta-based Indonesian government? Cliff himself recalls this objection in a 1 990) essay: " ! here seem to be historians, their anthropological educations having ended with Malinowski or begun with Levi-Strauss, who think that anthropologists, mindless of change or hostile to it, present static pictures of immobile societies scattered about in remote corners of the inhabited world."[44]

Change is everywhere in the writings of Clif ford Geertz. It is part of his story of peoples, communities, economic sites, religions, scholarly disciplines, and individual lives. The change is usually initiated or described as coming from outside rather than emerging from an instability or conflict within the town, polity, religious formation, or person. T he "forces" or big processes of change are the familiar ones: in Islam Observed of 1 968, they are "the industrial revolution. Western intrusion and domination, the decline of the aristocratic principle of government, and the triumph of radical nationalism.” These are Cliff’s shorthand ways of helping readers understand what intervened between “the classical styles” of Islamic sensibility and practice in .Morocco and Indonesia and “the scripturalist interlude.” In 1995, in reflecting on the political style of Indonesia and .Morocco as these independent countries maneuver for a place in the world, he draws upon “the rearrangements of global power relations, trade flows and cultural affiliations that the decolonization of Asia and Africa set in motion between the late forties and the early eighties.” Decolonization, along with global migration, is also a critical variable in shifts in the discipline of anthropology and the goals and worries of its practitioners in the late twentieth century: “the transformation,” as he says in Works ami Lires, “partly juridical, partly ideological, partly real, of the people aitthropologists mostly write about, from colonial subjects to sovereign citizens.”[45]

Cliff’s originality in describing change lies not in identifying well-known variables or in establishing long chains of causation—a procedure he rejects even on expository grounds—but in other intellectual and literary actions. He makes an up-close analysis of the agents and impact of external change on whatever cultural complex, production, or set of lives he is describing, noting with elegant precision the signs of “before” and “after,” and yet finding that a fundamental fashion of local doing and thinking is surprisingly durable. lurther, he reveals the possibilities in and viabilities of these durable styles and practices so as to undermine rigid stage theories and other linear models of historical change. Instead he offers fresh metaphors for imagining historical moventent.

I (> illustrate some of these points, who can forget Cliff’s contrast between the Moroccan Sefrou he knew in 1963 and the Sefrou he saw in I 986? ‘!‘he walled market town, with its age-old population of Arabs and Jews, whose variations and dissimulations could still be put together in a book with ethnographic chapter headings, had given way to a swollen population of (ال Arab families—“rhe real Sefrouis”—and Berber new-comers from the countryside, the specialized sections of town dissolved into diffuse urban sprawl. What kind of order could he make of that “instant jumble?” he asked himself, feeling that the transformed Sefrou had also changed hilt, as knower.[46]

And yer Cliff does hud centuries-old continuities after all, in the ways power is lodged in personages: in marabours with their baraka, scholars with their competing claims to legitimation, judges and other notables of the mosques, the markets, and the government offices, all struggling for and constantly shifting alliances. I he loyalty and friendship tmderlying “bargained-out dependency relarions,” is still at the heart of things as it was five hundred years before in the days of the Moroccan traveler “Leo Africanus.”[47] There are other enduring styles, moderated, adjusted, recast in new circumstances, but still recognizable. On the political level, it is the same ()Id task: ،‘building up something that looks like governance our of locally anchored personal loyalties.” Muhammad / transformed the sultanate in the first years of Moroccan independence but succeeded because he assumed the persona of the maraboutic king. In torn Sefrou, the conflict between ()ﻻ and new inhabitants was fought our, if nor resolved, in 1986, on common rurf: the color of buildings, the facades of private dwellings, of great moments in a land where architecture has long been a feature of morality.[48]

Cliff’s treatment of Indonesia has a similar mixture of transformative ruptures and long-term social, aesthetic, and religious styles, which shift, react, and persist. In Works and Lines and After the Fact, he describes the play between historical change, large and local, on the one hand, and the anthropological approach and literary style of individual anthropologists on the other. Precise historical context is of critical importance in setting the objectives for the anthropologist. For Ruth Benedict, the occasion for Patterns of Culture was the interwar quest by anthropologists for basic patterns in human societies; for The Chrysanthemum and the Sivord, the political concerns with japan during and after World War II. But Cliff’s brilliant chapter depicts Benedict embarked throughout these different contexts, from Starr to finish, on moral satire of Swiftian dimensions, her “rhetorical strategy” being, in Cliffs words, “the juxtaposition of the all-too-familiar [us] and the wildly exotic [them] in such a way that they change places.”[49]

Cliffs self-portrait in After the Fact and in his Haskins lecture has the same dialectic between historical settings, style, and self. The social science atmosphere of Harvard right after the war, the interdisciplinary milieu of the University of Chicago in the 19605, the confrontational life at the Institute for Advanced Study all shaped his plans, even while he describes himself as lighting on Indonesia and ،Morocco simply by good luck. Along with this story of changing institutional scenes and a somewhat Chaplinesque fashion of approaching the mysteries of Javanese and ،Moroccan towns is the story of the early emergence and persistence of his belief that “the study of meaning, the vehicles of meaning, and the understanding of meaning” were at the heart of his anthropological research. In retrospect he sees himself grappling with this goal already as he worked on his doctoral dissertation, The Religion of Jana. “ I he rest is postscript,” he quips and recounts how he has followed the hermeneutic path for forty years, delighted to find that people in other fields were starting off in the same direction.[50]

As an admiring reader of Cliff’s books, I was surprised to come upon this story of sameness in his autobiographical writings. It had seemed دالم me l\\ةأ Peddlers mid Princes, The Religion (دأ Java, Agricultural Involution had multiple and sometimes-conflicting goals—social, functional, and cultural (in the sense of style, affect, and ideas) —and that the study of meaning was a new step that grew out of an early creative conflier. Here I may be projecting from my own experience when as a social historian in 1969 I extended my study of “consciousness” to include a vast space of actions and forms and felt I had really changed.

Cliff ponders often the question of how to narrate the past: Historicizing yourself I he writesl, dividing your past into periods, is an uncomfortable sort of thing to do. It is uncomfortable not just for the obvious reason that the further you move from the beginning the closer you come to the end, but because there are so many ways to do it; any particular one seems arbitrary, rooted in very little else but narrative.[51]

Already in Ishim observed, in 1968, he was running through the choices for explaining and narrating change—indexical (that is, following through a predetermined mark of change like the decline of magic), typological (“primitive,” “medieval,” “modern”) and evolutionary—and finding them all wanting.[52] Certainly, Cliffs demonstration of the continning viability, flexibility, and creativity of core cultural styles would place him in opposition to any linear evolutionary scheme. Likewise with his treatment of bazaars in Java and :Morocco as tenable economic and information-swapping institutions; he is willing to use the concept of “modern” in After the Fact, but only in the plural as “modernities.”

Especially interesting are Cliffs experiments with new ways of conceiving and telling about time and change. Already in a study of 1968 he found a fresh language for describing an economic situation that most historians would hastily characterize as “static,” or “stagnant.” In the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries, the Dutch “superimposed their colonial economy” on the productive and labor-intensive wet-rice agriculrural system of the island of Java. During the nineteenth century, sugar production took land away from the peasants of the rice paddies and brought profits to the Dutch. Ar the same time, the Javanese population soared and rice production increased. [53] (Jiff accounts for this by a process of “involution,” a term drawn from discussions of artistic design and which his keen eye for patterns in behavior led him to apply to agricultural and social practices. In involution, a fully formed cultural pattern, rather than remaining static or breaking and turning into something new, “continues to develop by becoming internally more complicated.” With no increase in land and Ito alternative, say, in manufacture, the Javanese peasants elaborated on then land-mtensive patterns so as to incorporate their expanded numbers. The paddy fields became places of “internal elaboration and ornateness; technical hairsplitting, and unending virtuosity”:

And this late (lOthic quality of agriculture increasingly pervaded the \\ hole 1UK1I economy: tenure systems grew more intricate, tenancy relationships more complicated; cooperative labor arrangements more complex—all in an effort to provide everyone with some niche, however small, in the over-all system.[54]

We see Cliff’s temporal imagination at work twenty years later as he characterizes Levi-Strauss’s body of writings. Cliff rejects current views that they should be understood in terms of linear progress—first Levi-Strauss studied nature, then culture, then behavior, then thought—or that, on the contrary, they should be seen as an unchanging structuralist program turned (III different subjects one after another. Instead the movement is “centrifugal,” and 7rules lropiques—a midstream book, which fits neither scheme—is the “arch-text.” As Cliff puts it: all Levi-Strau,s’ι works, even those published before / ristes Tropiques, can be viewed ‘as partial unpackings of it, developments of particular strains present, embryonically at least and usually much more fully than that, in this, the most multiplex of his writings.”[55]

When I read this, I begin to think about whether a historian could use an arch-text or an arch-event to erase the chronology of a sequence, but to imagine a very different way that something in the middle could be related ε(ر W’hat went before and what came afterward.

Finally, Cliff’s book After the fact is a fascinating effort to reconfigure time. Its order is not that of a mere squall, to return to the quoration with which I opened these remarks, nor is it as hard to fathom as the crisscrossings at a bazaar. But it have multiple histories and biographies, as sites, persrms, decades, and themes are returned to with different questions and perspectives and as Clifford Geertz appears in all of them, “coming and going and knocking about,” “trying to find |his| feet in all sorts of places,” “go|ing| if not forward at least onward.”[56] To his words of self-description, we would add: observing and interpreting rhmgs deeply and anew’, opening W’ays of understanding people close to home and far away, telling US about the world in a prose W’hose rhythm captures voice and mind, and writing about himself with the humor and detachment that are the true mark of greatness.

[43] Clifford Geertz, *After the Fact: Two Countries, Four Decades, One Anthropologist (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995), 2.

[44] Clifford Ceert✓., “History and Anthropology,” initially published in Xeiv Literary //o،or> 990[1:, and reprinted in Available Light :Princeton: Princeton University Press, 20Mb 118–19.

[45] s. (..Motd (ietro, !slant ()bserved: Religious Develo|iment m Morocco and Indonesia (New Haven: ١’ale University Press, 1968), 56–57; After the Fact١ 89; Works and Lives: The Anthropologist as Author (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1988), 132.

[46] Geertz, After the Fact, 1 1–17.

[47] I am currently completing a book on ··Leo Africanus,’’ that is, the early-sixteenth-century traveler and diplomat as Hasan ibn Muhammad as-Wazzan, and am rinding Clifford Geertz’s writings very helpful in putting questions to my texts of 500 years ago.

[48] Geertz, After the Fact· 27, 29, 33, 58–59, 152–64; Islam observed, 74–82.

[49] Geertz, Works and Lives· 106.

[50] Geertz, After the Fact١ 104, I 14, I 19; Clifford Geertz, “A Life of Learning,” The Charles Homer Haskins Lecture for 1999, ACLS Occasional Paper, no. 45, 1999, 14.

[51] Geertz, After the Fact· 109.

[52] Geertz, Islam observed, 57–59: also, After the Fact, 1–2.

[53] Clifford Geertz, Agricultural Involution: The Process of Ecological change in Indonesia (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968), chap. 4.

[54] Geertz, Agricultural Involution· 80–82. Geertz's use of "late Gothic" evokes Johann Huyzinga's celebrated book, The Waning of the Middle Ages: A Study of the Forms of Life, Tbougbtι and Alt m ¥ι*auce mid the Netlei'Lmds m tie XIVtb mid XVtb CentιιιιesƔ\ι\l\ι\ ι had rirst appeared in Dutch just after World War I and in English translation in 1924, with many SUbsequent editions.

[55] Geertz, Works and Laves, 32.

[56] Ibid., 134–35.

 Happenstance and Patterns

LIFFORD GEERTZ EXEMPLIFIES the interpretive mind at its besr, the anthropologist finding himself here or there, in a sirnation that seems half familiar, half utterly strange, himself often uncertain which is which. Sometimes finding himself in the middle of those situations, sometimes at the edge, often not sure which is which, Geertz, cast as Honɔo Anthropologicus is having, and spending the time of his life interpreting What's What. In all these ways, Homo Interpretes is also an actor, an agent provocateur, a deft negotiator engaged in finding/giving an account, a reckoning of The Scene that might, as he puts it, make sense of sensibility. "Interpreter": the etymology derives from Latin, inter pres, a go-between, a negotiator, a broker. The anthropologist living in the field, crafting the right phrase or negotiating with his academic clan, is engaged in a practical activity. Thought is, as Geertz says, a moral act; moral acts are social; they have political presuppositions and implications.

Once upon a time, the activity of interpretation was treated as observational and speculative. The anthropologist was passive in the field, active in his study, in both cases Mind at work discovering underlying forms of Societies (Cultures). After his initiation in the field, the anthropologist was set to become a solitary scholar, construing his notes in order to decipher his society's structures, his culture's coded system of signs and symbols. Unlike the original etymological understanding of interpretation as fundamentally active and transactional, the metaphors of unveiling, deciphering, construing posed a metaphysical dilemma: either there is a basic Fact ofThe Matter that the anthropologist attempts to discover and articulate ... or his descriptive analyses are shadows cast (on what?) by a beholder (in which of the beholder's personae?). Geertz has shown US how to avoid the hopeless heroics of facing such unresolvable metaphysical dilemmas: take a detour around the dead-end metaphors of the solitary observing, deciphering mind ... or, better: so multiply metaphors that the sting of any one set causes no inflammation.

Geertz's essays have shown US how to bypass the mind-deadening theory-defining "isms" that formed the combat zones where academic careers were won or lost. Many of these theories quickly escalated to metatheories that were implausibly ranged as forced options: rednctivism vs. constructivism, biologisin vs. psychologism, phenomenology vs. science, behaviorism vs. ctiltnralism, structuralism vs. functionalism, universalism vs. pluralistic localism, relativism and anti-relativism and anti anti-relativism, and so forth, all ranged to fight in endless unresolvable battles on an otherwise empty plain, without anyone being clear about what, if anything, might be at stake. Like Dewey, Geertz has taken US through these oppositions, analyzed their sources, placed them in a larger conceptual field, reconciled/overcome their apparent opposition, and then acknowledged them again. His own strategy against schemes and systems of dichotomies has a characteristic plot. He first shows that the oppositions are mutually dependent. For instance, the claims of radical relativism pre-suppose enough common understanding to locate differences: identifying structural units presupposes hypotheses about their functions, and functional hypotheses occur in a structured field; the task of defining individuated units of behavior presupposes a system of cultural categories. Having defused oppositions, Geertz then introduces third and fourth mediating categories, and then—with a deft turn—preserves the insights of the original opposition, There is, as Geerrz has himself remarked, Dewey in his method. Bur unlike Dewey, and like Hegel, Geerrz has a historical understanding of the rise and fall of the opposition of “isms”; and unlike Hegel, and like Dewey, Geertz’s historical understanding casts no meta-physical shadows. Unfortunately both Hegel and Dewey were burdened with a dense and muddy style whose vague abstractions were surprisingly unreflective. Apparently lackiirg irony, their philosophical confidence remained unperturbed by self-criticism. Unlike the philosophers, Geertz undermines premature neatness with a wealth of examples and inimitable ironic asides, construing ancient epics and sacred texts, interpreting artworks and locating the insights of the latest intellectual witnderkindeii (“Deep Hanging Out,” “The State of the Art”).

Having undermined and reconstituted what is living and what is dead in the standard fashionable “isms,” Geertz has also put the apparently interminable wars between the faculties to rest. He has sorted out and adjudicated the claims, appropriations, and renunciations of anthropology by historians, legal and political theorists, philosophers, and natural scientists, rejecting “the historicist/scientist dichotomy” ... 1’deja vu all ovei again l and put them all in their commingled and opposing places, welcoming help wherever he can get it but firmly refusing reductive domination whenever it appears. Starting from a modest recognition of Where One Is and a circumscribed sense of what one is trying to understand — “less than Everything, less than “Society,” “Man, “Woman,” or some other grand elusive upper-case entity”—Geertz reveals his distrust for the grandiose and his taste for the specific. As usual, the best way to convey Geertz’s message is to quote him: “The conjoining of History and Anthropology is not a matter of fusing two academic fields into Something-or-Other, but redefining them in terms of another.... Sorting things out into ... what happened and what we can say about what happened will not, in the end, really do.... In the end nothing will really do.... [To understandl history-anthropology relations in action is not a deliberate tacking between variant modes of discourse, but an unintended, almost happenstance convergence of them upon a common concern: the enmeshment of meaning in power.”[57]

I want to add an item to our wish list for Geertz’s next act. The motif of the respective roles of chance and happenstance in the unfolding of a culture’s history—or for that matter, of an individual life—is played out in every phase of Geertz's thought. \'et—perhaps profoundly influenced by the happenstance of his early work in Bali—he is also a persistent and even relentless pattern-Hnder. Despite his impatience with forced oppositions, the implicit tension between the pervasiveness of chance and the continuing discovery of patterns has been a driving theme in his work. The theme is explicit in his discussion of odds-on gambling in "Deep Play, Notes on the Balinese Cockfight"; it reaches a crescendo in "Passage and Accident" and in his more recent philosophically reflective writings. The dramas of happenstance have always been present in his vivid ethnographic descriptions: the unexpected, unrehearsed events following a police raid on a Balinese cockfight, the authorial pride of a Javanese informant,[58] the multiply intersecting dramas and rituals of nineteenth century Balinese governance show a people struggling to encompass— to integrate—the inevitability of chance coincidence in a culture in which every event, every turn of object evinces a plenitude of significance and meaning. As he tells it, for such cultures, no leaf falls without a message ... everything, but absolutely everything has a place in a significant pattern. The interplay between the cockfight and the patterned rituals of gambling, the independent but interlocked multiple "political" organizations serve as star examples of the integration of happenstance and pattern. On the one hand, as luck would have it, many independent lines happen to coincide in the outcome of the cockfight. That's why it can be a betting matter. On the other, there is a pattern —an implicit rule—in the permissible alignment of odds in the betting, and that pattern, right in the middle of a chance event, replicates and reinforces the pervasive social and meaningful configuration of the culture. l he rheme develops the searing contrast—and the Balinese resolution—between the jolting recognition of the pervasiveness of chance and happenstance (on the one hand) and the universal verve, indeed the obsession wirh finding patterns, significantly meaning-laden patterns.

If chance incidents only involved a set of contingencies along one narrative line, they could be significantly integrated by stretching probability. Bur the fortuitous, accidental conjunction of a set of independent narrarive lines, each of them itself contingent is another matter altogether.[59] The kind of happenstance that co-incidenrally, accidentally conjoins several independent contingent narrative lines evokes some of our profound existential anxieties. We fear the pervasiveness of chance in marrers of grear personal or political moment, just when the hope—the need—of guiding intelligence is greatest.

For contemporary liberals, there is the further moral chill: the effects of chance aren’t always egalitarian. Even if there is plenty of chance to go around, its impact is more far-reaching on some people, some cultures, some economic classes than on others. Just when we think luck has been on our side, we see how inconstant it is. It is not only a matter of being subject to the erratic turn of events. Pervasive chance undermines the very idea of agency, let alone (what is confidently called) “rational agency.” When we recognize the extent—the scope— of the uninrended consequences of our actions, the claims of intentional and meaningful purposive action begins to seem naively childish, if not downright churlish, d o be sure, chance happenstance is by Ito means all there is; after all, even chaos is only recognizable against the background of the expectation of a particular order or of a consequential narrative. Even advanced postmodern films are charged by recognizable regularities.

Geertz has been the master dramatist of the ramifications of cliff-hanging chance events. But he is also a master diviner of cultural patterns and of the patterns of internally and externally impelled dynamics of cultural transformations. (Let’s have done wirh the critical complaints that Geertz’s ethnographies present cultures as overly unified, simplified and static themes, modes or styles. Ear from being reductive, he has consistently analyzed the dynamics of intracultural conflicts between priests and peddlers, urban people and villagers, high and low art.) A culture’s continuously transformative and transforming expressions of such conHicts are the ingredients of its forms and structures. The dynamic relations among events pervades the dynamics of interpretation, ! racing the drama of such transformations, a Geertz ethnography follows the shifts in the continuously negotiated and contested character—and even the boundaries—of a culture. As the case requires, the organizing scheme of an interpretation may be economic, political, metaphysical, or psychological; it may take the form of history or a drama, a statistical table or a sacred text... most likely, all of the above, the emphasis may rest on kinship structures (Kinship ill Bali), on statistical correlations , tural Involution), the multilayered turns of multiperspectival dramatic narratives (Negara), the complex patterns manifest in the interaction— the fusion—of religion, law, ideology, and politics (Islam Observed, The Interpretation of Culture, ıʃo ŏ Meaning and Order in Moroccan Society.

Geertz has, in all of these ethnographical studies, vividly analyzed the integrative strategic resolutions between the disquieting interpenetration of pervasive chance and pervasive patterns: the deep play of Balinese cock-fight gambling, the dramas of the shifts in their multiple political allegiances and the geo-political dynamics of legal, political, and economic organization in Sefrou, Morocco. Those resolutions may be very well for the Balinese and Moroccans. But the metaphysical problems that stir-round the opposition of sheer happenstance and constitutive patterns are merely problems about the limits of our understanding of causation, and they cannot always be resolved by symbolic rituals. They are direct, practical questions for interpretive anthropologists. What is the stance of the interpretive anthropologist, acutely aware of the chance happenstance coincidences of his fieldwork—indeed of his own intellectual history—but who is nevertheless committed to elucidating “the patterns of culture?”

The motif of the pervasiveness of happenstance has moved to the fore-front as a central motif in Geertz’s recent philosophical and Zeitgeistliche autobiographical reflections on the methods of multidisciplinary cultural studies (Local Knowledge and Available Light). He recognizes that the events of his life, the turns of his thought could have gone this way or that.... It so happened that his teacher at Antioch was George Geiger... it so happened that Geiger was Dewey’s last graduate student.... Speaking of his first fieldwork, he remarks, “Once again I caught the wave.... As improbably and casually as we had become anthropologists, and just about as innocently, we became Indonesianists.” We happened to be present W’hen the police raided an illegal cockfight, ... and we happened to run into a villager’s compound, and we all managed to support one another’s stories ... and after that, everything changed.... As luck would have it, my informant was—or wanted to be—a writer and so I lent him my typewriter ... but... one day it happened ... and so on.

Must Geertz follow Isaiah Berlin and Charles I aylor in classifying the world of happenstance and that of patterns as among the irreconcilable, incommensurable forms of life?[60] In this case, there is no escaping the need for ،l resolution. Consider the possibility of a world—a form of life—whose essential thematic interpretive heuristic is: “The meaning of every event is unintelligible. Events involve coincidental intersections of sequences of events that are themselves disjointed, unpatterned, unintended and unpredictable.” Such a world would not have any stable practices; it is not even coherent. A culture pervaded by a chance-ridden outlook would issue in a life entirely composed of Ionesco conversations randomly interspersed with Beckett reflections. Even if such a form of life were conceivable, we are nor—in this case—able to choose between chaos and order, as if they were two comprehensive, bur inconrpatible ways of life. Neither individuals nor cultures can choose between a life permeated by chance conjunctions of rime and place and one patterned by regularities of strongly defined social roles, friendships, and feuds, a mode of life that exhibits and largely follows a pattern that significantly organizes the movements of individuals and the meanings of institutions.

Nor can the contrast between happenstance and pattern be assimilated to other, more safely theoretical, less existentially vertiginous contrasts: between subjectivity and objectivity for instance, or between free will and necessity, or phenomenology and science. As we experience them, happenstance and pattern are mutually pervasive, They inhabit the same terrain. The reductively simplistic psychological suggestion that the quest for patterns is a function of the terror of chance only introduces another pattern, as does the apparently soothing recommendation that looking for patterns in chance events elicits them.

Geertz himself exhibits and reflects on another kind of resolution of chance and patterns. Uis style is, as Richard Shweder has said, spectacular. It can t be ignored. The style is the man; the medium is the message. l he sentences of Geertz’s later autobiographical and zeitgeisf-mapping essays are palimpsests of distinctive moments of a complex thought. l hey twist and turn, leap and bound; they are interrupted by tangential asides. I hey are lyrical yet earthy, directly confrontational yet evasive. l hey are self-conscious exhibitions and commentaries on the very process of thought, exemplifying assertion, qualification, reflection and counter-reflection on sheer happenstance, even as it affects the authorial stance. l lere I stand; like many others, I might well have thought otherwise, and may yet do so, but for the moment … here is how it seems to me. Asking whether the good fortune of his “charmed life, in a charmed time” is still available for young anthropologists, Geertz says, “It is difficult to be certain. The matter is sub indice... . There does seem to be a fair amount of malaise about.... !It is probably not altogether wise just now to take unnecessary chances.... I do not know how much of this is accurate, how much it presents a passing condition ... how much an alteration, rich and strange, in the structure of chance and possibilities.” He reflects that he no longer advises younger colleagues to stay loose, take risks, follow their own bent, This is not merely a modest fallibilism; it is, in the reflection and the rhythm of the prose, the practical, transactional and morally sensitive recognition of the fusion of chance and pattern. Speaking of the lessons he learned ill fieldwork Geertz says, “I remain calm and unfazed ؛about the culture wars, about the downfalling of anthropology and just about everything else] not so much above the battle as beside it, skeptical of its very assumptions.” He adds, “and the rest is post script, the working out of happenstance and fate.” But in truth, the rest is the beginning of the next act, the next turn of thought. Geertz accepts the moral obligation he enjoins: to continue conversation, to reflect on the tragedy and farce of having to address the endless return of repressed oppositions. Think of Geertz—the man and his style—as exemplifying Dewey’s philosophic generosity, Isaiah Berlin’s erudition, and Mark Twain’s wry ironic asides, “the working out of happenstance fate.”

[57] ل . ٢د\١١ةآلأ٢١«:غآأ١ Available Eight: Anthrojiological Reflections on PhilosophicalTopics (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000)), 127–28.

[58] Clifford Geertz, “Thinking as a .Moral Act: Ethical Dimensions of Anthropological Field Work in the New States,” Antioch Review 27 (1968).

[59] See Aristotle, Physics, 2, 196b 30ff.; and James Lenman, “Consequentialism and Cluelessness,” Philosophy and Public Affairs 24, no. 4 (20)0)0)).

[60] See haiah Berlin, The Sense of Reality (New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1997) and Charles Taylor, “Conflicts of Modernity,” chapter 25 in his Sources o/ the Self (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989).

 Geertz’s Concept or Culture in Historical Context

How He Saved the Day and Maybe tie Century

James Peacock

MY OBJECTIVE IS TO HIGH 1.1 GUT one of Geertz’s contributions by reminding US of historical context. I contend that he saved anthropology and the wider society from a great loss at a dangerous point in anthropology’s history.[61]

In 196ü Clifford Geertz published his first book, The Religion of Java. The previous year he had published an important article in the American Anthropologist, “Ritual and Social Change: A Javanese Example.” The book, which was essentially his doctoral dissertation at Harvard with theoretical discussions deleted and a new descriptive conclusion, paralleled in some ways the several works of Max Weber, such as Religion of India and Religion of China, etc., which were parts of the larger Afsatze Zur Religionssoziologie. the article, as we know, introduced anthropologisrs to a concept of culture based on the theories of Talcott Parsons and Pitirim Sorokin, that culture was a system of symbols, ideas, and values, integrated in a logico-meaningful mode, in contrast to a causal-functional mode that better characterized social systems. Geertz provided a suggestive analysis of a Javanese funeral whose tensions, he argued, derived from a clash between the two kinds of systems.

What else was happening in anthropology at this time—rhe late I 90s, early 19605: Two things: deaths and births. In 1960 Clyde Kluckhohn died, lit I 958 Alfred Kroeber gave a swan song at the American Anthropological Association meetings, then died in the early 1960s. Kluckhohn and Kroeber (1952) had authored the scholarly survey of concepts of culture and represented a humanistic and holistic heritage of American cultural anthropology, which drew on German philosophical traditions transmitted by Boas and others. With their deaths, anthropology lost champions of a humanistic and holistic perspective on culture.

Around the same time, new schools were born. Two that had great impact were structuralism and ethnoscience. Structuralism was announced by Claude Levi-Strauss in his 1955 essay “The Structural Study of Myth,” and ethnoscience, otherwise known as componential analysis or cognitive anthropology, broached by Ward Goodenough in his 1956 article “Residence Rules” in the Southwestern Journal ()/ Anthropology, followed by work by Conklin, Frake, Lounsbury, and others (see Goodenough’s “Componential Analysis” in Science, 1967, volume 156). While differing greatly, the two schools shared similarities. Both focused on thought, the mind, either of an individual or a collectivity, as embodied in symbols— language, mythology, kinship systems, and terminologies. Both laid bare the logical structure of these systems. And both tended to see those logics as disembodied, as abstracted from life and action, so that the structures could be analyzed mathematically and technically, by formulas and even computers.

Why was this a dangerous situation for anthropology? A vacuum was opening up with the death of champions and a decline of a great tradition of culture. Contending to fill this vacuum were these new schools such as structuralism and ethnoscience, which were having a large impact. Levi-Strauss’s impact is widely known, but within anthropology ethno-science, too, attracted much attention, for example, dominating the special publication list of AAA during the early 19605. Boasting strengths, their weaknesses were notable. Ethnoscience especially narrowed the concept of culture to ethnosemantics and narrowed ethnographic fieldwork to procedures of eliciting terms from informants so as to define their cognitive models. Structuralism is vast in compass but also reduces culture to cognition, of a sort. Neither ethnoscience nor structuralism treated the dynamics of whole societies, nations, for example, or global movements and the meaningful or cultural dimensions of them. Nor did they sustain the rich humanistic insights of Benedict (1943), Mead (1953), or Kroeber (1944) who, whatever their excesses, confronted large patterns, be they Native American, Japanese, Soviet, or great waves of history, and did so with dash, flair, and comparative breadth. Should these be replaced by either narrow techniques or by brilliant but abstruse models? Anthropology was in danger of selling its birthright for thin porridge.

Geerrz to the rescue. As the grand old traditions died and the barbarians or flaneurs threatened at the gate, he brought forward a perspective that at once sustained and developed the great tradition while providing a workable alternative to the challengers. He did this by adapting from a sociological tradition not previously salient in American cultural anthropology. This was the Weberian tradition, filtered through Talcott Parsons, now shaped and anthropologized by Geertz. T his is not to reduce Geertz to Weber or Parsons but to acknowledge their influence, as he does himself and as can be traced through his graduate student papers in the 1950s prepared in seminars with Parsons, on down to his published works. My emphasis here, though, is not origins of Geertz's thinking, which is complex, and on which he himself has elaborated somewhat, in After the Fact (1995), and in his Haskins lecture at the American Council of Learned Societies (1999), but rather on what he contributed at this point in history.[62]

What did he contribute? Most importantly, a concept of culture and a demonstration of the importance of culture in life as a whole and especially as a way of defining meaning and shaping meaning in the midst of action and change.

In asserting this, I will confine my observations to his published sources during the period in question, that is, the decade extending from 1959 with his article on the Javanese funeral to his essay on the Balinese cock-fight published in 1972. These and other essays are collected in The Interbretation of Cultures, published in 1973. I also have in mind the books during this period, including his first, Religion of Java, and previous and subsequent ones (1956, 1963, 1965, 1968, 1980, 1983, 2000). I was never a student of Geertz, so my knowledge is based primarily on published and unpublished works (plus, I might note, a delicious conversation in the held with one of his informants).

What underlying frame of reference may one abstract from Geertz's varied works? "Action," is basic. From human action, be it a funeral, a cockfight, or a revolution or meditation, ،ר community or a movement, one abstracts meanings: winks; a wink is a meaningful twitch. Detecting meaning entails "interpretation," or "thick description," and such interpretations are framed by a concept of culture, which one might quickly define as logico-meaningfully interrelated ideas, symbols, and values that bestow meaning. That concept of culture evolved through Geertz's writings. In his 1959 paper on the funeral, culture is a system of symbols, while by his 1972 paper on the cockfight, culture is a text one reads over an informants' shoulder. At other points in that decade, culture is ،l molding and shaping configuration, as in "Religion as a Cultural System." But always there s meaning, and meaning is bestowed by interrelated symbols, values, and ideas.

Such configurations of meaning boast a certain autonomy from social structures and processes, a point British social anthropologists such as Mary Douglas[63] never accepted from Geertz, but the meaning configurarions never become hermetically sealed, abstracted logical structures a la Geertxs ٢,<jfɹce١)t of Culture in :historical Cotrtext ss structuralism/ethnoscience. Rather they engage life, challenge and conflict with processes in society, whether local as in the funeral, or national and economic as in business and revolution.

What did this Geertzian notion of culture add or SUbtract? To the American cultural anthropology heritage, Geertz added a more limited and precise yet still pregnant concept of culture. Rather than a comprehensive rather vague label for all that is human and not biological, the notion holding sway from Tylor to Kroeber, Geertz's notion follows the Parsonsian view of culture as essentially ideational. To the British social anthropology heritage, he added this elaborated ideational dimension, distinct from yet dynamically interacting with social forces. To Weberian origins, he added anthropology—ethnography, life, the world, and especially the contemporary world. Culture through Geertz's influence became essential in understanding the new nations, Islam, politics, econoinic development, and history. Could this plethora of uses of culture have happened with either the older sprawling notion or the newer restrictive ideas? It did not.

So, jumping to today, many of US, working in varied spheres, inside and outside anthropology, find ourselves bumping into Geertz, sometimes eerily transformed. In my work, directing a center for international studies, he is there, expressed by politicians, security analysts, K-12 teachers among the 300 schools with whom we work, legislators, business people, and culture and political brokers, such as Gordon Smith, the creator of a global interactive museum, Exploris, which is at the center of an effort to internationalize an entire region focused around a state capital, Raleigh, North Carolina. All of these draw on a concept of culture, and one reason they do is Clifford Geertz.

I should not exaggerate. Their concept of culture is not explicitly Geertzian. The concept of culture seems to follow the old diffusionist age-area hypothesis: the older idea has spread wider and deeper than the newer one. So for most of these workers outside academia, culture is not the streamlined Geertzian notion, certainly not the tendentious intellectualist transformations some of US have created even more recently, but the older vague notions that were brought forward by iMargaret Mead and others. Exploris even has Mead enshrined along with Einstein, Jung, and many others in stained-glass windows replacing Christ and saints in a former church, and "culture" is used in the sense of way of life, cultures, which mix and mingle in the increasingly diverse life of everyone in the society revolving around the future manifested in the museum and surrounding evolving downtown community. Still, Geertz's concept sustained and developed the older notion within academic circles, which in turn have nourished and sustained the broader influence of culture in wider circles. What began in 1959 as a crisp refinement of a concept of culture has spread and evolved in interaction with myriad streams of life and thinking that have brought culture thinking, of various kinds, to the fore. In that wider process, Geerrz work is foundational —a kind of Ghost that haunts.

That ghost is difficult to exorcise. A concluding anecdote. In a class I have taught for many years, I require a hundred or so undergraduates each year to read Interpretations of Culture—until this year, when I decided to drop that book and replace it with Thomas Berry’s 7 be Great Work (1999), which exhorts US to save the earth and ventures bold generalizarions. A brilliant student, who happens to be blind, seats herself on the right hand with her dog, and challenges every bold assertion with relativisms drawn from Clifford Geertz. She (Danielle iredale) wrote on her final exam:

I am a radical relativist anthropologist. I believe that everything in the mentai, emotional, and spiritual lives of all human beings, as well as many of the supposedly biological or otherwise objectively physical elements of human existence, stem wholly from culture.

Later, Danielle upheld her point iti a formal debate at the DiPhi (Dialectical and Philosophical) Society, opposing Derek, another undergraduate from the course, who took a universalist stance.

What if Geerrz had not stepped forward to revitalize and enrich the concepr of culture at a critical point in anthropology’s history? Conceivably we would have replaced a broad and deep heritage with a more limited paradigm, and as a consequence both developments within the discipline and influences of the culrure concept in the wider society could have been stifled. A kingdom could have been lost for want of a horseshoe nail, or maybe a horse plus a nail and a knight. The discipline and the society are therefore in debt to Clifford Geertz.

 Coda: Thickening The Plot

History, as we know, is complex and constructed. While I stand by the version presented here—a rriumphalist narrative of Geertz as the hero who saved the discipline from a road best not traveled—I would admit that orhei st, earns wete flowing, other roads being paved. Following these side roads permits US also to note some histories nor included 111 standard accounts.

Dichotomizing the Geertzian and holistic/humanistic view of culture versus the structuralist/ethnoscientist view oversimplifies. Other imporrant movements in anthropology emerging in the 195Os and 1 96Os should be recalled as well. Within America was the ethnography ofcommnnication led by Dell Hymes and others. This approach kept alive Boasian interest in culture and language while grounding the linguistic turn within dynamic social process and community context. In Britain, a path breaking work was Edmund Leach's Political Systems of Highland Burma (1954). Leach here placed culture as a key factor in social process, tilting Kachin society toward democratic or authoritarian patterns, although this complex analysis emphasized primarily social change, with culture as only a factor and viewed primarily as content for social process rather than as a framing paradigm. Later, in Culture and Communication (1976), Leach would employ the term "culture" in a more developed way consonant with his neostructuralism. Coming from the]Manchester school led by Max Gluckman, Victor Turner's Schism and Continuity ill an African Society (1957) focused on ritual as a symbolic process correlated with complex and dynamic social process, an analysis also highly developed around that time by John Middleton (1960) and later T. o. Beidelman (1993). "Symbol" and "rite" rather than culture per se were the foci of these social anthropological studies, so that they developed nuanced insights into aspects of culture—symbol, rite, etc.—without naming them "culture" or elaborating a theory of culture as a whole, rather enriching a theory of ritual and symbols within a social anthropological tradition. Returning to the American context, specifically the Harvard context within which Geertz did his graduate work, it is worth noting roots of yet another stream, often termed "symbolic anthropology."

"Symbolic anthropology" is often identified with Chicago and especially colleagues of Geertz, notably David Schneider and Victor Turner, or students of Geertz and Schneider at Chicago (see, e.g., Patterson 200)1). Schneider, like Geertz, had studied at Harvard and was influenced by Parsons but developed cultural analysis in a parallel, not identical, line, the best example is his work on kinship as a cultural system, in which he elaborated a system or premises that underlay the practices in American family life (1 968). Students of Cieertz and Schneider at Chicago went on to elaborate their perspectives, sometimes using the label “symbolic anthropology.” Some historical interest may be served by noting the following, which, so far as I know, is not widely known, the term “symbolic anthropology” seemingly was first coined as a title of a series, “Symbolic Anthropology,” published by the University of Chicago Press, beginning with a monograph by me, Rites of Modernization (1968), followed by a second volume by Martin Silverman. This series was launched at Princeton University simultaneously with creating a program in anthropology that explicitly focused on the study of symbols. The program and series were created by David Crabb and me, who then brought iMartin Silverman from Chicago, and it ended with Silverman’s volume and his and my departures from Princeton. Later, James Boon, who took the first course I taught in Anthropology at Princeton (it was also his first course in that subject), went on to Chicago, and joined, then developed, the Geertzian stream.

A converging but little known history or prehistory to this development is this, which like Geertz and Schneider is partially traceable to Parsons. In spring 1960, three Hrst-year graduate students in the Social Anthropology department, Terrence Turner, Thomas Kirsch, and 1, enrolled in a seminar on the Sociology of Religion taught by Parsons and Robert Bellah. Bellah set out a perspective, “Notes on the Systematic Study of Religion,” which focused on symbols, while Parsons was also elaborating the cultural and especially “expressive symbols” dimension of his theory of action (later published as Part IV: Theories of Society, in 1961). Partly inspired by this Parsonsian/Bellah perspective as well as others we brought to the work, Turner, Kirsch, and I developed our own formulations as graduate students. In that seminar, Turner wrote a synthesis of the study of symbols while I worked through a case study, medieval mystics (Peacock 1969). Each of US then independently continlied to work on this perspective in varied contexts; thus my first publication was in archaeology, Academica Sinica. T urner went on to do fieldwork in Brazil on ritual, Kirsch in Thailand on Buddhism, and I in Indonesia, focusing on ludruk, a proletarian theater. By this time, Geertz had published Religion of java, which mentioned this form, and I sent him my field proposal, which he encouraged me to pursue. His work was hugely seminal for my project, but I also turned to other in fluences.

While indebted to Geertz, I found it necessary to trace in depth the communicative process by which streams of culture were born and SUStained (in this case by theater—see Dell Hymes's introduction to my Rites of Modernization). The lack of such analysis has lain behind later critiques of Geertz (e.g., Wikan I 990) as reifying culture, and proposals for "practice" as a focus later emerged by students of Geertz (e.g., Ortner 1999).

Should one probe even more circumstantially into the background of Geertz's perspective, one could go back to his fieldwork in java (see Fagg 1958). Geertz s Heldwork in Java was part of a team project overseen by Douglas Oliver. Ghosts of this project still reinained more than a decade later: in 1970, when I stayed with the family of Soedibdjo Markoes in the town named "Mojokuto," they were still riding the bicycle of Donaid Fagg, a member of Oliver's team, who had committed suicide, but whose Harvard disserration elaborated a cultural perspective on status and power that foreshadowed the work of Benedict Anderson on a cultural definition of power in Java (Fagg 1958). Histories remain to be written about the mutual ruminations of these team members that doubtless fed the perspective best known in association with Clifford Geertz.

 Development: Spreading The Word

Unearthing histories reminds US of the swirls of work and talk that were going on as Geertz was publishing his work and shaping thinking culture within anthropology and beyond, in humanistic and scholarly circles. Remarkable though understandable (and still to be plumbed) IS the sociology of know'ledge that would plot how and why his formulation came to stand for the many interrelated efforts; historians, for exampie, would routinely cite "The Cockfight" and nothing else, and scholars of religion treated ,'Religion as a Cultural System" rather as sacred canon. On the other hand boundaries were apparent; as noted previously, the older, broader notions of culture were the ones that spread so widely in the lay world, as when analysts explore business “cultures.” Humanistic notions that were pre-anthropological still prevail in formulations such as that of D. Paul Schafer, which sets forth a policy of making culture (1 998).[64] And disavowals of the concept of culture tend, also, to hearken back to older and broader notions, as among feminists who see it as patriarchal (Pollock 1988) or those who worry about its generally oppressive potential (Wikan 1998 on cultures of immigrants that result in killing of daughters by fathers or commentators at the hundredth anniversary of the Polish Ethological Society who traced how culture ignited ethnic cleansing in Eastern Europe). In these critiques, the specific formulations of Geertz are not paramount, just as they are missing, also, in the positive popularizations noted here, as in the instance of Exploris.

In short, Geertz’s notion of culture had critical impact within a certain context and period, an impact that still unfolds, while one of many explorations of what one might term “culture,” it is argttably the ()ne with strongest impact during a period when anthropology and other disciplines could have lost a certain “cultural capital,” if one may apply that term to “culture” itself. Culture is arguably the most distinctive resource that Anthropology has brought forward in its century or so of development, and formulations that lacked either the richness or the precision and engaging exposition of Geertz could have prevailed, robbing the discipline of an inheritance rather than developing and disseminating it strategically among neighboring disciplines. 1,1 this way, it was the Geerrzian rendition of culture that carried the day and saved the day.

[61] A version of this argument was presented in James L. Peacock, ·· the Third Stream: Weber, Parsons, Gecrtz,” Journal of the Anthropological Society of Oxford 12, no. 2 (1981): 122–29. T his paper summarized a brief talk l gave at the request of Godfrey Lienhardt to characterize the place of Geertz in anthropology.l made two points: first, the crucial contribution of Geertz’s notion of culture at a certain point in history—a point elaborated here—and, second, relations between Geertz, Weber, and Parsons, elaborated more in that paper.

[62] “The third stream” begins by quoting Clyde Kluckhohn who, as ! recall it, told a group of graduate students in his history of theory course in spring 1 960: “All you need to know is Boas and the French.” I took him to mean that socio-cultural anthropology at that rime boasted only two important streams: the American, beginning with Boas and continuing through Krocbcr, Lowic, and their successors, and the French, beginning with Durkheim and continuing through British and French social anthropology to Levi-Strauss. The third stream, I suggest, was brought by Geertz beginning in 1960) when Kluckhohn died, the summer following that course, and it inserted a Weberian inspiration via Parsons—adding a certain German perspective to the American and Franco-British. 1 lll not reduce (icertz to Weber/Parsons but noted some parallels, to wit: ،·action,\\ that is, meaningful behavior as the focal unit for analysis, “interpretation” (Weber’s Vcrsrehcn) by placing behavior in a framework of meaning defined by the actor (e.g., translating twitches into winks, to use Geertz’s analogy in “Thick Description”), a definition of culture (as (icist, as system, as text) as framework of meaning, a premise that culture is both superior and autonomous to society, and a mode of generalizing through highlighting distinctive features of instances rather than averaging Statistically across instances (ideal types and ethnographic portrayal in contrast to surveys and experiments). Geertz’s approach both drew on other sources, especially philosophical and literary, and transcended this “stream.” But he did join it, learn from it, and enrich It at certain points, some of which can be traced through papers he wrote while at Harvard and, following fieldwork, at MIT.

[63] Mary Douglas said this in reviewing Interpretation of Cultures (Times Literary Supplement 8 [August I 923|): “clearly the boy with guts and intellectual stamina had learnt as much (or more) from mentors in sociology, philosophy, and history as from anthropologists.\\ She comments specifically on his analysis of the Javanese funeral: “He asserts that culture is independent in the style of ،with one bound our hero was free.’ T he fieldwork reporting stops here.” Here Douglas contrasts her Durkheimian premise that culture is grounded in society (a premise she later argued in detail in Cultural Pias) with the Gccrtzian argument that culture and society are analytically distinct and empirically independent of each other, a premise that Weber and Parsons assert, following a German philosophical tradition of according autonomous power to Geist.

[64] For a review of Schafer and other recent commentaries on culture, see James L. Peacock, ،‘Culture and the Future,” American Anthropologist 102, no. 2 (June 2000): 261–62.

 References

<biblio>

Anderson, Benedict R. O’G. 1990. The Idea of Power in Javanese Culture, 17–77. In Language and Power, ed. Benedict R. O’G. Anderson. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Beidelman, T. o. 1992. Moral Imagination in Kaguru Modes ofThought. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press.

Benedict, Ruth. 1934. Patterns of Culture. New York: Houghton Mifflin.

Berry, Thomas iMary. 1999. The Great Work· 1st ed. New York: Bell Tower.

Douglas, Mary. 1978. Cultural Bias. London: Royal Anthropological Institute.

Fagg, Donald Ross. 1958. Authority and Social Stratification: A Study in Javanese Bureaucracy. PhD diss., Harvard University.

Geertz, Clifford. 1956. The Development of the Javanese Economy: A Socio-Cultural Approach. Cambridge, MA: Center for International Studies, !Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

— —. 1960. The Religion of Java. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

— ——. 1963. Agricultural Involution: The Process of Ecological Change in Indonesia. Berkeley: Published for the Association of Asian Studies by University of California Press.

— —. 1963. Peddlers and Princes: Social Change and Ecoironuc Modernisation ınTu’o Indonesian Towns. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

— ——. 1962. The Social History of an Indonesian Town. Cambridge: MIT Press.

— —. 1968. Islam Observed. New Haven: Yale University Press.

— —. 1972. Deep Play: Notes on the Balinese Cockfight. Daedalus 101: 1–27.

— ——. 1973. The Interpretation of Cultures. New York: Basic Books.

— ——. 1 980. Negara: The Theatre State in Nineteenth-Century Bali. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

. 1983. Local Knowledge. New York: Basic Books.

V99S. After the Fact: Two Countries, Four Decades, One Anthropologist. Cam.” bridge: Harvard University Press.

——. 1999. A Life of Learning. Charles Homer Haskins Lecture for 1999. New York: American Council of Learned Societies.

“. 2000. Available Tight: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical Topics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Goodenough, Ward. 1926. Residence Rules. Southwestern Journal of Anthropology 12.

——· 1967. Componential Analysis. Science 156.

Kroeber, Alfred. 1944. Configurations of Cultural Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Kroeber, Alfred, and Clyde Kluckhohn. 1922. Culture: A Critical Review of Concepts and Definitions. Peabody Museum Papers 47, no. 1. Cambridge, MA: Peabody Museum.

Leach, Edmund. 1924. Political Systems of Highland Burma. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

———. 1976. Culture and Communication. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Levi-Strauss, Claude. [1922]. The Structural Study of Journal ان American Folklore 68, no. 270: 42844.

Mead, Margaret. 1952. National Character. in Anthropology Today, cd. A. L. Kroeber. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Middleton, John. 1960). Litgbara Religion, London: Oxford University.

Ortner, Sherry B. 1999. The Fate of “Cultureك Berkeley: University of California Press.

Parsons, Talcott. 1961. Theories of Society. New ٦ork: Free Press of Clencoe.

Patterson, Thomas. 2061. A Social History of Anthropology in the United States. Oxford: Berg.

Peacock, James L. 1962. Pasamah Megaliths: Historical, Functional, and Conceptual Interpretations. Acadeniica Sinica 15: 52–65.

——. Rites (//Modernisation: symbolic and Social Aspects of Indonesian Proletarian Drama. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

——. 1969. Mysticsand Merchants in Fouitccnth Century Germany: A Reconstruction of Their Psychological Bond and Its Implications for Social Change. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 5, no. 1: 47–59.

———. 1 98 l. The Third Stream: Weber, Parsons, Geertz. Journal of the Anthropological Society of Oxford 12, no. 2: 122–29.

Pollock, Griselda. 1988. Vision and Difference. London: Routledge.

Schafer, 14. Paul. 1998. Culture: Reacon (,/ the Future. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Schneider, 1 avid M. 1968. American Kinship. Chicago: University of Chicago Department of Anthropology.

Turner, Victor. 1957. Schism and Continuity in an African Society. Northern Rhodesia: Manchester University Press.

Weber, Max. 1958. The Religion of India. Trans, and cd. Hans H. Gerth and Don Martindale. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.

Wikan, Unni. 199(). Managing Turbulent Hearts. Chicago: LIniversity of Chicago Press.

——. 1998. Culture—A New Concept of Race? Lessons from Norway. Social Anthropology 7, no. 1: 57–64.

</biblio>

 Clifford Geertz and Islam

Dale F. Eickelman

In After Babel, George Steiner (1975, 24) observes that a “text is embedded in specific historical time,” so that reading a text fully involves restoring “all that time can of the immediacies of value and intent in which speech actually occurs.” This essay seeks to restore how the work of Clifford Geertz was initially read and heard in Islamic studies in the 19605 and I97os —and indicate its contemporary significance for understanding Islam today.

 Knowing Islam and Anthropology

Most of us learn the history of academic disciplines from when we enter the field, not from their beginnings (Ortner 1984). I entered two fields in the 19605, Islamic studies and anthropology. From 1964 to 1966, I studied at the Institute for Islamic Studies at Montreal's McGill University, focusing on classical Arabic and developing a special interest in Islam and opposition to it in seventh-century Arabia (Eickelman 1967). Survey courses at McGill, the Castor Oil of graduate studies everywhere, covered the foundation texts of Islam and Islamic history. The name "Geertz" at the time passed the lips neither of mentors nor students, even in advanced seminars. Although several classmates at McGill were Indonesian, my lecture notes for those two years show virtually no reference to Islam in Southeast Asia. Unusual for survey courses on Islam in the! 9605, McGill's balanced Islam and Islamic history in the Middle East with South Asia.

When I entered the University of Chicago's Department of Anthropology in September 1966, Bernard Cohn and Clifford Geertz taught that year's introductory "brainwashing" course—to use the student language of the time. Their complementary approaches were ideal. Cohn's course, which came in the fall, offered us the double vision of a professional historian and anthropologist. As in most introductory courses, the bulk of our readings were excerpts from a variety of different texts, but with Cohn they became more than an assemblage of "found" objects in the style of Marcel Duchamp or a collation of predecessor's texts carefully chosen to persuade class participants of the inevitability of the lecturer's views—a form of pedagogical authority (Bourdieu and Passeron 1977) familiar to generations of graduate students.

Sartre aphoristically calls history "rhe deliberate resumption of the past by the present" (1962, 06). Phis phrase, which I had not yet encountered in I 968, perfectly conveys the consciousness of historiography and the historical imagination integral to C'ohn's sense of "doing" history. At a measured pace he did more than convey a sense of anthropology’s past. Anthropologists do not just “see” societies, they learn to see them at certain rimes in particular institutional settings.

Such a consciousness of “ways of knowing,” elementary from the vantage of today, was innovative at a time when Chicago’s Department of Anthropology, like most departments elsewhere, offered no courses in fieldwork. Students rhenrselves organized ait informal seminar in 19)68, well before the tidal wave of reflexivity hit the discipline. We gleaned what we could from cryptic notes in the introductions of the classic ethnographies of the time and the occasional anecdotes conveyed by our mentors. Cohn’s lectures invited US to pay equal attention to what anthropologists saw, experienced, and heard, and how—and to which audiences—they reported, wrote, and talked. His representation of the discipline’s past conveyed a critical sense of how our own approach to “ways of knowing” influenced how we read the texts of our predecessors and contemporaries.

Geertz’s pace and style of initiating US into anthropology in winter 1967 could nor have differed more from Cohn s. What Evelyn Woods was to speed-reading, Clifford Geertz was to speed-speaking. Limited in size of note-taking group by the pressure of ballpoint pens on carbon paper, I worked in relay with two other students to record what we could of Ceerrz’s rapid-fire lectures, tracing the notion of culture from figures such as Johann Herder, Wilhelm Dilrhey, and iVlatrhew Arnold to the 1960s. The names and texts flew hard and fast, although we later invoked them, half-digested and on the fly but sometimes appropriately, in comprehensive examinations. ‚More immediately apprehended was the impression of Geertz caught in the act of trying to break out of the “iron cage” of received social thought. At the very least, Geertz made US acutely aware of the irregularities and shortcomings of anthropology as receoed tradition and practice. As our readings caught up with our excitement for the discipline, and as Geertz himself acknowledged, his sense of the emergence of a theory of culture was heavily filtered through the sieve of Harvard’s Department of Social Relations, site of his own anthropological initiation beginning in 1950.

 Geertz on Islam in the 1960s and 1970s

Geertz said almost nothing of Islam or of Indonesia in his formal “core” lectures in winter 1967, notwithstanding his intense and recent field research in Indonesia. It was discussed only in that year’s oversubscribed advanced seminars. My first intimation of his approach to Indonesia came in a short required reading for Cohn’s initiatory course, “Ritual and Social Change: A Javanese Example” (Geertz 1957), an article that captured our imaginations. It took the dominant theoretical conceptions of anthropology’s immediate predecessors and sharpened our critical awareness of forms of social integration not allowed by so-called static functionalism—labeling any predecessor organizing concept as “static” was a fairly obvious cue that it was, or ought to be, on its way out.

The Hungarian composer Gydrgy Ligeti (lecture, Wissenschafrskolleg zu Berlin, February 15, 2001) said of composing music that originality grows at the margins of the incessant repetition of the familiar. The same might be said of anthropology. Geertz, building on a distinction made by Pitirim A. Sorokin, one of his teachers at Harvard, distinguished between “logico-meaningful,” or cultural, integration—“a unity of style, of logical implication, of meaning and value”—and “causal functional,” or social system integration —the kind “one finds in an organism,” with each part an element in a “reverberating causal ring” (Geertz 1957, 34). Geertz argued that distinguishing between these two forms of social integration (and adding the element of individual motivation), better accounted for the “interference”—Geertz’s term—of political with religious meanings and the “open struggle for power” in Javanese village society. Geertz’s argument reassuringly used elements of the social theory we were then learning, but also offered a way beyond the conventional ideas of the day, even if he still called it a “dynamic functionalist approach” (34). We saw the article as a model for breaking into mainstream anthropological journals. It showed how the modification of an existing anthropological approach could improve the questions asked and the answers given. Edmund Leach’s Political Systems of Highland Burma (1954), in retrospect also a creative break with conventional structural-functional anthropology, was also part of our core readings. It addressed issues of social change but offered no direct developinent of the idea of culture. Geertz’s approach intrigued US more because it encompassed a renewed attention to the idea of culture as well as that of the dynamics of societal change.

Like my fellow students in 1967–68, I was almost exclusively concerned with the theoretical implications of Geertz's argument, nor its implications for the stud)' of Islam in particular or religion in general. Nonetheless, eager to relate anthropology as a discipline to understanding Islam, I chose Geertz's rhe Religion of Java (1960) as an optional reading for a timed essay in Cohn's initiation course. Religion of Java exemplifies full-strength thick description. Prior to coming to Chicago in 1 966, I was immersed for two years in what Marshall Hodgson, Chicago's leading scholar on Islam until his sudden death in 1968, referred to as this high culture. Hodgson's focus was the dynamics of religious debate and change in Islamic "high" culture. He acknowledged that the traditions of "peasants or even non-lettered people" had their own dynamics of change, but he explicitly left aside any detailed discussion of such change or how transformations in peasant and high culture might have been interrelated or even share common background understandings (Hodgson 1 974, I: 80). For a student with a certain amount of "Islamic" learning but only a tentative grasp of social theory, Religion of Java was particularly appealing because it related the vicissitudes of "high" Islamic culture in Java with the rest of society, including what Geertz (1957, 49) called the "more or less" fully urbanized elite, the "more or less traditionally organized peasantry," and all the fluctuating in-between social forms. Even in his earliest writing, Geertz's complex qualifications and self-conscious prose invited readers to think on two related levels. Geertz's ethnographic reporting can never be reduced to the Jack Webb (of "Dragnet" fame) approach of "just the facts, ma'am." It also called attention to the frailty and uncertainty of even the best of ethnographic reporting and analysis.

Religion contains an implicit set of theoretical assumptions concerning how adequately to represent the religion of a complex religious tradirion—Islam in this case—nor limited to a single regional or national setting. For scholars of Islam, Religion suggested how anthropologists and others could apply what was learned from the study of the religious words and deeds of small-scale groups or communities to larger entities, including nations and historical traditions. Geertz divided Javanese religious practices into the three now-familiar "orientations" or "cultural types": abangan, associated in a "broad and general" way with Javanese villagers; san tri, a "purer Islam" associated in a " broad and general” way with Javanese traders in villages and towns; and a Hindu-Javanese prijaji tradition associated with the hereditary aristocracy (Geertz 1960, 5–6). Geertz argued that these three subtraditions refracted an underlying Cidrural unity, so that, for example, the prijaji and abangan cultural orientations were “in part but genteel and vulgar versions of one another” (234).

All the qualifications and caurions in Geertz’s narrative called painful attention to the fragility of social theory and ethnographic practice. The “in part” and “more or less” cautions embedded in the above quotations to relate particular religious “subtraditions” to particular social categories suggest an unambiguous awareness of the difficulties involved in adequately representing the various “strands” of Javanese religious practice and belief in cultural theory as it had developed through the early 19605. the title of the book itself, as opposed to alternative possibilities such as Islam in Jana, which could have been a parallel to Robert Bellah’s Tokugawa Religion (1957), represented an implicit choice in how to represent Javanese religious experience.

Geertz (personal communication, November 23, 2002) preferred the title Religions of Jana, but the publisher’s insistence on religion in the singular won the day and perhaps better reflects the book’s overall strategy. After all, the book concludes, perhaps with intended irony that the holiday of rijaja is “a kind of master symbol for Javanese culture, as perhaps Christmas is for ours,” and that if one understood “everything” concerning rijaja, “a simple impossibility—one could say one understood the Javanese”(Geertz 1960, 379).

This passage is vintage Geertz. It can be read at face value. Or it can be read as deliberately combining ironies and paradoxes, like those present in Jorge Luis Borges’s short story, “El Aleph,” in which the narrator discovers in a dark corner of a friend’s cellar “one of those points of space that contains all other spaces” (Borges 1962, 186, author’s translation), and through which one can at once see all things past and present, whether Geertz’s comparison of rijaja with Christmas is intended at face value or as end-of-book humor emanating from the furious pace—six uninterrupted months of writing in an office at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, he once said—matters less than his reminder to readers of the complexities of writing ethnography in an era when the “it is written” style of ethnography (“The Kaguru assume ...”) still prevailed.

Geertz’s first book to deal explicitly with Islam as world religious tradition, Islam Observed (19684), based on the l erry lectures given a year earlier at Yale University, remains good to think with. For its original audience, the book broke with the history of religions and Islamic studies traditions of looking for single, unifying religious essences and instead considered the implications of strongly contrasting ethnographic and historical characterizations of the Islamic tradition as it unfolded at the antipodes of the Muslim majority world, Indonesia and Morocco.

Islam Observed offered to its original audience two major conceptual innovations to the comparative study of religions and to the writing of anthropology for audiences well beyond its specialist base. The dominant trend in the history of religions through the I 96Os was a reliance on typological classifications of phenomena being compared, such as “mysticism,” that presumed in advance the essential” features of the phenomena being considered. In focusing on the particular, displayed through vivid characterizations of the representations and practices of Moroccan and Javanese saints in their respective social and historical contexts, Geertz suggested an alternative strategy based on “family resemblances”—partial similarities that can be compared and contrasted rather than slotted into taxonomies. Geertz imported this concept into anthropology from the post-analytic philosophy of Ludwig Wittgenstein, just as he also introduced Alfred Schutz’s (1967, 15) distinctions among predecessors, consociares, contemporaries, and successors, distinctions that becante commonplace in anthropology after the publication of Person, Time, mill Conduct in Bedi (Geerrz 1966a). By importing such concepts to anthropology, Geertz joined the held more forcefully wirh wider currents in social thought, making anthropology more visible, and vital, to a large public. His approach also suggested to others ways of following parallel paths. It influenced my work on the changing role of religious intellectuals and ideas of learning in ،Muslim societies (Eickelman I 985).

Geertzs second major contribution was to close the practical gap in academic training and styles of writing between anthropology and history (see Gohn 1980, 1981). Islam Observed “more or less”—to employ the common Geerrzian phrase—conveys the different historical contexts in which the dominant “classical” styles of Islamic expression and practice developed in ،Morocco and Indonesia. Elements of his argument have been superseded, as historian of religion Vincent Cornell (1 998) argues for Morocco in Realm of the Saint, a study of religious experience in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Morocco that also situates Moroccan Sufism in the context of comparable developments elsewhere in the Middle East and ill Christian Europe (see also Munson 1993 for ،Morocco; for Java, see Woodward 1989). Geerrz articulated changing and contested ideas of culture with what happened in history, prompting others to essay better arguments.

In Islam Observed as in his other writings, Geertz’s consistent goal was to develop an improved concept of culture (Eickelman interview with Clifford Geertz, CBS-1 V “Sunrise Semester,” November 26, 1974). At times, his arresting metaphors and images hyperbolically overreach, as in the comparison between the Javanese rijaja and Christmas. Thus Islam Observed concludes with wh:\t Geertz calls a “human metaphor” of a traditionally raised French-speaking Moroccan student on an airplane bound for New York, his rirst trip outside of]Morocco, passing “the entire trip with the Koran gripped in one hand and a glass of Scotch in the other” (Geertz I 968, 1 16–17)—quire a feat for a six-hour flight. But such flopped images are rare. Accompanying Geertz’s major essays of the period was a steady stream of reviews and review essays such as “]Mysteries of Islam” (19754), a review of Marshall Hodgson’s Venture of Islam, “Conjuring with Islam” (1982), and a variety of single-book reviews that brought specialist studies of Islam to the ken of a wider public and encouraged specialists from several Helds to reach across conventional disciplinary boundaries.

Geertz’s work on Islam is inseparable from the wider goal of significantly developing the concept of culture from earlier anthropological uses of the term and making the newer use of the term an integral part of modern social thought—the lynchpin of virtually all of his essays, nor just the “as a cultural system” series that encompassed ideology (1964), religion (1966), common sense (1975•) and art (1976). Essays inrroducing a wide public to the cultural implications of Moroccan naming practices (1975ε) and comparing the royal progress in Elizabethan England with Mulay Hasan l’s in late-nineteenth-century Morocco (1977) convey specific manifestations of the idea of culture to a wide audience. Most pertinent to the study of Islam—a nd the understanding of economics “as a cultural system”—is “Suq: The Bazaar Economy in Sefrou, Morocco” (1979), a major and heavily empirical book-length essay with a deceptively modest title, a data-laden essay showing the practical articulation of religious ideologies and institutions with politics and specific social classes and groups.

One would like to think that the argument for a concept of culture that is contested, contingent, and emerging—a notion that Geertz has done so much to convey to a wider public—would have displaced earlier, and in retrospect impoverished, notions of cultures and civilizations as fairly fixed entities. Yet Samuel Huntington’s notion of “West vs. the Rest,” in which “Islam” and “Confucianism” are pitted against the “West” (1 993), relies heavily on the ideas of Arnold Toynbee’s (1947) moralizing and historical stereotypy rather than newer ideas of culture that emphasize the incessant crossing and constructed nature of civilizational and cultural boundaries. Some of Geertz’s characterizations of culture, such as comparing it to an octopus (1966, 67–68) with its “partial integrations, partial incongruencies, and partial independencies” were geared primarily to specialists in the anthropological trade. Other essays were meant for a wider public, such as the 1983 Huxley ،Memorial Lecture, which contains an element of conceptual evangelism to those who would support quantitative approaches to the exclusion of others: “ I he setting aside of cultural factors altogether as something for Islamologisrs, mythographers, and shadow-play enthusiasts to deal with seems to lead not to increased precision but to ascending indeterminacy” (Geertz 19 8 9, 523).

THINKING AS A MORAL ACT: geertz’s impact today

There are several enduring contributions of Geertz’s life and work to the study of Islam. First, he recognized the continuing role of religion and religious debates in modern societies. Resistance to the idea of culture was nor confined to quantitative positivists. In “،Marabouts in the ،Market-Place,” in part a review of Moroccan Islam (Eickelman 1976), the lare Ernest Gellner (1981,218) issued a strong rebuke against the use of “cloud-culture-talk” derived from the “school” of Clifford Geerrz. The reduction of Geertz to “cloud-culture-talk” is difficult to reconcile with Geerrz (1972), which brings the arguments of Religion in Jana up to date and rereads them in the wake of the murderous violence that followed Indonesia’s 1965 coup d’etat and the subsequent purges of “communists” that by some accounts left as many as half a million dead and hundreds of thousands more in prison. Against this backdrop, Geerrz argued that the most salient religious development in Indonesia since midcentury was the “hesirant” emergence of “somerhing rather like a denominational pattern of religious organization or affiliation,” and toward a “more openly pluralistic system” (1972, 70–71), if not always a tolerant one, and one in which cultural understandings shaped, and were shaped by, the social and political contexts in which they took place.

This short 1972 article demonstrates more than the continuing significance of Geerrz’s earlier interpretations and their relevance to dramarically changed social circumstances. On rereading Geertz’s earliest work on religion in Indonesia, especially in light of the views about the inevitability of secularization prevalent in the 1 9ა0ბ and I 96Os, Geerrz insisted that religion as idea and practice still mattered. The secular bias of modernization theory has had a significant role in deflecting attention away from the continued role of religious practices and values in conremporary societies, including the Muslim majority world.

Geerrz sensed this continuing importance of religious thought and action to modern society while other influential thinkers accepted with few qualifications the assumption that religion and religions intellectuals, who earlier played central societal roles, were doomed to play increasingly marginal ones in modern and “modernizing” societies (Shils 1972, ,7). In the bold language of Daniel Lerner, the Muslim world faced the stark choice of “Mecca or mechanization” (1964, 405), a bleak view echoed by Manfred Halperin, who saw the Muslim world as faced with the unpalatable choice between a “neo-lslamic totalitarianism” intent on “resurrecting the pasr” or a “reformist Islam” that would open “the sluice gates and I be ل swamped by the deluge” (1963, 129). For Geertz, in contrast, the role of religion, like that of ethnic identities, was dynamic and evolving rather than primordial and fixed. These powerful ideas are, of course, echoed in the work of successors to Geertz on the role of Islam in Indonesia, including Robert Hefner (1 985, 2000) and John Bowen (1993; 2003).

Second, “Ritual and Social Ghange,” like Religion in Java, boldly caprured religious debates that were permeating villages as vigorously as urban life. It was not only in major urban centers that ideas and debates over religious practice had a strong resonance but also in villages and small towns. Throughout the Muslim world most scholars emphasized developments in major urban centers and religious institutions—a trend fully in accord W’ith the self-image of traditionally educated religious scholars {‘ulama) throughout the Muslim majority world as the “guardians” of faith and religious tradition. Like other mortals, Geertz has not always made the right calls in inferring long-term trends, as when he wrote that the Javanese were turning “toward a more experiential sort of faith, and especially tow’ard mysticism” and “a personal, inward, transcendental experience” (1972, 72–73). Here Geertz got it half right—more than most of us manage—in that two major developments in Java’s “experiential turn” have been the development of a strong nationwide movement of moderate, educated Muslims as a major political force (Hefner 2000), the underside of which has been a smaller but deadly movement of extremist violence among groups such as the Laskar Jihad (Hefner 2003).

In Indonesia and elsewhere, mass higher education, mass communications, new media, and the greater ease of travel has facilitated the fragmentation of political and religious authority and the development of new voices that contest or ignore established authority (Eickelman and Biscatori 1996, 121–35). Accompanying these developments has been the objectification of religious knowledge in the form of explicit questions such as “What is my religion?” “Why is it important to my life?” and “How do my beliefs guide my conduct?” (Eickelman 1 992). rhis refiguring of practice an 1 the religions imagination is as important at the village level as in towns, in Indonesia (Bowen 1993) as in Pakistan (Marsden 2003). What Geertz got absolutely right from the very beginning of his field research was the centrality of talk and religions practice and the role of ideas at all social levels and contexts.

Again, ،١11 early statement of Geertz's awareness of the importance of ideas is his " I !linking as a Moral Acr: Ethical Dimensions of Anthropological Fieldwork in the New States" (19681)). Geertz narrates how he often loaned his typewriter to a local poet, until one day he asked for its return in a way that implied to the poet that his work was less important than the anthropologist's own. Geerrz's rapport with the poet was never restored, but the subtext again affirms the importance of local knowledge and practice and its role in shaping wider social and cultural currents.

Finally, Geertz has—with ،١ few exceptions such as Huntington—infused a newer and more persuasive notion of culture into the wider framework of social thought. Anthropologists earlier thought of their academic discipline as the one most involved with the concept of culture, but the concept has, so to speak, lost its anthropological copyright and has developed in multiple ways in fields such as cultural studies. Geertz's work has pervaded studies of Islam and thinking about religion. In his work on the cult of the saints in early Latin Christianity, Peter Brown (1981, 9–10) acknowledges how writing on contemporary ؛Moroccan religiosity has stimulated his approach to a much earlier era. Explicit discussion of culture occurs only at the margins of Vincent Cornell's historical study of ؛Moroccan Sufism (for example, 1998, 6 1–62, I .56–5؟), but a dialogue with Geertz and others who have characterized ؛Moroccan religiosity permeares Cornell's approach.

I he first teaching post of one of anthropology's distinguished predecessors, Edward Evans-Pritchard (192(؛f 973), was at Cairo's Euad I University (now the University of Cairo) in the early 93 lOs. Ele spoke Arabic and conducted held research in Egypt's western desert before deciding to conduct field research among (he Nuer of the southern Sudan. Anthropology's oral history (author's interview' with Robert Fernea, CBS-I V "Sunrise Semester," October 23 1979) has it that "E-P" decided not to make his career in the Arab world because of the need to work among scholars of other disciplines. Nuer society offered ،١ prime exemplar ()fan elementary" society more in line with the anthropological expecrarions of the era.

Geertz's approach could not be more different. In Indonesia as in ؛MoCOCCO his work plunged him into contexts where anthropologists could never claim an exclusive interpretive role. Ill the irony that characterized many of his hypertextrial commentaries on the practice of anthropology and the study of Islam, Geertz (personal communication, 1973) once suggested only to ask questions that could he answered. Fortunately, Geerrz rarely follows his own advice. Neither his questions nor the answers offered ill his essays—his preferred narrative form—provide a sense of completion, reminding US that no ethnographic essay can. Islam Observed, for example, incorporated an intensive reading of “secondary” literature on]Morocco in French and English; his major field research in Morocco was still underway. ١ et the questions posed have helped shape thinking about religion in the modern world as few other texts have managed to do (for example, Casanova 1994). Geertz’s work in Indonesia, as in Morocco, breaks away from conventional disciplinary boundaries. For Islamic studies, Geertz’s work suggests how historians, anthropologists, and scholars in other disciplines can place their work in thick description ethnographic context—and still communicate to wider publics. Geerrz has posed questions that matter, and his answers, with their “partial integrations, parrial incongruencies, and partial independencies,” remain good to think with. Qualifications such as “more or less” and “partial” are invitations to thought, and this is Geertz’s major contribution to understanding Islam and to anthropology.

 Acknowledgments

l am grateful to Jon w. Anderson and Brian Didier for comments on an earlier version of this essay.

 References

<biblio>

Bellah, Robert N. 1957. Tokugawa Religion: The Vallies of Pre-Industrial Japan. Boston: Beacon Press.

Borges, Jorge Luis. 1962. El Aleph. Buenos Aires: Emece Editores.

Bourdieu, Pierre, and Jean-Claude Passeron, 1977. Reproduction in Education, Society and Culture. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

آلأدلا\نيرا١ث١٦ ١٢ل\١١ ١١. \ ؟>؟>?>. Muslims through Discourse*. Religion and Ritual in Gayo Society. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

———. لآدا١اً١ذ. lslam١ Law, and Equality in Indonesia*. An Anthropology of Public Reasoiling. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

١دعلأ\الا١١آ Pact. The Cult of the Saints*. Its Rise and Eunction in !.atm Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Casanova, Jose. 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Cohn, Bernard s. 19(؟(). History and Anthropology: The State of Blay. Comparative Studies III Society and History 22, no. 2 (April): 198–221.

——. 1981. Anthropology and History in the 1980s. Journal ()/ Interdisciplinary History 12, no. 2 (Autumn): 227–52.

Cornell, Vincent (. 1998. Realm of the Saint: Power and Authority /·,/ Moroccan Sufism. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Eickclman, Dale E. 1967. Musaylima: An Approach to the Social Anthropology of Seventh Century Arabia. Journal of the Social and Economic History of the Orient lf), no. 1: 1752.

——. 1976. Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society III a Pilgrimage Center. Austin: University of Texas Press.

. M. ” and Potver in - Education of Notable. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

— ——. 1992. Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies. American Ethnologist 19ı no. 4 (November): 1–13.

Eickelman, Dale E., and James Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Geertz, Clifford. 1937. Ritual and Social Change: A Javanese Example. American Antbropologist 39, no. 1 (February): 32–34.

— —. 196(). The Religion of Java. New York: Free Press of Glencoe.

. 1964. Ideology as a Cultural System, 17–76. In Ideology and Discontent, ed. David Apter. New York: Free Press.

— —. 1966a. Person, Time, and Conduct in Pali: An Essay in Cultural Analysis. New Haven: Yale University Southeast Asia Studies.

— ——. 1966b. Religion as a Cultural System, 1–46. hl Anthropological Approaches to the Study (/ Religion, cd. Michael Banton. London: Tavistock.

— —. 1968a. Islam observed: Religious Development III Morocco and Indonesia. New Flaven: Yale University Press.

· 1968b. Thinking as a Moral Act: Ethical Dimensions of Fieldwork in the New States. Antioch Revieiv 27: 134–39.

———. 1972. Religious Change and Social Order in Soeharto’s Indonesia. Asia 27, no. 3 (Autumn): 62–84.

“1973a. Mysteries of Islam. New York Revieiu of Rooks 22, no. 20 (December 11): 18–26.

———. 1973b, Common Sense as a Cultural System. Antioch Review 33: 47–33.

——. 1973c. On the Nature of Anthropological Understanding. American Scientist 63, no. l (January-February): 47–53.

. 1ε)76. Art as a Cultural System. Modern Language Notes 91: 1473–99.

——. 77(9 l. Centers, Kings, and Charisma: Reflections on the Symbolics of Power, 1 30–71. In (/////l/ε،///،l Its Creators: Essays III Honor of Edward Shils, ed. Joseph Ben-David and Terry N. Clark. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

———. 1ε)78. Suq: T he Bazaar Economy in Sefrou, 139–268. In Meaning and Order in Moroccan Society, cd. Clifford Geertz, Hildred Geertz, and Lawrence Rosen. New York: Cambridge University Press.

——· 1982. Conjuring with Islam. New York Review of Rooks 29 (May 27): 23–28.

Gellner, Ernest. !1977| 1981. Marabouts in the Market-Place. In Muslim Society. Cambridge: Cambridge university Press.

Halperin, Manfred. 1962. The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Hefner, Robert w. 1985. Hindu Javanese: Tengger Tradition and Islam. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- 2()00. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

— — 2003. Civic Pluralism Denied? Jihadi Radicals and New Media in Post-Suharto

\١\\.79-158 ١٦٥٢ةيحلاآر١١١ة New Media in tbe Muslim World: The Emerging Public sphere, ed. Dale F. Eickelman and Jon w. Anderson. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Marshall Hodgson. 19/4. The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civihzation, 3 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Huntington, Samuel p. 1993. The Clash of Civilizations? Foreign Affairs 72, no. 3 (Summer): 22–49.

Leach, Edmund. 1954. The Political Systems of Highland Burma. Boston: Beacon.

١ لآئلا\١خاً1964 ٢19581 احسا١. The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernising the Middle East. New York: Free Press.

Marsden, Magnus. 2003. Islamization and Globalization in Chitral, Northern Pakistan. PhD diss., Department of Social Anthropology, University of Cambridge.

Munson, Henry, Jr. 1993. Religion and Power in Morocco. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Ortner, Sherry B. 1984. Theory in Anthropology since the Sixties. Comparative Studies in Society and History 26, no. 1 (January): 126–66.

Sartre, Jean-Paul. 1962. Literary and Philosophic Essays. New York: Collier.

Schutz, Alfred. 1967. Collected Papers· vol. /·· The Problem of Social Reality, ed. Maurice Natanson. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff.

Shils, Edward. 1975. The Intellectuals and the Powers and Other Essays. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Steiner, George. 1975. After Babel: Aspects of Language and Translation. New York: Oxford University Press.

Toynbee, Arnold J. 1947. A Study of History, abridged by D. c. Sommervell. New York: Oxford University Press.

١ نيخ ة\لا-ة٣ة١لا‘\لآألآ١١. ل؟ Islam III Java: Normative Piety and Mysticism m tbe Sultanate of Yogyakarta. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

</biblio>

 Deep Play, Violence, and Social Reconstruction

Michael M. ١. Fischer

OR Cl. 11-‘FORD GEERTZ: Errant Thoughts ill a Blurred Genre—

Errant—but hopefully not too erring. Thoughts in a blurred genre. Between the Festschrift—in which one offers in tribute one’s own work as an extension of one’s teacher’s work—and the slide show on “works and lives.” Indeed two slides can serve as frames: a slide of a fabulous large tapestry of a fighting cock that hangs in one of the chemical engineering buildings at MIT, a locus to which I shall return; and a slide of a painting of a buzkashi game that I recently brought back from Central Asia and that now hangs in my house, a game to which I shall also return.

So: errant thoughts in a blurred genre—for Clifford Geertz—in three movements: where we are now, where we have been, and on the trail of an anthropology to come. (One of the condundra of trying to talk about Cliff’s work is that the very language of anthropology—the prose we speak—is suffused with the metaphors he has taught US to think with: turtles and metaphors all the way down.)

 Part One: Where We Are Now

Emergent Forms of Life and the Anthropological Voice;

OR:

A post-Geertzian manifesto, where “post,” “posts,” and “postings” are defined as a sending-receiving relation between fathers and sons, and between the three or four phases of self-defined Geertzian work.

I start with an ethnographic datum, a stance toward ethics and politics, and a contextualist stance toward social theory.

We live (again) in an era in which there is a pervasive claim, or native model, asserted by practitioners in many contemporary arenas of life (law, sciences, political economy, computer technologies, education, etc.) that traditional concepts and ways of doing things no longer work, that life is outrunning the pedagogies in which we were trained, that we are experiencing emergent new forms of life—in new cyborgian, hybrid, crossspecies biotechnological forms of life, in databank-networked and new materials infrastructures, in environmental and ecological changes, and in the legal, economic, psychological, and social institutional innovations ١\٢ أ\١ةأese ve٩v\١٢e. (..all ti s native model an ethnographic datum.

We live therefore (again) in an era in which new ethical and political spaces are thrown up that require action and can often have quite serious consequences, but for which the possibilities for giving grounds quickly run out. Traditional ethical and moral guides seem not always helpful, and we are often left to negotiate interests and trade-offs in legal or other tournaments of decision-making over time, and across terrains configured with multiply interacting new technologies, what I call ethical plateaus with due deference to Giles Deleuze, Gregory Bateson, and the Balinese. Gall this a philosophical stance toward ethics and politics, o١١e أ\١ة١د١٥- wig Wittgenstein formulated when he said that giving grounds comes to an end somewhere and that “the end is not an ungrounded presupposition; it is an ungrounded way of acting” or a “form of life,” a sociality of action that always already contains within it ethical dilemmas, or, in the idiom of Emmanuel Levinas, “the face of the other.” The “face of the other” is particularly of concern in the peopling of new technologies and technosciences.

In coming to terms with this ethnographic datum and this philosophical stance, anthropology is pushed to develop new tools of social theory. The social theory of the last quarter of the twentieth century and beginning of the twenty-first is created out of quite different generational, social structural, communication infrastructural, and knowledge-making contexts and experiences from those out of which classical social theory was created at the end of the nineteenth century and turn of the twentieth. Call this a corrtextualist stance toward social and cultural theory;. Classical social theory is hardly passe or superseded, but Marx, Weber, Dilthey, Freud, Durkheim, Fleck, iMauss, Schutz, et al. did not experience or analyze the kinds of shifts that have become focal for post-Algerian independence French theory (Cixcous, Deleuze and Guattari, Foucault, Derrida, Lyotard, Baudrillard, Touraine, Abeles, Latour, et al.), post-Green movement theory in Germany (Ulrich Beck, Friedrich Kittler) and Italy (Agamben, iMelucci), post-cost-benefit analysis of high hazard high consequence industries from anesthesiology to aeronautics to nuclear power in the United States (Perrow), post-socialist nationalisms, and, importantly for my own work, social and cultural movements in the Islamic world seeking to move beyond patriarchal patrimonialism (inspired among others by Ali Shariati, Nawal al-Sadawi, Saad Ibrahim; and the powerful films coming out of Iran). Indeed today—on the very day that NA 1 o is being expanded, and that we are contemplating war in Iraq—we operate under the sign of the film Safar-e Qandahar by the Iranian director]Mohsen Makhmalbaf, and its image of prostheses being parachuted from Red Cross helicopters to Afghan men running on crutches to catch them.

In the I99٥s anthropology began to take up ethnographic challenges in ٤٦ number of critical arenas: work on the reconstruction 0/society in the wake of social trauma, structural violence, and disruption on a scale not reflected upon, though it existed, by the social sciences since the early post-World War II, post-India-Pakistan Partition, and post-wars of decolonization era in which Clifford Geertz got his anthropological start. I99٥s anthropology began to take up ethnographic work on the new communication technologies that mediate the contemporary analogues of what Durkheim might have called the conscience collective in their more differentiated, telemediated, transnationally diffuse guises, and that transform the conditions of possibility for governance, legitimacy, and democratic civil societies. And I99ÜS anthropology began to take up ethno١ئ١٢،١٠\\١\\٢ work on the infrastructures of that lie make lite and 11’1)0 we let die.

Io map and critique these technoscientinc worlds and infrastructures, interferences and mediations, dislocations and reconfigurations, cultural forces and autoimmune cultural toxicities (CNN to al-jazeera) requires an anthropology attentive to an expanding variety of cultural differences that go far beyond traditionally understood cultural differences. The distinctive anthropological voice—the aspiration for cross-culturally comparative, socially grounded, linguistically attentive perspectives—continues to be a valuable jewel among the social sciences amidst the pressures to simply turn to statistical indices for all policies and judgments.

Thus far the inconstant son’s sendings to the father; let me turn to the generative sendings of the father to the son.

 Part Two: Where We Have Been

Rethinking the Anthropology of the Second Half of the Twentieth Century with Clifford Geertz;

OR:

Cliff’s four phases and my three-fold epistemological interpretive grid.

In his most recent of three essays surveying his own ،‘works and lives,” Cliff uses a four-fold division. I here is the golden age of optimistic post— World War II reconstruction, mtdtidisciplinarity and ream research, modernizarion and development theories grounded in Max Weber’s notions of economic, political, and cultural rationalizations, and the voluntarism of Talcott Parsons’s layer cake of biological, psychological, social, and cultural systems, the latter three, respectively, being dynamically integrated, functionally integrated, and logico-meaningfully integrated with cybernetic feedback among them, such that they were always already inseparable except analytically or heuristically. This was the age of Cliff’s field-defining quartet of ethnographic monographs on Indonesia.

There followed the dramatic shift of the hot spots of the Cold War into Indonesia. Thus the silver age of his migration to Sefrou in Morocco, and the efforts of the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations at Chicago to keep the modernization theories going as they obviously splintered and decayed. His ethnography became less monographic, and justifications were found for turning to the essay form in Local Knoudedge, and the tributes to such literary idols as Lionel Trilling. It is this turn that contains, I think, much of the ambivalence of his own corpus of work and its uneasy relation to the work of some of his progeny.

There followed the bronze and iron ages in anthropology of the 1980s and 19905, which Cliff glosses as a florescence of different schools and isms in the social sciences, followed most recently by a return of “unclear significance” to concerns with violence, ethnic conflict, and the like. This is the period of blurred genres, Cliff’s being in multiple minds about the role of Islam, and so on.

This is, however, the period, in my own trajectory and that of my أدلم ١أدلملأدلمء٢ Writing Culture, Antbropolog’y as Cultural Critique, Debating Muslims, the eight-volume Late Editions Project, the Public Culture Project, the inauguration of the journal Cultural Anthropology, my own directing of a Center for Cultural Studies, and then directing a Program in Science, Technology and Society. I coil nt myself as one of Clifford Geertz's progeny, perhaps an inconstant disciple, nonetheless both a fan, and I hope an appreciative and constructive deployer of his insights. My own work followed along behind Cliff's early interest in ecology, his efforts to test Weberian accounts of sociologically stratified and differentially organized religious forms (in my case in the Caribbean, Iran, and India), his interest in the philosophy of the social sciences, in genres of literary and dramatic forms, and eventually in science and technology. And I particularly want to salute Cliff's repeated efforts to appoint a science studies person at the Institute for Advanced Studies.

I would divide Geertz's four phases into three epistemological ones. I think one of the most fascinating features of Clifford Geertz's writings is the shift from a comparativist Weberian, Parsonsian, and broadly positivist or positive knowledge production, intended to help with notions of development programs for the modernization of "new nations" ill old cultures and civilizations (a contradiction that soon became generative both descriptive!)' and epistemologically), it is a shift from the rich ethnographic work of Agricultural Involution, Religions in java as it's author titled it (not as it was titled in the singular by its publisher kGee\ᒉᒉ١ After the Fact, \9١\\ 5< ʔe\·e،١iᒉev (\\ \١ 55ᒉ ,١Ite Social llistorv ()/ an Indonesian Town, Peddlers and Princes, and such essays as "Religion and Social Change," "Deep Play," and perhaps, but maybe not, "Person, Time, and Conduct in Bali,"[65] but certainly the later Negara. By the time we get to After the Fact and Available Light we are in the presence of an ostad, a master, of a very different kind of epistemology, one that plays deeply described cultures off against one another in a comparative epistemology, rather than a comparative realism, where as Geertz himself says, "One is faced with complex and contradictory helds of significative action, most of it tacit, across which assertion and denial, celebration and complaint, authority and resistance, continuously move.” He is talking about comparing Indonesia and Morocco, and he continues, “When ingeniously juxtaposed, these fields can shed a certain amount of light on one another, but they are neither variants of one another nor expressions of some superfield that transcends them both” (AF, 49). I would c،ıw v\ı\s using tbe epistemological resources of one culttire to critique and see anew into another culture. In this example, Geertz is musing upon the lack of gender inflections in Javanese, and its minutely graded, hierarchical speech registers, in cimtrast to ،Moroccan Arabic, which “has gender inflections for just about every part of speech, bur no status forms” (AF, 46). By so musing, he comes upon the insight—which he does not actually develop, though it would be fascinating to do so—that by looking at Moroccan politics with Javanese eyes (or grammars and speech modes), he is suddenly struck by the “persistent edge of seduction and resistance, flirtation and conquest... ranging from the understanding of sainthood to the metaphors of insult.” ،Moroccan politics is a world of flirtation and seduction, “where rank and station are sexually charged.”

Geerrz in this ntosr recent phase of his epistemological self-reflections speaks of this sort of comparative “method,” or, since he eschews the term “method,” artistic, even intuitive, skill, of these fields of “significative action, most of it tacit, across which assertion and denial, celebration and complaint, authority and resistance, continuously move”—as comparing incommensurables. Nonetheless, he concedes, it is “a useful enterprise, and when the stars are right, an informative one, however illogical.”

Illogical? I would submit even in passing, that hermeneutics and performance are nor illogical, either as method or as art, and that entertaining work ill the comparative critical apparatuses of local hermeneutics is both methodical and reasonable, and at least culturally logical.

Geertz’s middle passage, where I suppose the contradictions of the Parsonsian vision, came to accumulate so many anomalies that a paradigm shift was needed and was found in the Geisteswissenschaften of Dilthey, Weber, and Schutz, the counter-canon to which we were treated by Cliff in the 1 9605. (We also found our way to Hans-Georg Gadamer’s Truth and Method; to Walter Benjamin and Theodor Adorno; and to Paul Ricoeur, Kenneth Burke, Victor Turner, and Mircea Eliade who were important presences for my cohort at Chicago—-and even, very sotto voce at Chicago, Claude Levi-Strauss read as talmnd rather than as machine, Marx read as a decipherer of symbolic hieroglyphics of suffering and meaning as well as a political economist and a Saul Alinsky organizer avant la lettre). This middle passage was the time of the essays of the Interpretation of Culture, essays that we as graduate students were enthralled by, and tried without comparable success to mimic in our various term papers, mimicking the vocabulary, the bons mors, the paradoxes and chiasmuses, and elegant turns of polished phrase: models of/models for, experience near/experience far, many, as with all good poets, borrowed from, and gaining resonance from, the sedimented metaphors in the language and epistemological threads of earlier practitioners, Dilthey's Vorbildt und Nachbildt, Kohut's experience near and experience far, Gilbert Ryle's thick description and public language routing the ghosts in the machine, Paul Ricoeur's social action leaving traces that could be read as texts, Jeremy Bentham's deep play, Alfred Schutz's consociates. The middle passage was ethnographic as well as epistemological: Morocco did nor yield up the monographic ethnographic treatments that Indonesia did, though Islam Observed, and Meaning and Order in Moroccan Society had their brilliant insights and verbal pointillisms such as the much quoted image of the mental compartmentalization used by the modern Muslim of undecidable piety on the airplane with Scotch in one hand and the Koran for safety in the other.

This is the middle passage from cultural systems, the era of the hegemony of linguistic models: structural linguistics, generative grammars, cybernetics, paradigms, structuralisms, and the efforts to reformat phenornenology into more systemic modes whether in Sartre's effort to fuse existentialism and marxism or the socialization of perception through cultural forms, cockfights, calendars, teknonymic kinship namings, ethno-semantics, religion as a cultural system, models of/models for, common sense as a cultural system, art as a cultural system, ideology as a cultural system, the middle passage is from these recursive, self-protective symbolic systems to interpretive modes of blurred genres, incommensurable fields of significative action, reading over one another's shoulders, and like a moire flitting back and forth between narrative local worlds and world-historical ones, across which as well "assertion and denial, celebration and complaint, authority and resistance” continuously shift figure and ground, Gestalt and paradigm, appealing to undecidables and aporias, as when Geertz muses about the place of Islam in Indonesia, noting that in his several decades of observation its role has dramatically shifted several times—itself a sociological and historical comparativist observation. His recent essay on Gus Dur Wahid shows that he remains a shrewd and incisive commentator on Indonesia. But about Islam’s place he rather wishes to leave himself open to being “of many minds.”

 Part Three: On the Trail of an Anthropology to Come

By way of conclusion, I would return our gaze to the three challenges of 1990s anthropology as sires of deep play, each providing its own slide show: (1) the reconstruction of society in the wake of obliviously caused social trauma and structural violence—call this, title the slide, the move from cockfight to buzkashi; (2) the changes in science institutions fronr the 19605 to the 1990s—call rhis, title this slide, the move from Union Carbide in Bhopal (and Institute, West Virginia) to the demands of ACT UP and patient groups for accountability in the technologies of what is made to live and who is let die; and (3) the immersion in the telemedia—call this, title this slide, “War Again, 9/11, Qandahar, and the Autoimmune Cultural Toxicities of CNN and al-Jazeera.”

1. From Cockfight to Buzkashi

On September ؤ I, 2001, General Amin Said Tariq of the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan was quoted in a Boston Globe headline: “It is time for the Americans to join the game,” the Great Game of and for Central Asia, the game of buzkashi. American special forces were photographed astride Afghan steeds playing the game. Quire apart from one’s political stand on just wars or effectiveness of global interventions, one wonders how we will play the buzkashi game with smart bombs, psycho-pharmacological uppers for long range flights, nanotechnologies for smart protective uniforms, smart mobile surgical rooms, and whether we have, and how good are our game plans to pick up the land mines, destroyed schools, water systems, battered bodies and minds. Like the cockfight for an earlier era of violence, this buzkashi focuses our attention today again on violence, bare life, and states of exception. Bnzkashi becomes an icon for the shift from disciplinary societies to societies of control (those that depend less on territorial integrity than on statistics, (lows, codes, networks, and standards, and which when attacked create new zones of indistinction).

2. From Union Carbide in Bhopal to the Demands of ACT UP and Patient Groups for Accountability

The biopolitics of globalization are again at center stage, and at the center of these new ethical and political vortices are battles over the technosciences and biotechnologies themselves.

Cliff challenged US a few years ago to extend interpretivist approaches to the forms of life associated with “loose assemblages of differently focused, rather self-involved, and variably overlapping research communities in both the human and the natural sciences.” He wrote: “Of all the sorts of work that go on under the general rubric of the human sciences, those that devote themselves to clarifying the forms of life lived out... in connection with linear accelerators, neuroendocrinological labs, the demonstration rooms of the Royal Society, astronomical observations, marine biology held stations, or the planning committees of NASA, are the least likely to conceive their task as limited to making our the inter-subjective worlds of persons. Machines, objects, tools, artifacts, instruments are too close at hand to be taken as external to what is going on; so much apparatus, free of meaning. T hese mere ‚things’ have to be incorporated into the story, and when they are the story takes on a heteroclite form—human agents and nonhuman ones bound together in interpretivist narratives.” After cautiously acknowledging the “ill-formed and variable, uncertain opening probes in an ... ill-marked enquiry”—but I would say rapidly burgeoning field of science studies, (the anthropologies of Bruno Latour and Donna Haraway, Emily Martin, Rayna Rapp, Deborah Heath, and Karen-Sue Taussig, Steve Shapin and Simon Shafer, Sharon Traweek and joe Dumit, Paul Rabinow and Lawrence Cohen, Kim and Mike Fortun, Adryana Petryna and Joao Biehl, Byron and Mary-Jo Good, Chris Kelty and Hannah Landecker, Jennifer Mnookin, Heinrich Schwarz, Kaushik Sunder Rajan, Cory Hayden, Margaret Lock, Gary Downey, and many others, myself included)—he notes, “Sciences, physical, biological, human, or whatever, change not only in their content or their social impact (though they do, of course, do that ...) but in their character as a form of life, a way of being in the world” (AF).

What I want to mark here is a set of double movements that Cliff marked ﻍﻠﺝ ﺝﻠﻠﺞ on the 8ﺇﺍﺝﻠll of an anthropology to come, the double movement between lives and works, the coming inevitably onto the scene after the fact. Lifter the fact in search of and after the fact belated, the world-historical narratives, such as they are (bracketed as Lyotard would say, or ironized with Geertzian caution), nonetheless world-historical narratives (political master stories of modernization, or of anti-colonialism, “those were the Bandung days,١١ “the days of May 1968”) bursting from time to time into !()cal worlds, and at other times carrying those local worlds along with the spinning of the globe and the spinning of webs of signihcance and meaning, cosmic, scientific, metaphysical, and moral-ethical.

These doublings, hauntings, and phantasmagoria, tools of poesis, praxis, and gesture, mark out an anthropology to come, a justice to come, a community to come.

But the cockfights of science already are registered ill rich accounts by scientists themselves and by observers of their forms of life: François Jacob’s much admired autobiography, much cited by scientists, provides an exemplary account of two trained roosters beak to beak in, as well, a metaphysical and cosmic competition with God:

<quote>

Seminars, true rites of initiation, free-for-alls.... T hat day an American biochemist ... The audience interrupted incessantly.... Chopping up his discourse with questions ... badgering him, provoking him, nipping at his heels like excited puppies.... As for |Sol| Spiegelman, he was not easily confounded ... he listened to comments anil criticisms while playing with a piece of chalk in the fashion of a Hollywood gangster with a coin.... the deathblow came later in a cafe on the Boulevard Pasteur ... the theory was dissected, torn apart, shredded into tiny pieces. Bit by bit, the bull weakened. A final thrust of IJacquesI Monod's descabello. The bull's final spasm. And resistance ceased. All this amidst laughter and joking.... Two trained roosters beak to beak vying with humor and sarcasm.... a will to power ... desire for intellectual domination ... a world full of gaiety, of the unexpected, of curiosity, of imagination. A life animated as much by passion as by logic. Science meant for me the most elevating form of revolt against the incoherence of the universe. Man's most powerful means of competing with God: of tirelessly rebuilding the world while taking account of reality. (Jacob 1988,215)

</quote>

There is a richness, a joiiisance, a gamble with passion, in the sport of science, and also metaphysical depth, an agon with the mysteries of the universe and life, not just an aesthetic harmony or a pleasure in technical skill. As the Polish-born physicist, from the spa town and Hassidic seat of Rymanov in Galicia, 1. I. Rabi puts it:

<quote>

Some of the young people I see, who are very good, take physics ... as a system you can do things with, can calculate something with, and they miss ... the mystery of it: how very different it is from what you can see, and how profound nature is.... There is no good translation of a Witz. It's a joke or a trick. It's the use of this kind of witty trick that I have always liked about physics.... I have always taken physics personally.... It's between me and nature. (Rabi 1960)

</quote>

This metaphysical depth is often folded—like a double helix—against cultura I traditions, historical experiences, and community structures. Some of the productive tensions and synergistic reinterpretations between scientitle rationalities (such as they are in a post-Ludwig Fleck, Tom Kuhn, Bruno Latour, and Peter Galison era) and Christian and Jewish traditions have been explored, but one wonders in today's world why more has not been done with Hindu, Buddhist, Confucian, and Islamic traditions that lie in the background of some of the world's greatest scientisrs: Homi Bhabha, Vikram Sarabai, Ramanujan, Chandrasekar, Abdus Salam, Ghovind Khoranna, and now the Brahmin and Muslim creators of "the Hindu bomb"—Raj Ramana the classical pianist and explorer of resonances between Buddhist logic and high energy physics, and Avul Pakir Jainulabdeen Abdul Kalam, the current President of the Republic of India who justifies with good cockfight and game theory logic, "strength respects strength."

Above all, the search for accountability has transformed the ways in which the institutions of science and the rechnosciences operate. Call it the transformation from big science and the national security state to science accountable to multiple constituents lest the complexity of the infrastructure become brittle and break down. T he ethics of science— and the representations of science in both the epistemological (accuracy, reference, completeness) and political or stakeholders' senses—are no longer marginal issues left up to the sensibility of the researcher or expert. Across the sciences these are becoming matters for institutional review, efforts at transparency, and negotiations between publics and researchers over the propriety of research that involves people and publics. As the world becomes more integrated and interactive, questions of how information is collected, packaged, and made available as part of social institutions of reflexive or second-order modernization (to use Ulrich Beck's terms) let)!Ite more important and open to insistent questioning, and that detouring through media circuits of advertising, advocacy, and persuasion only make all the more suspect and SUbject to insistent questioning. Does a local poptdation always have to benefit, or is there a place for presumed consent to collection of various sorts of human biology data (blood, feces, cheek swabs, genetic, epidemiological, pathology samples, medical records), which only after considerable processing can be turned into statistical and "evidence based" knowledge and pharmacological and medical products.) The answers to these questions are not in, but they are today central questions publicly debated and politically negotiated—from Iceland's experiment to allow deCode Corporation to link data banks of medical records, genealogies, and DNA samples, to the Harvard-Millennium Pharmaceuticals project in China to collect DNA samples from populations in Anhui Province—and are not easily swept under the carpet. The biosciences are a deep play that directly pose quesrions of who shall live and who shall die, and that exert pressure toward new institutions of reflexive modernization or deliberative democracy in some of the most difficult areas of human experimental trials, informed consent, privacy and SUrveillance, parents and ownership of biological information, and the power of huge amounts of investments of not just money and power but also ideology and fantasy.

ز “ Will’ Again, 9/1 l, Qandahar,” and the Autoimmune Cultural Toxicities of CNN mid al-lazeera

No consideration of the current condition can avoid the new fabric of interacting media which have changed the calculus of, and conditions of possibility for, governance and legitimacy, of what democracy could possibly mean, of who speaks for whom, where all must play through the media, scientists and physicians as much as anyone, with anthropologists— for better and worse—far behind (running after the fact), and where the very use of relemedia has the effects, simultaneously, of both extending and undoing the messages, propaganda, persuasions, or pedagogies intended by the sender or patron, and where the truth is less hidden than partially revealed in measured and calculated unveilings that blur truth and falsity, that, as Hannah Arendt once said hide truth in the open where it can be assumed to be false, contaminated, or doctored, and is so by its very nature, without being any less the truth.

While Cliff has never devoted much attention to the felemedia, he has directed attention to the affective and cognitive, metaphorical and interpretive, tactics that form its basis. Symbolic anthropology and its morphing into interpretive anthropology can provide tools probing both cultural-philosophical meaning-making and also the sociology of cultural meanings and their operation as, and in, fields of power. For me, one of the tasks of aitthropology is to do the anthropology—cultural and social analysis —of communities of social thought and social theory itself. It is not very interesting after a while to simply debunk efforts at pattern recognition, generalization, comparison, model building, formalizations-in-the-service-of-models against which complex realities can be approximated, good-enough theory for pragmatic needs, and the like, as if they were misunderstood as universal and eternal truths. It is the recognition of immanent cultural critique, the play of communities of social thought against one another (not, Cliff, “recriminations”) that anthropology often is particularly well poised to place into the interpretive cockfight arena for us all to see the passions and irrationalities, as well as reasons and calculations, and social structures and cultural legitimations at play.

I end here my marginalia, commentaries, misreadings, and hashiyeh in the hopes that they may serve as a small return gift to an extraordinary teacher and writer. Cliff, thank you!

[65] This remains a stylistically brilliant essay and homage to the “phenomenology” of Alfred Schutz, a genre—of which I am fond—of testing European theories with non-European materials, ideally in the end also retooling the theories. Gananath Obeyesekere’s Medusa lɔ Hair is another such brilliant example. But as ethnography, it raises, as the cliche goes, maybe not more questions than it answers, but many unanswered questions. This is particularly so in the aftermath of 1965. My own imagination for Bali is still profoundly marked by my, much later, visit to Bali with Byron and Mary-Jo Good, and meeting one of our colleagues whose passport continues to be marked as belonging to a “communist” family, and who thereby is prevented from holding any public position, including teaching in the university. He was a child in 1965 and lost both parents. The position of living amongst those one knows or suspects of killing one’s parents, perhaps, only intensifies the tension surrounding the public masques and forms of address, time, and other social markers, that Cliff raises in this essay, and more flexibility in “Deep Play.” It certainly puts a different spin on the implications, long “After the Fact.” In a recent series of public discussions with refugees from social upheavals, preceding each performance of Peter Sellars’s production of Euripedes’ “The Children of Herakles” at the American Repertory Theatre, I heard an almost identical observation from a young Bosnian woman, now studying at Boston University, speaking of living together with the killers of one’s relatives, “It is a small society, and everyone knows .. While severe mental illness involves very different sorts of dynamics, Byron Good’s work in Indonesia on the episodic course of psychoses, in their cultural expressions and social responses among families, also adds layers of questions to the general account of cultural psychology in |aɹa (and Bali). I note these subsequent ethnographic benchmarks not as criticism of Cliffs ɹɹ ork, but as an ongoing form of ethnographic critique that builds upon, and is able increasingly to incorporate more kinds of ethnographic, historical, cultural, and psychological materials. The proɹ ocations (to uni\ersal psychologies) and questions (for ethnographic method) raised by “Person, Time, and Conduct,” arc such that the essay, I think, can no longer be used in the classroom by itself as a self-contained essay, but requires additional materials to think w ith. That is, as they say these days, a feature, not necessarily, a bug.

 References

<biblio>

Geertz, Clifford. 1995. After the Fact: Two Countries, Four Decades, One Anthropologist.

Cambridge: Har\ ai·d University Press.

Jacob, François. 1988. Tbe Statue Within: An Autobiography. Ne\ ʏ Tork: Basic Books. Rabi, 1. I. 1960. AJy Life ،1)/ Times as ،1 Physicist. Claremont, CA: Claremont College.

</biblio>

 Speaking to Large Issues

The World, If It Is Not in Pieces

Brief quote from Clifford Geertz reflecting on field work, in After the Fact, will begin to identify my concerns. In sum, he says.

<quote>

It is a matter of living out your existence in two stories at once.... One of these stories is the familiar one of the anthropologist projecting him- or herself onto the local scene as a minor actor, odd but harmless, and a solemn observer, searching our assorted facts. The other is the less familiar one, rarely recounted, of his or her attempt to maintain such a reduced and specialized persona amid the currents and cross-currents of world-scale politics.... You may set out to isolate yourself from cosmopolitan concerns and contain your interests within hermetical contexts. But the concerns follow you. The contexts explode. (Cjeertz 1995, 94–95)

</quote>

Mostly, in his ethnographic work, Geertz himself has told one of these stories, that of the local scene.[66] Yet the double life of the fieldworker shows up more in his essays, and in his recent variations in autobiography; as for example in commenting on the moral dilemma of sharing or not sharing one's typewriter with a local informant of modest resources who dreams of becoming a writer; and on being sought out, in the late 19505, by a group of earnest Balinese who wanted to have it confirmed by an American that the Soviet Union had indeed put a moon up in the sky. For if even an American would admit it, it must be true.

That concern with "the larger picture," with the world beyond the village, is I think continuously present in Geertz's work, !'or one thing, I see it in his insistence that in anthropology small facts can speak to large issues, when many of his colleagues in the discipline, after all, have seemed content to let their small facts speak to issues that are likewise rather small.[67] In some periods, the concern may not have been so noticeable, yet still contrapuntally present in his writings. At other times, It turns into more of a preoccupation. "The next necessary thing," he proposes toward the end of Works and Lines (1988, 47), is "to enlarge the possihiliry of intelligible discourse between people quite different froin one another in interest, outlook, wealth, and power, and yet contained in a world where, tumbled as they are into endless connection, it is increasingly difficult to get out of each other's way." And along related lines, in the final chapter of Available Light, his most recent book, he portrays the world at the end of the twentieth century; he notes that "a much more pluralistic pattern of relationships among the world's peoples seems to be emerging," but that "its form remains vague and irregular, scrappy, ominously indeterminate"; and he suggests that what political theory should now do is to participate in the construction of “a practical politics of cultural conciliation” (2000, 256).

This is very recent Geerrz. But I believe that the interest in large issues, the sense of coexistence of local and cosmopolitan stories, really goes back a half century or so, to the formative experiences of fieldwork in the period we may now describe as “early postcolonial.” It was an era of excitement, and not least some optimism, where those new nations had “charismatic leaders,” like Nehru, Nasser, Nkrumah, and of course Soekarno, and nor yer, or at least not yet recognizedly, the despotisms and kleptocracies associated with a later period. Being a witness to Indonesian life in that period, I believe, could both shape a perspective and defiite a horizon. Again, President Soekarno was one of those charismatic heroes of an independence struggle, and the emergence in world politics of what would become the Third World had its perhaps most renowned symbolic sire in the Indonesian ciry of Bandung. These were, as Geerrz has larer put it, “the Bandung days.”

Bur academic setrings count as well. It was likewise a time when schola IS were busily remapping the world, and Clifford Geertz had his significant share of such activity, not least with the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations at the University of Chicago. Perhaps I should insert that among the commentators here, I am no doubt unusual in that my personal interactions wirh Clifford Geertz have been limited; I claim largely a view from afar, although from that vantage point my attention to his evolving thought and writing has been fairly constant. In any case, I believe I first came across Geertz’s work, probably also unusually, in the volume Ohl Societies and Neil’ States (1963), a collaborative effort of that Committee. The book, which he edited and for which he also wrote ،l chapter, may nor by now seem very central to Geertz’s ’ contributions to anthropology, and it is distinctly a document of its era. Nonetheless, he draws attention to the connection between that book, and generally his time with the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations, and his current concerns, as he dedicates the concluding chapter of Available Light to the memory of the sociologist Edward Shils, a founding father of the Committee.

What Geertz took on, in his contribution to Old Societies and New States, was “ I he Integrative Revolution: Primordial Sentiments and Civil Politics in the New States.” It is a wide-ranging essay, drawing on brief interpretations of the state of affairs in seven countries of South and South-east Asia, the Middle East and Africa, and th rough the somewhat uncertain workings of oral and sometimes written tradition of a discipline such as anthropology, it may now be referred to most often as a source of a concept of “primordialism.” We could note here, first, that the concept came from Edward Shils (1957); and second, that Geertz’s actual understanding of primordialism seems rather different from what it may occasionally have been taken to be.Ĩ hose primordial attachments stemming from the “givens” of blood, speech, custom, and so on, noted Geertz (1963, 109) immediately, are assumed givens, “as culture is inevitably involved in such matters”; which means, in a latter-day vocabulary, that primordialism is indeed socially constructed. Yet when people define things as real, they are real in their consequences; and these attachments indeed keep on having consequences.

In his early essay Geerrz thus dwelt on the strains between divisive primordial sentiments and the push toward an overarching political regime in many new states; the strain between identity and recognition on the one hand and progress, efficiency and justice on the other. Again, the time of writing was one when the inclination was to take a fairly optimistic view of the future of the newly independent countries, and Geertz’s argument was generally that through compromises between primordial attachments and civil politics, compromises that varied from one place to the other, the countries he discussed seemed to muddle through. In the following years, some of them did less than that—Sri Lanka, Lebanon, Nigeria— and such failures surely had their part in the decline of optimism. Yet it appears to me that as he returns to similar issues in Available Light, in arguing for that “practical politics of cultural conciliation,” Geertz has maintained a consistent position.

So let us quickly come back to the present. In Available Light, in the final chapter titled “The World in Pieces: Culture and Politics at the End of the Century,” but not only there, and also more occasionally, before that, both in Works and Lives and in After the Fact, I find Geertz increasingly turning explicitly to some large issues—of increasing global interconnectedness generally, or the upheavals of the world after the Cold War particularly.

Anthropologists have characteristically been merchants in astonishment, he already told IIS once (Geertz 1984, 275), and in a time of global flux, we use astonishing juxtapositions as one way of sensitizing our listeners and readers and ourselves to what is going on and what now goes together. In Available Light 000, 247) Geertz has British bankers in Singapore gambling on Kobe earthquakes and Saudi production rarlongan running backs with the ,(1988, lذا) gers, in Works ،7/,،/ Lives Washington Redskins.

Indeed the end of the twentieth century, and the beginning of a new millennium, finds humanity facing some new circumstances, and that necessarily affects the human sciences as well. Again, scholars are redrawing rheir map the world. Geerrz argues that the cultural organization of the modern world oughr now to be anthropology's proper subject, bur that irs ()لا "cookie-cutter concept of culture" is no longer workable in the world of infinite connection (2000), 248). We must think again, for one thing, about how—or how not—to write anthropology: "Ethnographers have now to l() with realities with which neither encyclopedism nor monographism, world surveys nor tribal studies, can practically cope. Something new having emerged both in 'the held' and in 'the acadenty,' something new must appear on the page" (I 988, 148).

But what, then, can anthropology do? It seems reasonable to bring up the question of small facts and large issues again. In that period of now a little more than a decade that scholars, and some perhaps not quire so scholarly competitors, have once more been remapping the global landscape, some have been marketing what are purportedly very big facts—what one prominent participant in the trade, Neiv York Times columnist Thomas Friedman, has identified as the genre of "Ihe One Big I hing" (I 999, xviii). Some of these grand narratives may already be fading away—،'rhe end of hisrory"—others are still with us: "the clash of civilizations," perhaps "the coming anarchy," certainly Friedman's own global marketplace with its stampeding "electronic herd" of invesrors.[68] Those British bankers in Singapore are presumably somewhere in that herd.) If these stories do not necessarily homogenize the world, they do portray it as some kind of whole, rather than disconnecting its parts.

Again, ١٧hat can anthropology do now? Can we do anything effectively to contribute to a public intellectual exchange over where the world is today, and where it might be heading? Or more precisely, in the context of this session, what does one particular anthropologist do to speak to large issues? In Available Light, Geertz (2000, ود Iff.) states and exemplife his position. Responding to “One Big Thing” stories—he specifically identifies Samuel Huntington’s “clash of civilizations” scenario— anthropologists can hardly just go on offering another infinity of ethnographic facts. Still, he asserts that he is “an ethnographer, and a writer about ethnography, from beginning to end,” and notes, moreover, that I don’t do systems.” The latter, of course, might seem like a surprising claim from someone who has earned a part of his reputation from a series of essays analyzing religion, and ideology, and common sense, and art, as “cultural systems.” But perhaps that is a matter of the past, and in any case, this is hardly the kind of systems he has in mind.

My own preferences may be a little different here. The gap between American and European anthropologies may no longer be what it has been, and they may no longer be easily told apart, even if there continue to be those in my part of the world who are less than enthusiastic about subversive influences from this side of the Atlantic. Nonetheless, whether we talk about this in terms of “systems” or not, it may be a European streak in my anthropology, perhaps related especially to an old fondness for what I believe Clifford Geertz has somewhere called “cloth-cap anthropology,” which would lead me to favor some more robust sociological framing in the quest to understand precisely that cultural organization of the contemporary world.[69]

Yet let us leave that aside. What Geertz does identify as a resource of anthropology in understanding the global present is the particular kind of cosmopolitanism that he finds in “its determination to look beyond the familiar, the received and the near at hand”—“the considering together of what normally is not considered considerable together” (2000, 251). Comparison, that is to say, continues to be a major ingredient of Geertzian anthropology, from Old Societies and New States all the way to Available Light. But the style of comparison, as Renato Rosaldo (1999, 32–33) has pointed out in another collective effort to celebrate as well as scrutinize Clifford Geertz's work, is of a special kind, taking central concepts and exploring their connections and range of meanings through varied human contexts; inspired, it seems, by a Wittgensteinian sense of family resemblances.

One comment on this would be that a renewed, and rethought, use of comparison may well be one way of converting our ethnographic small facts into an asset in speaking to large issues—there are other indications of this (see, by way of comparison, Gingrich and Eox 2002). Rather than "One Big Thing" stories, we may favor identifying recurrent themes with their variations. There may be more ways of doing this, and in any case we would hardly all be able to do it in the particular way that Geertz goes about it. In most cases, probably, it would entail dealing with the ethnographic inventory of the discipline rather more as a shared resource, and cultivating skills of synthesis.[70]

But I would like, in conclusion, to point to another issue in the kind of understanding of the world that Geertz seems now to be working out. In his essay in Old Societies and New States, he made a plea for a better understanding of primordial attachments. In Available Light, in that final chapter, this is again the focus, the world scene, he notes, is "growing both more global and more divided, more thoroughly interconnected and more intricately partitioned, at the same time. As the one increases, so does the other" (2000, 246). And so on one side of this equation, there is "the world in pieces." As he also argues, "in a splintered world, we must address the splinters" (221). the identities continuously exemplified are those which in Old Societies and New States would have been identified as primordial: ethnic, national, linguistic, religious. And Geertz observes rhat there is indeed a continuity between the major changes of the 19505 and the 1960s and those of the 1990s, for in both periods what forms the background of a reaffirmation of such identities is the fall of empires. And in both periods it turns out that the relationship between splinters and whole is a different one from rhat of the old Western European notion of the nation-srate.

All the same, I wonder about the other side of the equation, that of the world growing more global, more thoroughly interconnected. Cosmopolitanism may be a keyword here; it seems now to show up with increasing frequency in Geertzian texts, although possibly not always with the same thrust.

As Rosaldo continues his analysis of Geertz's mode of comparison, he notes that while Geerrz rakes barriers erected by cultural differences seriously, he also has a vision of ethnography as a tool by which people can come to understand the differences, and establish a vocabulary for speaking to one another. I think that herein lies a significant part of the cosmopolitanism of anthropology; a sense of the world as a whole, but combined with a respect for, or even appreciation of, diversity. And I do indeed think of Clifford Geertz as a cosmopolitan—more precisely what Kwame Anthony Appiah (1 996) among others have recently described as a "rooted cosmopolitan," strongly connected to one place in the world and yet engaging with other ways of being human.

The rootedness is there, I would suggest, a little parenthetically, in a special although multifaceted relationship between his writings and American thought, in the way Geertz has continuously sought intellectual stimulation from American sources (not that others are missing), ranging from John Dewey by way of Kenneth Bnrke to Jerome Bruner; not necessarily everyday references among anthropologists. I believe it is also noticeable in the way that in Works and Lines (1988), he can incisively analyze the writings of ⁝Malinowski, Evans-Pritchard, and Levi-Strauss, but eventually seems to have a more tender understanding of Ruth Benediet, and her attempt, by way of portraying the strange Japanese, to tell her compatriots about themselves. And I detect this rootedness, too, in his personal style of writing, with its precise deployment of American colloquialisms and occasional but no doubt stylistically very deliberate appeal to what seems like a culturally specific vocabulary of common sense. Ehis rootedness, this cultural thickness as it were, is something that for me adds significantly to the pleasure of reading Geertz.

Yet as far as cosmopolitanism is concerned, that inclination toward looking beyond the familiar and the received, toward considering things together that have otherwise been kept apart, that openness to “another country heard from,” can hardly now belong to anthropologists alone. If the world is not only in pieces, not only splintered, we should perhaps not think of addressing the splinters as our single task. We certainly cannot fail to notice the splintering, the spectacular clashes linked to primordialism on the global scene—as newsmedia editing strategy has it, “when it bleeds it leads.” Yet from the times when primordial sentiments were contrasted with the civil politics of new states, to the present when they are set against global connectedness, the scholars inapping changes in the world may have been a bit inclined toward underestimating the cultural complexity of what is occurring on the other side of the equation, where a variety of people may also be motivated by their personal experiences interconnectedness to identify with humanity in its diversity.[71]

Perhaps the identities growing here are sometimes not so culturally thin. Perhaps we can sometimes even witness that there is, in a sense, a kind of primordialization of cosmopolitanism going on, although often less spectacular. This will also have its implications for the way we do ethnography. Those contexts referred to in my beginning quote will explode again and again. But as the world is at the beginning of this century, we should hope that there is something other than pieces to look for. And as the final few words in Available Light instruct us, there is yet “the moral obligation to hope.”

[66] (liven what I take to be a reluctance on Geertz’s part to appear very noticeably in person in his ethnography—with the famous exception of the opening scene in the essay on the B^ˀ!inesc cockfight—I can sec why the double existence of the ficldworker does not feature so prominently in it. For to the extent that there is really some tendency for the Stories to be separate, the fieldworkcr may be the main connecting link, and their combination might inevitably turn into what he might see as the wrong kind of person-centered ethnograph).

[67] I realize that I interpret ،‘large issues” in a somewhat narrow sense here, as a matter of social scale. Issues can be large in other ways as well.

[68] The “One Big Thing” stories referred to here, of course, apart from Friedman’s, are those of Fukuyama (19)ε)2), Huntington (1996), and Kaplan (e.g., 2()():)).

[69] (icertz has commented rather ironically on this gap, as it was at an early I 9605 Cambridge conference, in After the Fact (1995, 116–17). Yet certainly there would be American commentators as well, some of them close to Geertz, who would also be inclined to put more sociology into cultural analysis; sec for example, Ortner (I 999) and Sewell (1 999). As far as American, and specifically (icertzian, transatlantic influence is concerned, let me also just note that what was presumably the first “Hyper(ieertz ’ comprehensive, contextual, and referential bibliography and mediagraphy was on an Austrian website ([[http://www.iwp.uni-linz.ac.at/lxe/sektktfGGHyperGeertz.html][www.iwp.uni-linz.ac.at/lxe/sektktfGGHyperGeertz.html]]).

[70] For some more discussion of this, and of the relationship of anthropologists to the genre of macro-scenarios generally, see Hannerz (2003).

[71] For a comment on this in relation to ()/¸ Societies and New Statesι see Spencer (1 997, 7).

 References

<biblio>

Appiah, Kwame Anthony. 1 996. Cosmopolitan Patriots. In Martha c. Nussbaum et al.. For Lone of Country, ed. joshua Cohen. Boston: Beacon Press.

Friedman, Thomas. 1999. The Lexus and the ( )lire Tree. London: HarperCollins. Fukuyama, Francis. 1992. The End of History and the Last Man. New York: Free Press. Geertz, Clifford. 1 962. The Integrative Revolution: Primordial Sentiments and Civil Politics in [he New States. In old Societies and New States, ed. Clifford Geertz. New York: Free Press.

——. 1973. The Interpretation of Cultures. New York: Basic Books.

———. 19)84. Distinguished Eecture: Anti Anti-Relativism. American Anthropologist 86: 263–78.

——. 1988. Works and Lives. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

———. 1995. After the Fact. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

——. 20()(). Available Light. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Gingrich, Andre, and Richard G. Fox, eds. 2002. Anthropology, by Comparison. London: Routledge.

Hannerz, Ulf. 2003. 1M ac ro-Sce n a r ios: Anthropology and the Debate over Con tern pora ry and Future Worlds. Social Anthropology I l: 169–87.

Huntington, Samuel p. 996 l. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Kaplan, Robert l). 2000. The Coming Anarchy. New York: Random House.

()rtner, Sherry B. 1999. Introduction. In The Fate of “Culture, ” ed. Sherry B. Ortner. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Rosaldo, Renato !.,Jr. 999 l. A Note on Geertz as a Cultural Essayist. In The Fate of ·· Cuititre, ” ed. Sherry B. Ortner. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Sewell, William H., Jr. 1999. (icertz, Cultural Systems, and History: From Synchrony to Transformation. In 7 be Fate of “Culture, ” ed. Sherry B. Ortner. Berkeley: university of California Press.

Shils, Edward. 1957. Primordial, Personal, Sae’red and Civil Ties. British Journal of Socialogy 8: 1305ب.

Spencer, Jonathan. 1997. Post-Colonialism and the Political Imagination. Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 3: 1–19.

</biblio>

 On the “Subject” of Culture

Subjectivity and Cultural Phenomenology in the Work f Clifford Geertz

Byron Good and Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good

When Rick Shweder and we began hiking about organizing this e١enr— two)ears ago at a similar panel organized for Jerome Bruner—we discussed asking the Societ)’ for Psychological Anthropology to sponsor the gathering, as they had the Bruner panel. In Brunei’s ease, the reasons were quite obvious. “Cultural psychology” is ،١ key parr ot the Bruner corpus. In the case ot Clifford Geertz, it is somewhat less obvious. lor while he has turned his attention systematically front one domain to the next—religion, ecology in ف هدلار7٠تمى//كرك٢/ Imvliition. economic development in Peddlers ،1//، Princes. Balinese kinship, the social history and stratification of an Indonesian tow n, and the stare and polity of Nega ra—in each case demonstrating that cultural patterns a re constitutive, essential, nor accidental to their tinderstanding, Geertz has never taken on psychology in the same fashion. Several of his essays— notably “Person, lime, and Conduct in Bali,” and “From the Native’s Point of Ciew’”—examine “the problem of the self—its nature, function, and mode of operation” in Bali, lava, and Morocco. Bur none constitutes ،١ (till blown cultural psychology. Despite this, we will argtie that Geertz has elaborated ٦ view of subjectivity and the relation of the subject to culture, which, while seldom noted, lies at the hearr of the entire corpus, whatever specific he is a d d ressing. It is our goal here to re١iew the lineage of these ideas in light of current debates about subjectivity, in which diverse posrstrucruralist and linguistic theories vie with psychological and phenomenological accounts, and to raise questions about w here Geertz’s ideas might take US in the future.

In 1969, having completed a three-year degree in comparative religion at Harvard Divinity School, I (BG) drove to Chicago to begin amhropology; Mary-Jo took a leave from the Social Relations Department at Harvard to join me for the year.[72] These were rimes both exciring and awful— marked by the deaths of Martin L.uther King and Robert Kennedy, the police riots of the Democratic National Convention, the invasion of Cambodia, and the trial of the Chicago Seven. They were wonderful times to be a student, however, with the invention of interpretive anthropology in full swing; the interdisciplinary Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations in its tenth year, headed by Tom Fallers; Vic and Edie Turner hosting Thursday night seminars in their home in Hyde Park; reading groups taking on Marx and critical theory at Terry Turner’s apartment; and fortuitously, Clifford Geertz in the final year of a ten-year stint at the University of Chicago. Professor Geertz was, that year, extraordinarily available to students, gracious and accommodating. When forty students showed up for his Seminar on Theories of Culture, he simply divided the class in two and taught it twice, meeting four times each week instead of two. He taught a lecture course titled “Indonesia and Morocco—An Uncontrolled Comparison,” which many attended avidly. And when that wasn’t enough for a small group of US, he invited us to his home each week to discuss books we wished to read on the anthropology of religion.

If Professor Geertz was our teacher for only one year, the reading list for his Theories of Culture seminar—and his books, of course—were to be our teacher for years to come. It was a remarkable reading list—277 books and articles, divided among thirteen sessions—that gives a glimpse of the theoretical origins of Geertz’s work, seldom in full view in his footnotes or bibliographies. The thirteen sessions had titles in parentheses, indicating a loose grouping of sources bearing on a topic: Patterns; Symbols; Values and Norms; World View; Art; Categories, Classification, etc.; Science; Structuralism; Ideology; Change; Semantics; Phenomenology; and Psychology. Readings for the eleventh session, grouped under the heading “Semantics,” will give a flavor: Albert’s “ ،Rhetoric,’ ،Logic,’ and ،Poetics’ in Burundi”; Arewa and Dundes, “Proverbs and the Ethnography of Speaking Folklore”; two essays by Bernstein, including “Some Social Determinants of Perception”; Brown and Gilman’s “ the Pronouns of Power and Solidarity”; Kenneth Burke’s “The Philosophy of Literary Form,” “Terministic Screens,” and the entire Rhetoric of Religion; an essay by Burling; Ernst Cassirer’s book Language and Myth; Geertz’s own essay “Linguistic Etiquette”; Greenberg’s book Language Universals; a Goodenough essay on componential analysis; Izutsu on “Principles of Semantic Analysis”; jakobson’s “Concluding Statement: Language and Poetics”; Katz’s The Philosophy of Language; Mazrui on the “Sociopolitical Functions of English Literature in Africa”; Pike on “Emic and Etic Standpoints”; Vygotsky’s “Thought and Word”; and Whorf on “The Relation of Habitual Thought and Behavior to Language”—that was for Tuesday, with ،ד similar list tinder the heading of “Phenomenology on Thursday!

It will he no surprise that literary theorists figured large in the reading list—though this was eons before anyone imagined a “narrative turn” in the social sciences. Kenneth Burke, Northrop Frye, Walker Percy, and Auerbach’s Mimesis, along with Susanne Langer, of course, joined Gombrich on Art and Illusion and historian of Chinese thought Joseph Levinson. However, several intellectual threads of what might be called “cultural phenomenology,” less often recognized but representing a critical strand for understanding Geertz’s theorization of subjectivity, figured large on the reading list. Merleau Ponty, Alfred Sell Utz, and behind these the neo-Kantian Ernst Cassirer provided the basis for developing an anthropological phenomenology, a phenomenology absent a transcendental subject. Geerrz’s set of essays, “Religion as a Cultural System,” “Ideology as a Cultural System,” “Common Sense as a Cultural System,” and “Art as a Symbolic System,” represent a Schutzian exercise in describing phenomenological “perspectives” (explicated in Schutz’s essays on “milltiple realities”[73]), but with local symbolic systems providing the content and substance of each perspective. This anthropological elaboration on Schutz is grounded in the work of Ernst Cassirer and his vision of “symbolic forms” as mediating between Kant’s a priori categories of mind and the perceived world, actively constituting “image-worlds” (in Cassirer’s terms) of language and myth, religion, art, history, and science. But all of this becomes an ethnographic theory of subjectivity when made local, placed in “a small, shabby inland county-seat sort of place” that was Pare in Central Java in the 19505, or in Bali or Sefrou, described by Geertz with similar flair. And for these, the ethnographies on the reading list are more relevant: Hallowell, particularly “The Ojibwa Self and its Behavioral Environment”; Godfrey Lienhardt’s Divinity and Experience; Stauner’s On Aboriginal Religion and “The Dreaming.” In these, as in Geerrz’s ethnographies, the subject embodies culture, lives in a distinctive phenomenal world—spirits here, mystical powzers there, particular categories of kin in each—and has access to that world through a set of embodied practices—Javanese meditation, Balinese dance, or simply growing up in a Balinese household—practices and encounters with realities that “clothe those conceptions W’ifh such an aura of factuality” (and you know’ the rest). In these, culture shapes “the behavioral environment,” in Hallowell’s terms, as well as the “selves” who inhabit that environment; and the “moods and motivations” incorporated into these selves are not limited to the religious perspective, but carry over into the “everyday,” common sense” world, making Protestants into capitalists, and perhaps even Santri into capitalists as well. Only time will tell about that.

But it is Geertz’s explicit work on the person, or the self, that has had such profound influence on psychological anthropology.

In all three of the societies 1 have studied intensively I he writes in ،‘From the Native’s Point of View”[74]], Javanese, Balinese, and Moroccan, I have been concerned ... with attempting to determine how the people who live there define themselves as persons, what goes into the idea they have (but, as 1 say, only half-realize they have) of what a self, Javanese, Balinese, or Moroccan style, is. And in each case, 1 have tried to get at this most intimate of notions not by imagining myself someone else, a rice peasant or a tribal sheikh, and then seeing what I thought, but by searching out and analyzing the symbolic forms—words, images, institutions, behaviors —in terms of which, in each place, people actually represented themselves to themselves and one another.

It is this notion of the self or person as symbolic “all the way down” that contributed to a movement to investigate “the person” or “self” across cultures. It also initiated an important line of research and reflections on Javanese cultural psychology, from Ward Keeler to Steve Ferzacca’s recent book, that respond specifically to Geertz’s writings on Java.[75] And it is on these writings on the Javanese self that we would like to focus our attention for our few remaining min Utes.

Most of you will recall Professor Geertz’s elaborations of two sets of contrasts —batin and lair, glossed as “inside” and “outside,” and ahis and kasar, “refined” and “coarse”—through which Javanese, he says, pursue their efforts to be human, debating “reason and passion, the nature of time, or the reliability of the senses” with an “absolutely astonishing intellectual vitality.” The goal of being alus, refined, pure, subtle, smooth, is pursued through a set of religious disciplines aimed at quieting the inner self, “thinning out” or “smoothing” one’s emotional life, and by enacting a form of etiquette through which persons shape their outer or behavioral life to appear “predictable, undisturbing, elegant, and ... choreographed.” In The Religion of java, this complex of symbolic action is shown to be rooted in prijaji religious practices, those distinctive Javanese forms of Hindu-Buddhist and Sufi exercises rooted in what is still called—by our Javanese psychiatrist friends, for example—Filsafat Hichip jawa, the Javanese philosophy of life. It is this vision of cultural psychology, and of Javanese cultural psychology in particular, that we would like to query with three clusters of questions and ethnographic anecdotes.

First, what is the status of this complex of ideas and ideals, this pattern of managing self and the emotions, in Java today.) One anecdote. I taught a course on “Culture. Emotions and Psychopathology” for master’s degree students in psychology in Gadjah Mada University in 1996, shortly after we arrived as Senior Fulbright lecturers. In a session on culture and depression, we broke into small groups to discuss experiences students had had with depression or people they knew who had suffered severe depressions. I was only beginning to study Indonesian language at that time, and ran a small group, all young women, in English. Some of the students knew each other well; others in our group had only recently met. The first young woman to speak launched imnrediately into a story of her separation fronr her husband, her resulting bouts of depression, and her difficulties in deciding whether it was best for the children to remain with her husband or to seek a divorce. Soon she was crying, and the other students were stroking her arms, themselves in tears, joining the conversation. A second young woman in the class soon picked up a more difficult st(ıry—about how her father, a famous psychology professor, had taken up with another woman, lived openly with rhat woman though remaining married to her mother, deeply shaming the mother and the family, and about how she herself had become depressed, and was now less and less seen as a promising young scholar, overtaken by her younger sister, also studying psychology, who, by the way, lived with their father. Few in the group knew this student very well, bur they were soon holding and stroking her as well, engaged in a remarkable bit of intimate reflection on their inner lives.

I should probably not have been as surprised as I was, although this intimacy and open expression of emotion was remarkably different from the style of managing affect I had expected to find, based on my reading about the Javanese self. These were psychology students, speaking English not Javanese, and this was of course 1996 at the cosmopolitan heart of Jogjakarta, nor the I 95Os in Pare, not prijaji, women not men, a different rime, a different place. But it does raise questions about the status in Java today of what Cliff and Mildred observed about Javanese psychology as graduate students in the 1950s. We know there are continuities. An ontology of inner power, strength, force, achieved through a variety of practices 0ĺl and new—for example, tenaga dalam, “inner power” meditation groups among students today replace many of the mystical sects popular in the 19505 and I96ÜS—still is central to understanding selfhood foi a vast ma|ority of Javanese we know. But lava is now a very complex meeting place of diverse transnational images and cultural religious forms. Our Javanese goddaughter watches Javanese dance (,n television and immediately assumes embodied postures of classical avanese culture. This shifts when dangdnt music comes on, with young Islamic women covered with jilbab swaying to a kind of global Islamic rock. And when she puts on our earphones and listens to CDs of jMotown or blues, she immediately begins to enact yet another culture. She is fluent in each, embodying one after the other with remarkable grace.

The questions we ask in this context are asked daily by our Javanese friends. What is happening to Javanese culture? What contours of Javanese personhood will emerge in this setting? What exactly constitutes “Javanese” SUbjectivity as we enter the twenty-first century? Are the old cultural forms that once shaped how Javanese spoke of the self and managed their emotions still relevant for current generations, and to the extent they are not, what has replaced them? Exploring new forms of Javanese subjectivity, emerging under quite new conditions, is a line of inquiry that follows naturally from the Geertzian corpus.

The second set of questions has to do with the studies of individual lives in relation to the cultural norms through which self and person are imagined. What are the relations among these cultural ideals of selfhood, these “symbolic forms—words, images, institutions, and behaviors” to which Geertz refers, and the enormous diversity of individual lives and psyches? Flow are these symbolic coordinates and cultural practices appropriated and integrated into their lives by individuals? Ethnographic accounts of Susanne Brenner and Leslie Dwyer show,[76] for example, how Islamic revivalism and donning the jilbab have very different meanings for individual women, and the same is true for the meditation practices of those we know. Our research with persons suffering serious mental illness and their families is a constant reminder of how individual life histories, personal psychologies, and Javanese ideals of personhood interweave. But sustained analysis of individual lives is all too seldom present in ethnographic writing.

In After the Fact, Geertz quotes a retired Nationalist leader talking, in 1971, about the terrible killings of 1965. This man concluded: “There is still a good deal of bad feeling around on the part of friends and relatives of the victims. But anti-Gommunism is now so strong here they don’t dare say anything; they just conceal it, like good Javanese. I myself am as anti-Communist as I always was. But the real hatred, the murdering and being murdered, was a matter between Muslim militants and Communisr ones.” This murdering and being murdered is a matter for inquiry in and of itself, challenging any cultural psychology. But so too are the trauma and memories that mark the lives of individuals who lived through those desperate days. As Indonesians attempt, uneasily, to revisit 1965, even as new violence is afoot and more threatens, the study of trauma in individual lives, of how Indonesian cultural forms such as those Geerrz describes shape memory and the management of the pain it produces, is not only more possible than before, it is even more desperately needed.

But such research requires theories and ethnographic practices that link investigations of symbolic forms with the lives of individuals. Psychology has been out of vogue for much of American anthropology since the late, over-reaching years of culture and personality theorizing. Geerrz singled our for elaboration one crucial thread in American anthropological writing on the subject and subjectivity—a phenomenological subject linked to Hallowell and Sapir (and more ambivalently to Benedict), bur traceable to the “Romantic” subject of German theorizing (including that of Herder, Humboldt, and Hamann, by Charles Taylor’s reckoning[77]). Ironically, elaboration of a cultural theory of the person and subjectiviry may have contributed to resistance to investigations of individuals, reluctance to link common symbolic forms to enormously diverse psych(logical experiences of particular Javanese. But surely, at a moment when anthropology self-consciously rejects essentialized representations of “cultures” and struggles to write about groups that appear as “a tangle of differences and similarities only half sorted out,” as Geerrz writes,[78] studies of subjectivity through investigations of individual lives, invesrigations of how individuals appropriate elements from increasingly discordant cultural forms available through diverse media, become more critical if we are to make any sense of contemporary “Javanese” personhood or subjectivity. And for this, elaboration of new theoretical constructs and ethnographic practices, and a willingness to engage psychology in a way that threatens to “reciprocally disequilibrate” both anthropology and psychology,[79] will be needed to extend the lineage Geerrz continues to elaborate.

Finally, the story of the Nationalist Party leader’s description of how “good Javanese,” whether Muslim militants or former Communists, concealed their feelings and memories about the killings of 196.ʕ raises a third set of questions. What is the relationship of the politically “hidden” to our understanding of subjectivity and subjective experience? What happens when rhat which has been widely presumed as simple “common sense” is suddenly felt by many in the society to be hegemonic, when broad segments of society recognize how Slate apparatuses have used cherished formutations of selfand family to naturalize their power, when what is actually felt about public ideologies is concealed, when “subjectivity” is placed in tension with “subjection”.) How can a careful cultural phenomenology, such as that pioneered by Geertz, contribute to an understanding of the hegemonic, or, in turn, of those moments when state ideologies are felt to lose their hold, seen as symbolic forms behind which corrupt elites hide their real motives rather than a “map” for an imagined community? How do we theorize Javanese subjectivity in moments of widespread cynicism and despair such as that resulting from the obvious failures of political reform—reformasi—since the fall of Soeharto? Or even more difficult, whose voice do we privilege when we see hegemony where many (but not all) members of a society see everyday reality?

When I assigned my psychology students in 1997 in Jogjakarta to interview young parents about what was different between how their parents raised them and how they were attempting to raise their own children, discussions of the authority role of the father and the order and “discipline” he maintains for his children were ubiquitous. But this was at precisely the moment that the Soeharto regime had launched a Gerakan Disiplin National, a national discipline movement. The language of the state drew upon powerful symbols and affects of Javanese families, and, combined with memories of the terrible chaos of 1965 and thirty years of state propaganda that linked disorder and Communism, the call for “order” and “discipline” were psychologically powerful. Nonetheless, the mid-1990s was a time of enormous and widely recognized state corruption, and for many Javanese, such New Order symbols had lost much of their power. With typical Indonesian word play, disiplin was transformed into di-silip in, to have “slipped in,” indicating with a wink how one had to slip money into one’s driver’s license whenever stopped by the police, or into the myriad of documents passed to government officials. “Hidden transcripts” were beginning to be less hidden, though the language of order and harmony continued to mask a will to power. Iheorizing subjectivity under conditions such as these, amidst the decline of the New Order, thus required not only an understanding of the power of cultural forms to disguise the regime’s actions and naturalize its notions of “order” but also an analysis of the ability of many Indonesians to provide their own critical readings of elite discourses. It required attention to political subjectivity and the place of the imagination in the constitution of the state and its power.

For a moment after Soeharto was thrown from power in 1998, the loose ideology of reform, or reformasi, mapped a potent new reality.

Balinese could stop co ncealing their rage behind a docile image of the pDI bull, friends told Mary-Jo, and the bull was redrawn on the party banners and logos to represent its actual fierceness. Supporters of Megawati could actually wear Democratic Parry tee shirts—red with the image of the bull in black—rather than Chicago Bulls jerseys with Michael Jordan’s name and numerals, which more covertly proclaimed their allegiance to “Ibu Mega” and their rejection of the New Order regime. But three years and three presidents later, the term reformasi now too is greeted with cynicism, and rogue elements of’ the stare apparatus combine with parochial ethnic and religious leaders to loose new forms of violence in sites scattered about the archipelago. Cultural phenomenology needs to be extended to the complexities of political subjectivity under conditions such as these if we are to make anthropological sense of contemporary subjectivity in places like Indonesia.

We are at a moment in anthropology’s history when no single theory of subjectivity will, or can possibly, suffice. Clifford Geertz has provided a remarkable synthesis of humanist theorizing of the subject. His work points naturally toward several complementary efforts, linked to psycho-analysis and studies of individuals, on the one hand, and to critical theory and studies of political subjectivity, on the other, which practitioners of interpretive anthropology are pursuing today. And in his latest writing, he continues to try to make sense of the dramatic changes transforming postcolonial societies such as Indonesia and Morocco over the past forty years, to explore the rise of new forms of borh cosmopolitanism and parochialism, which constitute distinctive modernities that frame emerging subjectivities, ’!‘hroughout this monumental work, Clifford Geertz has continued to reflect with great passion and insight on what it means to be human in very diverse—but always specific—times and places. For these profound contributions to anthropology and the hliman sciences, we join the participants in the symposium in paying him homage. And for his assuming that ancient and enduring role of teacher, we say simply, thank you, Cliff.

[72] Although written jointly by Byron and Mary-Jo DcIVecchio Good, this paper was prepared to he read aloud by Byron Good. When the first person is used in the text, the ،1») refers to Byron Good.

[73] Alfred Schutz, Collected Papers, vol. The Problem of Social Reality (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 19)71).

[74] Quoted front Clifford Geertz, Local Knowledge (New York: Basic Books, 198.5), .S8.

[75] Ward Keeler, Javanese Shadow Plays, Javanese Selves (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 19)87): Steve Eerzacca, Healing the Modern in a Central Javanese City (Durham, NC: Carolina Acadeinic Press, 2001).

[76] Susanne Brenner, “Reconstructing Self and Society: Javanese Muslim Women and ‚The Veil,’ ” American Ethnologist (1996): 673–97; Leslie Dwyer, “Making Modern Muslims: Embodied Politics and Piety in Urban Java, Indonesia” (PhD diss., Princeton University, 200)1).

[77] Charles Taylor, “Theories of Meaning,” in his Philosophical Papers, vol. 1: Human Agency and Language (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985), 248–92.

[78] Clifford Geertz, Available Light (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000), 249.

[79] Geertz, Available Light, 199.

 Commentary

Clifford Geertz

I have not changed my comments significantly from the form they rook at the symposium at which I had a half-horir to respond. The number of papers necessirated rhat the reply to each be brief, and the variety of topics was such that I took an informal and unsystematic, rather ad hoc, approach to them. I am, as I made clear at the symposium, extremely indebted both to Richard Shweder and B١·ron Good for conceiving and organizing the evenr and to the various participants for giving their rime and arrenrion to my work and producing such perceprive and challenging discussions of it. The lightness of tone of my remarks conceals, as such lightness often does, the deep emotion I felt upon the occasion, and rereading the conrributions, I feel now. Ir was a very personal occasion, despite the presence of many people. I rrusr rhat at least some of this will get through to the reader.

 Lawrence Rosen

The turn, starting most dramatically with the Vietnam period, toward a more open and direct expression of personal judgments in anthropology, has raised, as Lawrence Rosen, a half lawyer, half anthropologist hippogriff, is preadapred to recognize, some seriously complex issues for anyone claiming to be just giving the news please about other peopies' ways of going about things. The Olympian pose—that these things, strange as they may seem, are just out there and I only tell you rhat they are, whatever you do or dou r rhink about the matter—is no longer a plausible stance, if It ever was. No one believes you anyway. Leaving the world alone is not something infra-lunary beings, as Paul Veyne would say, meaning IIS, can do. The recognition of the situated (and unreliable) nature of the observer, of the moral overtones of even the most thinned our, reductive, technically armored analysis, and of the fact rhat as humans are not iMartians, rrearing them as though they were, strange objects III a featureless space, pioduces caricature ... all these have brought, as Larry points out, the old question back into our line of sight: "What is the right thing for Its to do?" That is, what is the right thing to say, to write, to argue, to indict, to defend, and when need be, perhaps the most difficult thing of all, when ought we to hold our tongues. The hliman world is indeed various, puzzling, and impossible to sum up in simple good vs. bad formulae. But the matter can hardly be left at that.

This leaves US, as Larry says, with the question not whether to pass judgments, but how. How to phrase them, how to limit them, how to make them plausible, how not to fall in love with them. And, as he also says, n\y own approach here has been less head-on than oblique. The adjusted tone, the passing adjective, the parenthetical allusion, the glancing comment, the careful irony-thrown elbows and sideways kicks. The danger in this, of course, is the fact that judgments are being made, verdicts are being advanced, even sentences are being passed, may be missed altogether by the prosodically tone deaf, That has, indeed, sometimes been the case in my case: a quietness of comment being taken for an absence of it, a muffled view for no view at all. That’s the danger, especially in these days of blare and polemic. But it seems to me a lesser danger than a loud and headlong parti pris moralism—stiff in opinions, as Dryden says, and always in the wrong. The judgin’ business, as that famous Beyond the Fringe sketch has it, is a lark compared to goin’ down the mines. And it is all too eas\’—to quote the late great jurist Paul Freund—to substitute the complacencies of voting for the strains of judging.

 Richard Shweder

Richard Shweder’s paper with its hard questions about relativism, pluralism, diversity, and the like takes US further into this whole wrenching issue. But, before trying to address the questions he poses as such, let me extend this notion that much of the ‚‘judgin’)” that rakes place in my work comes less in terms of explicit verdicts than through passing comments, insinuate phrases, over-the-shoulder, curve-ball rones of voice and the like, by taking issue with his recommendation that the best thing to do about my writing style is to “ignore it for the sake of getting on with a discussion of his ideas.” (Jim Boon’s piece is, of course, directed to this subject altogether, and I will deal with it... and with him ... in a moment—or maybe a moment and a half.)

I do this not to defend my style (or styles) as such. Having toiled over it for so many years, I am qitite aware of its deficiencies, and if l am not there is always a reviewer to remind me. The pleasures of the text are hard pleasures. I do it to qtiestion whether style and substance aie so easily separable in such matters. Cyrano without his nose is, after all, not Cyrano, but just another hapless fop orating to a balcony. It IS his style, and the pain that inhabits it, that makes him into a great romantic figure. I do not claim to be that, at leasr in public. But I do think that much of what I have to say inheres in how I say it, and that this is especially true when it comes to deciding about issues of judgment, do make up a Yogi Berra-ism: you can say a lot just by writing.

That aside, Rick’s questions are indeed trenchant and very much to the point, so I will, of course, do my best to evade them. His wish to locate me vis-â-vis Richard Posner’s utilitarian anri-moralism and Isaiah Berlin’s Viconian humanism, between the lawyer-economist’s certainty and the philosopher-historian’s puzzlement, is an interesting notion, at leasr to me. Isaiah was, in fact, a personal friend (it was he who got me to Oxford for a year) from whom I learned an enormous lor, and whose voice, rapid, hectic, and all over the place, warm and engulfing, relentlessly comic, I can still hear fifteen years after, standing on a !Manhattan street corner for a half hour with him, I last heard it. (Dizzy Gillespie was there too, bur rhar’s another story.) Posner, I have never met, and I can’t say rhat his work—only a bit of which I have read, and most of that the fugitive stuff—has impressed me all rhat much.

Isaiah’s great strength was his ability to get deeply enough into views foreign to his own, even antipathetic to them (for, a political actor and a bon vivant, he was anything but detached from the world, and I never knew him to be neurral about anything), to appreciate their force—something I don’t see in Posner, who seems, often at least, to think he has things taped. Berlin is for that reason for me a much more shaking thinker: one who makes things harder, not easier. Posner is too ready with answers to suit me (though again, I can’t claim detailed acquaintance with his work), and he seems to me more complacent about things than he, or anyone else, has at all earned the right to be. Isaiah’s arguments are not fully adequate, as he himself insisted they could not be in the nature of the case. Bur they rake US into the heart of the matter: how to decide and act when there are no answers in the back of the book. And rhar is my concern too, whatever differences I may have with him on this or that matter— for example, that forms of life are readily separable from one another and the natural focus of our moral concern. I don’t think much of trying to judge whole societies, cultures, or historical periods—or schematized institutions, like infanticide, either: we can leave that to the ideologues.

All this doesn’t go very far toward addressing the specific questions

Rick raises. Bur there is not world enough and time, lie is right that l resist short abstract answers to broad theoretical questions. And I doubt there is more to anything that Montaigne imagined.

 James Peacock

With James Peacock's paper we turn more directly to "my place in the field," always a fascinating topic for an aging savant, who can discourse upon the subject for hours—to the relation of my work to our profession's self-conception, what it is it is supposed to be doing.

As he says, my aim has been to develop a way of studying systems of meaning, ways-of-being-in-the-world, forms-of-life, "culture" with as shuddering a set of quotes as I can devise, which would neither be a high church rationalism, which whatever the exotica it deals with, I regard structuralism as being, or a low church methodism, which is how I see "componential analysis." Whether this has had the Salvationist effects Jim so generously says it has had, I don't rightly know—I'm to much focused on that damned horse and nail. But we don't seem to be in instant danger of running out of either flaneurs or barbarians. Which is probably just as well. As Cavafy almost says: such people are useful, what would we do without them?

But his point that both the impetus for my doing what I have been doing, developing and testing out ways of describing and conceptualizing "logico-meaningful" systems, and the resources for it as well, came in good part from often from far outside, anthropology. Sapir and Benedict, as well as Kluckhohn and Redfield, were of course important, and so was E-P. But sociologists, Weber, Parsons, Goffman, or Schultz; psychologists, Bruner, Vygotsky; philosophers, Wittgenstein, Langer, Ryle, James; critics, Burke; poets, Stevens, Don Marquis, were at least as important. But even more critical was the fact that I came into anthropology from a background in the humanities and have never been fully deprogrammed, or even debriefed, never properly socialized. I have spent, by my count, no more than two and a half years in a purely anthropological setting in my half-century career, and much of that hiding from chairmen.... If, as the oldest living inhabitant, the wisdom-giver emerged blinking from his cave, I have any sage advice to give you young’ns out there, then, it is this: anthropology is too important to be left to anthropologists. Which, as he assigns books called I DE GREAL WORK (I wish I had thought of that), I gather is Jim Peacock’s view of things as well.

 James Boon

Then there is that other James: M. Boon, the man who made digression famous. Himself, perhaps the most distinctive stylist in anthropology, tin- less you count G. I). Murdock, he addresses himself, and addresses himself, and addresses himself to my style. ،‘Shaggy sentences,” “list-laden discursivity,” “prosy maze,” “wayward shuffle,” “Geertzy mots” indeed! Quel chutzpah!

Bur seriously folks, the heart of Boon’s message, here as just a Bout everywhere else, is that solemnity and seriousness are not the same thing, and that those of US—he and I are alike in this, as in so much else, ex- cept for the ability to abide Frazer—unable to keep a wholly straight face when confronting the really important things of life have something of a problem when it comes to anthropological prose making. Comic grav- ity, a careless air in the face of hard reality is a difficult thing to bring off. You all know the line, dying is easy, comedy is hard. Bur I rather prefer a reworking of Dolly Parton’s “it takes a lot of money to look this cheap”—viz.—“it takes a lot of swear to sound this casual.” Style is indeed a moral matter, bur that is no excuse for dullness or staying too logical, and a “colloquial, caustic, scatter-shot” way of assembling evidence and passing judgments has much to be said for it, as does, to take Jim’s case, never meeting a pun you don’t like. This high occasion is, as I just mentioned, an opportunity for me to pass on tribal wisdom to the anthropological youth, whom I have never been able to convince that it pays, really pays in hard, tenurable cash and now and then a genuinely grateful business major, to be readable. Better over the top than under the pile.

But I pass the opportunity on to a more talented savage, Theodore Roerhke, who knew what fate awaited the terminally “Academic”:

<verse>

The stethoscope tells what everyone fears

You’re likely to go on living for years

With a nurse-maid waddle and a shop-girl simper

And the style of your prose growing limper and limper.

</verse>

 Ulf Hannerz

Ulf Hannerz, the only European anthropologist here, extends this genera I line of reflection on to the large scale of societies, of civilizations, of the world. As he notes, I have been concerned with “making small facts speak to large issues” from the very beginning, and for all my fascination, quite undimmed, with strange instances and odd detail (nothing is so interesting as something that doesn’t fit), I have never seen anthropology as a boutique discipline peddling exotica to coffee-table consumers.

The question, of course, is how the devil to do this. How do you turn particular observations—a cockfight, a botched funeral, a sheep raid, market bargaining—into general comment—on violence, on faith, on imperialism, on social trust. And, as he also notes, one of the main areas in which I have tried to do this is with so-called primordial attachments. (Which, praise be to God, someone has finally gotten right: They are not natural givens or frozen history or the return of the repressed; they are cultural perceptions.) My first pass at this, in the New Nations book, is indeed more optimistic in tone than it would be were I to write it today, The “integrative revolution” I hoped for, the “modernization of primordial sentiments within the context of civil politics” has, like other expected revolutions, been rather postponed in many places and in some put off indefinitely. The roll call is horrifying: Rwanda-Burundi, Algeria, the Sudan, Kashmir, Sri Lanka, Eastern Indonesia, the southern Philippines, the Balkans, the Caucasus, Chiapas. One is anyway in no apparent danger in running out of hard cases: it all makes work, as Flanders and Swann used to say, for the working man to do.

In returning, a few passing essays over the years in between, to this subject in “The World in Pieces,” I hoped to begin a deeper inquiry into these matters in a way that would make it all less promissory. I hope that piece—which was conceived and originally published separately from the other things in Available Light— concerned as it was with a critique of some master ideas of both political theory and anthropology (a critique, not a rejection), could be a more extended inquiry into a more immediate and more practical question: namely, whether a multiethnic democracy is possible, and whether we can see any movements, any possible paths, in that direction on the present scene.

If we think, for instance, of the three most formidable of the no longer so new, no longer so emerging states (or, as I would prefer, “countries”), Nigeria, India, and Indonesia, they are all vast assemblages of—well, of primordial attachments, barely reconciled. In the past, such polyglot, polycultural, polycredal entities have been contained, with more success or less, and for a time, in empires: the Ottoman, the Habsburg, the British, the Soviet. The nation state, as we know it in France, Italy, Brazil, Canada, the United States where it became the frame and foundation of popular government there, took several centuries to evolve from Westphalia, and it now seems, with the two world wars, to be creaking at the joints, dubiously transferable to such jagged places as Nigeria, India, and Indonesia.

The question of what form nonauthoritarian government might take, or might be struggling to take, in such places seems to me one that an anthropologist, trained to notice difference and see connection, is especially well placed to address. In any case, it is what I want to do if my strength holds out, and whether I get anywhere or not, it should be sociologically robust enough, and “cloth-cap” enough, to suit Hannerz, and cosmopolitan—rooted, primordial, or just plain determined— enough too.

 Michael Fischer

One of the advantages of living a long time—at least I think it’s an advantage—is that you get to see, in the work of younger colleagues, former students, and after-the-fact critics, something of what is to become of your work in the future—”what (as Foucault once said) your doing does.” Now, when everything is coming up post, this can be a shaking experience. But it can also be, as with Michael Fischer’s piece, a deeply reassuring one. Not only has not all been for naught (there is, after all, nothing so dead as a dead academic) but also one has started some fires that will burn in their own way, with their own fuel, to their own conelusions. If one wants one’s work not to go out of date one should write (very, very good) poetry, not mess around in the human sciences, where the half-life of any idea or any reputation is may-fly in length. Who now reads Robert Lowie? Clark Wissler? Geoffrey Gorer?

Th us I am warmed, to keep the fire metaphor going, by the fact that one of the least tractable spirits in anthropology, someone who has gone his own way with flair and determination from the beginning, has found some things to bounce off against—turtles, metaphors, “comparative epistemology”—in my work. As Michael notes, much of what I have said has been derived, if often obliquely and with a twist, from others— Weber, Dilthey, Ricoeur, Ryle, Schutz, Kohut, the Parsons layer-cake, even, god save the mark, the old Panopticist himself, Bentham—so it is only proper that it be re-projected back into the wider stream of thoughts and thinkers exterior to, in some ways even orthogonal, to it.

Of these, perhaps the development rhat nrost interests me, and which I most regret not having done more with than the few odd pieces, general and project framing, I have produced, is “science studies.” I never wrote the natural sequel to my “X as a cultural system” genre, “Science as a Cultural System” (though I think Available Light is, to a degree, that), partly because I tired of the conceit (I didn’t write “My Life as a Cultural System” either, though l threatened to), and partly because I realized that I didn’t really believe in the ”unity of the sciences” or that the destiny of anthropology was to become physics with the calculus removed. As Michael remarks, I did struggle to get the social study of science represented at the Institute, but was blocked by the natural science hard-liners who, for all their talk of the virtues of criticism, don’t much like it when in comes from what they take to be the rabble. In any case, the project— “the study of science as a form of life”—thrives, both inside anthropology and just around it. I would, in n١y “revolt but don’t be too revolting” sort of way, urge that we be sure to get somewhere rather far in understanding “science as we know it”—Fleck, Latour, Kuhn, and Galison—before wandering too far off into the distant realm of Muslim physics and Buddhist logic. But doubtless I will, as usual, and with good reason, not be listened to by those for whom the new always beckons and trespassing is a vocation. The future, as they say, lies ahead.

As for games, great and little, everything is becoming such right now (1 write in the closing days of February, 2003, as the United Nations gathers to “finally” decide about the question of Iraq, and Afghanistan seems yesterday’s war), and it is hard to know what to do with such imagery any more. Buzkashi and the cockfight are clearly the models of something, but what they are the models of (or, you should excuse the expression, “for”) is still very much in the process of unfolding. One of the hard parts about being an anthropologist of Michael’s sort and mine, those who chew at our pencils in worry over the moral implications of what we are writing, is that they are, those implications, usually concealed from US until it is rather too late to do anything very much about them, whether the “biopolitics of globalization” will help with this problem or not (it sounds a bit grand to me), it is very much worth the try. We are, indeed, “gambling with passions,” and in fact rather than just in play. Anything that can provide US with a better sense of the odds we face (which as Damon Runyon once said, are always three-to-two against) is all to the good.

 Dale Eickelman

As Dale points out, my 196Os writings on Islam—Ĩ/حو Religion ofjava, Islam Observed, and various articles and reviews—were very much of their time and place, not just in terms of history as such, as is inevitable, blit ill terms of wliat sort of thing was then being written by orientalist” scholars. That decade was a rather special rime both in the human sciences, especially those like anthropology still concerned with religion, and in the world at large. It was in the full midst of the Cold War, as well as of course, the time of the Vietnam crisis. And it was before the rise—or, at leasr, before the rise to general view—of what came later to be known as “political” (or “radical,” or “fundamentalist” or “exrremist”) Islam. If there was any reigning view, indeed if there was any general view of Islam at all, in Western minds, it was that it was a relic religion. stiffened, unmodern, and soon to dissolve in the face of some combination of nationalism, secularism, and Marxism. Nationalism, in particular, was, as Nasserism, Baathism, etc., on the march in the Middle East and North Africa, and the role of Islam there was barely on anyone’s radar, a few, secluded world-history type scholars like Marshall Hodgson aside. Most students of “rhe third world” considered it a spent force, a drag on modernity, an “obstacle” to development, to the point that when, a few years further on, this view was finally seen to be (how shall I put it?) inadequate, there was much talk among the same people of “the return of Islam,” as though—Indian Partition, I he Kuala Lumpur Riots, The Egyptian Brotherhood—it had ever been away.

It was, then, in that general environment, that my earlier work in the held was done. In the ferry Lectures, published as Islam Observed, I argued, first, that Islam was indeed alive and well in the two countries I had been studying, Indonesia and iMorocco, if only you knew where to look for it in their societies, in their political institutions and among their leading personalities, and if you were willing to turn away from a hypertextualist, Qur’an, Hadith, and Shari’a approach to the matter. Second, by comparing these incomparables, a Southeast Asian, Malayo-Polynesian-based society and a North African Berber one, a number of things would come into view otherwise not so easy to see. In particular, the importance of what I call “scripturalism,” and others called “modernism,” or “reformism” (“fundamentalism,” was not yet, fortunately, the term of art for political Islam) in the nationalist politics of the two countries.

As Hale also notes, time has both reinforced this more dispersive, variegared view of “Islam,” and transcended it. We are, right now, in the process of constructing, rather hurriedly as though we had better quickly get on with it after years of neglect, a more contemporary, more realistic, less stereotypical, “postnationalist” view of “Islam.” There is, just now, an avalanche of books and articles—by historians, by journalists, by political scientists, by students of contemporary religion, by sociologists and anthropologists, and by various inspired amateurs designed to give ns a crash-course in, as the phrase goes, “Understanding Islam.” Particularly since 9/1 1/01 the multiperspective, multidisciplinary approach to Islam one could only hope for and briefly illustrate in the 1960s is dramatically underway, and indeed flying off in all directions, as everyone from Oriana Fallaci to Bay Area Sufis like Stephen Schwartz puts a word in. As for me, used to working along the edges of world history and suddenly engulfed in its center, I am both pleased and nonplussed. Pleased, because what I waitted to have done and could only barely indicate is coming to be done. Nonplussed because what Dale rightly calls my “high risk venture” (he is not correct, however, just for the record, in saying Islam Observed was written before I had done fieldwork in Morocco; also, he is wrong about how long one can cling to a glass of Scotch in an airplane—I have tried it) seems even more risky now, as he, Larry Rosen, Bob Hefner, and others take it up, than ever.

 Robert Levine

Robert LeVine is quite right: I will never write a book called Principia Semiotica, and am quite astonished to think that someone once imagined I might. The longer I go on, the shorter my books get and the more they decline into essays. But he is right, of course, that something like symbolic action has always been the central SUbject of my work and that this implied some strong theses in psychology that I was, as is my wont, strongly disinclined to state explicitly. T he metaphorics, so to speak, of psychology and psychoanalysis reverberate through iny work, not only in the experience-near, experience-distant borrowing from Heinz Kohut, but The Interpretation of Cultures was not so named for nothing. It was just that when I began writing the culture-and-personality vocation was so strong and so, as I put it in a recent paper, explanatorily ambitious that I rather shied away. Too much was being said about too many, and it was that —Yurok salmon orality, Russian teeth, swaddling totalitarianism— that rather put me off. Not any antipathy, which as Bob rightly says I never have had, to the subjective and to psychology as such. Now that a properly cultural psychology, grounded in what people actually say and do, rather that in destiny-in-the-nursery (or, later, in programs-in-the-head) abstractions, has been revived by the likes of him, jerry Bruner, Byron Good and Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good, Rick Shweder, and others, 1 am, as I think some of my more recent writings testify, more than willing to get back into the effort. And, as he also says, the proper totemic figure for that is Sapir, under the influence of whose writings I began, a half century or so ago now, to think seriously about “symbolic action anti the sort of psychological assumptions it implied.

 Byron Good and Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good

As I mentioned in my comment on Michael Fischer’s paper, hanging around long enough to see your successors arrive is much of a mixed blessing. But here, with Byron and Mary-Jo, it is even more shaking. For they have been working—how dare they?—in “my” Held site, with “my” people, and “my” culture for the last decade or so. Every field anthropologist, I am sure, wakes up from time to time in a cold sweat fearing that someone has gone back to where he or she worked and found not only that the people had been glad to see the last of him but also that he had made up everything, misquoted everybody, was lied to continuously, and didn’t have a clue about what was going on around him. In my case, a supposed American friend, a political scientist, visited Pare, “my” town in east-central Java, for a day about thirty years ago and found that all dozen or so of us who had been there together in the 19505 had been amalgamated in the local Durkheimian memory into a single archetypal figure called “Don,” the one proper name (that of the sociologist among us) they could, apparently most easily get their phonemes around. I went back not long after that for a revisit myself and more or less straightened all that out. But my demythologizing efforts were hampered a bit by the fact that one of my oldest friends there and ex-party-chieftain, by then pushing eighty, had just got hold of my book on the history of the place in Indonesian translation, had gone through it and written in the real names of the people, including himself, to whom I had given pseudonyms in an effort to spare them embarrassment, Xeroxed the particular pages involved, and distributed them t() the particular people concerned. This provided a re-entry problem (though, as at least at that time and that place ،‘the Javanese were still Javanese,” everyone was quite polite about it all) of a peculiar quality. ١Z()U can’t, really can’t, go home again.

So far as Byron and Mary-Jo’s piece is concerned, they of course have been mainly working in Jogjakarta, where I spent the first eight months of my own expedition in 1952, at a time when it was all oxcarts and bicycles and batiks and hierarchy, and dance classes in the kraton (the castle) on Sunday morning. Pelan-pelan, “slow, slow” as we used to say; mboten wonten tnenapa “nothing, absolutely is happening, has happened, or is going to happen.” It is very much not like that now of course —it is enormously sprawled our, crowded wirh honking automobiles, a major university center wirh students from all over the archipelago. (1 have heard people say that half the town’s population is now non-Javanese; “nobody stays where they belong anymore.”)

So the question, “are the Javanese still Javanese?” is a natural one to raise. In one sense, of course they are; what else could they be? But in another, as Java 1952 and Java 2002 are hardly the same place, uncritically applying conceptions based on experiences trafficking with the first to realities encountered confronting the second is not going to work our very well. So the flow of history presents, in and of itself, a difficult question: What persists? (Because, as the Javanese are still nor Americans, Moroccans, or even Baraks, something, and something central surely, does.) And what does not? (Because equally surely, now that “development,” massacre, and the state ideologization of culture has intervened, a lot, also central, does not.) After all, as the Goods point out, thirty-five years of Suharto’s putting Javanism andjavanist tradition to the most instrumentai and oppressive uses, when he finally falls, what do we ger in place of him? Firsr, Gus Dur, a Muslim folk figure out of the traditionalist Islamisr context of East Javanese madrasah life, and, when he self-destructs, iMegawati Sukarnoputri, a Javanese “Ibu” (“mother”) whole and entire, complete with grand formality, unnerving patience, and Delphic silences. This is not just the old cliche about change and sameness. It is that this whole question seems to me one of the central perplexities of anthropological accounting: How, through the greatest and most destructive of upheavals, violence, outside intrusion, “modernization ”—dangdut in a bijab, and all that —the core of something, stretched, bent, twisted like a topologist’s rubber sheet, perhaps, re-emerges, snaps back, or approximately, into position.

The relation of subjectivity to culture, as the Goods put it, is surely the route to take in attempting to get somewhere with this issue. My own attempt, as limited as it was, to take a phenomenological approach to self and identity questions was, of course, in the first instance stimulated by the Javanese themselves who, at least as I knew them, had a tremendous bent in that direction and could talk about feelings, consciousness, the inner life, and so on (including “psychosomatic” illness) till the water buffaloes came home.

“Exploring the new forms of Javanese subjectivity, emerging under (ˌquire new?’ well, anyway ˌnew’) conditions’ is clearly the way to go and in doing so the one thing I feel quite sure after all these years is that the Javanese themselves will be superb and willing guides in pursuing such an enterprise. It is hard to ger a word our edgewise from the Balinese about what is going on dalem, “inside.” It is, it still is, hard, so far as I can see, to get the Javanese to stop talking about it.

As for Byron and Mary-Jo’s memories of that last year of mine at Chicago, I can only say I myself had quite forgotten, I suppose repressed, it. Their invocation of how I taught, if “overwhelm with references so they may think you know something” can he called teaching, brought it all back with a rush, and stimulated the same sort of question about my consciousness as needs to be asked about the Javanese. Yes, that person was me. Have I changed? Have I learned anything? Have I unlearned anything?

 Jerome Bruner

As Jerome Bruner notes, he and I go way back, to the caveman times of neoanti-mentalism, computational determinism, tachistoscopes, and other Harvard horrors. I first encountered him there (but not he, nɹe: I cowered in the back row of a large auditorium, frantically scribbling) in my very first semester i,ɹ graduate school—that would be 195ü—when I audited, because someone said it would be amusing, a course he and the Berkeley experimentalist David Krechevsky, become Krech, gave on perception in which they argued, »lirabile dietu, that it was people—poor kids, rich kids, beggarmen, thieves—who heard and saw, nor ears and eyeballs. Ir was a revelation, as well as one can see clearly now but could already half-sense then, the opening gun in the Cognitive Revolution. I he tokening tremors before I he Big One. I can still see him in my mind’s eye, weaving about the stage like a featherweight boxer, a study in restlessness, energy, rapidity, and thinking, as he came, himself, later to put ir, with the jabbing, feinting, cutting left hand.

Since then we have gone our separate ways institutionally, our converging ones intellectually, blaming each other, and Kenneth Burke, for everything that has happened since. “Cultural psychology”/“iirterpretive anthropology”—bricoleur inventions, each of US annoying our maternal (or are they paternal?) disciplines with each other’s arguments. The making of meaning-making. The culruralification of fact, law, and verdict passing. Hermeneutic circles, hermeneutic spirals. Going beyond the information given. It’s been a grand ride. Worthy indeed of narration.

 Natalie Avis

The interaction between Natalie and myself has been steady and, I think, mutually transforming during the many years we were together in Princeton, she at the university, myself at the Institute. She and I taught a seminar together a couple times that Robert Darnton, another French historian, and I started sometime in the 1980s on “history and anthropology.” In that seminar we confronted the students (jtiniors and seniors from various departments—English, International Relations, Art, Economics. History, Anthropology) with paralleled classic texts from both disciplines: Evans-Prichard and Keith Thomas on witchcraft, Mary Douglas on the Lele and Emmanuel Le Roi Ladurie on the Cathars, Geertz on Balinese selfhood, Davis on Martin Guerre—to get the students, and ourselves as well, reflecting on the similarities and differences, both profound, between these two sorts of cousinly minds. I am not sure either we or the students ever arrived at any very certain position concerning the matter, because there is no certain position to be reached. But we did manage to shake up the students as well as ourselves, and a number of the alumni have gone on to have distinguished interdisciplinary careers, falling between two, or even three, stools with an aplomb I like to think owes something to their time with US and our own identity problems.

In her comment, Natalie returns to thatold problem: the supposed synchronic, narrow-focus, talking-informants nature of anthropology, and the (equally supposed) diachronic, wide-lens, dumb-documents nature of history, and shows again its wild inadequacy in distinguishing the sort of things she (or Darnton, or Carlo Ginsburg) does from the sort of thing I (or Douglas, or Ruth Benedict) do. The recurrence in my own work of temporal images—flowing streams, successive styles, java or Morocco then and now—and in her own of configurational ones—patterns of gift-giving, of being female, of “rough music” for newlyweds in early modern Europe—pretty well upsets any distinctions based on such matters. Whatever it is that divides history and anthropology, if anything does except the sheer fact of tradition and university organization, it is not that the one concerns itself with time and change and the other with form and order.

Prodded then, by Natalie’s over-kind comments, to think again about the differences that connect US, I reflect on the fact that historians, whether of her sort or Fernand BraudePs Ginsburg’s or Lawrence Stone’s (another old Princeton friend of both of US, much missed as both colleague and foil), write about things that have already reached a certain completion, things we know the sequel of, how they came out, how they look after they have happened. Anthropologists, whether of my sort or E-P’s or)ames Fernandez’s or Levi-Strauss’s, write about peoples and places and conditions of things in the midst of happening, whose endings are as obscured from US as they are from our subjects. For someone such as myself, concerned with two countries, Morocco and Indonesia, in the full flow of modern history, this produces a chronic sense of the ground shifting under)[,]our feet: merely in the time to publication your best ideas can be shown to have been quite mistaken, the principles you thought you saw at work been dramatically undercut. Again, this won’t really do as a difference marker (there is, after all, Douglas on the ancient Hebrews, Hans Blumenberg on the modern age), but it does at least mark a certain aspect of my own subjectivity in these matters. But all that imagery of flowing rivers and crossing streams, of how it seemed then and how it looks now, comes from a mind haunted by the fact that his subject is changing, and quite rapidly, even as he writes. Historians’ books go out of date too, but usually not before they are published. Trying to keep up with world-historical places in an age of world-historical motion gives a certain quality to your prose and a penchant for devices—concentration on a walled town, a prince or a peddler, a market system—that can soften, a bit and incompletely, the anxiety not so much of getting it wrong (that never goes away) but of being seen to have gotten it wrong even as you assert it. Writing history in the midst of history is indeed nervous-making and evasion-producing. But as I say, Natalie would probably counter that things are not all that different in her held.

Also I should perhaps remark on my sense of continuity in my work that she says, surprising me, surprises her. Aside from the fact that we all perhaps look back on our lives in ways that make them look at least minimally directed and should not be taken as authorities on ourselves, part of the problem is that I didn’t come to “the study of meaning” after turning away from my initial focus on fact and function. I started out, after my undergraduate work in philosophy and literature, where I was concerned with “the meaning of meaning” and the like on quite supernal levels, went cold-turkey into anthropology and into the field, wrote my licensing volumes, and then took up again, more explicitly (I had never really dropped them, just concealed them in some thick ethnography) the issues about meaning. My career really began in 1946 when I went to college but of course didn’t publish anything; which can give the optical illusion of a sea change in the l97₀s when the Interpretation of Cultures (most of whose articles were written earlier) came out. Plus ca change, plus c’est le meme auteur.

 Amelia Rorty

k is appropriate for me to end my so brief, so inadequate, so self-protective series of comments with Amelie’s piece, because, in her gadfly, philosophical way, she asks: Ok, Buster—now that you have been duly celebrated, what are you going to do next? As, she would expect, 1 am inclined to answer: who the hell knows? It’s all up for grabs.

But she has, alas, grasped, with uncomfortable exactness, the Yeat-sian (“perfection of the life vs. perfection of the work”) thematic in my authorial tome, the place where biography, the life I have lived, and representation, the world I have described, meet and clash. Am I, after all, a celebrant of chance or possessed by a rage for order? And, as she suggests, I am both, in unstable, indefensible, and determined imbalance. Everything is up for grabs, but we must, somehow, hang on.

To become a bit biographical for a short moment, my actual life, the one that has gone on out there and back then where things happen and happened, has been, in fact, rather a looking for small bits of order to hang onto in the midst of chaos. So it is hardly to wonder that my work looks like a grasping for patterns in a swirl of change: I was preadapted. My parents were divorced when I was three, and I was dispatched (the verb is appropriate) to live alone with an older woman, a nonrelative, amid the sylvan beauties of the northern California conntryside (a “nonvillage” of three or four hundred farmers, shopkeepers, and summer visitors) in the plumb depths of the Great Depression. I was well cared for, but that’s about it, and I was pretty much left to put my life together (not without real help from schoolteachers responding to a bright kid, and, later on, the U.S. Navy, responding to a callow klutz) by myself. Without going on—I do not much like the “Rosebud” approach to self-understanding—all this predisposed me to becoming, in both life and work, the seeker after a pattern, however fragmentary, amid a swirl of accident, however pervasive, that Amelie rightly sees. It has never occurred to me, not really being a deep thinker, just a nervous one, to try to resolve this “binary.” I have just sought to live with it. Pitched early into things, I assumed, and I still assume, that what you are supposed to do is keep going with whatever you can find lying about to keep going with: to get from yesterday to today without foreclosing tomorrow. And it does, that resolute irresolution, indeed show in my work.

I can hardly here really face up to Amelie’s challenge to make my conception of the relation between “the dramas of happenstance” and “the plenitude ... of significant pattern” clear and explicit. I can hardly face up to it at all, save through further fumbling after meaning of the sort I have done in Bali, in Java, in Morocco, in life. Even as such, this sort of seeing openness and order in the same optic has some use, or so I think, as a guide for the perplexed. That philosophical sociologist, David Reisman, once wrote somewhere that the central problem of political life was how to avoid being forced to clioose between murder and martyrdom. Good advice in general, and again most especially at the moment, late Febrnary 2003, in which I write.

I really don’t believe rhat “everything, but absolutely everything, has a place in a significant order.” I just think that sonre things seem to have some sort of place in a partial sort of order. Bali is not a cockfight writ large, or vice versa. The world is indeed a suq, bur the suq is nor the world. “Existential anxiety,” early encountered, is, for me, apparently here to stay; and, though as Amelie says about Berlin and Taylor, two other passionate evaders, it won’t really do, I shall just have to go on, at least so long as chance permits and pattern lasts, “cliffhanging.”

 Appendixes

 Appendix 1: The Original Symposium Schedule

1. The Pluralisms of Clifford Geertz 1(I co A Ria A. Shweder University of Chicago

2. Passing Judgment: Interpretation. Morality, and Cultural Assessment

1. A\ RENCE 1(0 SEN Princeton University

3. Clifford Geertz and Islam Dale Eickelman Dartmouth College

4. Happenstance and Patterns Amelie Rorty Harvard University

5. Deep Play, Violence, and Social Reconstruction Michael Fischer

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

6. Celebrating Geertzian Interpretivism

Jerome Bruner

Nerv York University

7. On the “Subject” of Culture: Subjectivity and Cultural Phenomenology in the Work of Clifford Geertz

Byron Good and Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good Harvard University

8. Geertz s Style: A Moral Matter James a. Boon Princeton University

9. Geertz’s Concept of Culture in Historical Context: How He Saved the Day and Maybe the Century

Jails Peacock

University ʏ(North Carolina

10. Clifford Geertz on Time and Change Natalie Zemon Davis University of Toronto

11. Speaking to Large Issues: The World, If It Is Not in Pieces Ulf Hann z

Stockholm University

12. Coded Communications: Symbolic Psychological Anthropology Robert a. LeVine

Harvard University

13. Commentary Clifford Geertz Institute for Advanced Study

 Appendix 2: Academic Biography and Writings of Clifford Geertz

Clifford Geertz

School of Social Science

Institute for Advanced Study

Princeton, New Jersey 08540

Born August 23, 1926, San Francisco, California

Formal Training

AB Antioch College, 1950 (Philosophy)

PhD Harvard University, 1956 (Anthropology) Department of Social Relations

Professional Career

Instructor in Social Relations and Research Associate in the Laboratory of Social Relations, Harvard University, 1956–57.

Research Assistant, Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1952–56: Research Associate, 1957–58.

Fellow, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford, California, 1958–59.

Assistant Professor of Anthropology, University of California, Berkeley, 1958–60.

Assistant Professor of Anthropology, University of Chicago, 1960–61: Associate Professor, 1962–64: Professor, 1964–68. Divisional Professor in the Social Sciences, 1968–70.

Member of the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations, University of Chicago, 1962–70: Executive Secretary, 1964-66; Chairman, 1968–70.

Senior Research Career Fellow, National Institute of Mental Health, 1964–70.

Consultant to the Ford Foundation on Social Sciences in Indonesia, 1971.

Professor of Social Science, Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, New Jersey, 1970-. (Harold F. Linder Professor of Social Science, 1982-). Professor Emeritus, 2000-.

Visiting Lecturer with Rank of Professor, Department of History, Princeton University, 1975–2000.

Eastman Professor, Oxford University, 1978–79.

Fieldwork

Java, Indonesia, 1952–54; April 1984; March-August 1986; November-December 1999.

Bali, Indonesia, 1957–58.

Morocco, june-July 1965; .June—December 1964; ,line 1965—September 1966; ,line 1968-April 1969; ,line-.,lll)’ I 972; June-.!llly 1976: November 1985-Marcb 1986.

Java, Bali, Celebes, Sumatra, April-September 1971.

Professional Honors

A. Honorary Degrees

Honorary Doctor of Laws, Harvard University, 1974.

Honorary Doctor of Humane Letters, Northern Michigan University, 1975.

Honorary Doctor of Humane Letters, University of Chicago, 1979.

Honorary Doctor of Hunrane Letters, Bares College, 198:).

Honorary Doctor of Hunrane Letters, Knox College (Illinois), 1982.

Honorary Doctor of Hunrane Letters, Brandeis University, 1984.

Honorary Doctor of Hunrane Letters, Swarthmore College, 1984.

Honorary Doctor of Humane Letters, New School for Social Research, 1987.

Honorary Doctor of Social Science, Yale University, 1987.

Honorary Doctor of Letters, Willianrs College, 1991.

Honorary Doctor of Hunrane Letters, Princeton University, 1995.

Honorary Doctor of Letters, University of Canrbridge, 1997.

Honorary Doctor of Letters, Georgetown University, 1998.

Honorary Doctor of Letters, Antioch College, 1999.

Honorary Doctor of Laws, Colby College, 2003.

B. Scholarly Awards

Social Science Prize (Talcott Parsons Prize), American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1974.

Sorokin Prize, American Sociological Association, 1974.

Distinguished Lecturer, American Anthropological Association, 1985.

Huxley]Memorial Lecturerand Medallist, Royal Anthropological Institute, 1983.

Distinguished Scholar Award, Association for Asian Studies, 1987.

National Book Critics Circle Prize in Criticism, 1988.

Horace Mann Distinguished Alumnus Award, Antioch College, 1992.

Fukuoka Asian Cultural Prize (Academic, International), 1992.

Bintang Jasa Utama (Medal), Republic of Indonesia, 2002.

C. Scholarly Memberships

Fellow, American Academy of Arts and Sciences,] 966-.

Fellow, Council on Foreign Relations, 1970-.

Fellow, American Philosophical Society, 1977-.

Fellow, I he National Academy of Sciences, 1973-.

Fellow, American Association for the Advancement of Science, 1980-.

Corresponding Fellow, The British Academy, 1991-.

Honorary Fellow, The Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, 1995-.

D. Lectureships

Ferry Lecturer, Yale University, 1967.

Harry F. Camp Memorial Lecturer, Stanford University, 1972.

John Dewey Lecturer, Antioch College, 1973.

Lionel 1 rilling Lecturer, Columbia University, 1977.

Storrs Lecturer, Yale Law School, 1981.

Bicentennial Lecturer, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1981.

Harry F. Camp Memorial Lecturer, Stanford University, 1983.

Obert c. Fanner Lecturer, University of Michigan, 1985.

Lindesmith Lecturer, Carleton College, 1990.

Hitchcock Lecturer, University of California, 1990.

I larvard-Jerusalem Lecturer, 1990.

Flardy Lecturer, Hartwick College, 1992.

Fukuoka Five-Year Anniversary Lecturer, Tokyo and Fukuoka, 1995.

Lecturer in Modern Philosophy, Institut fiir die Wissenschaften vom Menschen, Vienna, 1995.

William James Lecturer, Harvard Divinity School, 1998.

Wells Lecturer, University of Indiana, 1998.

Charles Homer Haskins Lecturer, American Council of Learned

Societies, 1999.

Master’s Seminar, University of Konstanz, 2000.

Sabbagh Lecturer, University of Arizona, 2001.

Sidney A. iMintz Lecturer, Johns Hopkins University, 2003.

Sir James Frazer Lecturer, University of Cambridge, 2004.

E. Other

Council of Scholars, Library of Congress, 1982–93.

Fellow, Intellectual Interchange Program, Japan Society, 1984.

Visiting Humanities Research Centre, Australian National University, 1987.

Rector’s Visitor, Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin, Germany, 1993.

Visiting Professor, European University Institute, Florence, Italy, 1994.

Visiting Scholar, EHESS, Paris, 1994.

Visiting Scholar, Getty Research Institute for the History of Art and the Humanities, 1998.

 Bibliography

For a complete bibliography together with translations and reprints, see I. iVlrth and G. Frohlich, FlyperGeertz World Catalogue, online at [[http://www.iwp.uni-linz.ac.at/lxe/sektktf/gg/HyperGeertz.html][http://www.iwp.uni-linz.ac.at/lxe/sektktf/gg/HyperGeertz.html]].

 Books

<biblio>

rhe Religion of Java. Glencoe, 11: Free Press, 1960.

(Editor). Old Societies and Neu’ States. New ١’ork: Free Press, 1963.

Agricultural involution, the Processes 0l Ecological Change ill Indonesia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1963.

Peddlers anil Princes. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963.

The Social History of an Indonesian Town. Cambridge: Ml F Press, Person, Time, and Conduct in Bali: An Essay in Cultural Analysis. ١،١\e Southeast Asia Program Cultural Report Series, no. 14, 1966.

Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968.

Tie Interpretation 0، Cultures: Selected Essays. New ١ovV. Bask Books, 1973, 2()0)0.

(Editor). Myth, Symbol and Culture. New York: Norton, 1974.

(with Hildred Geertz). Kinship in Bali. C hicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

(with Hildred Geertz and Lawrence Rosen). Meaning and Order in Moroccan Society. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1979.

Negara: ‘Vhe Theatre State in Nineteenth Century Bali.Vvwwevow.

Princeton University Press, 1980.

Local Knowledge: Further Essays /„ Interpretive Anthropology. New York: Basic Books, 1983, 200)0.

Bali, interpretation d’ıine culture. Paris: Editions Gallimard, 1985.

Works and Lives: The Anthropologist as Author. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1988.

After the Fact: Two Countries, Four Decades, One Anthropologist. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Welt in Stiicken: Kultur und Politik am Ende des 20. ı\\,ıAwww\ws•.

Passagen Verlag, 1996.

Available Light: Anthropological Reflections on Philosophical Topics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000.

The Politics of Culture, Asian Identities in a splintered World (Japanese). Tokyo: :Misuzu Shobo, 2002.

</biblio>

 Articles

<biblio>

1956

"Religious Belief and Economic Behavior in a Central Javanese Town: Some Preliminary Considerations.” Economic Development and Cultural Change, 2: 134–58.

“Capital-Intensive Agriculture in Peasant Society: A Case Study.” Social Research, Winter: 43349.

1957

“Ritual and Social Change: A Javanese Example.” American Anthropologist, 554–32 .ʕ>·.

1958

“Ethos, World View, and the Analysis of Sacred Symbols.” Antioch Review, Winter: 421–37.

1959

“The Javanese Village.” In C. w. Skinner, ed.. Local Ethnic and National Loyalties in Village Indonesia: A Symposium. New Wavew. Yale University Southeast Asia Program Cultural Report Series, 34–41.

“Form and Variation in Balinese Village Structure.” American Anthropologist, 61: 991–1012.

1960

“The Javanese Kijaji: The Changing Role of a Cultural Broker.” Comparative Studies in Society and History, 1: im ؟.

1962

“Studies in Peasant Life: Community and Society.” In B. L Siegel, ed., Biennial Review of Anthropology 1961. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1–41.

“Social Change and Economic !Modernization in Two Indonesian Towns: A Case in Point.” In E. Hagen, On the I heory of Social Change. Homewood, IL: Dorsey, 385–410.

“The Rotating Credit Association: A ،Middle Rung’ ill Development.” Economic Development and Cultural Change, 10(3): 241–63.

“The Growth of Culture and the Evolution of ،Mind.” In j. Sher, ed.. Theories ،,/ واك،? Mind. New York: Free Press, 713–40.

1963

“The Integrative Revolution: Primordial Sentiments and Civil Polities in the New States.” Ill c. Geertz, ed.. Old Societies and New States. New York: Free Press, 105–57.

“The Socio-Cultural Context of Policy in Southeast Asia.” In w. Flenderson, ed.. Southeast Asia: Problems of Policy. Cambridge: MIT Press, 54–70.

</biblio>

1964

“Ideology as a Cultural System.” In D. Apter, ed.. Ideology ،،„،/ Discontent. New York: Free Press, 47–76.

(with Mildred Geertz). “Teknonymy in Bali: Parenthood, Age-Grading, and Genealogical Amnesia.” Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, 94(part 2): 94–108.

“٢\\٦\١١١ئة\١٦ \
Y>٥V\\١ese
١’١لا’١\\سد Bijd, Igen tot de till’ll-, land-, en Volkenkunde, 120: 1–33; and Koenrjaraningrat, ed.. Village Communities in Indonesia, Ithaca and Djakarta: Cornell University Press and University of Indonesia Press, 1966.

“ I he Transition to Humanity.” In s. Tax, ed.. Horizons of Anthropology. Chicago: Aldine, 37–48.

“ ‘Internal Conversion’ in Contemporary Bali.” In I. Bastin and R. Roolvink, eds., Malay and Indonesian Studies. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 282–302.

1966

“Modernization in a ‚Muslim Society: The Indonesian Case.” In R. N. Bellah, ed.. Religion and Progress in Modern Asia. New York: Free Press, 93–108.

“Religion as a Cultural System.” In M. Banton, ed.. Anthropological Approaches to the Study of Religion. London: Tavistock, 146.

“Are the Javanese Mad?” Encounter, August: 86–88.

“The Impact of the Concept of Culture on the Concept of Man.” In

j. Platt, ed.. New Views ()/ the Nature of Man. Chicago: Universit) of Chicago Press, 93–1 18.

1967

“Politics Past, Politics Present: Some Notes on the Contribution of Anthropology to the Study of the New States.” Archives europeenes de sociologie, 8: 1–14.

“The Cerebral Savage: The Structural Anthropology of Claude Levi-Strauss.” Encounter, April.

1968

”Religion, Anthropological Aspects.” International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. New York: Macmillan.

”N’\\\-a%e.” International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. New TovV. Macmillan.

” Thinking as a Moral Act: Ethical Dimensions of Anthropological Field Work in the New States.” Antioch Review, 27: 134–59.

1969

“Myrdal’s Mythology.” Encounter, July: 26–34.

1971

”After the Revolution: The Fate of Nationalism in the New States.” In A. Inkeles and B. Barber, eds., Stability and Social Change.

Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 357–76.

“Afterword: The Politics of :Meaning.” In c. Holt, ed.. Culture and Politics in Indonesia. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 319–36.

“Deep Play: Notes on the Balinese Cockfight.” Daedalus, Winter: 1–38.

“Comment.” In R. Anroun and 1. Harik, eds., Rural Politics and Social Change in the Middle East. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 460–66.

“The Wet and the Dry: Traditional Irrigation in Bali and Morocco.” Human Ecology, 1: 34–39.

“Introduction.” In J. Harrison, ed.. South and Southeast Asia. 1 ucson: University of Arizona Press, V-Vİİİ.

“Religious Change and Social Order in Suharto’s Indonesia.” Asia, 27: 6284.

1973

“Comments on Benjamin White’s ‘Demand for Labor and Population Growth in Colonial Java.’)” Human Ecology, 1: 237.

1974

, Social Science Policy in a New State: A Programme for the Stimulation of the Social Sciences in Indonesia.” Minerva, 12: 365–81.

1975

“Common Sense as a Cultural System.” Antioch Review, 33: 47–53.

“On the Nature of Anthropological Understanding.” American Scientist, 63: 47–53. Also in K. Basso and H. Selby, eds., Approaches to Symbolic Anthropology. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1976, 221–37.

1976

“Art as a Cultural System.” MLN, 91: 1473–99.

1977

“Centers, Kings, and Charisma: Reflections on the Symbolics of Power.” In I. Ben-David and T. N. Clark, eds.. Culture and Its Creators.

Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 150–71.

“Foreword.” In G. Witherspoon, Language and Art the Navajo Universe. Ann Arbor: University of ،Michigan Press, vii-x.

“Found in Translation: On the Social History of the ،Moral Imagination.” Georgia Review, 31: 787–810.

“The judging of Nations: Some Comments on the Assessment of Regimes in the New States.” Archives europeennes de sociologie, IS: 245–61.

1978

“The Bazaar Economy: Information and Search ill Peasant Marketing.” American Economic Review, 65(2): 25–32.

1979

“Suq: The Bazaar Economy in Sefrou.” In c. Geerrz, H. Geerrz, and V.. Rose\ı, Meaning and Order in Moroccan Society. New NoAo. Cambridge University Press.

1980

“Blurred Genres: The Refiguration of Social Thought.” American Scholar, 49(2): 165–79.

“Ports of Trade in Nineteenth Century Bali.” In G. Dalton, ed.. Research in Economic Anthropology, vol. 3. Greenwich, CT: JAI Press, 109–22.

1982

“The Way We Think Now: Toward an Ethnography of ،Modern

I thought.” Bulletin, 7 he American Academy ()/ Arts and ” 35(5): 14–34.

“Foreword.” In K. Pelzer, Planters against Peasants. Leiden: KITLV,

1983

“Slide Show: Evans-Pritchard’s African Transparencies.” Raritan, Fall: 62–80.

“Foreword.” InJ. Stephen Lansing, The Three Worlds of Bali. New York: Praeger, vii-x.

“Foreword.” In L. Gesick, ed.. Centers, Symbols, and Hierarchies: Essays on the Classical States of Southeast Asia. New Haven: Yale University Southeast Asia Studies, Monograph Series, no. 26, viii-x.

1984

“Anti Anti-Relativisin.” American Anthropologist, 86(2): 263–78.

“Culture and Social Change: The Indonesian Case.” Man, 19: 511–32.

“Introduction.” In D. F. Eickelman, Knowledge and Power: Religious Intellectuals in Rural Morocco. Princeton: Princeton University Press, xi-xiv.

1985

“Waddling In.” Times Literary Supplement, lune 7, 1985, 623–24.

1986

“Epilogue: iMaking Experiences, Authoring Selves.” In V. w. Turner and E. Bruner, eds., The Anthropology of Experience. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 373–80.

“The Uses of Diversity.” Michigan Quarterly Review, 25(1): 105–23. Also in Tanner Lectures on Human Values, vol. 7. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 253–75.

1988

“Recollections of an Itinerant Career.” (Jamie Mackie, interviewer). Bulletin of Indonesian Economic Studies, 14’. 1–18.

1989

“.Margaret Mead.” In Biographical Memoirs, vol. 58. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 3 2 8–54.

“Toutes Directions: Reading the Signs in an Urban Sprawl.” Internationalfourital of bAiddle Eastern Studies, 116\ו.و2ل.

1990

“History and Anthropology.” New Literary History, 21: 321–35.

، ،Popular Art’ and the Javanese Tradition.” Indonesia, October. Also in A. Gerstle and A. Milner, eds., Recovering the Orient: Artists, Scholars, Appropriations. London: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1994,245–67.

1991

“The Social Scientist as Author: Clifford Geertz on Ethnography and Social Construction.” (Gary Olson, interviewer). Journal of Advanced Composition, 1 1: 245–68.

“An Interview with Clifford Geertz.” (Richard Handler, interviewer). Current Anthropology, 52: 61)3–13.

“Levi-Strauss Self-Inscribed.” Common Knowledge, I: 124–34.

1992

“Achter de Feiren: Twee Landen, Vier Decennia, Een Antropoloog.” In c. Bouw and B. Kruithof, eds.. De Kern ran het Verschil: Cidturen en Identiteiten. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 41–58.

“Introduction” to “Symposium: Exit from the Balkans—the Commensuration of Alien Languages,” 10–12, and “ ‘Ethnic Conflict’: t hree Alternative Terms.” Common Knowledge, 2(3): 54–65.

1993

“Preface.” In 11. Elboudrari, چl., Modes de transmission de /،, culture religieuse en Islam. Cairo: Institut français d’archeologie orienrale.

“ ‘Local knowledge’ and Its Limits: Some Obiter Dicta.” Yale Journal of Criticism, 35-129 .-ن.

1994

“Preface.” In K. Newland and K. Soedjatmoko, Transforming Humanity. Tbe \[;]:sionar١’ Writings ofSoedjatmoko. west\\;ة١Ĩة ١١٦, CT: Rumarian Press, vii-x.

“Foreword.” In Gary A. Olson, ed.. Philosophy, Rhetoric, Literary Criticism: (Interh’iews. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, xi-xii.

1995

“The Strange Estrangement: Taylor and the Natural Sciences.” In lames Tully, ed.. Philosophy in an Age of Pluralism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 83–95.

“Disciplines.” Raritan, Winter: 65–102.

“Reason, Religion, and Professor Gellner.” In I I. R. Hoetink, ed.. The Lmiits of Pluralism: Neo-Absolutism and Relativism. ‘ Praemium Erasmanium Foundation, 167–72.

1996

“Off Echoes: Some Comments on Anthropology and Law.” PoLAR, 19(2) :33–37.

“Afterword.” In K. Basso and s. Feld, eds., Senses of Place. Santa Ee: SAR Press.

1997

“ I he Legacy of Thomas Kuhn: The Right Text at the Right Time.” Common Knowledge, 6(1): 1–5.

What Is a Country If It Is Not a Nation?” Brown Journal of World Affairs, 4(2): 235–247.

“Cultural Tourism: Tradition, Identity, and Heritage Construction.” In lw\١Avمج١اً١”ة٢\أ\١ ١eA.٢’١ourism and Heritage Management.

Jogjakarta: Gadjah Mada University Press, 14–24,

1998

“The World in Pieces.” FOCAAL, 32: 91–117.

1999

“ ، I he Pinch of Destiny:’ Religion as Experience, Meaning, Identity, Power.” Raritan, Winter: 1–19.

“When the Poet Speaks Arabic.” To Be:2B, 14: 106–7.

“Awas Buaya.” In F. X. Baskara J. Wardaya, ed., Mencari Demokrasi. Jakarta: Institut Studi Arus Informasi, 51–94.

“A Life of Learning.” ACTS Publications.

“ The Introduction into Anthropokrgy of a Genuinely Historical Eye.” Rimndtable on George Stocking. Journal of Victorian Culture, 305–10.

“Afterword.” In R. Demallie, ed.. Interpreting Cultures. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

2000

“Geiger at Antioch.” Antioch Review, Winter.

“Bruner’s Imbalancing Act.” In D. Bakhurst and s. Shanker, eds., Jerome Bruner: Language, Culture, 9ȣ//. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications.

2001

“School Building: A Retrospective Preface.” In J. Scott and D. Keates, eAs.ı Schools of ɿ bought: l ɿventı’-Five Years of Interpretive Social Science. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1–1 1.

2002

“‘Hie Near East in the Far East.” In F. Pouillon, Essays for Lucette Valensi. Princeton: Institute for Advanced Study, School of Social Science, Occasional Papers, no. 12, 2 00)1.

“An Inconstant Profession, The Anthropological Life in Interesting ’I imes.” Annual Review of Anthropology, 31: 1–19.

“Interview with Clifford Geerrz” (N. Panourgia). Anthropological

Theory, 2(4): 421–31.

“I Don’t Do Systems. An Interview wit It Clifford Geertz”

(A. ،Michaelsen). Journal of the North American Association for the Study of Religion, 2–20.

Forthcoming

“Commentary.” In R. Shweder and B. Good, eds., Clifford Geertz /,ו’ His Colleagues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

“Rimal as a Model System.” Il Peritgino.

“A Fine Romance: Anthropology and Literature.” Current Anthropology.

“What Is a State If It Is Not a Sovereign: Reflections on Politics in Complicated Places.” Current Anthropology.

“Shifting Aims, ،Moving Targets: On the Anthropology of Religion.” Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute.

Essay Reviews: New York Review oe Books

“Under the Mosquito Net,” September 14, 1967.

“Gandhi: Non-Violence as Therapy,” 1969.

“In Search of North Africa,” April 22, 1971.

“،Mysteries of Islam,” December 11, 1975.

“Stir Crazy,” January 26, 1975.

“Sociosexology,” January 24, 1980.

“Conjuring with Islam,” May 27, 1982.

“ the Ultimate Ghetto,” February 28, 1985.

“A South Sea Renaissance,” February 16, 1989.

“A Lab of One’s Own,” November 8, 1990.

“Genet’s Last Stand,” November 19 1992.

“Life on the Edge,” April 7_· 1994.

“Culture War,” November 30 1995.

“Lhe New Psychology,” April 10, 1997.

“Deep Hanging Out,” October 22, 1998.

“Indonesia: Starring Over,” iMay 1 1, 2000.

“Life among the Anrhros,” February 8, 2001.

“The Visit,” October 18, 2001.

“Gombrich and Primitivism,” September 26, 2002.

“Which Way to ،Mecca?” Iune 12, July 3, 2003.

Essay Reviews: The New Republic

“The Forbidden Experiment: The Story of the Wild Boy of Aveyron by Roger Shattuck,” April 1980 ,لد.

“Socialism in Siberia,” August 6, 1984.

”The Anthropologist at Large,” May 25, 1987.

”The Year of Living Culturally,” October 21, 1991.

“Footsteps and House of Class by Pramoedya Ananta Toer,” April 22, 1996.

”Off the .Menu,” February 17, 2003.

</biblio>

 Index

<biblio>

Adorno, Theodor, 81

Alinsky, Saul, 81

Allport, Gordon, 21

American Anthropological Association (ʌʌʌ), vii, ix, 8,181023,36,53

Anderson, Benedict, 59

anthropology: and astonishment, 91–92; cosmopolitanism of, 93, 94–95; happenstance and pattern and, 49–51: history and, 39, 47, 64, 68, 121–22; and interpretation, 11–14, 45; and judgment, 7–8, 10, 13–14, 108–9: and large issues, 89–95, 12–14: and pluralism, 28 ,7 و; social, 57; study of religion, 66–68; symbolic, 57–58, 86–87; “the third stream” of, 6On2; use of comparison, 93–94

Antioch College, 49

Appiah, Kwame Anthony, 94

Arendt, Hannah, 86

Aristotle, 13

Arnold, Matthew, 64

Balinese cockfight, 22, 38, 39, 47–48, 54

Balinese ideology of reform (reformasih 105–6

Bateson, Gregory, 77

Beck, Ulrich, 85–86

Beidelman, T. ()., 57

Bellah, Robert, 58, 67

Benedict, Ruth, 13, 41, 53, 95, 121

Benjamin, Walter, 81

Bentham, Jeremy, 31,81,114

Berlin, Isaiah, 7–810 1 ,51 ,50 ,171110 ,12 124 ,و

Berry, Thomas, 56

Blumenberg, Hans, 122 blurred genres, 76, 79, 82 Boas, Franz, 36nl, 52, 57, 6On2 Boon, James ∧., 58, 109, 1 12 Borges, Jorge Luis, 67 Bourdieu, Pierre, 64 Bowen, John, 71,72 Braudel, Fernand, 121 Brenner, Susanne, 10)3 Brown, Peter, 72

Bruner, Jerome, 95, 98, 1 17, 120)

Burke, Kenneth, 22, 29, 81, 95, 120 buzkashi, 82–83, 115

Cai, Hua, 12, l6n9

Cassirer, Ernst, 10)0)

Cavafy, c. p., 111

chance. See happenstance

Clemens, Samuel. See Twain, Mark coded communication, 25–26

Cohn, Bernard, 63–64, 66

componential analysis, 53, 111

Cornell, Vincent, 72 cosmopolitanism, 93, 94–95

Crabb, David, 58

Crapanzano, Vincent, 171118

cultural critique, 3–4, 13. See also judgment cultural viii, 20, 88nl, 83 endorsed by Geertz, 117; of Javanese, 101,102–4 culture: causal-functional vs. logico-meaningful integration, 52, 65, 79و

1 I ل; as coded communication, 25–263 concept of, 2, 25–27, 52, 54–60, 68–7(), 72, 92; as symbolic action, 25–26

Darnton, Robert, 120, 121

Davis, Natalie Zemon, 31,36, 120–22

de Bergerac, Cyrano, I, 36, ! 10 deep play, 82, 86, 113

Deleuze, Giles, 77

Dewey, John, 46, 95

Dilthey, Wilhelm, 64, 81,114

Douglas, Mary, 34, 60113, 121,122

Dryden, John, 109

Duchamp, Marcel, 64

Durkheim, Emile, 60112, 60113, 78, 1 18

Dwyer, Eeslie, 103

Eickelman, Dale, 1 13–17

Eliade, Mircea, 81

epistemology, 79–80, 81, 83, 1 14

ethnography, 10, 2(), 25, 92. See also under Geertz, Clifford ethnoscience, 32–33

Evans-Pritchard, E. E., 72, 95, 121 experience near/distant, 25, 32–33, 81, 11 7

Exploris, 33

Eagg, Donald, 39

Eallaci, Oriana, 117

Eallers, Tom, 99

Eechner, Gustave, 21

Ecrnandez, Janies, 121

Eernea, Robert, 72

Eerzacca, Steve, 1()l

Eischcr, Michael 1\J. I., 1 14–13, 1 18

Elanders and Swann, 113

Eleck, Ludwig, 83, 1 13

Eoucault, Michel, 31,114

Eox, Richard, (1., 93

Ereud, Sigmund, 21,25

Ereund, Paul, 109

Ericdman, Thomas, 92

Eukuyama, Erancis, 96113

Gadamer, Hans-Georg, 81

Galison, Peter, 83, 1 15

Galston, ^Villiam A., 7

(jeertz, Clifford: concept of culture of, 23–27, 32, 34–60, 68–70ˢ critiques of, 1–2, 1 71118, 27, 483 epistemology of, 79–80ˢ as ethnographer, 10–1 1, 3 1–33, 49, 66, 92, 93, 94, 1()(); histor>r/historians and, 38–39, 47, 68, 121–22: and Islam, 23, 63–73, 113–17ˢ on judgment, 1()-11, 12–14, 18,12(), 108–9ˢ and law, 22–23 on meaning, 20, 34–33, 122ˢ phases ot, 78–82ˢ philosophical pluralism of, 1, 2, 1 1ˢ and primordial attachments, 91, 94, 93, 1 13ˢ and psychology, 20, 22–23, 27, 98, 1 17ˢ on relativism, 3, 14, 17nl0, 17nl8, 31ˢ as “rooted cosmopolitan,” 94–93ˢ on science studies, 83, 114–13ˢ study of religion and, 66–73ˢ style of, 1–2 , 29–35, 30–3 1, 1 10, 1 1 2ˢ and subjectivity, 98, 100–101, 104, 106, 119ˢ symbolic action theory of, 25–27, 34, 1 17ˢ as teacher/professor, 64, 99–100, 1 19–20,

46ز ,on theoretical oppositions 120–21ˢ and “the third stream” in anthropology,

38–43 ,OJI time and change 60,12ˢ

Geertz, Clifford (works): After the Fact, 38, 43, 89ː Agricultural Involution, 36,13,

Art” 3ː ”,Anti Anti-Relativism” 42–43ː

as a Cultural System,” 28ː Available Light, 11, 13,13, 16,16, 17,116, 28–29), 31, 33 , 47, 9)(), 9)1, 92–93, 94ː “Culture and Social Change,” 36113ː

Deep Play,” 47–48: “ I he Integrative” Interpretation of 91ː ”,Revolution ,42 ,Islam observed 25, 38ː ,Cultures

,Local Knowledge 67–69, 73, 1 16ː

لی///، Societies 29, 30), 34, 101ː ()/لی ,Person” –91, 94, 1 13ː 90 ,New States

l ime, and Condtict in Bali,” 87,11ː The Religion 6)/ Java, 32, 35,GU7ו

32ː ”,Ritual and Social Change” 101ː

“Suq: the Bazaar Economy in Sefrou,

“Thick Description” 69ː ”,Morocco ”,Thinking as a Moral Act” 25, 60,12ː

28, 72: “The Visit: Review of Cai Hua,” 12, I6n9ː Works and Lives, 22,

,91 ”,The World in Pieces” 43, 89–90ː

113

Cellner, Ernst, 70 ,13114 ,1 l Cillespie, John Birks (Dizzy), 1 10 Gingrich, Andre, 93

Ginzburg, Carlo, 39, 121

Good, Byron, 87nl, 108, 117, 118–20

Good, Mary-Jo DelVecchio, 87111, 117, 118–20

Goodenough, Ward, 53

Gopnik, Adam, 17nl0

Ciorer, Geoffrey, 114

Gray, John, 7

Halperin, Manfred, 71

Hannerz, Ulf, 112–14

happenstance: and Balinese cockfight, 4748· existential anxiety and, 48; and Geertz’s life, 49, 123; and Geertz’s work, 47–49

Harkness, Sara, 26

Harvard University, 41, 57, 59, 64, 65, 86, 98; Department of Social Relations, 24 98

Hassan II (king of Morocco), 14

Hefner, Robert, 71, 117

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 46

Heisenberg, Werner, 13, 181119

Herder, Johann, 64

history/historians: and anthropology, 39, 47, 64, 68, 121–22: and historical change, 39; study of religion and, 38–39, 66–68

Hodgson, Marshall, 66, 69, 116 Huntington, Samuel, 69, 72, 93, 96113 Hymes, Dell, 57, 58

Indonesia: historical change and, 39, 41; ideology of reform (reformasi), 105–6: killings of 1965, 14, 1(13–4; President Soekarno, 90; religion in, 7072–71 و. See also Balinese ideology of reform (reformasi);

Java, and agricultural involution; Javanese interpretation: activity of, 45 and interpretivism, 20–21; legal, 22–23; as moral act, 10, 12; standards/criteria of, 11–12,1616

interpretivism, 2()-21 involution, 42

Islam: change in, 39, 66, 71; law of, 23 and modernity, 70–71: scripturalism, 39, 116; study of, 66–73, 1 15–17. See also Indonesia; Javanese

Jacob, Francois, 84

James, Henry, 30

James, William, 11, 15114, 30, 32

Java, and agricultural involution, 42–43

Javanese: cultural psychology of, 101, 102–4, 1 19; religion of, 66–67, 71; subjectivity, 103, 04–5

Jordan, Michael, 106

judgment: moral, 3–8, 13, 17110, 18n2O; personal, 13–14, I6n9, 108–9

Kael, Pauline, 14

Kahn, Paul, 22, 23

Kant, Immanuel, 100

Kaplan, Robert D., 96n3

Kateb, George, 11, I6n5, I6n8, 17110

Keeler, Ward, 101

Kennedy, Robert, 98

King, Martin Luther, Jr., 98

Kirsch, Thomas, 58

Kluckhohn, Glyde, 26, 6On2

Kohut, Heinz, 25,81,114,117

Krechevsky, David, 120

Kroeber, Alfred, 26, 52, 53, 55, 6On2

Kuhn, Thomas, 85, 115

Latour, Bruno, 85, 1 15

Leach, Edmund, 57, 65

Lerner, Daniel, 71

Levinas, Emmanuel, 77

LeVine, Robert A., 26, 117–18

Levi-Strauss, Claude, 43, 53, 6On2, 95, 121

Ligeti, (jyorgy, 65

local knowledge, 2, 11, 72

Lowie, Robert, 1 14

Lyotard, Jean-Francois, 84

Makhmalbaf, Mohsen, 78

Malinowski, Bronislaw, 95

Marsden, Magnus, 72

Marx, Karl, 81,99

Mead, Margaret, 53, 55

meaning, 20, 23, 41, 54–55, 1 1 1, 122

Middleton, John, 57

MIT (Klassachusetts Institute of Technology), 76

models of/for, 81,115

Montaigne, Michel Eyquem de, 3, 7, 31و III

Morocco, 14, 29, 38, 39, 40–41, 67, 69,

King 14ː ,King Hassan II 72» l 16ː

Muhammad ٧, 40

Muhammad / (king of Morocco), 40 Munson, Henry, Jr., 68 narrative, 22, 42, 48

Obeyesekere, (jananath, 16116, 87111 Oliver, Douglas, 59

Ortner, Sherry IL, 63, 96114

Parsons, Talcott, 52, 53–54, 57, 58, 60111, 60112,60113,79,81,114

Parton, Dolly, 112

Passcron, Jean-Claude, 64 patterns, cultural: and Balinese cockfight, 47–48: anti Gccrtz’s life, 123: and Geertz’s work, 47–49: and involution, 42

Peacock, Janies, 32, 36, I l 1–12 Peterson, Houston, 15114 phenomenology, cultural, 100, 105, 106, 119

Piscatori, James, 71 pluralism, 2, 7, 8, 1 1 Pollock, Griselda, 59 Ponty, Merleau, 100 Posner, Richard, 4–8, IIO, 111 power, 104–5 primordial attachments, 91, 94, 95, 113 Princeton University, 58: Institute for Advanced Study, 41,115, 120 psychoanalysis, 25, 106, 1 17 psychological anthropology, 25–27, 101 psychology: and anthropology, 20, 23, 104: and Geertz, 20, 22–23, 27, 98, 20–21. See :and interpretivism 1 17:

also cultural psychology: subjectivity: symbolic action theory

Quinn, Naomi, 27

Rabi, Isidor Isaac, 85 Rabinow, Paul, 171118 Reisman, David, 123–24 relativism, 2, 3, 4–8, 14, 171110, 171118,31, 32, 36115, 1()9 religion: and modernity, 70–71 study of, 66–73

Richards, I. A., 21

Ricoeur, Paul, 81, 114

Roethke, Theodore, 112

Rorty, Amelie Okscnbcrg, vii, 122–24

Rosaldo, Renato, 93, 94

Rosen, Lawrence, 30), 108–9, 1 17

Runyon, Damon, I 14 Ryle, Gilbert, 81,114

Sahlins, Marshall, 16,16

Santayana, George, 16118

Sapir, Edward, 27, 117

Sartre, Jean-Paid, 64, 81

Sellars, Peter, 87111

Sewell, William IL, 96114

Schafer, D. Paid, 59

Schneider, David, 57

Schutz, Alfred, 68, 81, 87nl, 1()0, I 14

Sellwartz, Stephen, 117

science studies, 83–86, 1 14–15

Shils, Edward, 91

Shwcder, Richard, 26, 36, 50, 98, 108, 109-11, 117

Smith, Gordon, 55

Society for Psychological Anthropology, vii, ix, 98

sociology, 93, 96, 114

Soekarno (president of Indonesia),

Sorokin, Pitirim, 52, 65

Steiner, George, 63

Stone, Lawrence, 121

Strauss, Claudia, 27

Structuralism, 52–53, 1 1 1

subjectivity: ethnographic theory of, 100–101 of Javanese, 103, 104–5, power and 104–6ː ,political ː5–104 ,19ː relation to culture, 103, 104, 19 l. See also under Geertz, Clifford symbolic action theory, viii, 25–27, 54, 1 17:

implied psychology of, 27, 1 17, 1 18

Tariq, General Amin Said, 82

Taylor, Charles, Ind, 50, 104, 124 thick description, 1, 81 ,73 ,54 ,او

Toynbee, Arnold, 69, 72

Trilling, Lionel, 79

Turner, Edward, 99

Turner, Terrence, 58, 99

Turner, Victor, 57, 81, 99

Twain, Mark, 51

Tylor, Edward B., 26, 55

University of Chicago, 20, 24–25, 41, 57, , 63, 64 , 66 , 79, 81, 90, 99, 120:
58

Contmittee for the Comparative Study of New Nations, 79, 90, 99 value pluralism, 7

Veyne, Paul, 108

Vico, Giambattista, 110)

Wahid, Gus Dur, 82,119

Walzer, Michael, 12, I6n6

Weber, Max, 21, 31,33, 36117, 52, 53–54, 601, 60n2, 60n3, 78, 79, 81, 1 14

Wikan, Unni, 59

Wilson, Edward, 26

Wissler, Clark, 114

Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 13, 68, 77, 93

Woodward, Mark R., 68

Yale University, 67

Yeats, William Butler, 123

</biblio>

 [Back Cover]

ANTHROPOLOGY

CLIFFORD GEERTZ is the most influential American anthropologist of the past four decades. His writings have defined and given character to the intellectual agenda of a meaning-centered, nonreductive interpretive social science and have provoked much excitement and debate about the nature of human understanding.

As part of its centennial celebration, the American Anthropological Association sponsored a presidential session honoring Geertz. Clifford Geertz by His Colleagues compiles the twelve speeches given by a distinguished panel of social scientists along with a concluding piece by Geertz in which he responds to each speaker and reflects on his own career. These edited speeches cover a broad range of topics, including Geertz’s views on morality, cultural critique, interpretivism, time and change, Islam, and violence.

A fitting tribute to one of the great thinkers of our age, this collection will be enjoyed by anthropologists as well as students of psychology, history, and philosophy.

CONTRIBUTORS:

James A. Boon, Jerome Bruner, Natalie Zemon Davis, Mary-Jo DelVecchio Good, Dale F. Eickelman, Michael M. j. Fischer, Clifford Geertz, Byron Good, Ulf Hannerz, Robert A. LeVine, James Peacock, Amelie Oksenberg Rorty, Lawrence Rosen, and Richard A. Shweder

RICHARD A. SHWEDER is a cultural anthropologist and the William Claude Reavis Distinguished Service Professor in the Committee on Human Development at the University of Chicago. He is the author or editor of numerous books, including, most recently, why Do Men Barbecue? Recipes for Cultural Psychology.

BYRON GOOD is professor of medical anthropology and chairman of the Department of Social Medicine at Harvard University. He is the author or editor of several previous books, including Medicine, Rationality and Experience: An Anthropological Perspective.

<quote>

"GEERTZ’S combination of great philosophical sophistication with an artist’s eye for the significant little detail has made him one of the most influential intellectuals of recent times. This collection of essays will give the reader a good sense of his impact on a variety of academic disciplines.”

RICHARD RORTY

</quote>

<quote>

"CLIFFORD GEERTZ is a central figure in the humanities in the last half-century, whose work has transformed anthropology and social science in general. His interpretive turn has made it possible to grasp the particular, changing constellations of meaning which constitute human societies, and are often masked in the explanatory systems and overarching generalizations of traditional social science. This work is of greater relevance than ever today, when very diverse societies are drawn ever tighter together, often in mutual incomprehension and conflict. This fascinating book, a conversation between Geertz and colleagues from different disciplines, draws out these and other implications of his remarkable corpus of work."

CHARLES TAYLOR

</quote>

The University of Chicago Press

[[http://www.press.uchicago.edu][www.press.uchicago.edu]]

BOOK AND COVER DESIGN: JOSEPH ALDERFER

COVER PHOTOGRAPH: HERMAN LANDSHOFF

ISBN 0-226-75610-6

9 780226 756103

#title Middle Eastern Lives

#subtitle The Practice of Biography and Self-Narrative (Contemporary Issues in the Middle East)

#author Martin S. Kramer

#date 30 Nov. 1991

#source

#lang en

#pubdate 2023-09-14T21:11:08

#authors Martin S. Kramer, Norman Itzkowitz, Elie Kedourie, Bernard Lewis, Shabtai Teveth, Vamik D. Volkan, Marvin Zonis

#topics

#cover m-s-martin-s-kramer-middle-eastern-lives-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

Middle Eastern Lives

Contemporary Issues in the Middle East

Published in cooperation with the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies

Tel Aviv University

 [Title Page]

Middle Eastern Lives

The Practice of Biography and Self-Narrative

Edited by Martin Kramer

Syracuse University Press

 [Publisher Details]

1991 by Syracuse University Press, Syracuse, New York 13x44-5160

All Rights Reserved

First Edition 1991

91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 654321

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed

Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48-1984 00

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Middle Eastern lives the practice of biography and selfnarrative / edited by Martin Kramer. — 1st ed.

p. cm. — (Contemporary issues in the Middle East) Proceedings of a conference sponsored by the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies.

“Published in cooperation with the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies. Tel Aviv University.”

Includes bibliographical references and index.

isbn o-8r 5602548-0 (alk. paper)

1. Biography (as a literary form)—Congresses.

2. Autobiography—Authorship—Congresses.

3. Middle East—Biography—History and criticism— Congresses. 4. Self in literature—Congresses.

1. Kramer, Martin S. 11. Merkaz Dayan le-heker ha- Mizrah ha-tikhon ye-Afrikah (Universifat Tel-Aviv) in. Senes.

CT21.M54 1991

808'.06692—dc2o 91-11277

Manufactured in the United States of America

 Preface

The last few years have seen an upsurge of interest in biography and autobiography across a wide range of disciplines. The appeal of both, as genre and source material, is owed to a new appreciation for narrative, but even more to the quest for a shared humanism. As academic specialties narrow, the practice of biography and the interpretation of self-narrative constitute common ground, where scholars can conduct a dialogue in which no discipline enjoys a uniquely privileged position.

This volume contains the proceedings of a small gathering meant to open that dialogue. These are papers presented at a conference convened at Tel Aviv University in 1987. The participants, although few in number, included scholars from the disciplines of anthropology, history, political science, and psychology. Some spoke as writers of biographies; others, as critics of biographies and self-narratives. Some presented research papers; others, essays of opinion. The objective was not to cover the Middle East geographically (although the articles do draw on Turkish, Iranian, Arab, and Israeli examples). Rather, the aim was to explore alternative approaches to evidence. The contributors avoided the rarefied theoretical issues that have preoccupied postmodernist critics of literary biography. Their concerns were more practical. How does one persuasively write a life? How does one persuasively use self-narrative as evidence? The wide diversity of approaches produced much heat and also some light, and a sense of shared enterprise that I hope this book conveys.

I wish to thank a number of persons and institutions for their support for the conference and this publication. I am especially grateful to Prof. Itamar Rabinovich, then Director of the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University, who assisted at every stage in the preparation of the conference, and to my colleague on the organizing committee, Prof. Saul Friedlander of Tel Aviv University. The conference and book were made possible thanks to the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Avix University, which sponsored the conference; the Conference Board of Tel Aviv University, which covered some of the expenses; the America-Israel Educational Foundation (Fulbright Commission), which contributed to participants' travel; and the Lucius N. Littauer Foundation, which made a grant toward publication of the book. At the Dayan Center, Nirs. Lydia Gareh typed the manuscript with her customary exactitude, and Mrs. Edna Liftman steered the book safely through bureaucratic shoals. I wish to extend a special word of gratitude to Ms. Cynthia Maude-Gembler of Syracuse University Press for taking the volume under her benevolent wing and seeing it to publication.

It is my hope that this slim volume will initiate a broader discussion of how our understanding of the Middle East might be enriched by the study of individual lives.

Chicago, Illinois January 1991

MARTIN KRAMER

Middle Eastern Lives

 Introduction

Martin Kramer

The Middle East and the West are heirs to long traditions of recounting lives. In the ancient civilizations of the Mediterranean and west Asia, the stories of individuals were chiseled on friezes and triumphal arches, minted on coins, memorized as epic, and written down as chronicle. Although Christendom and Islam arose to proclaim the unlimited power of a single God, they made still more generous allowance for the role of the exemplary life in divine history. Both traditions rested upon individual responsibility before an indivisible God, who worked his will through the lives of prophets and kings, saints and warriors. Christians and Muslims differed over the precise manifestation of the divine presence, but they differed not at all in their search for guidance in the edifying lives of Jesus and Muhammad, the disciples and the companions, St. Augustine and Ghazali, Richard the Lion-hearted and Saladin. Within both great traditions, the recording of lives became a specialization within the preservation of knowledge, and the recorders followed similar conventions of selection and narration. And in both traditions, the purpose of organizing the circumstances of a life was overwhelmingly didactic, to inspire and guide by example.

It was the West that discovered a new and revolutionary way of telling lives, at a time when, for many of the same reasons, the West was discovering much else that was new and revolutionary. What would become modern biography and autobiography differed from the old telling in their insistence on the intellectual and emotional distance of the teller from the subject—even when that subject was the self. These modern biographers sought evidence of human motive where their predecessors cited divine intervention. In the quest for knowing, they sought to penetrate those corners of lives left unexplored by the traditional edifiers and hagiographers.

This distancing ultimately made biography one of the grandest spires of nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century historiography and established introspective autobiography as a major form of literary expression. In the past hundred years, recorded lives achieved a cultural ideal in form and proportion, an ideal preserved to this dav in many biographies and autobiographies. Narrative proceeds in some chronological relationship to the lived life. It draws on the public document and the private diary to weave a coherent story, in which the subject always occupies center stage. Bolder narratives, influenced primarily by psychoanalysis and the modern novel, seek to reconstruct perception and hidden motive, of others and the self. And the narrative champions fullness as the highest virtue, so that a biography, to approach truth, must be comprehensive. Its proportions must evoke the creative (or destructive) energy generated by a lived lite.

But this revolution in the telling of lives did not sweep the Muslim societies of the Middle East. Muslims immediately associated intellectual distance with disbelief, for they were introduced to the methods of modern biography largely by Orientalists, who applied them to the edifying lives of the Islamic tradition, and especially the life of the Prophet Muhammad.[1] In the nineteenth century, Muslim opinion became much exercised over the subjection of Muhammad’s life and other exemplary Muslim lives to the critical methods of Western biographers. Some in the M»ddle East, battered by the political and cultural expansion of the West, rejected the desacralization of their history, as they have done in our own time by their condemnation of Salman Rushdie’s The Satanic Verses. To make sacred lives the subject of critical biography was to commit a sacrilege. The situation did not differ much among those who substituted the creed of nationalism for the religion of Islam. Nationalism, too, edified through the telling of exemplary lives and created its own personality cults. And so the writing of Middle Eastern lives in the Middle East largely followed the methodological and intellectual ground rules of traditional and uncritical narration. The same held true for self-narration, which was either devoid of introspection or more like memoir than autobiography.

Orientalism and “New” History

The first initiatives in applying critical methods to Middle Eastern lives originated largely from outside the region. Even these were slow in coming, for a subtle bias against biography ran through the Orientalist tradition. Whereas the “old” historian of Europe respected and even exalted the causal role of the individual, the Orientalist insisted on the primacy of culture as expressed in language and religion. Compelling history was not the doings of rulers and their dynasties, although Orientalists did much to establish the chronology of Islamic history and to translate chronicles. Compelling history was cultural history—the history of religion, philosophy, and literature—which evidenced change over time, often through the influences of other cultures. Orientalists therefore produced a very limited corpus of biography. Studies of towering figures were compiled, including the biographies of the Prophet that Muslims found offensive, but the Orientalist history of Islam was largely the history of a religious community, in which the individual was rarely accorded the full autonomy attributed to the individual Westerner.

Nor did the Orientalists receive encouragement from the example of the “new” history as it emerged early in this century. The “new” historians of Europe had little use for biography once they had shifted the territory of historical inquiry from elite to mass, from politics to society. Vast segments of society had been excluded from the “old” historv, even of Europe. The “new” historian sought evidence for the driving forces of change in villages and town marketplaces, not in courts and palaces. Change itself originated not in the action or inaction of rulers or a ruling elite but in economic, demographic, and ecological forces that unfolded over long durations of time. These constituted the fundamental tiers on which human history rested —so deep and vast that only a total vision of history could encompass them in its sweep. The biography of the “great man” in the nineteenth-century tradition did not disappear, but it was undertaken increasingly by nonprofessional historians who wrote for general audiences. Academic historians questioned not only the utility of biography but its very legitimacy.

When historiography’s European revolution occurred, it led the historiography of the Middle East almost directly from Orientalism to “new” history. The transformation was swiftest in France. There the domineering figure of Louis Massignon personified the metamorphosis of Orientalist into social and economic historian. Under the proximate influence of the An- nalistes, he and other scholars, who had been formed in the tradition of Oriental studies, rushed straight into social and economic history. Maxime Rodinson, trained in philology, followed a similar progression to economic history, although under the rather different impetus of Marxist theory. French scholarship passed through no stage comparable to the “old” history, with its emphasis on politics and biography, but leapt, like Massignon and Rodinson, directly from philology and religion to the study of guilds and prices. When they paused to study individual lives—Massignon that of Hallaj, Rodinson that of Muhammad—their quest was not for the unique but for the exemplary and edifying, although their criteria differed radically from those of Muslims.

In the English-speaking world, the transformation of Orientalist into “new” historian was not as dramatic. Yet the same leap was urged by the Orientalist Sir Hamilton Gibb, who argued that the next generation should devote its resources to social history. “It is vital to stress the word ‘society,’ ” he wrote three decades ago, for “the nature and pressures of the internal social forces engaged have largely determined che working of [Middle Eastern] political structures.”[2] The admonition did not go unheeded. In a comprehensive survey of Middle Eastern historiography published slightly more than a decade ago, the historian Albert Hourani announced that “social history seems likely to be the dominant mode of history writing for the present generation.”[3] That generation borrowed theoretical models and methodologies first elaborated by the “new” historians of Europe, who had defined the concerns of social history when most Middle Eastern history still was being written by Orientalists. In recent years historians of the Middle East have produced the first studies to employ the paradigms of political economy, the “world-system,” the Annales approach, and even deconstructionism. In the words of one “new” historian of the Middle East, the search is for a paradigm that “is able to describe the activities of the whole society as meaningful, and need not restrict itself to a narrative of political events and elite biography, disembodied from the rest of society.”[4] Nothing in the work of the Orientalists ever quite approximated this avid depersonalization of Muslim society.

“It has been said that when ideas die in France, they are reborn in America,” one eminent American historian has written. “One might add that when they are past their prime in other disciplines, they are belatedly adopted by historians.”[5] And only after they have made their contributions to the history of Europe are they applied to the history of the Middle East. By the time the first “new” historians of the Middle East emerged, the general crisis of the “new” history—what one practitioner once called “history without people”—had already overtaken the field. The crisis grew from a disappointment with the yield of “total history” and doubts about the role of such history as a humanistic endeavor. Over the past decade, narrative history has been revived, and even biography has lost much of its stigma.

The crisis of the “new” history is just now being appreciated by historians of the Middle East. Their disillusionment is bound to be deeper, for in every instance the resort to the themes and methods of the “new” history has been less satisfactory for the Middle East than for Europe. The thinness of rhe sources and the complete absence of many social groups from the extant records has left the “new” history of the Middle East a pale shadow of its European models. The “thick description” that several historians have achieved for parts of premodern Europe can never be approximated for the Middle East. And so historians of the Middle East are becoming aware of the revaluation of biography as evidenced in the work of historians of Europe, the creation of new journals of biographical method, and the choice of biography as a theme of conferences held by advanced research institutes. There are signs of a new willingness among historians of the Middle East to see whether biography can produce a fuller and richer representation of the past. And there is a readiness to look again at selfnarratives, in order to mine new insights from the texts.

 Obstacles to Representation

Yet this new endeavor cannot but bring into relief the special problems of writing Middle Eastern lives, for it may be just as difficult to follow the lead of “new” biography on Middle Eastern ground as it was to follow the lead of “new” history.

The “new” biographer, like the “new” historian, cannot discount the dearth of intimate source materials. There are no comprehensive and accessible collections of private papers, no confidential diaries deposited for the scrutiny of all. Certainly there have always been sufficient sources for those seeking to write about one or another Middle Eastern writer, and many of those schooled in the strong Orientalist traditions of cultural and literary history contributed to what might be called intellectual biography or portraiture. Yet this writing was often disembodied, based narrowly on the works of the subjects themselves. There were too few intimate documents to surround public text with context. That there can be a wide discrepancy between the public and private persona of a Muslim intellectual we know from the successive lives of Sayyid Jamal al-Din “al-Afghani,” reckoned as the precursor of the major Muslim ideological responses to the modern West. With each chance discovery of material—a file in the British Public Records Office, another m the French police archives, and finally some of his own papers in a Tehran library—it became clear how futile trying to assess Afghani’s life solely through his own writings had been. No one can say how many lives of Muslim intellectuals might be turned over by the discovery of a trunk of letters. But these lives were not lived in Bloomsbury. Cairo, Damascus, Istanbul, Tehran—these cities insisted on conformity, in politics, literature, and art. An intellectual might dare to stretch these conventions but could never openly defy them. And so it is almost impossible to strip away the heavy layers of self-imposed censorship; in many instances, the absence of letters and diaries means that the private voice is forever lost.

The intimate sources for the lives of rulers and leaders remain even more inaccessible. There is nothing Middle Eastern about the desire of the powerful to erect defensive barriers between their personas and themselves, but the powerful of the Middle East sometimes have erected barriers so high as to be insurmountable, even decades later. “Political biography is essentially concerned with the interaction of personality and politics,” one historian has written. “And personality, it is commonly supposed, is at least as much the product of private as of public experiences. How then are political biographies of Middle Eastern leaders possible? For their private lives are as secluded from public gaze as were the family lives of their fathers, secure behind the windowless outer walls of their dwellings. Syrian presidents disclose what they choose: in place of personalities they have personality cults.”[6] Even when those cults die—usually superseded by the cult of a successor—the evidence for the lived life remains fragmentary or inaccessible.

As a consequence, some modern lives that occupied the center of history’s canvas have never been told with documentary rigor. No documented biographies present the lives of Ottoman sultan Abdulhamid II and Qajar shah Nasir al-Din, the two rulers who dominated the Islamic world in which Afghani lived, and who reigned tor thirty-three and forty-eight years, respectively. (A scholarly biography of Nasir al-Din is now in preparation.) There is no life of Faysal, the leader of the Arab revolt, ruler in Damascus, and then king in Baghdad. There are a number of biographies of their successors—of Egyptian and Syrian and Turkish presidents, of Iranian shahs and Arabian kings. But these works, when they are not journalistic, have been forced to rely on secondary sources because the intimate document is inaccessible. Sometimes interviews can offer compensation, but the intimate document is biography’s adrenaline. If we know Herzl better than Abdulhamid II, Lawrence better than Faysal, Philby better than Ibn Saud, Eden better than Nasser, it is largely thanks to the rich texture of the sources. There is no substitute.

Or is there? All lives leave their documentary gaps; perhaps the documentary problem for the Middle East is one of degree rather than kind. Just as there cannot be total history, there cannot be total biography. All biography, like all history, is a grand compromise.,One biographical strategy is to narrow the focus to questions suggested by the accessible evidence. This is the essence of “political biography,” a life told with an explicit bias for politics and the kinds of available evidence that politics generates. Another strategy is to draw on some theory to infer a world of meaning from the broadest circumstances and anecdotal details of a life. This is the essence of “psychobiography,” a life told through explicit inferences, guided by a more or less comprehensive theory of motive. Both of these approaches to biography are compromises: the first because of its willful omissions, the second because of its deliberate inferential leaps.

A great deal has been written and said about the problems raised by such compromises. Here it need only be noted that they are often greater for the biographer of a Middle Eastern subject. The political biographer may not have access to the private diary, but if the life of a subject was lived within the confines of a Western democracy, the public archives are probably copious and accessible. Yet in much of the Middle East and during most periods, politics have been conducted much like private life—behind high walls of secrecy, secure from all scrutiny. In what sense is the president of Syria, even after twenty years of rule, a “public man”? Is it not more accurate to say that he is Syria’s most private man, whereas it is the citizens of Syria who are public men and women, who live their lives under the penetrating gaze reserved in the West for the politicians? The political biographer of the Middle Eastern leader is compelled to make not a few leaps of taith in trying to reconstruct the concealed dynamics of decisions for which the evidence is fragmentary at best.

In one sense, the compromise demanded of the psychobiographer of a Middle Eastern subject is no greater than that demanded of any psychobiographer. For adherents of comprehensive theories, the inferential leaps built into theory are essentially the same regardless of cultural setting. Yet in practice, those leaps may be longer and more perilous for the psychobiographer of a Middle Eastern subject. At many times and in many places, the experience of private, family, and sexual life in the Middle East has differed radically from the kinds of experience that have driven theory in the West. And since so little has been done even to describe the range of experience in the Middle East, from palace life to tent life, it is difficult to determine just where the biases might lie. The distance of the leap is further lengthened by a certain sense of propriety and privacy common to most of the Middle East. This transforms self-revelation into a breach of collective integrity, makes women invisible, and constricts the flow of evidence.

But if the Middle Eastern setting of biography raises the obstacles, it also raises the incentives. For in the Middle East, almost as much as in Europe, this has been a century of “great men.” The Middle East entered the century under the traditional authority of long- ruling sultans and shahs. After an imperial interlude, the charismatic authority of revolutionary heroes had its moment of (vain)glory. A decline in the apparent caliber of leaders occurred just after midcentury, when the Middle East became a cauldron of coups. Historians and social scientists had little cause to dwell on the many rulers who shuttled in and out of office during those years. The prize of these incessant struggles could scarcely be called power, since a growing dependence narrowed the base of resources—social, economic, military—that could support leader-driven change. But in the last two decades, new wealth has combined with new technologies of control to transform some Middle Eastern leaders into immovable strongmen.

With the collapse of the despotisms of Eastern Europe, the Middle East remains the last preserve of protracted individual rule. Syria’s president has ruled for twenty years. Jordan’s king has reigned for thirty-seven years. Libya’s leader brought off his coup twenty years ago. The chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization has held his title for twenty years. Iraq’s ruler helped to bring his party to power twenty years ago, and has ruled the country alone for ten years. Now that the means of control have been supplemented by the technologies of mass destruction, the “great men” loom large. Through cults of personality that they themselves promote, they have become the embodiments of entire states. Their enhanced stature, of course, is partly an illusion, a game of mirrors. The revolutions of Eastern Europe hang over the “great men” of the Middle East like a pall. But the recent history of some Middle Eastern polities is virtually inseparable from the choices and prejudices of a few men. For periods when strong leaders rule, as in Europe during the age of the dictators and in the Middle East today, biography becomes indispensable to history. And so it must be, unless or until Middle Eastern societies rise up to impose some limitation on ambition and personal power.

 Competing Approaches

Reading and writing lives begin with careful listening to the voices of those who have lived them. Self-narrative in its various forms is the subject of the first two essays in this volume, by Bernard Lewis and Dale Eickelman, and of much of the third, by Marvin Zonis. Lewis considers the nature of the selfnarratives that have figured in the literatures of the Middle East from ancient times to the present, with an emphasis on the Islamic tradition. His point is to demonstrate the continuous thread of self-narrative in these literatures and thus refute the argument that only under Western impact have Middle Easterners given accounts of their own lives. It is a point well taken: the past offers up numerous apologia, self-aggrandizing statements to posterity, and first-person accounts of religious awakening. Yet as Lewis points out, much of this material is of a fragmentary nature and contains little that might be described as introspective.

A question Lewis does not raise, but one that is inescapable, is whether this paucity of introspection is the product of culture. In his essay, Marvin Zonis goes further: noting the dearth of true autobiography in the Middle East, he argues that the retrospective assignment of meaning to a life, so essential to the production of introspective autobiography, is a product of Western historicism. Life experience is not integrated or understood as a variable fashioned by changing contexts; the lived life is understood as a series of discrete experiences. The predominant cultures of the Middle East, with their emphasis on communal values and identity, do not encourage an individualism essential to introspection. These cultural norms preclude more than true autobiography, since true biography also depends on the same sense of historicism and individualism. As Dale Eickelman suggests in his essay, this devaluation of individual will owes nothing to Islam and indeed would seem to stand in opposition to Islamic doctrine, which stresses personal responsibility and autonomy. But that doctrine has always been in tension with social values inherited from pre-Islam.

On all these points, Zonis enters controversial ground. The postulated inability to integrate a life’s experience cannot but evoke those formulations about the atomism of Arab thought so attacked by the critics of Orientalism. The argument that communalism undervalues liberty and equality, and that the Middle Easterner understands only fraternity, has been made before. Yet the fact remains that very little self-narrative by Middle Easterners satisfies the criteria by which Westerners define true autobiography. If Middle Eastern self-narrative is thin, its thinness requires methodological strategies to compensate for the lacunae.

As Dale Eickelman demonstrates, the anthropologist can supplement the self-narrative by firsthand observation of the wider social context. Eickelman has studied the tarjama, highly stylized self-narrative or biography, of learned men in local settings in both Morocco and Oman. These texts show some evolution in form but remain almost rigidly stylized and selective, offering nothing in the way of introspection or accounting of motive. The texts serve above all to present the cultural personas of learned men: their social masks, put on for the benefit of a contemporary audience of initiates. The tarjamas exclude family context, peer learning, economic activity, and politics— precisely the subject matter sought by the anthropologist in the quest for contextual wholeness. As it happens, the tarjamas consulted by Eickelman are ambiguous about just those political issues that most interest him: the relationship of individual men of learning to French colonial rule in Morocco, and their attitude to the imamate in Oman. Such texts then are not selfcontained, but once their context is established through direct observation, they become invaluable documents, not only for what they include, but just as often for what they omit. The marked discrepancies between what the tarjamas say about these learned men and what Eickelman has found out about them can only sober the historical biographer, who must rely solely on texts and recollections to reconstruct lives.

Eickelman’s kind of “social biography” is not so much the reading of lives as it is reading between the lines of lives. And for some, it is not particular context but universal theory that coaxes the alternative readings from the texts. The second part of the essay by Marvin Zonis advocates the resort to psychological theory to illuminate what he calls the human “black box.” His plea for psychopolitical studies is not precisely a plea for psychobiography: the psychopolitical study is in every instance the case study of an event, not a life, and depends just as much on group psychology. Yet certainly in the case chosen by Zonis, the fall of Iran’s last shah, an abbreviated psychobiography is the inevitable prelude to the study itself.

Ultimately, then, any plea for psychopolitical studies is a plea for psychobiography. In the case of the Shah's fall, Zonis seeks to demonstrate how much can be added to an understanding of Iran's revolution by accounting for the Shah's own conduct—and how much more convincingly that conduct can be explained through psychoanalytic theory. Drawing particularly on the work of Heinz Kohut, Zonis maintains that "the Shah entered adult status with depleted narcissism, unable to provide himself with a level of self-esteem sufficient to allow the maintenance of a reasonable psychic equilibrium. Instead, he was totally dependent, for his narcissistic nurturing on external sources." As it happened, each of those sources failed him as the revolution gathered steam, leaving him quite helpless to resist it. When personality becomes the pivot of explanation, so too does a theory of personality.

The difficulty, of course, is that theories of personality stir deep disagreements among theorists and evoke charges of determinism and reductionism among historians. Zonis argues for tolerance and a kind of suspension of judgment, but the warriors of theory take no prisoners. Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz, whose psychoanalytic biography The Immortal Ataturk evoked many hostile reactions, respond in kind to their critics. The assumption of their piece is that the "unending" argument over the validity of psychoanalysis cannot be resolved: "Let them have it how they will." More consequential for them are the objections of psychoanalysts to psychoanalytic biography, criticism made within the charmed circle of believers. For psychoanalysis is both a theory and a clinical technique that "brings the analyst and analysand together in a highly specific way." This interaction between analyst and analysand generates the very evidence on which the entire analysis rests. Not surprisingly, many psychoanalysts are uncomfortable with the application of their techniques of interpretation to dead, unanalyzed subjects. Volkan and Itzkowitz respond by showing how texts and interviews related to Ataturk can supply some of the information that would have been gained from an actual analysis of the Turkish leader. This information can interact usefully with theory, although they concede that "total biography" is impossible.

For Elie Kedoune, however, this attempt by psychobiographers (and others) to hang their evidence on a shaky scaffold of theory—and then deduce what is hidden and missing—is self-delusion. Biography, like any historical account, “is wholly made up of pieces of evidence interlocking with other similar pieces without, so to speak, being forced. And if there is no evidence, then no concept can make up for its absence.” For Kedourie, “there is nothing beyond or above or below the historical record (as the evidence shows it to be) which may serve to account for or to explain this record.” The record is “its own explanation.” Nor do the biographer and the subject need the mediation of theoretical decoding: mind is akin to mind, mind speaks to mind, mind can and does understand mind.

Kedourie’s repudiation of the social sciences is a view that has few adherents among historians outside Britain. During the conference, the historian Saul Friedlander, who served as commentator, proposed the compromise of “limited models.” But there would seem to be little middle ground on which a Kedourie and a Volkan or Itzkowitz might meet. Practically speaking, the debate over psychobiography has probably gone as far as it can go. Nothing done on the Middle East is likely to carry it much further.

The last two essays, one by a biographer, the other by a political historian, consider the relationship of biography to history. Compared to biographers of most Middle Eastern subjects, biographer Shabtai Teveth works in a very different medium, for writing the lives of the makers of Israel rests on introspective sources that are plentiful and accessible. 'Yet even here Teveth finds history and biography at odds. First, whereas history proclaims the primacy of evidence, biography is an art; it insists on a “blend of evidence and poetic licence.” (Some contributors to this volume invoke theories of science to sanction inferential leaps; others claim the licenses of art—both for the same purpose.) Second, history and biography diverge in assignations of significance. The choice of biography is itself a selection, even an exclusion, that blue-pencils a question mark beside every digression of narrative into the wider context of events. Yet for biography to do credible service as history, it must draw the full-length portrait of its subject’s life and the context of that life. (This may explain why biographies often run to such great length.) But if biography is indeed a “crime against history,” as Teveth says, then it is certainly no more heinous than the offenses committed daily in the name of new theories and methods. Certainly Teveth’s own study of Ben- Gurion qualifies as history, for the lived life is tightly interwoven with the dramatic events of the time. Yet biography's demands of style, proportion, and emphasis will doubtless continue to repel some historians, even as they attract ever-growing numbers of readers.

Uriel Dann contemplates the other side of the coin. Just how much biography can be usefully introduced into a political history? Quite a bit, Dann concludes, especially in the setting of the Middle East, where the "prevalence ot a hero" makes insistent biographical demands on the political historian. Dann himself has always accepted the challenge; each of his political histories has turned on the axis of a central figure. Just how much biography is essential and how much is intrusive in political history is a matter of—well, plain common sense: "There is no ironclad definition of what is 'palpably trivial,' but we are expected, after all, to exercise some judgment." Theories and models notwithstanding, there is no substitute for sound judgment, a capacity for empathy, and a strong respect for evidence. This is not historical fundamentalism, but simply a reminder that all interpretation must rest on firm foundations.

 The Promise of Biography

In a book full of pleas and admonitions, a general one in favor of the book's theme is not out of order. When done with sensitivity, the telling and reading of lives increase our empathy for people of other times, other places, other cultures. There are many other roads to other minds (history, language, literature), but few so resistant to the arid pedantry of overspecialization as biography. Biography allows scholars in warring disciplines to debate their differences on the neutral ground of a shared humanism, where no discipline enjoys a uniquely privileged position. And biography and autobiography are literary forms that are appreciated by general readers, including those in the wider world of scholarship, which is otherwise disconnected from the closed community of Middle Eastern studies and the Middle East itself.

It is for this last reason that biographers and students of selfnarrative working in a Middle Eastern medium have an outside chance to move their wider disciplines. Since so many disciplines burned their bridges to biography and the analysis of selfnarrative, the present work of reconstruction is still open to all. Students of the Middle East again might arrive on the scene too late, and with too little equipment. But those who are inspired by the riveting tension of Middle Eastern lives perhaps hold a key to the inspiration of others.

 1. First-Person Narrative in the Middle East

Bernard Lewis

After the Young Turk Revolution of 1908, there was [a] sudden outpouring of something that had long been WW rare: the writing and publication of memoirs. Two new circumstances combined to produce this flowering of $ the memoir. The first was an interval of freedom of expression and publication in Turkey that had no precedent in the past and very few parallels in the future. The second was the urgent need felt by a number of rather senior and important figures to provide some explanation of what they had been doing during the previous thirty years. And so we find Said Pasha, grand vezir and holder of various other offices under Abdiilhamid, producing three volumes of self-exculpatory memoirs; Kamil Pasha, colleague and rival, doing the same; Said Pasha then producing comments on Kamil Pasha’s memoirs; Kamil Pasha producing comments on Said Pasha’s memoirs; and each producing a reply to the other’s comments as well as to comments by a number of lesser mortals. Memoir writing engaged not only pashas but even some of the revolutionary leaders. Some of these works were translated from Turkish into Arabic and helped to set afoot a similar trend in the Arabic-speaking world.

It has been claimed that this was the beginning of memoir writing in the Near Eastern Muslim world and that until that time it was not the practice for people to write about themselves. It has been remarked that, generally speaking, the tendency among writers of history in Arabic was to conceal their own personalities, and it is noteworthy that when inserting a personal testimony, they often do so in the third person. Tabari, for example, the great medieval historian, when wishing to make a comment or observation of his own, says qultu, “I said,” instead of his usual narrative introduction qala, “he said.” But when he is producing a piece of evidence of his own, he says “qala Abu Jarir,” this being his own sobriquet, thus distinguishing between information provided by him and comment made by him.

The idea that autobiographical writing, first-person writing, memoir writing, whatever we may choose to call it, begins with the Young Turk Revolution is quite mistaken. Such writing goes back a very long time, and I shall try to demonstrate this by putting before you a sort of prospectus of the different types of first-person narrative that have at one time or another flourished in this region and that have contributed directly or indirectly to the growth of memoir and autobiography in modern times.

First-person narrative figures among the most ancient writings of the Middle East and therefore in the world. Amenemhet of Egypt, of the twelfth dynasty that flourished between 1991 and 1962 B.C., wrote some rather interesting autobiographical texts. In a description of a journey to the south and some campaigns, each paragraph begins with “I did this” or “I did that,” the classical approach of the autobiographer. Even more remarkable is an autobiographical inscription from a Hittite king, Hatusilis, who felt called on in about 1275 b.c. to provide a justification for his accession to the throne. He felt, almost uniquely among ancient and indeed more-recent rulers, that having obtained power to the disadvantage of other members of his own family, he had to provide a moral and legal justification for what he had done. So we have this rather strange spectacle of an ancient Hittite king saying in effect, “Well, I had to do this. It’s true he was my brother . . .”

Another example is Tiglat Pileser, the Assyrian king who, writing about 1115 b.c., produced another of the classical types of first-person narrative; describing the innumerable countries he had conquered, cities he had devastated, and peoples he had killed or enslaved, thereby building up great glory for himself. Darius, the king of Persia, gives us another type in his Behistun inscription of about 520 b.c. that begins with his pedigree: his father, his grandfather, his ancestors.

When we pass from these and other for the most part now extinct Middle Eastern societies to that of the Jews, we have a somewhat different situation. In the Hebrew Bible, normally only God speaks in the first person. Normally, but not exclusively; there are exceptions. The Book of Deuteronomy, for example, is for the most part first-person narrative by Moses, or at least is presented as such, although it is hardly autobiographical. There are first-person passages in some of the Prophets and a genuine autobiography in the Book of Nehemiah, a personal statement of personal history probably unique in the ancient world. Another Jewish example is the autobiography of Josephus, written or at least surviving in Greek, in which he justifies his own rather questionable activities. M. Vidal Nacquet, the French classicist, described this as a manual of correct behavior in treason. Josephus gives us a perhaps classical example (classical because it was in Greek) of the self-justificatory memoir, explaining his life because it was necessary to answer a whole series of charges and accusations brought against him.

One interesting feature of Josephus's autobiography is that he begins with his pedigree. Apart from Darius, this is almost unique in antiquity. As far as I know, no other Greek or Latin author does so, and there are quite a number of autobiographical writings in Latin and Greek. Josephus begins with his ancestry, explaining that among the Jews, unlike other people, nobility is measured by priesthood, and he goes on to develop this theme at length. This practice of beginning with a pedigree became standard in Islamic times.

Of all the pre-Islamic societies that flourished in the Middle East, the one with the most recent and direct influence on early Islam was of course that of Iran. Unfortunately, we do not know a great deal about the literature of Iran in the period immediately preceding the advent of Islam, that is, in the Sasanid period, but we do have some information, including three documents that purport to be autobiographical and that survive in Arabic. One of them, ascribed to the Sasanid emperor Khusraw Anushirvan and preserved by Ibn Miskawayh, sets forth certain guiding principles that Khusraw as a king found it expedient to tollow. This text is a mirror for princes, of a type common in Islamic literature, but is projected back into a pre-Islamic past and presented in the first person in the name of Khusraw; it is obviously not to be taken seriously as autobiography. Somewhat more autobiographical is a letter of advice from another Sasanid, Khusru Parviz, to his son Shiroye. This does make some personal statements and may in part be authentic.

Much more important than either of these is the brief autobiography of Burzoye, a Persian physician who was sent to India, knew Indian languages, and translated from Sanskrit the collection of animal fables that later came to be known as Kalila wa-Dimna. The introduction to his autobiography states that the king gave orders to set down the history of this man from the day of his birth, including his education, his studies, his travels, “until his heart was filled with all kinds of wisdom and knowledge.” As we shall see, this short autobiography became the model for a vast number of autobiographical writings— fragments rather than autobiographies—by men of learning.

Having set the scene, I come to the heart of my presentation, namely, the Islamic period. For convenience of rapid treatment and at the cost of some inevitable oversimplification, we may divide first-person writings into certain major classes, the first of which I would designate by the Arabic term fakhr, the boast. Perhaps the earliest Arabic autobiography is the Mu[c]allaqa of Imr al-Qays, and to a lesser extent some of the other “hanging odes” of ancient Arabia. These are often lengthy first-person statements describing deeds done. Quite a number of other fragments survive from ancient Arabia; the stories of the Ayyam al-[c]Arab, and other ancient poems are often markedly autobiographical.

This kind of personal statement of deeds done finds expression in an impressive number of royal memoirs, written personally by rulers or under their immediate direction. A fascinating example comes from the far west of Islam. ‘Abdallah Ibn Buluggin, of the Zirid dynasty of Arabized Berbers who lived in the eleventh century, wrote a book-length account of life at court during his father’s and his own lifetimes. A still better known autobiography is that of Usama ibn Munqidh, a local ruler in northern Syria in the twelfth century, who wrote what is probably the most informative single book in Arabic about what life was like in Syria at the time of the Crusades and what kind of human relationships existed between Muslims and Crusaders.

Such writings appear more frequently in the Persian than in the Arab or Turkish world. There are the pseudomemoirs of Timur, the genuine memoirs of Babar and of Tahmasp, and the still later first-person narratives of Nasir al-Din Shah. In contrast, the Ottoman sultans do not seem to have gone in for this kind of writing. They preferred to express themselves artistically by writing verse rather than memoirs. All the Ottoman sultans without exception composed poetry, and some of them were even poets.

Associated with the royal memoir is a rather special genre: the autobiographical biography, a book written by someone who is primarily a literary figure, who is closely associated with the ruler, and who writes a book that is at the same time a biography of the ruler and an autobiography of the writer, the two stories being commingled in order to show, among other things, the intimate position of the writer with the ruler. The best example of this genre is Tmad al-Din's book about his life with Saladin. If he had been modern, he might have called it "My Life with Saladin" or "Saladin and I"; he actually called it al-Barq al-Shami. Displaying at times an almost epic quality, it is a remarkably informative document about Saladin and also about 'Imad al-Din. About the same time, [c]Umara al-ramani, a courtier of the last Fatimid rulers of Egypt, a minor poet and a man of letters, wrote an autobiographical work that is also of considerable interest.

The first category of first-person narrative consists, then, of "things that I did." The second category might be defined as "places I went to and things I saw." In the Middle East, there is an extensive travel literature, arising from many different kinds of travel. Medieval Islamic society enjoyed a far greater degree of voluntary, personal mobility than did any other known premodern society. Men, and sometimes women, traveled; they planned, organized, and conducted long journeys.

The main impetus, of course, was the Muslim pilgrimage, which requires every Muslim once in a lifetime, whether living in Morocco, in Java, in Central Asia, in Central Africa, to go to the Hijaz, visit the holy places, and join with other Muslims in certain rites. An elaborate system of arrangements all over the Muslim world facilitated the pilgrimage. There were roads, relay stations, and other services, and we know of a large number of individual travelers.

The pilgrimage became associated with other forms of travel, notably travel for trade and travel for study. Scholars went to study under different teachers: “Seek for learning even in China,” says a hadith. This is not meant in any sense to be derogatory to China; it simply means that even if you have to go that far, still go. This whole category of writings is devoted to “journeys I made, places I visited, teachers at whose feet I sat, whose courses I attended, whose lectures I noted down,” and the like. People collected shaykhs, and books that are “shaykhs under whom I studied” form a recognized genre, the mashyakha.

There were also diplomatic envoys who, exceptionally, had interesting things to say. There were captives who managed to get themselves ransomed and returned home. And, in more modern times, there were students who went abroad and came back with often very strange stories.

One of the earliest of these travelers was an Arab called Harun ibn Yahya, who was taken prisoner and sent first to Constantinople and then to Rome in about 886. He wrote a brief description of Rome and Western Europe that was preserved by a later geographer. Others, including such famous figures as Ibn Battuta (whose descriptions of the world are at least in part written in the first person), recounted personal adventures and experiences, personal contacts and relationships, conversations with other people, and personal reactions to the strange and wonderful things that they found.

In the Ottoman period we have accounts of India, such as that of the admiral Sidi Ali Reis, who went to India in the late sixteenth century. We have a number of Ottoman ambassadors to Europe, to Iran, to Central Asia, to India, and we have the unique and incomparable Evliya Chelebi, who died in 1684 and wrote of a whole series of adventures. Unfortunately one of the problems with Evliya Chelebi is his credibility. To call him a liar, as some have done, is an injustice; he makes it quite clear in the introduction to his book that his purpose is to entertain rather than to instruct. He is indeed one of the few authors who tells us why he is writing the book and what he is trying to accomplish. There is undoubtedly a great deal of personal information in his work. His account of Vienna, where he went as a member of the entourage of an Ottoman ambassador, is particularly interesting. He seems to have spent some time in the city, and the responses of an Ottoman gentleman to imperial Vienna in the seventeenth century make a remarkable document.

In the nineteenth century, the literature of travel acquired a new dimension with the process of European discovery and the growing number of students, then diplomatic envoys, and then political exiles who visited the lands beyond Islam. To these three major groups, we may add royal visitors.

If the first two categories are “what I did” and “what I saw,” the third, more interesting in many ways, is concerned with “what I thought.” These latter works are rarely book length. Most are short statements by scientists and philosophers, apparently written for inclusion in some larger biographical work. Reference has already been made to the existence in Arabic and later, to a much lesser extent, in Persian and Turkish of vast biographical dictionaries. Scholars were obviously concerned to have a proper and correct entry in these medieval versions of Who’s Who, and some of them took care to provide an outline. Thus when Ibn Abi Usaybi[c]a compiled his famous biographical dictionary of physicians, many of the physicians in his book provided their own biographies directly. Quite a number of remarkable personal statements by medieval physicians are included in this and other biographical dictionaries, and some entries are preserved from earlier periods. From as early as 873, we have a kind of memoir by Hunayn ibn Ishaq, a translator, who talks about his work, his rivals, and his critics; a memoir by the great physician Muhammad ibn Zakariya al-Razi, who died in 925; and another by an Egyptian physician called Ibn Ridwan, who tells the heartbreaking story of his impoverished childhood and hard times, his inability to study properly because he had no money, and his success in completing his studies all the same: an intensely personal statement also offered as a moral lesson for others.

Not only the scientists and philosophers wrote in this manner, but also others with a more specifically religious purpose, and notably the Sufis. Muhasibi (d. 857) is an example. Hallaj left some autobiographical fragments. These writers want to tell us of their mystical experiences, for our enlightenment and for our guidance. Surely the outstanding and classical example of the religious autobiography in Islamic literature is Ghazali’s (d. mi) Saviour from Error. In it he tells of his struggle to achieve a true understanding of the world, the universe, and the predicament of humankind. He speaks of trying the way of the philosopher, the way of the theologian, and finding that each one was unsatisfactory. He finally found the true way, that of the mystic, and through that, with some changes, he managed to achieve the understanding that he sought. Among scholars, this introspection takes the different forms of autobibliography and what might be called autohagiography; an outstanding example of the latter is Sha[c]rani (d. 1565).

One religious autobiography is of particular interest, that by an Ismaili da[<]'i, or propagandist, who worked in Iraq in the interest of the Fatimid caliph. He was a propaganda agent of subversion and influence in the territories ruled by the Buyids and eventually was recalled to headquarters in Cairo where, if I may translate it into modern language, he became first a high official in the ministry of propaganda and then minister of propaganda—the head of the Da[c]wa, or da[l]i al-du’-at. His narrative, one of the very rare book-length autobiographies, is a curious mixture of personal statement, religious testimony, and career intrigue. It consists of debates that he had with other people, speeches that he made, sermons that he delivered, letters that he wrote, and actions that he took—demonstrating how clever he was in various tricky diplomatic situations. In the last part, when he is in Cairo and working in the Fatimid government, he tells of his disagreements with other people and describes how this one and that one were treacherous and dishonest, or stupid and vicious, and how he got things right and was therefore deserving of credit and attention. This is the most modern of these books, an early prototype of the present-day memoir that consists of speeches, letters, debates and experiences, accusations against one’s rivals, and above all self-justification.

I spoke a moment ago of the autobibliography. These became more and more common as the biographical dictionaries became larger, more capacious, more copious, and more numerous. Roughly from the thirteenth century onward, there were great numbers of short autobiographies and short memoirs— half a page, a page, rarely much more—that were someone’s draft for his own Who’s Who entry. More often than not, such entries were provided to disciples who then included them in their books. These disciples and compilers also offered selfportraits. The biographical dictionaries were normally arranged chronologically by years of death, and the individual entries were therefore not, so to speak, published until after the subject’s death. But some compilers arranged their entries by the centuries in which they flourished and therefore felt able to include themselves in their own biographical dictionaries. Sometimes they spoke of themselves in the third person, a practice shared with such distinguished figures as Julius Caesar and

Charles de Gaulle; at other times, they wrote in the first person. Some of these accounts are mixed, as for example that of the famous Ibn Tulun of Syria; he begins his autobiography in the third person and halfway through switches to the first person.

An outstanding book that combines many of these different features is the autobiography of the great Ibn Khaldun. This is not strictly speaking a book but part of a book, a book-length component in his vast universal history. In this he talks of his ancestry, his education, the shaykhs under whom he studied, his travels, his writings, his career, and his scholarship. It is certainly the most comprehensive and, as one would expect from Ibn Khaldun, intellectually the most interesting and the most satisfying.

A distinct group consists of autobiographies by those who lived in some sense on the margins of Islamic society, for example, the dhimmis, non-Muslims living within the Muslim community who, for one reason or another, wrote memoirs or statements about themselves. Two Jewish figures are credited with probably apocryphal autobiographies, Eldad Hadani and David Reubeni; an interesting eighteenth-century figure from Jerusalem, Azulay, produced a real autobiography. Among Christians, there were several memoir writers in the nineteenth century, including Mikha’il Mishaqqa, Rustum Baz, and Aru- tin.

Some of these non-Muslims were converts to Islam. The Jew known as Samuel al-Maghribi was converted in 1163 and wrote a refutation of Judaism called Ifham al-Yahud, to which he appended a brief statement about himself and his family, explaining that he had postponed his conversion because he did not want to distress his father.

Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq wrote extensive memoirs; an experienced convert, he became a Protestant first and then a Muslim.

A special genre consists of solicited memoirs, those written on request, usually of someone European, someone from outside the Islamic world. Some of these documents are interesting personal statements, in part because of the circumstances that brought them into existence. The Yemeni Jew Hayyim Bab- shush, for example, who escorted Halevy in his travels in the Yemen, was asked twenty years later by Edward Glaser to write memoirs of himself and Halevy. Habshush wrote a kind of autobiographical cum biographical travel book, a kind of al-Barq al-Shami on a small scale. There was an Egyptian shaykh called Tantawi who somehow found his way to Russia where he died in 1861, but not before becoming one of the founders of the Russian School of Arabic Studies. Tantawi was asked by a Russian Orientalist of the time to write an autobiography, which he obligingly did. There was the Ottoman interpreter known as Miitercim Osman, a native of Temesvar, at that time an Ottoman city, who was in the service of the Pasha of Temesvar. Osman knew several languages, as apparently did everybody in Temesvar. He spoke Serbian and Hungarian as well as Turkish; after his capture by the Austrians in war, he spent eleven years in captivity during which he mastered German. He was then ransomed or exchanged and went home and got an excellent job as chief interpreter to the Pasha of Temesvar. He wrote two volumes of memoirs, fascinating books about the Turko- Austrian wars in and around Hungary. What is still more interesting is that each of these volumes survives only in a single manuscript, one in Vienna, the other at the British Museum, and that the work is totally unknown to Ottoman historiography or literature.

In the nineteenth century, again, a number of people wrote memoirs to order: Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi, for example, who was asked to write in French; As'ad Khayat, who wrote in English; and a rather curious person known as Mme. Veuve Ki- brisli Mehmet Pasha, the widow of Kibrisli Mehmet Pasha, whose book, written or at least published in English in 1872, contains the remarkable memoirs of an Ottoman lady.

What sort of pattern, if any, emerges from this kind of first- person writing, memoirs, autobiographical fragments, and the like, of which I have selected merely the high points? Certain things are almost standard. These writers begin with ancestry, although in Greco-Roman antiquity only Josephus does so. In Islamic autobiographical writing, this opening is practically universal and includes as many generations as possible. In extreme cases people will go back to Adam, but certainly as far back as ancient Arabia. They say where they were born, though not necessarily when they were born. (There seems to be a certain vanity that inhibits some of our memoirists from giving the date of their birth.) The place of birth is important, and some words of praise for the beauties of the place are often included, perhaps the citation of a well-known hadith, Hubb al-watan min al-iman, love of one's birthplace is part of the faith, and the like. Then, particularly among the scholarly autobiographies, education and travels follow, forming a kind of curriculum vitae. This section may include "the books I have read and the books I have written," and if the autobiography or fragment is a religious one, then of course the religious experience. The length varies enormously. Relatively few are separate books or even long enough to form separate books. The great majority are brief, running from a few lines to a few pages, and obviously written for inclusion in some larger book, either one's own or someone else's.

Finally, why? What are the purposes of these writings? Here again, at the risk of oversimplifying, I would put them in three main categories: to serve oneself, to serve others, and to serve posterity. To serve oneself covers, of course, the numerous apologia written to justify what one has already done or to facilitate what one hopes to do next. The two purposes are often linked. To serve others refers in particular to the religious works. There is no doubt about the religious sincerity of Ghazali or of Avicenna in writing for the intellectual guidance of their readers. And posterity is the intended audience of those who are concerned about their place in history, an important concern in Sunni Islam where, by the very nature of Sunni beliefs, the sense of history is strongly developed.

In the course of the nineteenth century, unnei the influence of European models, many memoirs of one kind or another were added. In the twentieth century, they have become an unstoppable torrent.

 2. Traditional Islamic Learning and Ideas of the Person in the Twentieth Century

Dale F. Eickelman

Accounts of Muslim men of learning ^ulama-, sing. [c]alim) in the “premodern” era, an epoch that, like mythical time, possesses no distinct temporal markers, suggest that they were oversocialized to a narrow set of public roles and constrained by the “strict observance of traditionally established behavior patterns.”[7] A presumed consequence of tradition is that men of learning, imbued with central cultural and social roles in premodern Muslim societies, lacked the disposition and opportunity to sustain these roles in the modern world and thus have become the equivalent of an endangered species. This essay argues that the discontinuity between past men of learning and those of the present is primarily an artifact of “ulamology,” to use L. Carl Brown’s deliberate neologism. The religious traditions sustained by ulama and the response of these customs to changing political and economic circumstances have been more flexible than the self-image sustained by men of learning themselves.

The capacity of traditionally educated religious intellectuals to play decisive contemporary roles is evident in postrevolutionary Iran, where Ayatollah Khomeini rivaled Ronald Reagan as a “great communicator” by using the mass media and Friday sermons in innovative ways to influence a large and diverse audience, an impact sustained by his clerical successors. Men of learning also remain politically significant in the Arab Middle East.[8] Far from fading away in colonial North Africa, men of learning adapted to radically altered circumstances, although not as a bloc. Ulama in French Algeria were innovators and conservatives, liberals and reactionaries. Some withdrew from participation in colonial institutions, others opposed them, and still others saw certain colonial reforms as offering the possibility for revitalizing the Muslim community.[9] In Morocco, the cooperation of judges, advisors, and administrators was vital in establishing and maintaining colonial rule. After independence in 1956, Moroccan ulama remained an important component of the elite, and their support of the monarchy is important still in maintaining popular political legitimacy. This is also true elsewhere in the Muslim world.[10]

 Self-Images of Men of Learning: Morocco and Oman

The principal vehicle for self-representation of men of learning is the tarjama, which in Arabic can mean both biography and autobiography. The term dates from at least the tenth century.[11] Using accounts drawn from opposite ends of the Arab world, Morocco and Oman, I argue that tarjamas, often neglected because of their highly stylized and seemingly inflexible features, serve as an index of changes in self-representation with the important qualification that tarjamas cannot be considered independently of the social contexts for which they are produced. In both Morocco and Oman, I am concerned with persons in regional settings rather than those at the highest levels of political authority.

Islam is a literate and complex civilization, but until recently the vast majority of Muslims has lacked direct access to the written word. In Morocco over 90 percent of the population was illiterate through the 1950s; in Oman this was the case through the 1970s. Since then, significant strides have been made in educating the school-age population in both societies, although literacy rates for the adult population remain low. In both countries, literacy has been primarily associated with religious learning, but this has begun to change: state schooling now affords more prestige to diplomas in other fields. Nonetheless, the popular link between literacy and religious status remains strong. Although a reputation for religious learning does not guarantee high social status, it usually implies wealth, leadership, and distinguished descent.[12]

 Individual and Person

The distinction between “individual” and “person” is useful in discerning how traditional Muslim religious scholars represent their social roles. “Individual” refers to the mortal human being, the object of observation and self-reflection. Thus individuals can wield considerable power and still not be recognized as playing a significant or legitimate social role. “Person” refers to the cultural concepts that lend social significance to the individual. Personhood can be regarded as a status that “varies according to social criteria which contain the capacities of the individual within defined roles and categories.”[13] The notion of “person,” to paraphrase Jean La Fontaine, is society’s confirmation that an individual’s identity has social significance.

The roles and categories of the person are defined by society. As Marcel Mauss reminds us, persona in ancient Rome was literally a person’s social mask, a locus of general rights and duties. In clan-based societies, such as ancient Rome, the role of the person was to act out “the prefigured totality of the life of the clan,” allowing very little room for individuality.[14] Mauss’s distinction between individual—he used the term “self”—and person contains an evolutionary assumption: the rise of Christianity saw the emergence of the “moral person,” a growing fusion between the person in the sense of social roles and masks and the self as a conscious, metaphysical entity. He argues that other societies, including such “ancient” (and in his view static) civilizations as India and China, possessed fixed categories of person that ceased to evolve.[15]

Orientalist scholars attributed to Muslim societies a similar fixed nature, of which one component was men of learning with less autonomy and personal responsibility than their counterparts in Western societies. Yet, from the beginning of Islam in seventh-century Arabia, Muslim doctrine has stressed personal responsibility and autonomy. The Qur’anic vision of personGod relations is devoid of intermediaries, although many seventh-century sources depict a tension between Qur’anic notions of person and other ones. The historian al-Tabari (d. 923), for example, relates that a member of the B. Rabi'a tribal confederation posed several questions to Musaylima bin Habib, a B. Rabi'a rival of Muhammad. After questioning Musaylima, the tribesman concluded “that Muhammad is telling the truth. But a liar of the Rabi[c]a is better for us than a true prophet of the Mudar.” (A more skeptical version of the same account is, “A liar of the Rabi[c]a is better than a liar of the Mudar.”)[16] In both versions, loyalty to the collectivity takes precedence over the obligation of the individual to God. We shall return to the issue of the coexistence of competing notions of person and individual and to situations in which only some individuals can realize a full sense of person.

The emergence of the self as an explicit subject in biographies and autobiographies has been an important element of Western social thought since the eighteenth century. Indeed, the idea of the self, a conscious and self-reflexive “me” or “I” possessing individuality and an “inner” life, is so integral to modern European thought that it is considered a natural part of the social landscape.

 Tar jamas

A tarjama is generally written in the third person, even if autobiographical, suggesting a distancing from self, an appeal to set standards and understandings. The components include a genealogy, an account of formal education and Qur’anic memorization, a list of teachers (often including close relatives, which indicates family support for religious learning), the books and subjects studied, and selections from the subject’s poetry, aphorisms, or other contributions to learning. Dates are provided whenever possible, since the ability to date events distinguishes the traditionally educated from the unlearned.

Tarjamas purport to represent words and deeds reliably and with credible witnesses. Quotation marks are not used, and the stylistic tag, “he said to him” {qal lu), does not clearly distinguish between speech and paraphrase. The tarjama records the evidence of a person’s character and actions; it contains no speculation concerning “inner” self or motive other than anecdotes that demonstrate piety and devotion to Qur’anic studies.

These accounts record the persona of men of learning, the actions and attributes that legitimate their piety and scholarly authority. Other activities, no matter how significant for understanding the role of the individual, are not part of the reported scholarly persona. Marriages are not mentioned, and women are mentioned only when they encourage Qur’anic memorization and recital. In most instances, the family contexts in which early learning occurs cannot be directly ascertained from a tarjama unless the father or other relatives play a direct role in Qur’anic education.[17] Likewise, peer learning, a crucial element in understanding traditional education, is passed over in silence. The same is true for many political activities. Men of learning may be landlords, politicians, and shrewd entrepreneurs, but these activities are outside the scope of the tarjama, which concentrates on those elements of personhood that link individuals with the sacred center of society, as viewed in religious terms.

There have always been alternative forms of biography and self-representation, ranging from rhe life of the Prophet (sirat) and the chronicles of caliphs and rulers to the lives and miracles of saints, pilgrimage accounts, and, since at least the early nineteenth century, memoirs influenced by the Western genre. The third-person representation of Taha Husayn's autobiographical The Stream of Days, sometimes assumed to be a realistic image of an Egyptian childhood and mosque-school education, is influenced by European literary forms, as is Algerian Malek Ben- nabi's Memoires d'un temoih du siecle.[18] The Moroccan Allal al-Fasi (d. 1974), a popular lecturer at the Qarawiyin mosqueuniversity in Fez in the early 1930s and subsequently a key leader in the nationalist movement, spoke only Arabic, yet the style of his autobiographical writings suggests the influence of forms beyond those of the Qarawiyin.[19]

Tarjamas represent religious scholars to specific, known audiences. Indeed, for a younger generation with a "modern" education, the term tarjama and the form of religious authority it represents often go unrecognized.[20] Until the availability of printing in the nineteenth century for Morocco and the 1970s for the Omani interior, tarjamas circulated only in manuscript form; access to them depended on networks of ulama. Even after the introduction of printing, tarjamas continued to circulate in this form. The compilation of Mukhtar al-Susi cited above circulated for at least two decades prior to its publication in 1961; in Oman several compilations continue to circulate only as manuscripts.

There are several points of resemblance between tarjamas in Oman and Morocco. In both tarjama traditions, genealogies link men of learning with their distinguished ancestors, and the enumeration of scholars under whom the subjects studied does the same for their claims to scholarly authority.

Selections from the subjects’ sayings and actions exemplify character, lists of distinguished students represent their continued authority, and the sayings of associates who admire them enhance authority.

Tarjamas are not ordered by a chronological sequence of events, although genealogical descent and the details of early studies usually come first. Anecdotes intended to show character do not distinguish between youth or maturity. Because the personas of men of learning are linked to fixed qualities, sequence and chronology become peripheral. Indeed, the material chosen for the tarjamas analyzed here suggests that the primary audience is contemporary and not an abstract, generalized audience of future generations.

* The Maghrib

In Morocco as in Oman, it is difficult to separate a tarjama from its intended audience. A tarjama is almost always prepared in response to a specific request, often for inclusion in one of the compilations that reveal complex, mutually supportive networks of patronage among men of learning. Mukhtar as-Susi’s al-Ma[c]sul portrays judges, court functionaries, teachers, and others with claims to learning as regularly offering hospitality and gifts to writers of such compendia, to poets, and to others who could enhance their reputations.

The three Moroccan tar jamas discussed here indicate significant situational differences, although they share the problem of reconciling Muslim identity with participation in colonial rule. The ulama discussed in two of these tarjamas are brothers, Ahmad Mansuri (1895-1975) and Abd al-Rahman Mansuri (b. 1912), from Bzu, a Berber village not far from Marrakesh. The third tarjama is by a former chief judge of Tangier, Ahmad bin Abd al-Salam al-Bu Ayyashi (1910-83).[21]

The Mansuri brothers’ tar jamas lack specific genealogies; neither brother goes further back than their paternal grandfather. In the late nineteenth century, their father, Mansur bin Ahmad (d. 1946), fled from a village in the High Atlas Mountains because an intertribal dispute threatened his life. He settled in Bzu and attained a quasimaraboutic status among local tribespeople. He was a notary, a devout member of the Kitta- niya religious order, and by the early twentieth century a minor landowner. 'Abd al-Rahman relates various popular accounts of his father’s piety and the efforts of some genealogical “specialists” who approached the brothers in the 1930s, when their reputations as notables were secure, with “evidence” of their descent from the Prophet Muhammad. None of this information appears in the tarjamas, although the tarjamas of other scholars characteristically make such claims. Not doing so was a means of indicating participation in the reform movements of the early twentieth century. Both brothers emphasize their credentials as men of learning over status based on descent.

* Ahmad Mansuri

Ahmad Mansuri’s tarjama describes his schooling (from 1913 to 1919). He names his teachers, specifies where he studied (a tent school in a hamlet near Bzu and the Yusufiya mosque-university in Marrakesh), and cites the texts memorized or commented on. He mentions his brief teaching career in Bzu, but not his financial support for students from the Bzu region to continue their religious studies at the Yusufiya.

In 1919 the French native affairs officer for the Bzu region asked Ahmad to assist in the “pacification” of the Ait 'Tab, a large tribe in an adjacent region. Ahmad also assisted in establishing the region’s first agricultural tax (tartib). His tarjama records these facets of his career, commenting only that he cooperated with the French to avoid unnecessary bloodshed. He omits the protectorate’s award of a medal for bravery, the Ouis- sam al-Harb.

French authorities again requested Ahmad’s assistance in 1925 in Azilal, a nearby regional center. When he returned to Bzu at the end of the year, he was appointed qadi, a post he held until 1953 when he was removed for his refusal to recognize the French deposition and exile of Sultan Muhammad V. Ahmad’s tarjama records that a French native affairs officer, who had known him from earlier years, intervened to prevent confiscation of his property and a prison sentence, the fate of other notables who opposed the deposition. In the tumultuous years tollowing independence in 1956, Ahmad briefly served as both qadi (in 1956 and 1957) and district officer, or qa’id (1956). Later he was appointed to the prestigious Constitutional Council (1 960) and won election to Morocco’s first parliament (1963).

Qadi Ahmad’s correct relations with French authorities, although by no means deferential or obsequious, figure in his tarjama. Cooperation is justified in the “heroic” years of colonial “penetration” as a matter of avoiding greater collective harm; thereafter it is noted as an activity that the French obliged him to do, and he is thus freed of personal responsibility.

Abd al-Rahman Mansur 1

The tarjama of Abd al-Rahman, Qadi Ahmad’s younger brother, places emphasis on his education rather than on his judicial career. He memorized the Qur’an (completed “when he was aged twelve to fifteen”) and studied at tent schools near Bzu and Azilal, where, like his elder brother, he first learned Arabic. He studied in Azilal in 1925 when his brother was there assisting the French. The tarjama records Ahmad’s presence in Azilal as a clerk (katib).

Abd al-Rah man’s tar jama ends in April 1935, when he was compelled to break off his studies and return to Bzu to serve as his brother’s deputy in order to prevent the unpaid post from going to an outsider. A separate diary, kept intermittently from his return to Bzu until his 1957 appointment as qadi in Boujad, provides a record of events after 1935. (Some parts of the diary were destroyed to avoid arrest in the final years of the French protectorate.) The diary records marriages, property titles related to the Mansuri brothers, lists of wedding guests, the visits of notables and men of learning to Bzu, the prices and availability of foodstuffs and commodities during the 1940s, droughts, epidemics, French regulations and exactions, and the Allied invasion.

The events in the diary, unlike events recorded in the tarjama, were outside Abd al-Rahman’s public persona as a man of learning. Even the act of recording was problematic. As he explained, such things were best passed by word of mouth among trusted confidants, through chains of known, reliable witnesses, and written about only in obscure language to avoid political complications; for politics, oral sources were more reliable than written ones, and the oral tradition shared by men of learning provides the background necessary to understand the significance of such events.

* A Nationalist Judge

Ahmad al-Bu Ayyashi’s tarjama shows a developed awareness of alternative literary forms. He published, at his own expense, a history of Abd al-Krim al-Khattabi’s Rifian revolt (1923—27) and a play, never performed, on the nationalist struggle. Bu Ayyashi’s father was tribal leader of the Bani Waryajil until his death in 1946 and minister of defense in Abd al- Krim al-Khattabi’s Rifian Republic.

The genealogical section of Bu Ayyashi’s tarjama begins with a discussion of the proper name in Arabic for the Bani Waryajil (Ait Waryaghar in Rifian Berber), and he opts for Arabic on the grounds that the tribe was an “early” adherent to Islam. He traces his descent from Musa bin Haddu, a twelfth-century marabout from the Bani Ayyash, the subgroup that provided leadership for the Bani Waryajil for several centuries. Because Bu Ayyashi emphasizes the Bani Ayyash’s role in the struggle against colonial rule, his genealogy cites his twelfth-century maraboutic ancestor and skips directly to his paternal grandfather (d. 1900 or 1901), ruler (hakim) of the tribe, a pious man who applied much of his “vast” wealth to rearm his tribe for resistance to Spanish rule. Bu Ayyashi then discusses his father’s role in the Rifian Republic.

Bu Ayyashi’s account of his early studies is perfunctory. He includes his stay at the Qarawiyin mosque-university in Fez from 1929 to 1936 but mentions only teachers who became important in the nationalist movement, tutored Morocco’s present monarch, or became senior officials after independence. The subjects he studied are mentioned generally, and no specific texts are cited. In 1936 he went on the pilgrimage as part of a quasi-official Moroccan delegation carrying a message from Sultan Muhammad V to Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud. The delegation was led by one of Bu Ayyashi’s teachers, a former minister of justice in Morocco’s French zone, who was dismissed by the French in 1930 for opposing the “Berber decree” that restricted the application of Islamic law in Morocco’s Berber regions.

Bu Ayyashi’s tarjama is more elaborate in citing connections to persons in the nationalist movement than to those noted for their learning. As in Ahmad Mansuri’s case, he records as an event beyond his control his appointment by the Spanish as Bani Waryajil qadi. After the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, colonial authorities imprisoned Bu Ayyashi’s father as a guarantee for his tribe’s good conduct and his own return from Fez, as well as to forestall renewed anti-Spanish violence. Bu 'Ayyashi claims that his work as a qadi insulated him from collaboration. He describes his relationship to Spanish authorities as that of “old adversaries who have spent considerable time together.” In 1939, he became a member of the Council for Higher Education in Tetouan, capital of the former Spanish zone, and when the zone was incorporated into independent Morocco in early 1957, he served briefly as a regional administrator (qcfid mumtaz) in the ministry of the interior. He felt uncomfortable in an explicitly political role, however, and requested a transfer to the ministry of justice, where he served as a criminal court judge until his retirement in 1976.

Bu Ayyashi details his activities in the late 1940s and early 19 5 os, when the nationalist movement acquired popular momentum, as characterized by bureaucratic infighting with colonial authorities, internal disputes among pronationalist Bani Waryajil lineages and their opposition, and the difficulties of openly supporting the nationalist movement and functioning as qadi at the same time. In interviews, although not in the tarjama, he said that he reconciled these roles by speaking publicly in a way that could be read as nationalist by the nationalists but remained sufficiently ambiguous so that Spanish authorities could not document opposition to their authority. The tarjama provides extracts from these speeches.

* Oman and the Ibadiyya

There are major differences in scale between Morocco and Oman. Oman’s current population is just over a million, of which some 20 percent are foreign workers, while Morocco’s population is over twenty-four million. Morocco’s most important economic transformations have occurred gradually since the early part of the century; for Oman the most crucial period has been occasioned by the intensified search for oil in the early 1950s, its discovery in commercial quantities in 1964, its export beginning in 1967, and the 1970 palace coup, which saw the application of oil revenues to education, security, and development projects. Moroccan Muslims are all Sunni and follow the Maliki legal school; Omanis are more diverse.

Oman’s pluralism offers a contrast to nonsectarian Morocco. Almost all Omani nationals are Muslim (although a handful of Hindu merchants with ties to the palace have been granted Omani citizenship), but there are important sectarian distinctions among the Muslim population. The Ibadiyya account for 40-45 percent of Oman’s citizen population and predominate in the mountainous northern interior of the country. From 1913 to 1955, the Ibadi tribes of the interior broke away from rule by the Al Bu Sa[c]id dynasty and were autonomously governed by an imam selected by men of learning and tribal leaders. Sunni Muslims form a majority on the coast and in the southern region of Dhufar, where they constitute 50—55 percent of the population. However, significant distinctions exist between the Sunni of the north and those of the south. Men of learning in the south form an almost hereditary stratum of society, as was the case for the Hadramawt region of southern Yemen, where Dhufar’s Sunni men of learning received their religious training until the 1960s when political turbulence severed this line of communication. Finally, the Shi'a, constituting less than 3 percent of Oman’s population, are concentrated in the large coastal cities, including Suhar and Muscat. Added to this complexity is the fact that religious divisions in the coastal regions are crosscut linguistically and ethnically, with Sindi, Baluch, and Persian being the principal non-Arabic languages of northern Oman.

Men of learning in each community are seldom in regular contact with their counterparts in other sectarian groups. Until the early 1960s the intellectual ties of Dhufar’s men of learning were with southern Yemen and not with their northern Omani counterparts. A further contributing factor was that Oman's ruler until 1970, Sa[c]id bin Taymur, discouraged internal travel. The Sunni community in the north also looks outside of Oman. In Musandam Peninsula, the dominant lineage of the Kamali- yin has produced the leading religious scholars for generations. The post of qadi in Musandam's principal town, Khassab, has been held by a Kamali since at least the early part of this century, and other members of the lineage hold religious appointments in Kuwait and Abu Dhabi. The present qadi in Khassab, who succeeded his father in 1932., studied at a religious school on the Iranian island of Qeshem, located directly north of the Straits of Hormuz. Until the Iranian revolution, Qeshem and the mainland Iranian town of Lengeh were centers of learning for the Sunni (Shafi[c]i, to be precise), Arabic-speaking Muslims of the Gulf region, and they drew students from as far away as India. As of 1980 about seventy students remained there, most of the students leaving for Dubai after the outbreak of the Iran-

Iraq war. Elsewhere in coastal Oman, there is a similar external orientation among the Sunni community, at least for traditional religious studies. Family ties and links with centers of learning allow them considerable mobility but attenuate communication among different sectarian groups within Oman itself.

The same tendency toward autonomy prevails among Oman's Shi'a. One example is the religious leader of one of the coastal Arabic-speaking Shi[c]a communities. The son of a wealthy landowner (who, the son said, would have been called a "feudalist" had he been an Iraqi), this shaykh studied in Najaf, Iraq, from 1969 until 1973 under Shaykh Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (executed by the Iraqi government in 1980) and subsequently in Qum, where he remained until political disturbances forced him to break off his studies.[22] Well read and articulate, this shaykh nonetheless indicated little direct knowledge of religious leaders in other sectarian groups except for those in his immediate locale.

Only Ibadi networks of learning are centered on Oman itself. Although there are Ibadi communities elsewhere in the world, the Ibadi of Oman have, for all practical purposes, been isolated from them. Prior to 1970, regular links were maintained only with the Ibadiyya of East Africa, most of whom are of Omani origin.

Until the 1960s, literacy in the Omani interior implied religious learning and was widely respected, although its practical use as a means to economic or social advancement was limited. In principle, Qur'anic and higher education was open to all, but in practice, regular participation was difficult without the support of relatives already familiar with the world of learning. Acquiring a reputation as a man of learning entailed sponsorship, and rhetorical skills could not be derived solely from the study of religious texts. Thus, scholars who were part of the tribal oligarchy or sponsored by it had a competitive advantage. Leading shaykhs conducted lesson circles, visited, challenged one another in poetry and aphorisms, and circulated manuscripts among themselves (and because manuscripts were copied by hand, considerable time and expense were involved in obtaining and commissioning copies; thus access was controlled and restricted). Reading was not an anonymous, solitary act, since religious manuscripts were usually read and commented on in small gatherings of men of learning.

Hamra' al-[c]Abriyin, a tribal capital of the interior (not far from the old imamate capital of Nizwa), provides an example of the uses of literacy in the pre-19 70 Omani interior. In the 1940s, the town had a population of 1,200. Of this number, one scholar possessed a country-wide reputation for learning. About thirty other individuals, most of them members of the shaykhly lineage that provided the tribal leadership, also possessed high levels of literacy. Yet no more than five of the thirty knew the conventions of Islamic law pertaining to inheritance, land transactions, and marriage well enough to prepare appropriate documents. Another fifty townspeople were able to read and write, in addition to being able to recite the Qur'an. Except for the Qur'an, a few standard religious texts, and the manuscripts that passed among the leading men of learning, virtually no books were available.

As in Morocco, a reputation as a man of learning was achieved primarily by word of mouth, since the small scale of society limited the scope for what had to be said in writing. No men of learning in the nineteenth- or twentieth-century Omani interior possessed formal written credentials, such as the ijazas that were common in Morocco and other parts of the Muslim world. In the small-scale society of the imamate, the number of men of learning was in the hundreds, and far fewer if only the upper ranks are considered.

The form taken by contemporary Lbadi tarjamas is indicated by a manuscript by Shaykh Ibrahim Sa'id al-Abri (d. 1975) on the history of the Abriyin tribe, prepared at the request of a leading man of learning of the interior who sought similar accounts from the learned men of other tribes.[23] Shaykh Ibrahim, like his counterparts elsewhere in the northern interior, was both a religious scholar and a man of action. He claims to have been responsible for persuading Muhammad ibn Abd Allah al- Khalili to accept leadership as imam in 1920, a title he held until his death in 1954. For a number of years, Shaykh Ibrahim was both qadi and tribal leader of the Abriyin, as well as a counselor of the imam. He also found time to teach almost daily. After 1937 he became qadi for the sultan, dividing his time between the sultanate and the imamate. After the 1970 coup that brought the son of the former ruler to power, Shaykh Ibrahim became Oman’s first mufti, or official interpreter of Islamic jurisprudence.

Shaykh Ibrahim’s manuscript spans four-hundred years of tribal history. The older sections are largely taken from earlier treatises, but Shaykn Ibrahim is clearly responsible for much of the nineteenth- and twentieth-century material. The account sometimes incorporates letters and other documents, which are not always ordered by chronology. The mention of a place associated with an early tribal migration prompts the inclusion of a famous poem recited there in his youth (e.g., p. 12), and a request that Shaykh Ibrahim write a tarjama of the father of a man of learning occasions Ibrahim’s spirited refutation (using “I” for the only time in the manuscript) of charges that he defied the authority of the imam during a tribal dispute of the 1930s (pp. 111-33).

Genealogical links in a small-scale society like the Omani interior were public and widely known, so there was much less latitude in this region as compared to Morocco for reinventing the past. Men of learning were aware of the complex links of descent and alliance both within and between tribes.

Ordinary tribespeople, although generally unable to express these links in great detail, knew their general outlines. These matters were decidedly important for tarjamas. Although men of learning were expected to rise above tribal loyalties in the service of the imam (for the pre-195 5 period), in practice they acted on behalf of their tribes or were suspected of doing so. Accusations by Shaykh Ibrahim's detractors that he defied the imam, mentioned above, suggest the tensions inherent in the two roles.

Shaykh Ibrahim also includes the tarjama of his teacher and close relative, Shaykh Majid bin Khamis (d. ioz8). Maiid's early Qur'anic studies are mentioned in detail, as is his support for the nineteenth-century imamate of Azzan ibn Qays (186871), during which he was appointed governor of the neighboring town of Bahia. This appointment involved him in organizing and directing tribal levies. Historical elements in Shaykh Majid's tarjama are interspersed with vignettes of personality and deeds—the construction of mosques, poetry, a list of scholars who studied under him, and his views on such topics as graveside Qur'anic readings, the sale of pious foundation land (tuaqf) to finance the imamate, innovations in almsgiving (zakat), and proper forms of prayer. The account at times verges on hagiography: Majid brought rain and reinvigorated the land wherever he went, divined water, healed a broken hand by touching it with the leaf from a tree in a region devoid of trees, and tamed a bull that had broken loose from its tether. Shaykh Ibrahim also records that "some say" that after Shaykh Majid's death there was a light and two green birds, "perhaps angels," over Shaykh Majid's grave (p. 182). Shaykh Majid's participation in the selection of the first two twentieth-century imams (1913 and 1920) is recorded, as is the blindness of his last years.

The other tarjamas incorporated into Shaykh Ibrahim's history contain many of the same elements, although they lack the hagiographic anecdotes. Ibadi tarjamas are more specifically grounded in political history than are their Moroccan counterparts, primarily because men of learning in Oman are closely identified with their tribes and, until the end of the imamate in 1955, acted politically on behalf of their tribes and the imam. And since the framework of political events is already known, Omani tarjamas focus on actions that favor the subject. Thus Shaykh Majid's tarjama recounts how in 1871, when he abandoned the cause of an imamate restoration just before its defeat, he opened the Qur'an and happened on a verse that indicated to him that God willed him and his retainers to slip out of the Bahia fortress at night rather than to remain to defend it against a more powerful enemy (p. 138). The action described is manifest, the motivation divinely inspired and not the result of individual choice.

Shaykh Ibrahim avoids certain topics—Saudi efforts to subvert the tribal leaders and ulama of the interior in the early 1950s, attitudes toward incorporation into the rule of the sultanate beginning in 1955, and the 1957 rebellion against sultanate rule. In a brief passage, Shaykh Ibrahim dryly writes that “hearts changed,” and the Omani interior “all” went to the sultan: “There is no need for me to say what happened next” (p. 134). Indeed, if one is writing for an audience of contemporaries familiar with events and with what is not said, further elaboration is unnecessary.[24]

 Conclusion

This essay shows the variation among Muslim societies in representing the lives of traditional men of learning. In spite of the common appeal to fixed and generalized elements, the representations in tarjamas differ according to social and political contexts and over time. Tarjamas are not a self-contained genre: they are intended for known audiences with access to additional, usually word-of-mouth, traditions complementing those of the tarjama.

It might be argued that there is a vast difference between the exemplars discussed here, drawn from the antipodes of the Arab Muslim world, and the persona of ulama contained, for example, in the biographical dictionaries of “classical” Islam, works that were intended presumably for a transregional network of men of learning. The tarjamas of such compendia should not be given a privileged position simply because their abstract and standardized nature make them appear more selfcontained. They merely point to the persona sustained in contexts significantly different from those of nineteenth- and twentieth-century men of learning or, for that matter, those of other times and places in the “premodern” period.

Tarjamas select from the activities of learned individuals those elements that fit the prevailing cultural profile for men of learning. This process is a highly selective one, as only a limited number of individuals in Muslim societies can aspire to the persona of traditional men of learning. In the past, individuals could achieve full personhood on the basis of attributes other than learning, such as tribal leadership or royal authority, but full personhood is still confined to a limited number of individuals. In both Morocco and Oman, a distinction is made between “elite” (nas khassa or mcfrufin) and “commoners” (al-[c]awam), terms that distinguish between those who have reputations as men of learning and those who do not.

Until the late 1950s, a claim to family names going back multiple generations—one means of defining personhood and distinction from others—was confined to families of the elite and to learned persons. In Morocco, where religious roles were fluid, men of learning were sometimes considered to have saintly, or maraboutic, powers. Such powers could exist independent of religious knowledge. (The term salih [pious one] in Morocco can refer to a reputation based on various combinations of piety, learning, descent, mysticism, miraculous deeds, and maraboutic powers, and the weight given to these attributes has varied over time.) Thus in the 1930s, the Mansuri brothers found assistance in “discovering” their antecedents, but their preference was to emphasize the achieved status of learning over the ascribed one of descent. In 1919 the brothers’ father was regarded locally as a salih, an attribute on which Ahmad Mansuri capitalized in arranging for the first French agricultural tax, collected in kind, to be delivered to his father’s house. Tribespeople thought the tax was religiously sanctioned, and armed resistance to the French innovation was thereby avoided. Significantly, Ahmad’s clever initiative is not recorded in his tarjama.

For the Mansuri brothers, as for Bu Ayyashi, distinguished descent is asserted but not explicitly demonstrated. Since their claims were widely recognized and unchallenged, there was no need to do so. The size of the community of men of learning in Morocco allowed considerable latitude for presenting and inventing such ties, but by and large, specific claims to descent, although still important, no longer carried the political and social privileges of earlier eras.[25] Bu Ayyashi’s principal concern is to demonstrate his affinities with the nationalist movement,[26] and in doing so, he conveys the persona of the man of learning in the service of legitimate authority . For the Mansuri brothers, legitimate authority is the monarch. When the monarch acquiesced to French tutelage, so did the Mansuris; when the monarch opposed the French, so did they.

There is less latitude in Oman for expressing status and social location, for individuals are clearly located within specific frameworks of tribal identity. There is a greater expectation in Oman that a man of learning also be a man of action because of the closer links to tribal identity, in which the man of learning must balance his personas as one of the ulama and a responsible member of a tribal oligarchy. The latter identity, although not specifically Islamic, is implicit in the structure of the tarjama itself. One is expected to defend tribal interests, but in such a way as to advocate only those actions that can be justified in Islamic terms. Men of learning continue to show that their personas fulfill generalized, fixed principles, but the content of the principles and the choice of emphasis among them can vary considerably.

One remaining issue is how the self-representation of traditional men of learning is perceived by a younger generation, the product of an education different in form and emphasis from that of Qur’anic schools and mosque-universities and accessible to a much larger proportion of the school-age population. Modern education has broken the earlier ties between men of learning and the communities of which they were a part. In both Morocco and Oman, the older generation and many of the educated young share the expectation that political authority is legitimated or delegitimated in accord with divine law, although there is a difference of interpretation as to how this is done. The rulers of Morocco and Oman continue to regard the public expressions of legitimation from traditional men of learning as an important component of political legitimacy. Another legitimizing element is the rulers’ ability to bring material progress and “development” to their subjects. For a younger generation, there is greater recognition of alternative interpreters of “what is Islamic” who are not legitimated by knowledge of a specific body of texts or by their predecessors. Indeed, the religious-minded can make such decisions for themselves.

The consequences for conceptions of self and person are as follows: In the past, few individuals could aspire to the persona of a man of learning, as expressed in tarjamas, Now the persona of the sincere, religious-minded believer has become more important and in some dimensions can recapture the early Islamic sense of personal responsibility mediated by only a few privileged interpreters of Islamic doctrine. Concepts of the [c]alim as a person are embedded in particular social contexts, and the way in which individuals achieve full personhood is much more open than in the past, including conceptions of religious knowledge not dependent on the forms exemplified in the tarjama. The persona of the tarjama is not so much attacked as displaced. As men of learning themselves possess qualities and attributes ranging beyond those signaled in tarjamas, many individuals take part in this quiet transformation of forms of valued religious knowledge and the social roles of their carriers.

 3. Autobiography and Biography in the Middle East: A Plea for Psychopolitical Studies

Marvin Zonis

In an important article, Karl J. Weintraub distinguishes autobiography from memoirs, diaries, and other works by and about the self.

Autobiography adheres more closely to the true potential of the genre the more its real subject matter is character, personality, self-conception—all those difficult-to-define matters which ultimately determine the inner coherence and meaning of life. Real autobiography is a weave in which self-consciousness is delicately threaded throughout interrelated experience. It may have such varied functions as self-explication, self-discovery, self-clarification, selfformation, self-presentation, self-justification. All these functions interpenetrate easily but all are centered upon an aware self aware of its relation to its experiences.[27]

Weintraub refers to the existence of an “autobiographic instinct” and urges the study of autobiography as the means best suited to revealing “the developing self-conceptions of Western men.”[28] It is appropriate that he refers to “Western men” inasmuch as his examples are drawn entirely from the literature of Europe. Reviewing the output of such literature in the Arabic-, Persian-, and Turkish-speaking worlds, one would have to conclude that such an “instinct” is largely confined to Westerners and is not part of the constitution of those from the Middle East.[29] Those works from the region that achieve the “true potential of the genre” are few in number, limiting the utility of autobiography for illuminating Middle Eastern conceptions of the self.[30]

But not only is autobiography generally lacking: biographies, indigenous to the region, are also in relatively short supply.[31] The most obvious explanation for the paucity of these genres, even in the contemporary Middle East, appears to be that the concept of the individual human life as well as the “development” of that life over the course of the individual life cycle are profoundly different from such conceptions in the West.

Weintraub suggests why the genre of autobiography came to be common in the West:

It is the intent of this paper to argue the thesis that the autobiographic genre took on its full dimension and richness when Western Man acquired a thoroughly historical understanding of his existence. Autobiography assumes a significant cultural function around a.d. 1800. The growing significance of autobiography is thus a part of that great intellectual revolution marked by the emergence of the particular modern form of historical mindedness we call historism or historicism.[32]

That particular sensibility, Abdallah Laroui has made powerfully clear, has yet to grip the Middle East.[33] Historicism is the commitment to an understanding of a phenomenon as rooted in particular contexts that change over time with the result that the phenomenon itself may change. That commitment is not yet thoroughly subsumed within the culture of the Middle East. It is no wonder, then, that autobiography and biography are not yet part of the genres of literature in the Middle East. Both genres depend on the willingness to see a human life as a coherent whole with a history rooted in a variety of social, cultural, economic, and political contexts, where it is both possible and meaningful to assign, retrospectively, significance to the subject's life experiences and to the entire lived life. In the absence of a willingness and a capacity to understand a life in that way, the production of autobiography and biography will be limited. In their stead will be other related genres, such as memoirs, diaries, travelogues, and even lyrical poetry. These genres are similar to autobiography and biography in that they focus on the experiences of the author or subject. They differ in that they do not attempt an integration of those experiences to fashion an account of a lived life. Genres that focus on discrete lived experiences are common in the Middle East.

To be sure, more than one factor works against the production of autobiography and biography in the Middle East. Like all significant phenomena, the paucity of these genres is overdetermined. The absence of historicism is one contributing factor. But in addition, differential cultural emphases regarding the nature and meaning of the individual also reduce their incidence. It has been widely noted that concepts of the individual and individualism assume different dimensions in Middle Eastern and in Western cultures. Communal values are more widely cherished in the Middle East. The well-being of the community, even at the expense of the well-being of the individual (although there is certainly no necessary trade-off), is more highly valued in the Middle East than in the West. It could, in fact, be argued that if the three paramount values of Western society are liberty, equality, and fraternity, only fraternity is central to the value structure of the Middle East. The centrality of the value of community over individuality and individualism works against the production of both autobiography and biography, for that value lessens the need for the critical scrutiny of the individual life and the attempt to organize a life history into a coherent point of view and life pattern.

Thus both the absence of a sense of historicism and the relative underemphasis on the life of the individual in comparison with the group reduce the propensity for persons steeped in Middle Eastern culture to produce autobiographies and biographies. Not surprisingly, therefore, most such works written about the lives of Middle Easterners have been written by members of the intelligentsia who have been Westernized, most often those who have been educated in the West. Or, in many cases, they have been written by Westerners themselves.

The relative absence of autobiographies deprives investigators of the Middle East, both Western and Middle Eastern scholars, of the opportunity to examine first-person data on the life course as it is lived in the Middle East. In addition, the absence of autobiographies deprives investigators of insights into the shared principles by which individuals come to understand and make sense of their lives. This is because an autobiography is a retrospective reordering of one's life experiences on the basis of one's viewpoints and understandings held at the time of the reconstruction, not at the time of the lived experiences. As Weintraub suggests,

When the autobiographer has gained the firm vantage point from which the full retrospective view on life can be had, he imposes on the past the order of the present. The fact once in the making can now be seen together with the fact in its result. By this superimposition of the completed fact, the fact in the making acquires a meaning it did not possess before. The meaning of the past is intelligible and meaningful in terms of the present understanding; it is thus with all historical understanding.[34]

The value of autobiography as a source of insight into the nature of the lived life in the Middle East rests on the author's understanding of the past at the moment of authorship. Aside from completely idiosyncratic understandings of the past, the kind produced by those adjudged eccentric—geniuses or mad- persons—such understandings are part of the cultural repertoire of the author. They have been produced by that culture or been borrowed from other cultures, but they must be in the cultural repertoire of the author in order to be available for generating the understanding of the lived life. Thus, autobiography gives insights not only into how lives are lived but also into the organizing principles that inform the culture in which the autobiography is produced. Indeed, these two components are difficult to untangle.

But it is not only autobiography that provides investigators with insights into these phenomena. Biography is an equally rich source. Whether producing work about oneself or about another, the process elicits information about two central issues: the lived life and the principles for organizing an account of that life.

Insofar as these organizing principles are derived from Western culture, they will provide little insight into the ways in which Middle Easterners understand their own lives. This does not mean that Middle Easterners are better than Westerners at making sense of a life lived within a Middle Eastern culture. It is simply that Middle Eastern organizing principles can help us understand how Middle Easterners understand their own lives.

When that is not central to the investigation—and for most purposes I think it is largely irrelevant to the investigation— then there is no privileged status for either the autobiographer or the biographer from the Middle East. Western concepts can be as useful, if not more so, for assigning meaning and significance as concepts indigenous to the culture in which the life is lived.

Four recent extraordinary biographies of Middle Eastern figures have been produced, none by Middle Easterners.[35] They constitute the four most important biographies of modern Middle Eastern lives ever written. Fouad Ajami, Vincent Cra- panzano, Roy Mottahedeh, and Vamik Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz, the authors of these works, came to their tasks with formidable credentials. All are deeply steeped in the cultures of the Middle East. They were born into Middle Eastern families or grew up in the region or had long residence there. In addition, three of the authors have had extensive psychoanalytic training, which has helped them to grasp the workings of the minds of their subjects and to produce sensitive yet powerful biographical treatments.

The four works seek to achieve somewhat different purposes: more or less political in focus, more or less interested in the psychological dimensions of their subjects, more or less attempting to learn of the intellectual, social, and political milieus in which their subjects were acculturated and which, in turn, were influenced by their subjects. But all four seek to “know the individuality of another,” even if, as Crapanzano (quoting from Georg Simmel) reminds us, this knowledge is ultimately unobtainable.[36] Nevertheless, these studies are as successful in achieving that goal as any nonfiction work ever published about the lives of individuals from the Turkish, Arab, and Persian cultural worlds.

Two of the four works are explicitly nonpsychological. Mot- tahedeh strives to place his Shi[c]ite cleric within the context of contemporary Iranian culture and Shi'ite experience. In the sense that the author strives to say something of general significance about the place of Shi'ism in present-day Iran and the ways in which members of the Shi'ite intelligentsia come to terms with the world, the biography is more appropriately cultural and intellectual than psychological. Ajami’s work on Musa al-Sadr can be understood in the same way. The story of the vanished imam is meant to do more than tell us of the life and death of a Shi'ite leader. It is also meant to account for the political power of Musa al-Sadr and the unusual links between him and his followers, which are at least partially explicable by the ways in which Musa al-Sadr embodied the principal myths of Shi'ism in his life and his disappearance. Ajami’s work is also not psychological in any systematic sense.

The other two works are self-consciously psychological. Cra- panzano attempts to present a psychological portrait of Tuhami through a flow of words that represent for his subject the “verbal objectification of the tension between ‘reality’ and desire structures by the author.”[37] Volkan and Itzkowitz strive to present a psychological portrait of Ataturk that will allow the reader to gain access to his inner psychological processes and understand how his political actions spoke to his character structure.

Although all four studies—psychological or not—are successful as different types of biographies, they are less successful in illuminating the political lives of their subjects. Of the four works, Tuhami is the least committed to political investigation. Yet the book contains fascinating insights into significant aspects of political power in Morocco. Crapanzano, through Tuhami, helps us understand the role of the king in Moroccan society.[38] He also illuminates the nature of the power relationship between leader and follower by explicating the role of dependency. He illustrates the crucial role of power and domination in interpersonal relationships, including those that are not ostensibly political. He speaks, as well, of the ways in which power is accumulated and preserved. Attributions of baraka (divine grace), for example, are significant components of a power base, but it is finally the doing of deeds that makes saints powerful in the eyes of their devotees. Ironically, then, the biography that is the least oriented toward politics is rich with insights for use by students of politics in the Middle East.

The remaining works, although explicitly oriented to politics, suffer to a greater or lesser degree from their failure to focus on the intersection of psychological and political processes. As has already been noted, neither Ajami nor Motta- hedeh take up the challenge of combining political with psychological investigation. Only Volkan and Itzkowitz meet that challenge. The basic narrative of the Volkan and Itzkowitz psychobiography is a fascinating recounting of Ataturk's life, with special attention to his brilliant successes as a military leader and then as "Father Turk." Ataturk's life history is chronicled in terms of conventional political explanations for political acts, and the body of that narrative is devoid of psychological analysis. Only after the rich narrative history, in an epilogue, is a compelling psychological portrait of Ataturk presented. Thus, the introduction of psychological variables to explain or provide rich accounts of Ataturk's significant political acts appears more an afterword than a central component of the analysis of the lived life.

This neglect of politics is not surprising given the central task of the psychobiographer. The thesis of this paper is that neither autobiography nor biography are useful genres for maximizing our generation of theories of the political process. As a type of biography, psychobiography suffers from the same shortcomings as its more abstract "parent." This paper argues that a particular kind of study, combining aspects of psychobiography and political analysis, can produce psychologically grounded understandings of important political events and thus contribute to the development of a body of theory that will come to constitute a specific academic discipline, that ot psychopolitical studies.

Psychobiography is not useful in this goal of discipline building because the psychobiographical task is to "discern and assign meaning to a life" by employing psychological theories and modes of investigation.[39] The challenge and even the accomplishment of discerning and assigning meaning in order to fashion a coherent life account is different from the process of producing a psychopolitical study. In the latter effort, the emphasis must be placed on understanding the psychological underpinnings of particular political acts or events in which the subject was a participant, or of certain political ideologies or writings that were formulated or disseminated by the subject. The challenge is to understand the character structure of the person and the acts he or she committed, as well as the reciprocal relations between character and political behavior in sociopolitical and interpersonal contexts.[40]

I have undertaken just such a study of the Iranian revolution. Majestic Failure: The Fall of the Shah of Iran is a study of the revolution from the point of view of the losers: the Shah and the United States, his major foreign backer. The study focuses on the Shah as the central actor of the revolution, that relatively brief, year-long outpouring of rage, and attempts to explain how he lost the revolution—a loss that resulted in his ouster, the fall of the Pahlavi dynasty, and its replacement by the Islamic Republic led by the eighty-year-old Ayatollah Rouhollah Khomeini.[41]

That the Shah lost the revolution is all the more remarkable because of the resources he commanded. He had ruled his country for thirty-seven years and presided over its transformation from a backward, isolated country to a prominent regional power. The development ot the oil industry had produced vast revenues that he had used to build the most powerful armed forces in the Persian Gulf. The governmental bureaucracies had also burgeoned, and the regime had undertaken vast public projects as well as massive expansions of the educational and social welfare systems. Iranian industry had blossomed, establishing a base for a powerful industrial sector.

In addition, the Shah could boast of support from all of the major international states. The United States was his principal champion, but the Soviet Union was not adverse to destroying the Iranian Communist party to win his favor. The European powers—East and West—counted themselves his supporters. The last chief of state to pay an official visit to the Shah, in the midst of the revolution, was the ruler of the People’s Republic of China.

Yet despite his money, armed strength, and international diplomatic support, the Shah could not cope with the revolution. He failed to deal effectively with the complaints of his people and their demands for change. This study of the revolution suggests that a determining explanation for the failures of the Shah can be found in his character structure. It also suggests that his character and the actions that were consonant with that character were the most significant reasons for the rage that propelled the people of Iran into revolution.[42]

The Shah, it is argued, had emerged from his difficult childhood with a “narcissistic character structure.” His youth, even after he was officially designated crown prince at the age of six, was no royal fairy tale. His mother was a powerful woman whose strength was exceeded only by that of her husband. When the young Mohammad Reza Shah was two, his father, Reza Shah, staged the coup that would eventually propel him and his son to the throne. Meanwhile, Reza Shah took another bride and was ostracized by his first wife, an unheard-of response in Iran in the 1920s. To take revenge on his first wife, Reza Shah later withdrew his eldest son from her care and installed him m a separate palace where he could be raised as a “man,” free of her “feminizing” influences. After several years in his own palace, the crown prince was sent away again, to secondary school in Switzerland, also in the interests of preparing the boy for his future imperial responsibilities.

The Shah became an adult with depleted narcissism, with a level ot self-esteem insufficient to maintain a reasonable psychic equilibrium. Instead, he was totally dependent for his narcissistic nurturing on external sources, of which he developed four.

One source was the Iranian people. He had a relationship with “his” people that led him to believe that he was genuinely respected and admired by them, if not loved. In short, he had come to believe his own press.

A second source feeding his self-esteem was his firm belief that he was protected by God. The Shah believed that he had been divinely chosen for his mission to lead the Iranian people to greatness. His belief stemmed from his early childhood when he recovered from three life-threatening illnesses and during each had visions of sacred figures from early Shifite-Islamic history. From that period on, he believed that he was protected by the Lord in order to fulfill his divine mission.

A third crucial source of psychic support came from certain intense personal relationships. The Shah derived strength from what, in effect, was a psychological merger with three other persons during different periods of his life. Through these “twinship” relations, the Shah was able to use the strength of others to aid his own functioning.

Finally, the Shah derived needed strength from his association with the United States. The Shah had met and worked with eight American presidents, from Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who first met the Shah when he came to Tehran to attend his wartime meetings with Churchill and Stalin, to Jimmy Carter, who came to Tehran and celebrated the Shah in his famous 1978 New Year’s Eve toast. The American presidents became bastions of support for the Shah. He was restored to the throne through a CIA-sponsored coup in 195 3 and received more than a billion dollars in aid through the remainder of the 1950s. But the peak of his relationship with the United States came with his designation by President Richard Nixon as America’s virtual proxy in the Persian Gulf, after which the United States sold billions of dollars’ worth of the most sophisticated American weapons to the Shah. The unusually close links between the two countries help explain the psychic dependency on the United States that the Shah developed.

As long as those sources of narcissistic supplies replenished him, the Shah could derive the self-esteem that he needed in order to “do” shah and not just to “be” shah. Beginning in the early 1970s, however, each of these sources of strength began to fail the monarch.

In February 1971, Iran experienced its first contemporary terrorist incident. A group of armed dissidents attacked a police post, killed many of its defenders, and withdrew into the neighboring forests surrounding the Caspian Sea. The terrorists were eventually captured, but their act initiated a series of attacks and killings and regime countermeasures that kept news of the armed enemies of the regime in the newspapers for the remainder of the decade.

Later in 1971, the Shah held the now infamous festivities in Persepolis to mark the 2,500th anniversary of the establishment of the monarchy in Iran. Heads of state and dignitaries from throughout the world attended the lavish spectacle, but few in Iran were invited. One result was to distance the Iranian people from rhe grandeur and pomp of the regime. Their dissatisfactions with the monarch became more obvious in the 1970s, dissatisfactions that the Shah found it increasingly difficult to ignore. With the outbreak of the revolution, he was devastated by the depth of the Iranian people's rejection of him.

The Shah's divine protection failed him as well when he learned in 1973 that he had cancer. He was told that the cancer, with proper attention, was not life threatening, but every day he had to take large numbers of pills, medication that reminded him of his illness and of his own mortality.

The Shah's third source of psychic support also failed him. He had established "twinship" relations with three others: Ernest Perron, Assadollah Alam, and his actual twin sister, Princess Ashraf Pahlavi. Ernest Perron, who was the son of the gardener at the Le Rosey School in Switzerland, had accompanied the Shah when he returned to Iran from his studies. Perron lived in one or another of the Shah's palaces until the mid-1950s, when he finally returned to Switzerland. His death in i960 ended their intense mutual involvement. Following Perron's death, the Shah established or strengthened his "twinship" with Assadollah Alam. Alam served the Shah as prime minister and minister of court until he developed leukemia and died in November 1977. Just when the Shah needed Alam's strength to face the revolution—just when the Iranian people were about to demand the Shah's ouster—Alam died. Moreover, Alam died of cancer, fostering the Shah's belief that he had lost his own divine protection. Princess Ashraf, alive to this day and living in New York, was by then no substitute. She had become extremely unpopular with the people of Iran, and the Shah had gradually excluded her from his personal circle. She could play no useful role when he was most in need of her brilliantly calculating political judgment.

Finally, the Shah came to believe that he had lost his fourth source of narcissistic supplies. The 1976 nomination of Jimmy Carter as the Democratic candidate for United States President was greeted with grave concern in Tehran. Carter's campaign and inaugural address only exacerbated the panic in Iranian ruling circles, for Jimmy Carter demanded that United States foreign policy be reoriented. He sought two new emphases. He wanted the United States to insist on the realization of human rights throughout the world. And he wanted the United States to restrict the sale of weapons in order to diminish the international arms race and to tie the sale of those weapons to the institutionalization of human rights. The Shah understood Jimmy Carter to be talking first and foremost about Iran. He believed that President Carter was signaling a significant diminishing of the relationship between the United States and the Shah, a relationship that had been built throughout the terms of the previous seven American presidents.

As the dissatisfactions of the Iranian people turned to rage and as this rage was transformed into street demonstrations and then violence, the sources of psychological support that the Shah had been able to use in the past deserted him. He was thrown back on his own narcissistic resources, which were so inadequate that the Shah's psychological strength ebbed to the point where he could not act. He was effectively paralyzed.

In the face of this paralysis, the revolution grew, the rage of the Iranian people became more intense, and, in relatively short order, the Shah and his entire System were swept from the country. The revolution had completed its first phase, and Mohammad Reza Shah was its first victim. The revolutionaries had not so much won as the Shah had lost.

This is a summary of the argument made in the book Majestic Failure. The work attempts to provide a psychological explanation for the outbreak of the Iranian revolution and for the failure of the Shah to cope effectively with the demands of the revolutionaries and to suppress their attempts to oust him. This explanation is rooted in a psychoanalytic perspective that finds that significant childhood experiences of the Shah led to a particular narcissistic character structure. That character structure, in turn, meant that the Shah was unable to provide himself with sufficient psychic supplies—with enough of a sense of self-worth—to function effectively as the shah. Deprived of sufficient internal narcissistic supplies, the Shah turned to outside sources. As long as those sources, in his mind, provided him with the narcissistic supplies necessary to maintain his psychic equilibrium, the Shah could function, not always effectively, but usually with sufficient strength to rule. But as these sources of psychic strength failed him and he was unable to identify new sources, his narcissistic balance was shattered. He gradually became more depleted and less able to function. By the outbreak of the revolution, he was a broken man.

This exercise in psychopolitical studies is not a psychobiography, in that it is not concerned with the entire sweep of the shah's life, nor is its principal task to assign a coherent meaning to chat life. It does provide significant amounts of biographical data in order to construct a character structure for the Shah that accounts for the observed qualities of the man during his life. But that is not the purpose of the investigation. It creates a character structure that makes sense of his life, but it does not stop there and for this reason, as well, fails to qualify as a psychobiography Rather, the study proceeds to a third phase, an examination of a particular political phenomenon, in this case, the revolution of 1978—79. The Shah was a single political actor with immense potential power vis-a-vis that political event. By focusing on his behavior and how that behavior emanated from his character structure, the study uses psychological variables to explain a set of political processes.

This investigation of the Iranian revolution is an example of the genre of social scientific research here called psychopolitical studies. The outcome of the Iranian revolution was determined by the actions and mactions of the Shah of Iran in the face of the mounting rage of the Iranian people. Those actions in turn were consequences of the Shah's particular character structure, whose functioning had altered over the course of his rule through his social and political relations with others and, as the Shah believed, with the Lord.

Psychopolitical studies differ from psychobiography because the former focuses on political processes and uses psychology to explain those processes. The goal of such studies is not to make a lived life coherent by assigning meaning but to explain the nature and outcome of political phenomena.

Psychopolitical studies, then, will be concerned with the explanation of political phenomena, but not with their prediction. If social scientists are to improve the quality of their investigations, they must abandon prediction as a significant enterprise, at least in terms of predicting the outcome of complex political events. Social scientists with long experience in the Middle East frequently make successful predictions about complicated political phenomena; so do diplomats and professional politicians. Successful prediction is a particular kind of achievement, hardly restricted to the social sciences, that suggests a familiarity with “what follows what” or “what goes with what” or the “association among variables.” But to make predictions through the construction of a series of interrelated and meaningful theoretical propositions is a more difficult task, one requiring the identification of the relevant variables, an understanding of those variables, and a comprehensible explanation for their relationships.

Furthermore, most variables of interest to the social scientist relate through a human agency: the dependent variable is affected by the independent variable because intervening between the two are the mental processes of human actors. Take, for example, the area of voting studies, an area of social science investigation in which prediction has been impressively accurate, if not particularly profound. In most voting studies, people are asked to give their voting preferences and intentions; it is not surprising that a high correlation exists between these expressions of intention and subsequent behaviors. Other voting studies attempt to link social variables—economic conditions, political repression, strategic power, international relations, and the like—to voting behavior. These variables are often highly associated with voting behavior, but understanding why the variables relate to each other as they do entails the application of psychology, the study of human mental processes. Intervening between economic conditions, for example, and the act of voting or political protest or any other dependent variable of social scientific interest is the human agency, with its mental processes and character structure. To understand fully the relationship between the independent and dependent variables, one must understand the way the human “black box,” intervening between the other variables, serves to link the two. Thus psychology lies at the heart of the concept of social science explanation.

To expect to link the variables, however, in a predictive fashion is another matter. The prediction of complicated sociopolitical phenomena through the construction of sophisticated models whose operations are not merely empirically known but also theoretically explicable and, therefore, sensible is still beyond the capacity of the social sciences. For the foreseeable future—indeed, perhaps indefinitely—the construction of such models will be possible only for phenomena of scant interest to the social sciences.[43]

This is not the case, however, for postdiction. Social science theories can be developed most effectively through retrospective examination. The historical examination of events or processes allows for the identification of variables as significant components of the particular process. The examination of those components in other historical processes is one form in which the model that has been produced can be “tested.” In short, it appears possible to explain in the social sciences, but not necessarily to predict.

This act of retrospective explaining is best done through a case study. William Runyan suggests that “a case study is undertaken in response to a problem in understanding.”[44] The social sciences and their individual disciplines and subdisciplines would appear to be reflections of widespread problems in understanding. The case study is not the only possible response to such problems; yet case studies must be a central component of psychopolitical studies and will be a more useful part of such studies than will psychobiographies, or treatments of an entire life. Runyan presents two separate definitions of the case study. First, he suggests that “a case study may be defined as the systematic presentation of information about the life of a single unit.” Then, he suggests that “a case study may be defined as ‘a reconstruction and interpretation’ based on the best evidence available, of part of the story of a person’s life.”[45]

Hans-Georg Gadamer argues more forcefully for the case study:

Surely we can admit that all historical knowledge involves the application of general empirical regularities to the concrete problems it faces; yet, the true intention of historical knowledge is not to explain a concrete phenomenon as a particular case of a general rule. ... In actuality, its true goal—even in utilizing general knowledge—is to understand an historical phenomenon in its singularity, in its uniqueness. Historical consciousness is interested in knowing not how men, people, or states develop in general, but, quite on the contrary, how this man, this people, or this state became what it is; how each of these particulars could come to pass and end up specifically there.[46]

But psychopolitical studies, although based on the study of particular cases, should not necessarily be restricted to the study of the individual political actor. Insofar as such studies are restricted, they are related to and bear a family resemblance to psychobiography. But in addition, psychopolitical studies must concern themselves with the study of group phenomena, of which several variations exist. One kind of group phenomena is found when many individuals are responsible tor a single political decision or act, as, for example, in collective leadership or collective political action. The United States decision to supply arms to Iran, now known as the Iran-Contra Affair, appears to be a classic example of a decision that was reached by a number of political actors for various political and personal reasons.

The president of the United States appears to have sought the link as a way to free the Americans held captive in Lebanon and thus to spare himself the anguish resulting from his own inability to rescue them. That anguish appears to have been a blend of his deep personal commitment to alleviate human suffering and his capacity to best understand the nature of such suffering on a personal basis, on the level of individual human beings rather than abstract phenomena such as whole groups or nations. His anguish was also bred of the pleas that had been made directly to him by the parents, spouses, and children of the hostages. Finally, it appears also to have stemmed from his eagerness to avoid being compared to his predecessor, President Jimmy Carter, who was unable to free the United States diplomats held captive by the Iranians for 444 days.

There certainly were other key actors. The CIA director appears to have been primarily concerned with the fate of William Buckley, the CIA station chief in Beirut, who had been seized by the Islamic Jihad. Director William J. Casey was concerned about the suffering Buckley would likely undergo at the hands of his captors and also about the secrets Buckley knew that would damage American intelligence in the Middle East were he tortured and forced to talk, as the CIA believed would inevitably be the case. Furthermore, Casey still smarted from the losses that the agency had suffered in Beirut during his directorship. Robert Ames, the National Intelligence officer for the Middle East, and the entire staff of the Beirut CIA station were killed when a terrorist bomb destroyed the United States Embassy in April 1983. Casey sought to protect his agents in the field, to maintain the morale of his employees, and to preserve the intelligence capabilities of the United States.

There were yet other actors with other commitments in the decision to supply weapons to the Iranians. The CIA had generated a report in early 198 5 arguing that some officials within the ruling clergy of the Islamic Republic of Iran were interested in contacts with the United States. These contacts were seen as potentially useful for the strategic position of the United States and for moderating Iranian support for terrorism, its commitment to export the Islamic revolution, and its pursuit of the war with Iraq. It appears that some American officials who urged the decision to supply weapons to Iran were interested in altering that country’s foreign policy, if not its domestic politics as well.

Other officials, first in the CIA and then elsewhere, feared mounting Soviet influence in Iran and even the possibility of a Soviet military thrust into Iran as a wav of aiding Soviet proxies. These American officials believed that supplying American weapons to the Iranian regime would accomplish at least two relevant goals: The arms would send a signal to the Soviets that the United States still maintained a commitment to the territorial integrity and independence of Iran. The arms would also strengthen the Iranian military against a possible Soviet invasion.

Other officials in the National Security Council saw the sale of arms to Iran as a means to bail the Nicaraguan Contras out of their increasingly dire financial and political straits. With the refusal of the United States Congress to supply weapons or financial assistance to the Contras, their cause had nearly collapsed. Profits from the sale of weapons to Iran could be channeled to the Contras to reverse their fortunes. If the Reagan administration later succeeded in changing Congressional opposition to additional funding for the Nicaraguan “freedom fighters,” the arms supply to Iran could be ended.

This abbreviated account of the motives and goals that underpinned the Iran-Contra Affair has dealt only with the American actors. There were foreign actors as well. Israeli officials had their own reasons for supplying weapons to Iran and also for urging the United States to do so. In addition, certain arms dealers had private, financial motives for working toward the opening of a military supply relationship between the United States and Iran.

The point of this discussion is to indicate that in many political situations a focus on the role of a single actor presents an impoverished view of the political event. Even when the focus of the inquiry is narrow—the United States decision to supply weapons to Islamic Iran—it is necessarv to examine more than one actor and more than one “motive” of any given actor to understand, in its complex richness, the basis of even a simple decision. This is especially true when the decision is not simple and when there is not a clear chain of command with an officially designated and universally accepted decision maker.

In audition to the study of group decision making, other group phenomena are important for future psychopolitical studies. Interactions among actors also produce politically significant results. Such is clearly the case when one is studying the behaviors of crowds or mobs. But group phenomena are present outside the study of the political behaviors of “the masses.” Terrorism, for example, has been explained as the re-suit of a complex series of relationships among certain kinds of members of an intelligentsia.[47] Similarly, insofar as political decisions are the result of group processes, an exclusive focus on the minds of individual decision makers will miss the consequences of group dynamics for political decisions.[48] It is the case, therefore, that psychopolitical studies must not be limited to the study of individual political actors but must also consider group phenomena as well.

Irrespective of whether psychopolitical studies focus on the postdictive interpretation and explanation of individual or of group processes, such studies confront a problem of validity that is profound and troubling. For the time being, it is difficult to imagine a satisfactory solution to the challenges that bedevil the question of validity in psychopolitical studies. By validity, we refer to the problem of assessing the legitimacy or appropriateness of an interpretation or, as Vincent Crapanzano has put it, of understanding that the real is a metaphor for the truth and distinguishing the latter from the former.[49] How does the investigator of a psychopolitical phenomenon know when a particular understanding of a phenomenon is valid, and how does a reader of that scholarship come to accept the legitimacy of that interpretation?

There is a common solution to the problem of validity, which approximates the solution to the problem of validity advanced in other sciences. As Runyan suggests, the problem of validity can be solved through the judgments of people who are familiar either with the subject of the psychobiographical investigation or with other sources of information about the subject.[50] Ultimately, the problem of validity must be solved by the consensual opinion of others. There is no so-called objective way to establish “truth” in psychobiographical and, by extension, psychopolitical investigation. Validity, in short, is consensual validity.

This should be far from a cause for despair. Rather than leading either proponents or critics of psychopolitical studies to question the scientific status of the enterprise, it would be more appropriate to recognize the central status of consensual validation in virtually all scientific endeavors, or, indeed, perhaps in all communication. Peter Winch refers to “discourse universes,” and E. D. Hirsch stresses the significance of language and communication since “the process of understanding is itself a process of validation.”[51]

The so-called hard sciences may have developed instrumentation to calibrate and replicate their findings, but those instruments are useful for validation because scientists accepted as knowledgeable have agreed that the instruments measure what the scientists claim. In short, the disciplines of the academic world constitute communities of investigators who share expertise about particular phenomena and ways of investigating those phenomena that are, in the minds of the members of those disciplines, appropriate.[52]

The challenge confronting the practitioners of psychopolitical studies is not whether there ought to be a separate or different method of validation for these studies than for those of other disciplines. There is no reason to expect or demand a different set of procedures tor determining validity in psychopolitical studies than in any other field of inquiry that purports to be scientific in the Western sense of that term.

The problem with validity in psychopolitical studies is rather that the size of the community who could legitimately pass on the validity of a given interpretation may be so narrow as to be limited to the individual investigator. There are two reasons for this. First, the number of practitioners of systematic psychopolitical studies is extraordinarily small, and second, the “discipline” of psychopolitical studies does not exist in any effective fashion.

Psychopolitical studies are not in a “preparadigmatic” state but rather have a variety of competing paradigms in both components of the enterprise—the investigation of political and of psychological processes—none of these paradigms having managed to assert their intellectual dominance. Moreover, there is no reason to believe that there will ever be a single paradigm in the study of either politics or psychology that will compel, by its intellectual power, the loyalty of a significant majority of the practitioners of psychopolitical studies.

Psychoanalysis, for example, is the single most widely used foundation of psychopolitical studies, but psychoanalysis, in its present manifestation, is itself far from a unified paradigm. There have been three stages in the articulation of the discipline; theories and methods from each stage remain important to the present. The field is clearly dominated by the works of its creator, Sigmund Freud. His basic clinical methods as well as the intellectual grounding of many of his central theories remain widely accepted to this day. But even during his lifetime, many who had originally been his disciples turned away to develop significant modifications of their own. Both Adler and Jung, for example, created alternative theoretical formulations that are used by present-day psychopolitical investigators. The second stage of psychoanalysis began shortly after Freud's death. Significant modifications in his work were then created by those who considered themselves solidly within the intellectual legacy of the master. For example, the ego was assigned a more substantial position in the operation of the psyche than was the case in Freud's writings. The third stage began more recently as the works of Heinz Kohut have dramatically altered Freud's legacy yet have left Kohut and his followers within psychoanalysis.

Thus psychoanalysis is far from a unified discipline. Psychopolitical investigators who apply a psychoanalytic approach to their research will differ dramatically in the kinds of work they do, the kinds of questions they pursue, the kinds of data they consider meaningful, and the kinds of interpretations they make. As Roy Schafer has suggested, "There is no single, necessary, definitive account of a life history. . . . What have been presented as the plain empirical data and techniques of psychoanalysis are inseparable from the investigator's precritical and interrelated assumptions concerning the origins, coherence, totality, and intelligibility of personal action."[53] Those "assumptions" arise from within psychoanalysis itself as well as from other theoretical frameworks and from broader cultural beliefs and practices.

But outside of psychoanalysis, an even larger number of psychological approaches to the study of political phenomena may be found. There are what may be thought of as subdisciplines within psychopolitical studies, defined by the common commitments of their members to shared theories and methods. As a result, there will be many intellectual communities whose members can agree on the validity of particular interpretations because they share the commitments of the interpreter. But there is little likelihood that agreement will be produced between subdisciplines, those mini-intellectual communities whose dogged commitment to their particular approaches was described by Freud as the "narcissism of small differences."

The validity problem in psychopolitical studies is exacerbated because of the difficulty of communicating all the nuances of data and meaning that led to the interpretation at issue. No one knows the subject under investigation as deeply as the investigator, who has a privileged status vis-a-vis the subject since he or she has been immersed in and has developed a feel for the subject that is extraordinarily difficult to convey. Even Freud, that great prose master, had difficulty communicating the richness of his interpretations and the nuances of his data, although he did it better than anyone else.

Given all this, the communities from which judgments of validity will emanate will be small in size. There will be significant disagreements, even from within what appears to be rhe same paradigm, because the number of “validation communities” will be substantial. As a consequence, the practitioners of a scientific enterprise will have to tolerate extraordinarily broad criteria for validity or witness an even greater fragmentation of psychologically based studies of political processes. That does not mean that there are no validity criteria at all, that any interpretation is as good as any other. Within the subdisciplines of the field, the criteria for validity will be explicit, if not always easily applicable. Across fields there will still be common commitments to more overarching modes of intellectual inquiry. Yet ultimately, there are no simple and universal validity criteria.

In our efforts as critical readers, our first task must be to try to adopt the subdisciplinary framework of the author—as long as the suodiscipline falls within the tolerant limits of the field and seeks validity within the paradigms on which that work is based. If it does not, then we are not dealing with a science, and conventional intellectual approaches to the question of validity are irrelevant.

But if the subdiscipline does fall within conventional definitions, then it is necessary to work within that subdiscipline to determine validity, not an easy thing to do. Few of us are trained across subdisciplinary boundaries. Even fewer can lay claim to the intellectual eclecticism necessary to work effectively across such boundaries or the intellectual tolerance to do so. Moreover, we shall never be able to capture the subject as effectively as the investigator, given his or her lengthy immersion in the research.

Validity, in short, is a nearly insolvable issue. We should never cease to search for it or for more adequate ways to determine it, but we need to operate m a tolerant intellectual framework and be willing to function with validity criteria less certain than most of us would conventionally deem essential. In the process, we need to accept conclusions that are “conditioned and incomplete” as well as tentative and uncertain.[54] Lack of certain conviction, however, has never been an impediment to scientific inquiry. To the contrary, it is the impetus for scholarly investigation.

Through the tentative conclusions of psychopolitical studies—the use of psychology to investigate political phenomena—we are most likely to produce an understanding of those processes and so begin to generate theories applicable to other phenomena at other times and in other places.

 4. Biography and Psychohistory

Elie Kedourie

We may look on biography as a species of historical investigation. It is the attempt to give an account of a subject’s thoughts and actions in the context of his or her own time and place. But a question arises: why should anyone think it useful or interesting to embark on such an investigation? The question is all the more natural since biography is not a universal genre to be found everywhere or at all times. To take a case in point, in the domain of traditional Islam, biography as briefly described here is unknown. There are of course biographical dictionaries of ulama, the tra- ditionists and learned men; here and there in the literature may be found brief accounts of governors and rulers. All of these provide no more than brief and stylized details about those aspects of the subjects’ lives that are, in terms of the self-view that is associated with the world of Islam, considered the most important and the most worthy of notice. Traditional Islamic literature has no equivalent of Plutarch’s Lives, or Thomas More’s biography of his son-in-law, or Monypenny and Buckle’s Life of Disraeli. Even more striking is the utter absence not only of women’s biographies but also of even the scantiest detail about the mothers, wives, or daughters of those men who are the subject of biographical notices. There are, of course, good reasons why such detail was considered inappropriate, but this absence is significant in itself as a pointer to a lack of interest, within traditional Muslim culture, in individuals as individuals, with their own specific characteristics and peculiar quirks. Men are seen as belonging to well-established categories, and the particular category is deemed to indicate how a person who belongs to it behaves: Muslim or non-Muslim, [c]alim or vizier, military commander or ruler. Biography as an exercise in understanding another human being as fully as possible, and understanding this person simply for the sake of understanding, seems to be a modern Western notion—an invention that has its roots in Western culture but has characteristics that have been articulated and theorized within, say, the last hundred years.

History, then—of which biography is a branch—is a genuinely new enterprise. It is commonly said that Islam is historically minded, and as the Bible shows, the same may be said of Judaism as well as of Christianity; the latter is, or has been, said to be a historical religion. How are we to understand such statements? What they mean is that at one point in the past a divine revelation or a divine intervention took place that is the beginning of what may be called a sacred history. All that follows is the working-out of the consequences of this divine intervention, and the consequences of obeying or, as the case may be, disobeying divine injunctions. History here is a guide to believers, a repository of stories and rules of behavior that will enable them to lead lives pleasing in the eyes of God. This sacred history, then, is a kind of practical history, making use of the past in order to engage in the successful practice of living here and now. There are other kinds of practical historv, the most prevalent, and the most efficient, being the history that serves to instill a sense of pride or glory in the body politic. Other kinds of history may serve as a storehouse of precedents, legal or administrative, or may be used to defend a particular religion or political cause, or are designed to teach political prudence.

However, this practical attitude to the past is not history as history came to be invented or discovered—a term used advisedly, for this attitude is indeed a new discovery made by Westerners about themselves and their past, a new invention dealing in a new way with the fact that people have succeeded one another through the generations and successively left layer on layer of fragments that can be read as evidence of past thought and past activity.

This new discovery or invention has been called Historismus by the German philosophers and historians who have been prominent in articulating and theorizing it. The English equivalent, as adopted by the translator of Friedrich Meinecke's book on the development of Historismus, is historism. This term is distinct from, and signifies something very different from, what is commonly known as historicism. Historicism, it is well known, as anathematized by Karl Popper and his many followers, is the belief that there exists a pattern that governs human history and that unfolds with an irresistible inevitability. Whether the pattern is cyclical as in Plato, or linear as in Augustine or Bossuet, historicism is at the opposite pole from historism.

There are three other views, in addition to historicism, that are very influential but quite incompatible with a properly historical view of the past. The first is that human existence is a manifestation over time of our unchanging essence, the second is that people's actions are exemplifications of unchanging eternal laws, and the third is that there is an underlying structure in human nature or in society that governs all visible action or thought that may be called superstructure. Marxism is today the most influential, but by no means the only, variant of such a belief.

The properly historical view may be summed up by saying that man's nature is his history. This view signifies that there is nothing beyond or above or below the historical record (as the evidence shows it to be) that may serve to account for or to explain this record, that the record is, in short, its own explanation, chat a subject, to quote Hegel, is the series of his or her actions. In such a record, there is nothing extraordinary (to borrow a word that occurred in the original title of this conference) because there is nothing ordinary either. The pair of ideas, ordinary—extraordinary, imply a norm of human behavior to which people conform or from which they depart. But given that people are mind and will, and that, as such, their actions cannot be programmed or predicted, then it follows that there are no norms against which human actions or thoughts can be judged. Extraordinary lives are legendary lives, and the historian’s work is to make legend explicable in terms of human actions and responses.

The historian’s work is possible because mind speaks to mind or, as sometimes put, because of the “I” that is in the “thou.” This does not mean that the historian possesses magical powers that open up the minds of others for exploration. Rather, the historian is able to write history because minds have objectified themselves in utterances, artifacts, and institutions that are open to inspection and that one may aspire to understand because they are the expressions of minds with which one’s own mind is kin: mind speaks to mind. For if these utterances and performances are not the expressions of human minds, then they are and must remain hopelessly unintelligible to the historian. But again and again we do find that they are intelligible: Champollion deciphers the Rosetta stone, Gold- ziher disentangles the confusion of hadith, Prescott penetrates the secrets of the Aztecs, Mommsen probes the intricacies of Roman administration, and Syme explores late Republican politics. It can be done—and is done every day—in spite of the fact that Champollion is not the nephew of a Pharaoh, nor is the Orientalist Goldziher an Oriental, Prescott a descendant of Aztecs, or Mommsen and Syme survivals from the time of Augustus and Cicero.

The philosopher Dilthey, who more than anyone else strove to establish the main lines of what he called a critique of historical reason, held that because the object of history is a mind- affected world, then it is biography that is the best entrance into history. Whether one agrees with him or not, biography, in this view, is the attempt to make intelligible the thought and action originating in a particular mind over the whole course of its life. History is the asking of questions from the evidence. The questions that are asked arise from the evidence, but they are not themselves to be found in the evidence. Evidence is itself inert and lifeless until a particular mind with all its ingenuity and originality comes to recognize it as evidence and, so to speak, to vivify it. It is therefore utterly misleading to imagine that history, seen in this way, is an assemblage of “facts” or “materials,” or that historians are mere collectors of “facts” that they only put together, as a child puts together the pieces of a prearranged puzzle.

If history begins with the asking of questions, then the notion of total history, made fashionable by Braudel and the school of the Annales, is misconceived. A historian begins by asking a question because something in the evidence or the account being examined is obscure and puzzling. One question leads to another, until the particular puzzlement that led to the initial inquiry is, as far as possible, banished. Then comes another historian, with a different set of puzzlements and a different set of questions, and so on ad infinitum. This is why it is commonly, and rightly, said that every generation writes its own history. One may go further and say that, since no historian's mind is identical with that of any other historian, every historian writes a unique history: there are no standard histories, no so-called authorities. Similarly, there can be no given quantum or totality that one can hope to cover, and once you have covered it, you have produced total history. Take any subject and survey the literature about it, and you may easily see how revolution follows on revolution in this field: the life of the Prophet from Ibn Hisham to Montgomery Watt to Suleyman Bashir, the Abbasid "revolution" between M. A. Sha'ban and Moshe Sharon, and Afghani from Edward G. Browne's and C. C. Adams's wide-eyed pieties to a book whose subtitle proclaims its subject's religious unbelief and his political activism.

Biography, then, like history, is the asking of questions the answer to which makes intelligible, for instance, the passage of Disraeli from the dissipated dandy of the 1830s to the prime minister of the 1870s, or the passage of Nuri b. Sa[c]id from the small conspiratorial lieutenant of 1914 into the prime minister of the Arab Federation ovet whose mutilated corpse the Baghdad mob danced with glee in 1958. In all these biographies, there is nothing expected or normal or ordinary, and yet nothing that is rebellious to historical discourse. The passage in question here is a passage over time, and the substance of it is made up of actions and responses for which evidence exists; of that for which no evidence exists, thereof one must be silent.

For evidence, there is no substitute. Some speak of a so-called conceptual history, with concepts serving as some kind of scaffolding or framework holding together the bricks of historical "facts," which in turn serve to make the conceptual skeleton attractive with color and decoration. But some such metaphor cannot help being misleading since a historical account is not made up of concepts plus “facts”; it is wholly made up of pieces of evidence interlocking with other similar pieces without, so to speak, being forced. And if there is no evidence, then no concept can make up for its absence. An economic, social, or psychological theory cannot substitute for evidence. The temptation, however, to make use of such a short-cut—a temptation that Carlo Antoni has examined and illustrated in his book From History to Sociology[55]—is, considering the flourishing condition of the social sciences in the academy, one that must be very difficult to withstand.

It may, however, be said that action is the expression of personality, and that to understand the action we must understand the personality. This is to speak as though the personality is the cause and action the effect: male babies are mother-fixated whereas female children suffer from penis jealousy, therefore— therefore what? This kind of explanation, whether Freudian or Adlerian or Jungian or Pavlovian or other, is at the basis of psychobiography and more generally psychohistory. The “psycho” in psychohistory is a reference to the science of psychology, a science, that deals with unconscious drives and involuntary impulses or reactions, that seeks to explain them and to explain how thoughts and actions are “conditioned” by them. The science is a chain of hypothetical reasonings that, as in all sciences, take the form, if—then. Like all sciences, it is subject to continuous contention and revision and cannot, therefore, be the sturdy structure on which to base history.

Psychobiography proves too little: you cannot establish an evidential chain from an Oedipus complex to a decision to bomb Tripoli. It also proves too much: every Oedipus complex must lead to warlike proclivities. Psychobiography, again, must assume that behind all actions there are hidden motives, unknown to the agent. If so, this must be equally true of the psychobiographer. We then should not ask, for example, whether what the psychobiographer says of James V. Forrestal’s psychosis is true, but rather what drives he seeks to satisfy, or what unconscious motives lead him, when he is making such statements about the United States defense secretary. We then find ourselves revolving in a vicious circle: in this cabinet of Dr. Caligari, it can never be established who is mad, the biographer or his subject.

 5. A Response to Critics of a Psychobiography

Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz

Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, born in 1881, was the founder of modern Turkey. After World War I, in which the Turks fought against the Allies, the Ottoman Empire collapsed, and Turkey was invaded. The Turks generally believe it was Ataturk who, almost singlehandedly, inspired his war-weary compatriots to fight a war of independence. A brilliant military man, he became the first president of the modern Turkish nation and instituted drastic cultural changes that did much to westernize it. Although he died in 193 8, he is venerated in Turkey much as though be were still alive. His representation as “The Eternal Leader” is immortalized.

In 1984 the University of Chicago Press published his psychobiography, The Immortal Ataturk. It was written from an unabashedly psychoanalytic perspective by a psychoanalyst and a historian.[56] Since the book’s publication, it has received more attention from both scholars and lay persons than had been anticipated, and it has been reviewed in journals of different disciplines—psychoanalysis, history, political science, and political psychology—and in magazines and newspapers in the United States, Turkey, England, Israel, and northern Cyprus. In these reviews, and in the Tel Aviv conference on biography, the Ataturk psychobiography was praised. But criticism was of- 98 Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz fered as well, and doubts were expressed as to the value of applying psychoanalytic concepts to the understanding of leaders, especially those of the Middle East. This chapter does not discuss the methodology of psychoanalytic biography,[57] nor repeat our findings on Ataturk. It will deal directly with criticisms raised by our work, the first of which was the claim that the psychoanalytic approach to biography is of little value, and reductionist at best.

In addressing this claim, we concluded that our critics had leapt to the conclusion that all psychobiography is written from the standpoint of Freudian beliefs, for which these critics had little tolerance. We suspected that those taking this view would dismiss Marxist historiography, women's studies, or quantitative historiography—indeed, anything new, largely because it is new, without asking why they find such enterprises threatening. In particular, they see something pruriently sexual in psychoanalysis, ignoring its use as a comprehensive model of the human mind and a key to understanding the intricacies of how we consciously and unconsciously see our world and balance internal against external demands. One Turkish reviewer remarked that reading our psychobiography of Ataturk was like entering his bedroom, a shocking performance for a Turk; this comment suggests that Ataturk represented the oedipal father to him. A few reviewers made fun of our psychoanalytic interpretations, and we felt this reaction might point to an effort by them to reverse anxiety that had been aroused by the sexual formulations. We were challenged, for example, on our explanation of Ataturk's refusal, or inability, to visit the former Ottoman capital of Istanbul after it became politically possible. He left that city for Anatolia in May 1919 to open the Turkish struggle for independence, a struggle that ended in October 1922. The visit he made to Istanbul in July 1927 was his first since leaving in 1919. We know that in the interim he was preoccupied with making the little Anatolian town, Ankara, into the capital of the new Turkey, but he could have gone to Istanbul during this time. We ascribed psychological reasons, both conscious and unconscious, for his not doing so, and he confirmed our intuitions about this in his own words, as we made clear in our book. It was his own utterance that explained how Istanbul had become a symbol for him. William Nieder- land has written of how a geophysical entity can represent externalized images, wishes, and fears.[58] The ability to symbolize differentiates humans from animals, but apparently our critics were unwilling to conceive of how Istanbul represented to the Turkish leader at this particular time in his life a mother to whom he was ambivalently related, possibly because this seemed to them an uncalled-for sexual reference.

Some of the criticisms have been so far off the mark that one is obliged to conclude that the critic either failed to read the whole book or was unable to understand the work. It seems obvious that the reviewers approached the book from long-held positions that they felt obliged to defend, and they failed to judge the material on its own merits.

To respond further to such critics would be to belabor the unending and largely intellectualized arguments heard since the days of Freud as to whether psychoanalysis is a science, and whether it is prurient. Peter Gay in his recent work on the life and times of Freud indicates that since Freud's proclamation of a dynamic unconscious and psychic determinism, psychoanalysis has been a favorite target for the wrath of certain intellectuals and pseudointellectuals.[59] We are reminded of Freud's musing that the discovery that the world is not the center of the universe, and then the claims of evolutionary theory, dealt narcissistic blows to humanity; clearly, the conclusion that a person has a dynamic unconscious, that the mind operates according to certain patterns, and that we are not always rational tops off the list of such injuries, injuries to which some of our critics appear to react still. In tne words of Matthew Arnold,

Let the long contention cease!

Geese are swans, and swans are geese. Let them have it how they will Thou art tired, best be still.

Reviewers who gave our work serious consideration usually agreed with some of our formulations, but the comments of some demand a response. First, it seems curious that these reviews appeared in journals for those interested in psychoanalysis or for historians or specialists in Near Eastern studies— and that the reviewers were specialists in one of these fields, without any real knowledge of the other. The writing of the Ataturk psychobiography was a collaboration between a historian with psychoanalytic training and a clinical psychoanalyst with a long-held interest in political psychology and familiarity from birth with the Turkish culture. The joint effort pooled diverse resources in such a way as to enhance the skills of each and to preclude any ill-founded conclusions. But few of the reviewers were capable of crossing over from psychoanalysis to history, or vice versa. In general, the reviews in psychoanalytic journals accepted the psychoanalytic conclusions (in spite of some remarks indicative of the operation of Freud's "narcissism of minor differences") but criticized some aspects of the historical analysis, the writer of one psychoanalytic journal praising our representation of psychoanalytic concepts but pointing to “historical flaws.” At the same time, specialists in history took a more favorable view of historical aspects of the book than of the analytic material.

Second, although we took pains to make it clear that even the Armenians do not accuse Kemal Ataturk of being involved in the Armenian deportation, massacres, and countermassacres, much review space was unprofitably devoted to the Armenian issue. This matter is one much before the public today, and we sincerely hope that Armenians and Turks will make peace, sort out reality from emotional misperceptions, acknowledge each other’s grief, and validate each other’s humanity and self-esteem. But such matters lie beyond the scope of our book, in which our aim was to map out Ataturk’s mind, a mind that did not harbor genocidal thoughts toward any ethnic group.

Freud was keenly aware that “biographers are fixated on their heroes in a quite special way.”[60] He noted that a subject was often chosen on the basis of some special regard that arose from the writer’s own emotional life, and he feared that the result might be biased accordingly. We noted Freud’s comments about the idealization of the hero but recognized that devaluation of a public figure may also be the motivation for a biographer when the subject has become a displacement figure on which hatreds generated in the writer’s own childhood have been placed. We suggest that reviewers may also have transference feelings about the subject of a biography; under some circumstances, leaders, ethnicity, and nationality evoke strong and raw emotions that color perceptions and thought in dealing with such topics.[61]

Ataturk certainly seems to have induced strong feelings in some reviewers. Therefore we appreciate the candid remarks of a psychoanalyst of Greek origin whose mother was born and reared in Anatolia but moved to Athens with her family after the Turkish War of Independence, a war that brought catastrophe to Greeks living in Anatolia. This reviewer noted that Ataturk was obviously not his national hero but that, after some soul-searching and self-analysis, he read our book with an ease that surprised him. On the other hand, one reviewer who was an analyst-turned-historian (!) suggested that Ataturk had taken part in the Armenian problem, and compared him indirectly to Hitler. This was purely transference to Ataturk.

Our book pointed out the differences between reparative and destructive leaders who are charismatic and narcissistic.[62] We claim that Ataturk was a prime example of the former since, having been born into a house of mourning, he fantasied about saving his grieving mother, and this fantasy gave him the impetus to save his motherland. There is evidence for his wanting to repair and idealize his followers without devaluing or killing another group in order to feel superior. Hitler operated in the opposite way, using aggression in order to bolster his and his followers' self-esteem, and was thus an extreme example of the destructive leader. The invocation of Hitler's name in discussing Ataturk indicates the reviewer's need to project some hidden inner dread onto an imagined Ataturk quite different from the real one we studied and wrote about.

Some critics, who were not themselves psychoanalysts, claimed that our approach was reductionist, accounting for everything by reference to unconscious instinctual forces. The work of Erik Erikson and other rigorous historical scholarship should suffice to counter this accusation, but some analysts, notably J. E. Mack, continue to warn against reductionism, considering it a most pernicious pitfall in the writing of psychoanalytic biography.[63] A. Falk argues that reductionism should not be equated with the "nothing but" fallacy and adds that it is in fact "a legitimate scientific method because, in truth, all science is reductionist."[64]

Our approach to The Immortal Atatiirk required examination of his entire life with the assessment of the strength of his instinctual drives, the location of any developmental arrests, reconstruction of his infantile rescue fantasies, and consideration of infantile conflicts and the child's way of dealing with them, ways of adapting, and the nature of the identity crisis at adolescence. Our study also probed the nature of internal responses to external trauma and the handling of midlife issues, as well as psychic transformations and the reaction to aging and the approach of death. We looked at our subject's psychodynamics developmentally. Recent advances in theories of object relations, demonstrating how a cohesive sense of self is established, have enriched our approach to psychoanalytic biography.

Although some of our critics who were not analysts declared our approach Freudian, we are obviously fully aware of the enormous expansion of the field of psychoanalysis since Freud concluded his pioneering work, and of the need to incorporate wider psychoanalytic understanding. Psychoanalysis and Freud are no longer synonymous. Further misunderstandings occur iO4 Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz when a nonanalyst relies on theoretical papers without reference to clinical material. The psychoanalyst Ives Hendrick has written: “Psychoanalysis is misused by intellectuals, who argue its validity as if it were a philosophy, an ethical system, a set of theories; such discussions . . . seem alien and unproductive to the analyst himself, whose primary convictions originate in what his patients have told him.”[65]

We would be the last to deny that there are any problems in psychoanalytic biography. To understand these difficulties, compare the task of an analyst’s writing the biography of one of his or her analysands with that of writing the life story of a long-dead leader who was never psychoanalyzed. In psychoanalysis, a patient’s history unfolds before the analyst during many sessions, and by the end of the treatment, the analyst feels that he or she has the patient’s total biography, including previously unconscious motivations, fantasies, and defenses—and adaptations to them. Formerly repressed material has become available and new material has been constructed. An analyst writing his or her analysand’s biography would add meaning to the life story from the subject’s “internal reality.” Two examples of such inquiries are What Do You Get When You Cross a Dandelion with a Rose? and Six Steps in the Treatment of Borderline Personality Organization, although it must be admitted that a literally total biography is not attainable.[66]

Freud suggested using the archeologist’s model, the restoration by the analyst of pieces of the puzzle that are missing.[67] The analyst may be justified in filling in the missing pieces of the patient’s experience and may approach the truth very closely if what he or she supplies fits well into the tapestry of material apparent in the patient’s life. An analyst writing his or her successfully analyzed patient’s psychobiography can offer data not available to any other writer. The assumption is that the total history of the subject, in the sense used here, can be obtained only through clinical psychoanalysis and by no other means such as simple interviews or perusal of the record of factual milestones of the life in question.

The method of clinical psychoanalysis, whether in treating or in gathering biographical data about the patient, follows certain principles and brings the analyst and analysand together in a highly specific way. Using Harry Sullivan's terminology, David Rapaport referred to this as "the participant-observation variant of the method of inter-personal relation," adding that this particular type of interpersonal relationship is nonindirective, using free association; is interpretive-genetic; and analyzes defenses.[68] In analysis much information is communicated nonverbally; the trained analyst is sensitive to the revelations of gesture, intonation, and syntax. The analyst also is on the alert for the repetition of patterns the patient developed in childhood in relation to those who were then important to him or her, notably family members. These patterns reappear in daily living, and in dreams and transference neuroses. Free association and the message of repeated patterns will not, however, yield a total history unless the repeated patterns are connected also with the transference, in which the patient displaces them onto the analyst. Rapaport noted that when techniques "are tied up to the concept of transference they are specifically psychoanalytic."[69]

The question remains as to how the biography of a leader who was never analyzed can be called psychoanalytic. Diaries and letters, added to what is known of the subject's political philosophy, artistic productions, and acts, tell much about a public figure, and the story of the subject's youth and growing achievements is often common knowledge. In the case of subjects not long dead, it may be possible to interview persons who had been close to them, or had been affected by them. (This was a very useful source in preparing our book on Ataturk.) Besides citing factual data, a psychoanalytic biography tries to grasp and interpret the unconscious meaning of what does come to light. Since so much depends on the skill of the biographer-analyst, there is always the possibility of a "wild analysis."

It is hard to gain information that will lead to "the royal road of the unconscious."[70] Even if the subject's dreams are known, his or her associations to them are not. The task is obviously easier when symbolic expression of the subject's inner world has been left in artistic productions.

The most difficult aspect of a psychoanalytic biography concerns the area of transference neurosis and the reconstruction of unconscious fantasies.

If we limit the scope of psychoanalysis to cases in which we have the benefit of a transference neurosis, we cannot apply the theory to the biography of someone never treated on the analyst's couch. We may ask, however, if we can find substitutes for the transference neurosis and be reasonably sure of the meaning of repeated patterns without it. Many psychoanalysts are optimistic about the availability of substitutes for the transference neurosis and those free associations that let us understand unconscious material.[71] Niederland found Heinrich Schliemann's "language exercises," in which Schliemann discovered unconscious wishes and dreams in sentences written to master a new language, very like free associations.[72] After all, transferences occur in everyday life, and given everyday transferences in which patterns clearly relate to known childhood events, we can be reasonably sure about the nature of these patterns without the close-up participant-observer evaluation possible in a transference neurosis.

For example, we are struck by Ataturk's fascination with the sun. The cover of our book shows him silhouetted against it, and the book's original title was "The Savior Sun." His public utterances were full of references to the sun and its warmth and brightness, and this was a signal for the psychoanalyst. However, we missed a clue; only after the book's publication did we recognize, tardily, the meaning of the name §emsi, which is "the illuminator," being derived from the Arabic word for sun, and which also was the name of a man critically important to Ataturk in his youth.

The devout mother of the young Mustafa had insisted that he attend religious school, but his father, shortly before he died, made it possible for his son to attend secular school under a teacher named §emsi Efendi, who seems to have become for the seven-year-old boy a badly needed substitute for a father lost during the oedipal period and idealized in spite of his lack of success and addiction to alcohol. The cogency of the name was brought out in a review of our book by Kemal Karpat in the American Historical Review; although opposed to psychoanalytic formulations, Karpat, a Turk, noted that "Ataturk referred to the sun and its life-giving power in many of his speeches."[73]

Analysts may be optimistic for another reason about biography that can be considered psychoanalytic. Little has been written about the usefulness in this connection of countertransference, which complements transference, although Mack, Falk, and Loewenberg provide exceptions.[74] Lacking the benefit of the transference neurosis with a subject who has not been analyzed (and a personal inclusion within that transference), the biographer is likely to seek a substitute in countertransference thoughts and feelings about the subject.

We assume that to call a biography psychoanalytic we must know how the writer deals with this countertransference. A psychoanalyst (or someone who has been well psychoanalyzed) will be uniquely able to handle this; failure to note and analyze countertransference may be an obstacle. At the outset of our project on Ataturk, we probed our motivation tor undertaking it and gave careful attention to what he meant to us. Moreover, we believe that writing in collaboration may help deal with countertransference issues. The involvement of other writers, especially those from other disciplines, can provide checks and balances.

A biographer at work lives with the mental image of his or her subject, and the mental representation of Ataturk was a valued companion to us during the seven years of work on his life story. When our book was published, the dean of the University of Virginia School of Medicine gave a reception for us. A night to remember with great pleasure, it marked the end of our association with Ataturk, and that night one of us dreamt of newspapers written in many different languages, all announcing Ataturk’s death. Although he felt sad in his dream, when he remembered it the next day he knew that he could now let his distinguished countryman rest in peace and could pass, like his coauthor, to other work.

 6. History versus Biography

Shabtai Teveth

In the writing of outstanding lives, history and biography may seem, at first glance, to be complementary. But they will be found to be at odds once it is realized that the art of biography requires—both for its perfection and for its reputation as the most popular of nonfiction literary forms—careful selection and an appealing, yet sensible, blend of evidence and poetic license. In fact, these demands create in the biographer's mind a sharp conflict between biography's two principal elements: the writing of a life and the writing of history. Indeed, one may rightly refer to this clash as a case of history versus biography.

History deals with events. But events, we all know, mean different things to different people. The event that can drastically change one life can just as well leave no mark whatsoever on another. War is a good example: some who take part in it are marked by the experience for life, whereas for others it proves but a passing episode. That one event does not necessarily play the same role in two different lives will be found to be true even in regard to great statesmen whose lives are closely interwoven with the events of their times. Which of these events should be given precedence: those that changed the hero's life or the ones that altered the course of history? Even the biographer of a minor historical figure is familiar with this dilemma.

Nowhere is this dilemma more challenging than in David Ben-Gurion's case. [75] Any serious biographer is bound to recognize early on that his life almost totally coincided, at least from 1921 on, with the history of Zionism and of the Israeli state. In other words Ben-Gurion's life cannot properly be told without telling the history of Zionism, and vice versa. Yet such an enterprise, filling as it would many thick volumes, could hardly be considered biography in the orthodox sense. Are we to include in Ben-Gurion's life all of Zionism's main events, or only those that left their mark on him? History demands the first, although the requirements of selection and appealing narrative suggest the latter.

Lytton Strachey, I would imagine, can rightly be referred to as the apostle of selection. To satisfy lucidity, poetic figment, and brevity—his gods—he selected only those episodes in the lives of his Eminent Victorians that best highlighted their singular characteristics. But what was fine and admirable for miniature portraits of Florence Nightingale and Cardinal Manning, or even Elizabeth and Essex, would hardly do for a Churchill or a Lenin. Even Solzhenitsyn’s Lenin in Zurich, penetrating as it may be, is only a sketch. In all these, history gets short shrift—too short. History wants neither sketches nor miniatures but rather insists on full-length portraits, in which monograms done in lace are clearly legible.

But the rivalry between the muse of history and the muse of biography does not end here. They both appreciate personal details, and neither will give up on mentioning Caesar s prowess as a lover and a swimmer, or Beethoven’s growing loss of hearing. Both muses recognize a connection between their hero’s achievements or failures and his life story. Yet they are not of one mind as to the importance or the scope of this connection. History, undoubtedly, would have given Caesar and Beethoven their proper place even if the first had been a cripple and the latter had ears as sharp as a rabbit’s. The Ninth Symphony, history would argue, stands by itself, and that is the main thing. Biography, however, would be twice as enthusiastic about the symphony because it was conceived in total deafness and would inquire to what extent the orchestration and particularly the soprano’s role are indebted to this deafness. Furthermore, this muse would research relentlessly the nature of Beethoven’s deafness, and whether its origin was hereditary syphilis. The biographer, more than the historian, would strive to understand the relations between Caesar and his friends and adversaries as the motive, and perhaps the compass, of the endeavor.

Thus, the disagreement on events does not abate when personal details are at issue. History concerns itself with the fact tnat Ben-Gurion drew conclusions from Mein Kampf, whereas to the biographer the story that in August 1933, at a short stop in Munich’s railway terminal, Ben-Gurion bought only Hitler’s book and Sprinzak cigarettes is of value, this story showing how much sharper than his colleagues was Ben-Gurion’s political sense. The same would apply to the detailed accounts of the groceries with which Ben-Gurion fed himself in November 1938 in London: “ham, canned beef, tomatoes, lettuce, eggs and cheese.” Trivial, yet how well this information helps the biographer in describing the loneliness of Ben-Gurion, who ate in his hotel room and there listened to the radio speeches by Hitler and Chamberlain, speeches that decided the fate of the world and the fate of both Europe’s Jews and Zionism. The biographer must therefore decide which personal details are truly important: only those that left their impact on history or also those that define and characterize the hero and add color to the narrative.

There is no ready-made compromise. It is up to the biographer to reconcile these conflicting demands, to impose on them a personal solution, knowing full well that no matter what is done in this regard he or she will be accused of committing a crime. Should selection and narrative be favored, the biographer will feel the wrath of historians; should history be given pride of place, readers will be scared away.

In a way it is the biographer's object all sublime, to paraphrase Gilbert, to let the punishment fit the crime. One's ability to let both history and biography represent themselves will decide the degree of one's art. Generally speaking, the less offensive he or she is to either history or biography, the better. Yet, sound advice as this undoubtedly is—is it practical? No. And that is why, to this writer's mind, the biographer who can fully acquit himself or herself in "doing" the life of any major historical figure, let alone one suspected of genius, has yet to be born.

There is a third approach open to the biographer, a very tempting one: to regard "life" as drama. But far from making the biographer's task easier, this option renders it, if this is at all imaginable, far more difficult. For as if two conflicting elements were not enough, this course introduces yet a third. In drama, the argument goes, the hero must be on stage in full view of the audience, if not always then at least most of the time. (Brecht, who once argued to the contrary, clamoring for a play with no hero, was unwilling or unable, great dramatist that he was, to produce one himself.) Now, if biography is to be taken for a play, then the hero must be in evidence on nearly every page. This dictum of the hero's ubiquity leaves little room for historical background (that is, the empty stage, or several pages without the hero), thus further aggravating the biographer's crimes against history. And this is only for starters. For drama, with its strong taste for struggle, would further narrow the field of dramatis personae and events included in the biography to those with which the hero comes to grips directly.

To do justice to the broader backdrop, the biographer as a dramatist will have to resort to “on-the-job” training. In other words, he or she will have to incorporate historical information into the dramatic plot. Robert Graves has shown, in I, Claudius, and still better in Wife to Mr. Milton, how this can be done. The hero either “exploits” the major figures and events that bear on his life or “is exploited” by them. In the case of a bold and imaginative national leader, this technique would involve the events he or she created, used, played with, or even rode the crest of. The catch here is obviously a simple one: if this dramatic rule is to be kept, few candidates will be found fit to star in a biography of this sort, one in which history and plot are at peace with each other.

In this sense the biographer of Ben-Gurion is rather fortunate: Ben-Gurion excelled in what he himself called “exploiting disaster,” that is, turning adversity into advantage. Thus Ben- Gurion provides his biographer with plenty of events from which to choose without the latter running the risk of giving too much offense to history.

To understand Ben-Gunon’s political thinking, one must keep in mind that he was born into what was called, by him and by many other Zionists, “the Jewish disaster”—the pogroms and general misery that were, for many centuries, the lot of Jewry, especially in the central and eastern parts of Europe. His singularity was encapsulated in his view of this disaster as a fount of strength, and in his single-mindedness in harnessing it—the way one would wish to turn nothingness into substance, darkness into light, disadvantage into advantage—to the chariot of Zionism. Furthermore, Ben-Gurion set out to fulfill this unique mission with the greatest possible urgency. His fear of “the destruction of Jewry,” in Europe by Hitler and in Palestine by Arabs, proved to be, throughout the 1930s, the compass and the engine behind his political thinking. “Disaster,” Zionism’s strength, was the “lever,” as he put it, by which he expected the Zionist dream to be fulfilled. In March 1936, he laid down that Zionism must immediately “begin the policy of a Jewish state.” However, the Jewish state was not the end but the means, yet another “lever” to enable “in a minimum of time a maximum of Jewish immigrants” to come to Palestine, and there to create a Jewish majority.

The Arab Revolt, which broke out in April 1936 and lasted three years, threatened the very existence of the Yishuv—the Jewish community of Palestine—then 400,000 strong. Unlike many who feared the Yishuv's collapse, Ben-Gurion greeted the danger heartily, as if it were a heaven-sent challenge to his special talent for turning adversity into advantage. In a spate of imagination and energy and against vehement opposition within his own party and the Yishuv as a whole, he set about using the revolt to launch his "Jewish state policy." The Arab economic boycott would enable the Yishuv, hitherto dependent on Arab farm produce and Arab workers, to develop into a selfsustaining community, what he termed a "Jewish economy." The constant Arab raids on Jewish settlements would facilitate the strengthening of the Yishuv's defense infrastructure as the groundwork for the army of the future state. And the closure of Palestine's two Arab-manned ports, at Jaffa and Haifa, would pave the way for the improvisation of an off-shore port in Tel Aviv, then the country's only Jewish town. This "Jewish port," both as a symbol and a physical asset, was to him the most important step toward independence. On May 17, 1936, only a day after the port opened for business, Ben-Gurion noted in his diary: "Had there been no loss of life—for which there is no recompense—all the economic destruction would have justified giving the [Arab] rioters a prize for their share in this wonderful creation."

Having proven his mettle as a "disaster-exploiter" par excellence, Ben-Gurion was ready to apply his concept of "disaster means strength" to the European theater. He presaged the Nazi "destruction" of Europe's Jews as early as January 1934 and repeatedly warned that time was running out for them. As Hitler gathered power, Ben-Gurion called on Zionist parties and world Zionist organizations alike to turn "disaster ... to productive force" and "misery," another "political resource," into a "lever." The destruction of European Jewry, he told his party, was an accelerating factor "in the implementation of our enterprise." In May 1936, he explained to his political colleagues: "We want Hitler destroyed, but while he lasts—it is in our interest to exploit this fact for the build-up of Palestine."

The Yishuv in Palestine, he argued, was the only haven for Europe's Jews, their one and only rescue. Not wishing to wait for history to prove him right, Ben-Gurion energetically explored a number of avenues of rescue while there still was time. In 1934 he negotiated with Palestinian Arab leaders the creation of a federation with Syria, Iraq, and Transjordan, on the understanding that the Jewish state would be entitled to bring in six, even eight, million Jews; in 1937 he was willing to accept partition and a tiny Jewish state, only because it would at least be free to open its gates to Hitler's would-be victims. His idea of "exploiting" Hitler was that Jewish and world opinion recognize the rightness of his cause, the Jewish state, and help to set it up as quickly as possible. But all his predictions and warnings fell on deaf ears.

It was his custom to state, or indeed overstate, his position in stark alternatives; as the years passed and doomsday drew near for Europe's Jews, Ben-Gurion used ever bolder language. His total dedication to the "historic interest," sometimes even to the exclusion of the individual, found extreme expression in December 1938 when, in a reductio ad absurdum, he told his party's Central Committee: "Were I to know that the rescue of all German Jewish children could be achieved by their transfer to England, and of only half their number by transfer to Palestine, I would opt for the latter—because our concern is not only the personal interest of these children, but the historic interest of the Jewish people."

This brutal formulation reflected his bitterness at the world's indifference to Jewish misery, revealed by the Evian Conference; at Britain's betrayal of Zionism, following the horrors of Kristallnacht; and at the blatant hypocrisy of the British government in claiming that the Jewish question could be solved in Angola, in Guyana, or elsewhere, all the while refusing to allow the rescue of 10,000 German Jewish children by sending them to Palestine. The horrors of the Holocaust were still in the future, unimaginable by Ben-Gurion or by anyone else. He knew very well that his formulation was purely theoretical and that there was no hope of rescuing the German Jewish children anyway. In using words to which later events gave a different and unintended meaning, his purpose was to hammer home the axiom that a true rescue of the Jewish people was possible only in Palestine, and that the only real choice that confronted European Jewry, children and adults alike, was for halt and even less to be saved in Palestine, or not to be saved at all.

It was this belief that drove him to militate throughout the war years for a Jewish state, and to inspire and orchestrate Hitler’s survivors—whom he was the first Zionist leader to meet, in 1944 and 1945—in voicing the single demand for a Jewish state. If the establishment of Israel in May 1948 can be seen, at least in part, as directly resulting from the Holocaust, then Ben-Gurion could have claimed this to be his most stupendous “exploitation.” Surely no one would dispute that the Holocaust followed by a Jewish state was better than the Holocaust without Israel. Yet to steer such a course when the Holocaust was in progress, to embed his policy in the minds of the broken refugees from the death camps, to motivate them to proclaim the Zionist cause because humanity owed it to them—this took a great deal more than mere courage and imperviousness. It called for a very special sort of person, one whose vision was soaring unarrested and whose self-control was absolute. That Ben-Gurion was such a man, that only twice was he unable to stop his tears on meeting the survivors, that there was a great roaring inside him and—well, that is what his biography should be all about.

 7. The Biographical Element in Political History

Uriel Dann

I am a student of political history and not a biographer. But I have a penchant for the role of the individvual. It is purely a matter of preference; there is no J ■ principle involved, and of course I try not to lose sight [v] of the nameless forces that go far to shape the human destiny. All the same, each major theme that has so far taken my attention has one person who occupies center stage: General Qasim as the “Sole Leader” during the first years of the Iraqi republic, Amir Abdallah in Transjordan under the mandate, and King Husayn in Jordan during its struggle for survival. This inclination must be my personal preference, and not something peculiar to the Middle Eastern political scene, for a study on Western Europe in the eighteenth century that recently kept me busy for three years also centers on an individual, a Baron von Miinchhausen. (He is not the famous teller of tall stories, I hasten to add, but a distant relation.)

I do not consciously couple my work as a political historian with any discipline other than history—be it political science, or economics, or sociology, or anthropology, or psychology. This may be the result of my lack of formal training in these disciplines; or else, my lack of training may be the result of my never having felt the urge to take them up. However that may be, if this makes me a “pragmatic” historian, that tag is as good I18 as any. (A reviewer once called me a “pragmatic historian” in this context, in no unfriendly spirit.) And if you think the deficiency diminishes the value of my work, then I just have to face my critics, inductively, point by point to be sure. Face the argument as a whole, conceptually, I cannot; I do not feel competent to plead whether or not a political historian must also be trained as a political scientist, or in any other of the additional disciplines I mentioned above.

As to the distinction between biography and political history with a biographical bias, the key is obviously relevant to the overall theme of the work, but some pondering is still useful. Respecting certain societies during certain periods, such as Western Europe in the nineteenth century, the ordinary measure of common sense is a fair guide for the historian. Take for instance Benjamin Disraeli. An outstanding trait of his personality was his need for women. Not, indeed, sexually; he was no womanizer. But he constantly needed female sympathy, admiration, even mothering. Yet Disraeli the politician and statesman was not appreciably bent by this trait. You will not find his sister and his wife, or Henrietta Sykes and Lady Bradford, given any prominence in a political history of Victorian England, not even one focusing on the leaders of that time. Try, however, to remove women from Robert Blake’s wonderful biography of Disraeli and see the havoc—and Lord Blake is as fine a political historian as any today.

The Middle East in the twentieth century poses a more difficult problem; at least, most political societies there do so most of the time. The reason is clear. The phenomenon of the “hero”—not necessarily a term of approval—is much more general in the Middle East than in the West, for reasons that are a major object of independent research. (The giants of the West during the first half of this century are not characteristic of their society over a longer span.) In our present context, this phenomenon, the prevalence of a hero, makes the task of the political historian more complicated or, if you like, more idiosyncratic. Amir Abdallah loved chess. He also had a trick of assuming a diffident smile when talking to important Britishers. King Husayn goes in (or perhaps used to go in) for speed driving. He divorced his first wife with considerable cruelty, such as is not usually associated with him. General Qasim loved to tour the streets of Baghdad at night, Harun al-Rashid-like. All this is meat for the biographer. Does it have a rightful place in political histories? Considering the societies in which these persons moved, I think it has. But what place? And, more important, how can I ensure that 1 pursue what is after all a penchant of mine in a manner conforming to the agreed rules of our profession? And, with respect, what are these rules?

At the risk of appearing trite, I will make a few points. The first is, I believe, the most controversial, and for that reason I bring it first, and not because it is more important than others. Whether you are a biographer or a political historian with a biographer's bias, you should have a liking for your chief actor. Of course you must preserve your critical faculty—the more so, since you have, by my definition, that liking. But unless you develop a certain affinity, a human fellow-feeling, I think you cannot have the necessary empathy. This underlying liking is in most cases a sort of dowry that the historians bring to their task. After all, they rarely choose a theme with which they have not been well acquainted for some time. There are exceptions: I myself was entirely ignorant of Gerlach von Miinchhausen's existence when I began work on the relations between Hanover and England under George II, and lo and behold, the study turned out to have as much a biographical bias as anything I had ever touched on twentieth-century Iraq, Transjordan, or Jordan. I quickly grew a liking, mixed with respect, for the man—the leading minister of Hanover to be sure, but neither a great statesman nor a paragon in any other way. And he had as much charisma as a dish cloth. Conversely, I know that I could not do anything of value that centered on Saddam Husayn's Iraq, or Nasser's Egypt or, for that matter, on Prussia under Frederick the Great. 1 dislike the protagonists, and that is that. My own limitations need not apply to everybody. But I do not recall any biography that I valued when I sensed that the biographer was fundamentally antagonistic to the hero. Here you may ask, what about biographies of Hitler, or Mussolini, or Stalin—those which, by professional consensus, are of high standing? I have no ready answer. With some hesitation I suggest that these works are exceptional in that the biographers strove to give a rational fundament to their previous loathing.

Empathy should follow, provided you put in a lot of time and work over a long period. Empathy may become an obsession that reaches a climax as the job in hand nears fulfillment. The obsession soon fades; I have never heard of a historian suffering permanent damage. But I shall never forget, nor did my wife, how I once awoke in the small hours of the night believing that I was Abd al-Karim Qasim. The delusion passed.

Affinity and empathy are worthless professionally, as opposed to, perhaps, aesthetically, unless they are founded on knowledge—the knowledge of evidence or “facts.” I dislike belaboring the obvious, but there are points that I still have to stress: First, the effort involved in the search. This sounds elementary; it should be, but it is not. Second, the distinction between what your mind must register while you prepare your study and what finally passes all sieves to enter your product. Regarding the former, truly all that comes to your mill except the palpably trivial is grist. (There is no ironclad definition of what is palpably trivial, but we are expected, after all, to exercise some judgment.) I think that it is the blurring of this distinction that gives “facts” the slightly derogatory tang that they commonly have in the profession. There is a phrase in a recent essay on psychohistory that expresses disdain for the “mere recital of facts.”[76] Apart from the context (which I do not find convincing), the idea itself that a “mere recital of facts” is something to be held in disdain disturbs me. Of course we do not want a chronicle of disconnected facts, but is this at issue? We certainly cannot do without considering the secret self, the inner myth, particularly not in biography. Being children of our times, we are less likely to ignore the secret self than to overrate it. Yet I believe that one ounce of fact is worth a ton of speculation. I also believe that “le bon dieu est dans le petit detail”— I have just found the sentiment in Professor Shlomo Ben-Ami’s foreword to the first issue of the Mediterranean Historical Review. Incidentally, the Germans say, “der Teufel steckt im Detail.” God or the devil—it depends on whether you get your detail right or wrong.

You must absorb the ambience through proficiency in the language and personal acquaintance with the surroundings associated with your theme. The former, linguistic proficiency, should be a matter of course, but it is not, and again I will leave it at that. Regarding the latter, the recent years have been both kind and unkind to Israelis. The opening of Egypt is priceless; Morocco may follow soon, and possibly it has already opened up to some extent. Iran has been closed to us since 1979. Turkey is less accessible to Israelis than it used to be. Saddest of all is the increasing difficulty for us Jewish Israelis in creating, and maintaining, meaningful contact with the Arab sector, not merely in the West Bank and Gaza, but even this side of the Green Line. This last phenomenon has of course a significance that transcends our professional interest.

What of the potential sources? The national archives of Middle Eastern countries are closed, so far as I know, to most scholars studying the period since World War I. Still, there is a trend toward greater liberality. Israel adheres to the thirty-years rule, by and large. Jordanian files in eastern Jerusalem and elsewhere in the West Bank are mostly open to research. Professor Hanna Batatu has had access to Iraqi police and security files. Egyptian authorities may give access as a favor to the royal archives at Abdm Palace. Jordanian archives seem to have become more accessible, in certain fields. I will add that for the political historian of the modern Middle East the Western public archives are a pretty good substitute, with their thirty-years rule, and with the even more recent official material that is continuously declassified in the United States along quite liberal lines.

I deem it especially important to put in a word for the much- maligned Arabic press. If there is one professional achievement of which I am proud, it is the use to which I have put the Iraqi press of Qasim’s time, and if there is one negative criticism of my work that I think downright ignorant, it is the criticism that I made use of that press. Indeed, journalism in the Arab world is often the object of censorship, regimentation, bribery, harassment, and outright persecution. But publishers, editors, and plain correspondents have as a matter of self-preservation grown an intelligence superior to that of the authorities, and they often find a way to deliver their messages—whether of fact or of opinion. At least, I would advise the historian to assume that they have found the way, and to look for it. The quest may be astoundingly rewarding. (Lebanon is a special case, in regard to its press as in so much else. Here the researcher’s overriding need is to determine who directs whom, and to what extent.)

Interviews with actors on the stage are an important source in Arab countries that is largely denied to the Israeli historian— largely, though by no means entirely so. I would have given a lot to have talked to General Qasim or to King Husayn. I would have to evaluate their knowledgeability, their frankness, and their truthfulness, but the ability to do so is a test that every historian must pass. For me, it is not to be. I find some comfort in that I am spared one temptation that faces the historian who makes a point of cultivating living sources. I know one colleague, and an eminent colleague at that, whom I suspect of dealing with undue leniency with high-placed interviewees who might, if offended, withhold further cooperation. But mine may be merely a case of sour grapes.

Lastly, I love to gaze at portraits. A good many of course do not tell a thing, but I find that the majority do. And here I will mention the caveats. First, the message of a portrait is personal; your man, or woman, looks at you benevolently, or cunningly, or stupidly—it is all the same photograph, and the reading depends on your individuality, and often on your predisposition. Second, and this of course is an external factor, the message of a portrait depends on the circumstances in which it was taken. Look at Qasim in 1958 and in 1962. The ravages of four years of power, and the corruption of that power, stare from his eyes into ours. But then, the earlier portrait was taken in repose, whereas the latter shows a demagogue in full action. Who can say for certain how far the two are comparable?[77] And who can say whether the frightened little boy propped up against his frightening father’s side has something to tell us about Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi fifty years after?[78] Still, trying to read portraits is a fascinating game, and I would not do without it.

This brings me to autobiographies, or memoirs, and their usefulness to the political historian of the modern Middle East, as distinct from the biographer. As to the incidence—not too bad, so far as my personal interest as a historian is concerned: Abdallah’s Mudhakkirat and the Takmila, King Husayn’s Uneasy Lies the Head and Ma Guerre avec Israel, and works by a few Transjordanian-Jordanian and a host of Iraqi politicians. The direct gain to the political historian is remarkably small. But as you read between the lines, you do gain in the understanding of political processes at work, beyond the actor-writer's personality. Abdallah describing the stewardship of the chief British representative at Amman after 1924, Lieutenant Colonel Henry Cox, as "a difficult time for . . . the Hashemite family," when "much patience was necessary," provides a shattering understatement that helps to explain why Abdallah proved indestructible. And King Husayn abstaining from mentioning with even a single word the Suez Canal nationalization in July 1956 shows how ill-conceived his Arab-nationalist (qawmi) period seemed to him after a few years and, by implication, how ill it must have sat on him even in 1956.

I have said what I wanted to say. I think it is relevant, or else I would not have said it. But I do not want you to think that I have lost my sense of proportion. Gibbon says somewhere that the cardinal virtues in a historian are diligence and accuracy. (I have failed in my attempt to locate the quotation; hence I certainly lack diligence, and probably accuracy.) Gibbon was a political historian with a penchant for the role of the individual, like myself. He was not a historian of the Middle East, but this gives me no special latitude.

 8. A Sampler of Biography and Self-Narrative

Martin Kramer

In A comprehensive survey of Middle Eastern historiography written some fifteen years ago, the historian Albert Hourani determined that "there are almost no satisfactory biographies, even in the modern period." That verdict is less apt today, for there are now numerous biographies, influenced by most major schools of biographical writing, that do satisfy more demanding tastes. Still, major gaps remain. The aim of this sampler is to direct the reader to a number of books in English that are representative of various approaches to biography and self-narrative. This selection is offered as an abbreviated guide to anyone who wishes to compare these approaches, and a practical reading list for courses on Middle Eastern biography, self-narrative, personalities, and leadership. The suggestions are for readers with a primary interest in the modern period. Preference is given to American over British editions, and to the most recent editions or reprints.

The best biographies of Middle Eastern subjects are those of political intellectuals—persons who shaped the ideas of nationalism, reformism, and revolution. The mark left by these figures was often more profound than that of the leaders and rulers who were their contemporaries. And unlike the leaders and rulers, many political intellectuals have left private papers that thoroughly document the evolution of their ideas and politics.

The most prominent figure of this kind was Sayyid Jamal al- Din “al-Afgham,” reckoned as the intellectual precursor of many of the major trends in modern political thought—from reformism to fundamentalism, from nationalism to Pan-Islam. The amount of writing on Afghani is formidable, with even a published bibliography devoted to studies of him. This biographical endeavor culminated in Nikki R. Keddie’s Sayyid Jamal ad-Din “al-Afghani”: A Political Biography (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1972). Keddie’s definitive book, which rests on detective work in many European and Middle Eastern archives, succeeded in dispelling the last wisps of fog that had obscured Afghani’s life and works. It is instructive to compare the full biography to Keddie’s article, “Sayyid Jamal ad-Din ‘al-Afghani’: A Case of Posthumous Charisma?,” in Philosophers and Kings: Studies in Leadership, ed. Dankwart A. Rustow (New York: Braziller, 1970), 148—79. In the article Keddie attempts “a psycho-historical analysis” of Afghani, drawing on theoretical literature on paranoia and its relationship to latent homosexuality. The speculative points made in the article were excluded from the full biography, perhaps because, as Keddie noted, “psychological analyses of heroes are often resented, and doubly so when a non-Muslim Westerner writes about a Muslim Easterner.”

A second example, of comparable worth, is Hamid Algar’s Mirza Malkum Khan: A Study in the History of Iranian Modernism (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1973), which painstakingly reconstructs the winding life of a leading Iranian Muslim reformer and reveals it to be something quite different than historians had hitherto assumed. The author’s tone is clearly hostile toward his subject, who is cast in the role of manipulative charlatan, but the charlatanry is documented with impressive thoroughness.

Yet another example is William Cleveland’s Islam against the West: Shakib Arslan and the Campaign for Islamic Nationalism (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985), a biography of still another Muslim intellectual and activist, who spent the decades between World War I and II in Geneva as a pamphleteer for Arab and Muslim independence. This study tends to extend the benefit of the doubt to the subject, who was enmeshed in intrigue and compromising alliances. The language of the book, however, is a model of balance, and the archival research is thorough. Cleveland, it should be noted, is perhaps the only historian of the modern Middle East to regard himself as a biographer. He is the author of an earlier study of another political intellectual, The Making of an Arab Nationalist: Otto-manism and Arabism in the Life and Thought of Sat? al-Husri (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1971); Cleveland is now preparing a biography of George Antonius.

There are a number of other stimulating biographies of intellectuals. Particularly noteworthy is the study by Charles D. Smith, Islam and the Search for Social Order in Modern Egypt: A Biography of Muhammad Husayn Haykal (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983), which is presented as a “social biography.” Two examples of shorter studies, which fall somewhere between biography and intellectual portraiture, are Uriel Heyd’s Foundations of Turkish Nationalism: The Life and Teachings of Ziya Gokalp (London: Luzac, 1950) and Irene L. Gendzier’s The Practical Visions of Ya[c]qub Santf (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1966). Many of the most important figures in Middle Eastern intellectual history have not yet had their lives written in English, including such central thinkers as Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida. There are, however, shorter sketches of such thinkers, the best known being Albert Hourani’s Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983).

Autobiographies by intellectuals are numerous, but the available English translations are few. Particularly valuable, therefore, are Salama Musa's The Education of Salama Musa (Leiden: Brill, 1961) and Ahmad Amin's My Life: The Autobiography of an Egyptian Scholar, Writer and Cultural Leader (Leiden: Brill, 1978). One such work that has always been one of the most popular books for the teaching of Arabic in America is Taha Husayn's autobiography, published in parts and in various editions as An Egyptian Childhood, The Stream of Days, and A Passage to France. Recently the book has been reinterpreted in Fedwa Malti-Douglas's Blindness and Autobiography: Al-Ayyam of Taha Husayn (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988), a work that also has much to say on broader questions of self-narrative.

The modern rulers and leaders of the Middle East have been less well served by biographers. In many cases, the necessary source materials are inaccessible, even for rulers whose dynasties have long since disappeared. None of the major modernizing rulers of the nineteenth century has been the subject of a first-rate biography, although the lives of some have been sketched as part of an overall discussion of their reforms. Noteworthy among such works are the studies by Stanford J. Shaw, Between Old and New: The Ottoman Empire under Sultan Se- Um III, 1789—1807 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971); by L. Carl Brown, The Tunisia of Ahmad Bey, 18371855 (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974); and by Afaf Lutfi Sayyid-Marsot, Egypt in the Reign of Muhammad Ali (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984). In each of these books, a powerful individual stands at center stage, although none of these studies is conceived or executed as a full biography. The limitations in writing about palace lives are perhaps best evoked by Franz Babinger in his monumental Mehmed the Conqueror and His Time (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978): "It is even more difficult to obtain a reliable portrait of Mehmed the man than of Mehmed the ruler. Any attempt to derive a complete picture of his character and personality from the statements of contemporaries and chance observers is a hazardous undertaking. Nearly everything that was said of him in his lifetime reflected either boundless, slavish admiration and deification or hatred and contempt." In such circumstances, the custom has always been to write not just the life but the times, often with emphasis on the latter.

The last and most visible of the palace lives, those lived in the last decades of the nineteenth century, could prove to be exceptions, but they have not yet received scholarly attention. Perhaps the most compelling among them is the “Red Sultan,” Abdiilhamid II—the remarkable product of a once-great Ottoman palace system in decline, and a personality marked by calculating shrewdness and scarred by fear. His life has inspired a few biographical studies by amateurs. Alma Wittlin’s Abdul Hamid: The Shadow of God (London: John Lane the Bodley Head, 1940) presents itself as a “psychological study,” based “especially on the unpublished testimony of persons who once formed a part of the Sultan’s entourage—members of the imperial family, officials, palace-secretaries, sons of members of the Government and women of the Harem.” This work has been described more than once as a biographical novel, although it is not without art. The later book by Joan Haslip, The Sultan: The Life of Abdul Hamid II (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1973), does not take the story much further. The richness of the Ottoman archives, with the large number of administrative and personal documents that the sultan himself generated, now makes Abdiilhamid II a prime candidate for a scholarly biography. Nasir al-Din Shah, the Qajar ruler of Iran during roughly the same period, is an equally worthy subject for a biography, and one is now reportedly in preparation by Abbas Amanai. This potential is ably evoked by Ehsan Yar-Shater in “Observations on Nasir al-Din Shah,” in Qajar Iran, ed. E. Bosworth and C. Hillenbrand (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1983), 3-13. There are still no scholarly biographies of the ambitious Khedives Isma'il and Abbas Hilmi of Egypt.

The rulers and leaders who rose to preeminence after the collapse of the Ottoman and Qajar empires have inspired a number of amateur and journalistic biographies. Fewer scholarly biographies have been attempted and the distinction between the two approaches is often quite striking. Although historians prefer documentarv materials and sometimes would rather wait until their subject has spoken his or her last, journalists are most at home with the interview and actually prefer to examine living and breathing subjects. The great merit of journalistic biographies is that they often contain rare information and insights. Often they are beautifully written and are free of theorizing jargon. Their principal defect is their tendency to judge their subjects with sometimes unabashed partisanship, and always with haste (for journalists must rush to press). It is often a worthwhile exercise to compare biographies by journalists, written at close range, to accounts of the same lives written by scholars more remote from their subjects. The instances that lend themselves to direct comparison are few but will be noted below

For the Arab Fertile Crescent, many major figures have not yet found their biographers. Particularly striking is the absence of serious biographies for the Hashemites, including Sharif (later King) Husayn and his son Faysal, who ruled briefly in Damascus and established the (short-lived) Hashemite dynasty in Baghdad. Lord Birdwood's Nuri as-Said: A Study in Arab Leadership (London: Cassell, 1959) is an openly sympathetic account of one of Faysal's chief lieutenants, based on long talks with the subject. The author, however, chose to avoid inquiry into "the details of family life," because they were of "little interest" to the subject himself, and "I would rather this record was in accordance with the wishes of the great man concerned than that it should offer sensational attraction"—a remarkable concession for any biographer to make to a subject. Later rulers in Baghdad still have few biographers. Uriel Dann's Iraq under Qassem: A Political History, 1958-1963 (New York: Praeger, 1969) sets the man in his context but is not intended as a full biography. A line of biographers of Saddam Husayn formed quickly after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990. The best of these works to date is Efraim Karsh and Inari Rautsi's Saddam Hussein: A Political Biography (New York: Free Press, 1991).

Jordan's more enduring branch of the Hashemite line has been considered in Mary C. Wilson's King Abdullah, Britain and the Making of Jordan (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987). This is a hostile portrait of an 'Abdallah consumed by an ambition that ultimately consumed Palestine as well. However, the work does not pretend to be a full biography and sketches Abdallah only in such detail as its argument requires. For King Husayn, there is only James Lunt's Hussein of Jordan: Searching for a Just and Lasting Peace (New York: Morrow, 1989). Lunt does "not doubt that my admiration for the King will be evident"—so much so that he is compelled to add that the biography was not commissioned, although it was "written with the King's agreement."

Two biographies of Syria's president, Hafiz al-Asad, provide an opportunity to compare the work of journalist and scholar. Patrick Seale's Asad of Syria: The Struggle for the Middle East (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989) is “not an official biography” but one very much indebted to the personal rapport established between the journalist and his subject. Contrast this with Moshe Ma’oz’s Asad: The Sphinx of Damascus (New York: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1988), written at double the distance by an Israeli academic. Few Lebanese leaders have inspirational qualities that transcend sect, but the life of one has been artfully told in Fouad Ajami’s The Vanished Imam: Musa al Sadr and the Shia of Lebanon (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1986). The author has based his work largely on interviews with those who were close to his subject, and the portrait is admiring but not overbearing.

It is difficult to say the same for the work done on Palestinian leaders. Philip Mattar’s The Mufti of Jerusalem: Muhammad Amin al-Husavni and the Palestine Question (New York: Columbia University Press, 1988) strikes one possible balance of interpretation but is very thin on important and controversial chapters in the mufti’s life. Thomas Kiernan’s Arafat: The Man and the Myth (New York: Norton, 1976) creates a few myths of its own by getting facts wrong. Alan Hart’s Arafat: A Political Biography (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989) casts its subject in a heroic light; this work is an “epic story” cataloging the “miracle of his leadership” and has embarrassed even some of Arafat’s admirers. For Arafat’s Palestinian rivals, little material is available. An example of the rather dubious genre of the intelligence biography, which relies on privileged leaks, is Yossi Melman’s The Master Terrorist: True Story of Abu Nidal (New York: Adama Books, 1986).

Nowhere have the amateur biographers served their subjects so uncritically as in their accounts of the House of Saud. David Howarth’s The Desert King: A Life oflbn Saud (London: Collins, 1964) is the most independent-minded study of the founder of the present kingdom, and still it lionizes the “desert king” and mourns the corruption of his heirs. Those heirs have not been examined by discriminating eyes, but the existing studies do include much useful grist. Such is the case with Gerald de Gaury’s Faisal: King of Arabia (London: Arthur Barker, 1966), which salutes Saudi Arabia’s “good fortune in having Faisal, the boy from Najd, now King, as guide.” Vincent Sheean’s Faisal: The King and His Kingdom (Tavistock, England: Butler, 1975) was written out of personal friendship, and this fact clearly shows. Biography by “friends” is perhaps the inevitable first step on the road to more diverse representations but is arguably more an obstacle than a useful preface to critical work.

King Faruq of Egypt has yet to find his biographer, although he would make a fascinating subject given his popular reputation for extravagance and debauchery—and the more important fact that his reign was pivotal to Egypt’s transformation by revolution. A rather uneven first effort is Barrie St. Clair McBride’s Farouk of Egypt (New York: A. S. Barnes, 1968). In contrast, Nasser has been the subject of many biographies, both by journalists and scholars. There is, for example, Jean Lacouture’s Nasser, A Biography (New York: Knopf, 1973), a lucid account colored, as he says, with a “critical sympathy” for Nasser. Compare it to P. J. Vatikiotis’s Nasser and His Generation (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1978), which is longer on criticism and shorter on sympathy. Nasser’s successor is virtually skewered in David Hirst and Irene Beeson’s Sadat (London: Faber and Faber, 1981), a work by two journalists that is sometimes little more than an eloquent diatribe against their subject. “Sadat was by no means the world’s most absolute ruler,” they write, “but his career illustrated, in a remarkable way, how far the personal can predominate over the political and, when the personal is as peculiar as it was in him, what perversities, in the name of policy, can then ensue.” Contrast this with Raphael Israeli’s Man of Defiance: A Political Biography of Anwar Sadat (Totowa, N.J.: Barnes and Noble Books, 1985), which claims only to evoke Sadat’s “thinking, his hesitations, his fears, his images and the reasoning behind his acts,” without “delving into value judgments of any sort.” Still, this work finds him more hero than buffoon.

Ataturk is the subject of a vast amount of biographical writing in Turkish and of two important biographies in English. Lord Kinross’s Ataturk (New York: Morrow, 1965) is an impressively researched biography that draws on the recollections of many who knew and worked under Ataturk. Its perspective is naturally admiring. The study by Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz, The Immortal Ataturk: A Psychobiography (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984), is no less admiring of Ataturk’s achievements but seeks to establish a very different explanation of motive by its reliance on psychoanalytic theory.

For Ataturk’s Iranian contemporary, Reza Shah, there is nothing comparable. Donald N. Wilber’s Riza Shah Pahlavi: The Resurrection and Reconstruction of Iran, 1878—1944 (Hicksville, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1975) is an uninspired narrative. Farhad Diba’s Mohammad Mossadegh: A Political Biography (London: Croom Helm, 1986) is a straightforward narrative based on Mossadegh’s writings and on British and American archives. Mossadegh, a complex man, now warrants still more complex treatment. A different approach has been taken in Marvin Zonis’s Majestic Failure: The Fall of the Shah of Iran (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991), which addresses Mohammad Reza Shah’s conduct during the Iranian revolution from a psychoanalytic vantage point. Although the book is not intended as a full biography, it does develop an innovative line of biographical inquiry. At present, Ayatollah Khomeini is the subject only of journalistic treatments: Amir Taheri’s The Spirit of Allah: Khomeini and the Islamic Revolution (Bethesda, Md.: Adler and Adler, 1986) and Baqer Moin’s Khomeini: Sign of God (London: Tauris, 1991). Hamid Algar and Marvin Zonis are reportedly working on more thorough studies. In the meantime, it is useful to compare two sketches of Khomeini’s early years, one by Michael M. J.

Fischer, “Imam Khomeini: Four Levels of Understanding,” in Voices of Resurgent Islam, ed. John L. Esposito (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983), 150—74; and the less-speculative and more reverential interpretation by Hamid Algar, “Imam Khomeini, 1902-1962: The Pre-revolutionary Years,” in Islam, Politics, and Social Movements, ed. Edmund Burke III and Ira M. Lapidus (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1988), 263—88.

Such biographical portraiture pretends to less than full biography, although the penetrating portrait can be a miniature work of art in the right hands. Majid Khadduri offers two volumes of (rather uncritical) sketches of Middle Eastern leaders: Arab Contemporaries: The Role of Personalities in Politics (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973) and Arab Personalities in Politics ('Washington. D.C.: Middle East Institute, 1981). More recently, a collection of sketches of Middle Eastern leaders, relating personality to performance in a single crisis, has been assembled by Barbara Kellerman and Jeffrey Z. Rubin, eds. Leadership and Negotiation in the Middle East (New York: Praeger, 1988). Finally, over seventy sketches by almost as many hands have been collected by Bernard Reich, ed. Political Leaders of the Contemporary Middle East and North Africa: A Biographical Dictionary (New York: Greenwood Press, 1990). The entries are substantial enough to warrant description as sketches and include short bibliographies, providing a useful starting point for students seeking inspiration for assignments.

Students interested in Middle Eastern rulers and leaders should also give due attention to the self-serving autobiographies and memoirs of these leaders, such as Ismail Kemal Bey's The Memoirs of Ismail Kemal Bey (London: Constable, 1920); Djemal Pasha's Memories of a Turkish Statesman, 1913-1919 (New York: Arno Press, 1973); King Abdallah's Memoirs of King Abdullah of Transjordan (London: Cape, 1950) and the sequel, My Memoirs Completed "Al Takmilah" (New York: Longman, 1978); King Husayn's Uneasy Lies the Head: The Autobiography of His Majesty King Hussein I of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (New York: Bernard Geis Associates, 1962); Anwar Sadat's In Search of Identity: An Autobiography (New York: Harper and Row, 1978); Mohammad Reza Shah's Mission for My Country (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961) and his Answer to History (New York: Stein and Day, 1980); and Abu Iyad's My Home, My Land, written with Eric Rouleau (New York: Times Books, 1981). The list could be lengthened considerably.

Beyond the world of thinkers and leaders are the men and women usually excluded from history, people who, despite their obscurity, can personify a social order or revolution from below. This kind of telling is often associated with anthropology but also has been done by journalists and even historians. One example of this approach is Dale F. Eickelman's Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a TwentiethCentury Notable (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985), which is an anthropologist's view of the way political and social change is played out in the life of one learned man. Roy Mot- tahedeh's The Mantle of the Prophet: Religion and Politics in Iran (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1985) is a historian's telling of the life of an Iranian cleric, one "Ali Hashemi"—"a real person whose wish to remain anonymous I have scrupulously respected."

The account is intermingled with discursive asides on Perso-Islamic history and contemporary Iranian culture. Richard Critchfield's Shahhat: An Egyptian (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1978) is a journalist's account of events in a young villager's life, as witnessed by the author or recounted to him, a study that borders on literature. "In the end," writes Critchfield, "all study of human beings lies in a borderland between science and art and the difference between the journalist and the anthropologist is one of degree; one mixes some science with his art, the other some art with his science." This apology has not been universally accepted. The book should be read with the article by Timothy Mitchell, "The Invention and Reinvention of the Egyptian Peasant," International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 22 (May 1990): 129— 50, a critique that accuses Critchfield of racism, plagiarism, and ahistoricism (this last charge, of course, being the privilege of the historian). This article will not be the last word in the controversy.

The amount of published self-narrative by the people overlooked by history is small, and even less is available in English translation. These works include Re§at Nuri Giintekin's The Autobiography of a Turkish Girl, trans. Wyndham Deedes (London: Allen and Unwin, 1949), and Muhammad [c]Ali Ja- malzadeh's Isfahan Is Half the World: Memories of a Persian Boyhood, trans. W. L. Heston (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1983). A self-narrative, of course, need not be literary, or even the work of a literate person; it can sometimes be presented through the mediation of a listener. One example is Vincent Crapanzano's Tuhami: Portrait of a Moroccan (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980), a highly experimental account of the author's encounter with an illiterate Moroccan Arab tilemaker. Most of the text is an annotated self-narrative by Tuhami himself, a revelation rich in allusion and embellishment, so that Tuhami is as much a self-portrait as a portrait. The serious student of biography will want to range even further for comparisons and inspiration, from biographical writing on subjects in other cultural contexts to the burgeoning theoretical and methodological literature and the specialized journals devoted to biography. Any interested reader will have no difficulty finding a point of entry into this literature. A beginning can be made in the outstanding periodic bibliography of the quarterly journal Biography, which is published by the Biographical Research Center. Less-systematic inspiration can be had by browsing in specialty bookstores, like New York's Biography Bookshop.

Supplementary reading may be found in the biographies of the many figures from beyond the Middle East who left their impress on the history of the region. Notable among these figures are the English, from proconsuls to travelers, who made careers of the Middle East. Their diaries and letters, often preserved xn their entirety, have supported some impressively thorough (and readable) biographies. An example is Elizabeth Longford's A Pilgrimage of Passion: The Life of Wilfrid Scawen Blunt (New York: Knopf, 1980). The late Lady Longford was one of the most prolific biographers of Victorian subjects. Among the fifty or so biographies of T. E. Lawrence, the most important landmarks are the passionately hostile assault by Richard Aldington, Lawrence of Arabia: A Biographical Inquiry (New York: Greenwood Press, 1976); the psychobiography by John E. Mack, A Prince of Our Disorder: The Life of T. E. Lawrence (Boston: Little, Brown, 1978); and the massive narrative by Jeremy Wilson, Lawrence of Arabia: The Authorized Biography of T. E. Lawrence (New York: Atheneum, 1990), which is meant to save Lawrence from the debunkers and psychologizers. These should be read in conjunction with Elie Kedourie's "Colonel Lawrence and His Biographers," in Kedourie's Islam and the Modern World (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1981), 261-75—largely a refutation of Mack's work. Another landmark biography is Elizabeth Monroe's Philby of Arabia (London: Faber and Faber, 1973). H. V. F. Winstone has made the biography of the English among the Arabs into his special trade, by writing Captain Shakespear: A Portrait (New York: Quartet Books, 1978), Gertrude Bell (New York: Quartet Books, 1978), and Leachman: "OC Desert": The Life of Lieutenant-Colonel Gerard Leachman D.S.O. (New York: Quartet Books, 1982). The reader will also find many subtle sketches of the English in the Middle East; among the most evocative are Albert Hourani's essays on Wilfrid Scawen Blunt and H. A. R. Gibb, in his Europe and the Middle East (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1980).

Not to be overlooked are the many biographies of Zionist leaders, who left behind vast collections of intimate materials that have inspired several modern, thoroughly documented biographies. On Theodor Herzl are the studies by Amos Elon, Herzl (New York: Schocken Books, 1986^, and by Ernst Pawel, The Labyrinth of Exile: A Life of Theodor Herzl (New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1989). These may be supplemented with the provocative sketch by Peter Loewenberg, “Theodor Herzl: Nationalism and Politics,” in his Decoding the Past: The Psychohistorical Approach (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1985), 101-35. So rich is the documentation for the lives of many Zionist leaders that many of their biographers have produced multivolume works. Particularly noteworthy are the first volumes published by Jehuda Reinharz, Chaim Weizmann: The Making of a Zionist Leader (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985), and by Shabtai Teveth, Ben-Gurion: The Burning Ground, 1886—1948 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987). Additional volumes will follow. Anita Shapira’s Berl: The Biography of a Socialist Zionist (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985) is an English distillation of a larger multivolume biography in Hebrew, and an example of the full potential of intellectual biography. And on and on, ad (almost) infinitum.

 Notes

3. Autobiography and Biography in the Middle East: A Plea for Psychopolitical Studies

The author wishes to thank Mr. Cyrus Amir-Mokri of the Department of History of the University of Chicago for his valuable assistance in the preparation of this paper. Mrs. Layla Kassem of the Committee on Human Development of the university was also helpful.

2. Traditional Islamic Learning and Ideas of the Person in the Twentieth Century

Arabic names and terms are transliterated from classical or spoken Arabic according to context. The author thanks Deborah Hodges for comments on this essay.

[1] See Maxime Rodinson, “A Critical Survey of Modern Studies on Muhammad,” in Studies on Islam, ed. and trans. Merlin L. Swartz (New York: Oxford University Press, 1981), 23—85.

[2] Hamilton A. R. Gibb, “Problems of Modern Middle Eastern History,” in Studies on the Civilization of Islam, ed. Stanford J. Shaw and William R. Polk (1956; Boston: Beacon, 1962), 340—41.

[3] Albert Hourani, “The Present State of Islamic and Middle Eastern Historiography,” in Europe and the Middle East (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1980), 163, 191.

[4] Peter Gran, “Political Economy as a Paradigm for the Study of Islamic History,” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies n (1980): 512.

[5] Gertrude Himmelfarb, “Some Reflections on the New History,” American Historical Review 94, no. 3 (June 1989): 662.

[6] Malcolm Yapp, “More Enigma Than Statesman” (review article including Patrick Seale, Asad: The Struggle for Syria, and Moshe Ma’oz, Asad: The Sphinx of Damascus'), Times Literary Supplement, November 4—10, 1988.

[7] L. Carl Brown, The Tunisia of Ahmad Bey, 1837—1855 (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974), 161. See also E. Levy-Provengal, Les historiens des chorfa (Paris: Librairie Orientaliste Paul Geuthner, 1922.), 11; and Abdallah Laroui, L ideologic arabe contemporaine (Paris: Francois Maspero, 1967), 19-28.

[8] The analogy of the Iranian clerics to Ronald Reagan is Yann Richard s (personal communication, June 2, 1987). For Egypt, see Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: The Prophet and Pharaoh, trans. Jon Rothschild (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1986), 99—101, 173. See also Dale F. Eickelman, “National Identity and Religious Discourse in Contemporary Oman,” International Journal of Islamic and Arabic Studies 6 (1989): pp. 1— 20.

[9] See Allan Christelow, Muslim Law Courts and the French Colonial State in Algeria (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985), no. For an authoritative survey of ulama throughout the Maghrib, see Pessah Shinar, “ ‘Ulama’, Marabouts and Government: An Overview of Their Relationships in the French Colonial Maghrib,” in Religion and Government in the World of Islam, ed. Joel L. Kraemer and Hai Alon, Israel Oriental Studies, vol. 10 (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University, 1980), 211—29.

[10] See Dale F. Eickelman, “Religion in Polity and Society,” in The Political Economy of Morocco, ed. I. William Zartman (New York: Praeger, 1987), 84-97.

[11] Three manuscripts by al-Tha[c]alibi (a.d. 961—1038), Tarjama al-Shu^ara^, Tarjama al-katib fi adab al-sahib, and Tarjama al-Mut- tanabi, use the term in their titles, whereas al-Yaqut’s (d. a.d. 1229) Mu[1] jam al-Udaha[3], ed. D. S. Margoliouth (Cairo: Dar Ihya’ al-turath al-Arabi, 1936), 26-27, refers to scholars prior to himself, such as Abu Abbas ibn Yahya al-Shaybani, whose writings date from the ninth century. I am grateful to Adel Sulaiman Gamal of the University of Arizona for bringing these references to my attention.

[12] See Dale F. Eickelman, Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a Twentieth-Century Notable (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985), 59-65; and Dale F. Eickelman, “Religious Knowledge in Inner Oman,” Journal of Oman Studies 6 (1983):

166— 67. On the association of literacy with other attributes of high status in the Yemen, see Brinkley Messick, “Legal Documents and the Concept of ‘Restricted Literacy’ in a Traditional Society,” International Journal of the Sociology of Language 42 (1983): 43-44.

[13] J. S. La Fontaine, “Person and Individual: Some Anthropological Reflections,” in The Category of the Person, ed. Michael Carrithers, Steven Collins, and Steven Lukes (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985), 124, 126, 133.

[14] Marcel Mauss, “A Category of the Human Mind: The Notion of Person; The Notion of Self” (orig. 1938), in ibid., 14.

[15] Ibid., 13—14, 18—32.

[16] Abu Ja[c]far Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari, Ta’rikh, ed. Muhammad Abu Fadil Ibrahim (Cairo: Dar al-Ma[c]arif, 1964), 1937.

[17] Mukhtar al-Susi’s al-Ma[c]sul (Casablanca: al-Najah Press, 1961), a compendium of tarjamas, contains numerous entries that cumulatively suggest that many men of learning come from households in which the father or another close relative is literate and takes an active role in encouraging Qur’anic recitation.

[18] On genealogical representations of self, see Abdelahad Sebti, “Au Maroc: Sharifisme citadin, charisme et historiographic,” An- nales: Economies, Societes, Civilisations 41, no. 2 (March-April 1986): 433—57; the cited “modern” autobiographies are Taha Hussein, The Stream of Days, trans. Hilary Waymont (London: Longmans, Green, and Co., 194.8); and Malek Bennabi, Memoires d’un temoin du siecle (Algiers: Editions Nationales Algeriennes, 1965).

[19] For example, Allal al-Fasi, al-Naqd al-dhati, 5th ed. (1952; Rabat: al-Risala Press, 1979).

[20] Consider, for example, the profile of Palestinian religious activists offered by Jean-Francois Legrain, in “Islamites et lutte nationale Palestinienne dans les territoires occupes par Israel,” Revue Frangais de Science Politique 36, no. 2 (April 1986): 241-43—young and well- educated compared to the general population, deprived of all hope of “social integration,” and often rural in origin. Despite the religious commitment of activists, their pamphlets and slogans rarely cite the Qur’an or hadith literature.

[21] Ahmad Mansuri’s tarjama was written between 1962 and 1963 at the request of a schoolteacher assigned to Bzu. The teacher came from Tetouan, the former capital of Morocco’s Spanish zone, and became interested in local history. Abd al-Rahman Mansuri’s tarjama was prepared at my request in 1976. It is a short document of two pages, brief in part because of extensive interviews carried out over several years and described at length in Eickelman, Knowledge and Power in Morocco. Ahmad al-Bu Ayyashi’s tarjama, a document of six single-spaced pages in Arabic, was written in 1976.

[22] Interview, northern Oman, June 8, 1980.

[23] “Kitab tabsirat al-mu[c]tabirin fi ta’rikh al-Abriyin” [Book for the enlightenment of passers-by on the history of the Abriyin]. The manuscript is undated but from internal evidence was composed between 1956 and 1958—59. The first page of the manuscript states: “Copy finished 1378 [a.d. 1958—59] by Sa[c]id bin Abd Allah bin Muhammad al-Daghghari, by order of Shaykh Muhammad bin Amir.” The manuscript is in the possession of Jabir Musa al-Abri, Nizwa.

[24] On several occasions in 1979 and 1980, and again in 1982,1 saw Shaykh Ibrahim’s manuscript and similar ones being publicly read by men of learning. These readings took place in tribal guest houses, with other men of learning present, in addition to tribespeople and other interested onlookers. Occasionally particular points in the manuscript were clarified or discussed among senior participants.

[25] For example, shurafc?, recognized descendants of the Prophet Muhammad through his daughter Fatima, were exempt from taxation and from corvee labor, among other privileges, prior to the protectorate.

[26] One of these is the support of his father and tribe for Abd al- Krim al-Khattabi, who was a qadi in Spanish Melilla prior to his revolt, and thus in a role not dissimilar to that of Bu Ayyashi. It is interesting that of Bu Ayyashi's personally established ties with the nationalists, he emphasizes those with leaders in former French Morocco instead of the former Spanish zone, where he spent all of his career after 1937. Although his sentiments are undoubtedly nationalistic, it is possible that his persona as a Muslim nationalist was better supported by claims to linkages less susceptible to verification in the northern zone itself. For an example of the biography of an early- twentieth-century Moroccan man of learning that also skillfully bridges the divide between nationalism and reformism within the format of the tarjama, see Abd Allah Jirari, al-Muhaddith al-hafiz Abu Shu'ayb al-Dukkali (Jadida and Casablanca: al-Najah Press, 1976), one of a series of books in a similar format on "Moroccan Personalities." The series itself suggests that the tarjama as a literary form still commands a significant audience in Morocco.

[27] Karl J. Weintraub, "Autobiography and Historical Consciousness," Critical Inquiry 1, no. 4 (1974-75): 814.

[28] Ibid., 821—22.

[29] In referring to the Middle East, this author means to include the Arabic-speaking states, Turkey, and Iran. Israel is specifically excluded, not because it is not part of the Middle East in a geographical or political sense, but because it is not considered a part of the Middle East in a cultural sense in terms of the central themes of this paper. Clearly, this geographical construct is of limited utility. It is posed at a level of abstraction that is so great as to nearly vitiate its utility— nearly, but not entirely. Appreciating the level of abstraction, one can still, as argued here, produce useful generalization. The same is true for the construct of the West.

Equally adamant disclaimers have to be made for the use of the generalization “culture” when speaking of the Middle East. There is no single Middle Eastern culture—whether Israel is or is not considered part of the region—but three principal cultural arenas in addition to the culture(s) of the state of Israel. Each of these major cultures is unified only at a particular level of abstraction that may not be useful for scholarly purposes. There are also countless minor cultures that are not part of the four major cultures of the region.

For the purposes of this paper, “culture” will be used to refer to the aggregated cultures of the Persian-, Turkish-, and Arabic-speaking areas of the Middle East. The reader must appreciate the author’s serious reservations about the meaningfulness of the construct, while appreciating the efficiencies in writing that can nonetheless be achieved by retaining the concept.

[30] Literary works from the region that appear to adhere more closely to Weintraub’s criteria for “true autobiography” than do most other Middle Eastern examples include the following: In Arabic, Ahmad Amin, Hayati (Cairo: Maktabat al-Nahdah al-Misriyah, 1961); 'Abd al-'Aziz Fahmi, Hadhihi Hayati (Cairo: Dar al-Hilal, 1963); Taha Husayn, al-Ayyam, z vols. (Cairo: Dar al-Ma'arif, 1966); and Ahmad Lufti al-Sayyid, Qissat Hayat (Cairo: Dar al-Hilal, 1962). For a general introduction to this genre in Arabic, see ‘Ali 'Abduh Barakat, Ftirafat Udaba^ina fi Siyarihim al-Dhatiyah (Jidda: Tihama Publications, 1982). In Persian, Qasim Ghani, YacPdashPha-yi Duktur Qasim-i Ghani, vol. 1 (London: Cyrus Ghani, distributed by Ithaca Press, 1980); Muhammad ‘Ali Jamalzadeh, Isfahan Is Half the World: Memories of a Persian Boyhood, trans. W. L. Heston (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1983); and Ahmao Kasravi, Zindigani-i Man (Tehran: Jar, 1976). Included with these works must be the following, of a somewhat different order: Mohammad Reza Shah, Mission For My Country (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961); and Ashraf Pahlavi, Faces in a Mirror: Memoirs from Exile (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1980). In Turkish, Halide Edibe Adivar. Memoirs of Halide Edibe (New York: Arno Press, 1972); and Re§at Nuri Giin- tekin, The Autobiography of a Turkish Girl, trans. Wyndham Deedes (London: Allen and Unwin, 1949).

[31] There are, of course, some. For Persian biographies, see, for example, Nasrullah Falsafi, Zindigani-i Shah Abbas-i Awal, 4 vols. (Tehran: Kitab-i Kayhan, 1962); Muhammad Husayn MaymadPni- zhad, Zindigi-i Pur Majara-i Nader Shah (Tehran: Saziman-i Inti- sharat-i Javidan, 1966); Abdul Husayn Nava’i, Sharh-i Hal-i Abbas Mirza Mulk’ara (Tehran: Intisharat-i Babak, 1976); Akbar-i Hash- emi-i Rafsanjani, Amir Kabir Ya Qahriman-i Mubarizeh Ba IstPmar (Tehran: Mu’asiseh’i Matbu‘ati-i Faranahi, 1967); Isma‘il Ra’in, Hay- dar Khan Amu Ghuli (Tehran: Saziman-i Intisharat-i Javidan, 1973); Isma‘il Ra'in,Mirza Malkum Khan (Tehran: Bungah-i Matbu‘ati-i Safi ‘Ali Shah, 1971); and Rahimzadeh-i Safavi, Zindigani-i Shah Isma[c]il- i Safavi (Tehran: Ketab Forushi-i Khayyam, 1961).

[32] Weintraub, “Autobiography and Historical Consciousness,” 821.

[33] Abdallah Laroui, The Crisis of the Arab Intellectual: Traditionalism or Historicism? (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University ot California Press, 1976).

[34] Weintraub, “Autobiography and Historical Consciousness,” 826.

[35] These works are Fouad Ajami, The Vanished Imam: Musa al Sadr and the Shia of Lebanon (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1986); Vincent Crapanzano, Tuhami: Portrait of a Moroccan (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980); Roy Mottahedeh, The Mantle of the Prophet: Religion and Politics in Iran (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1985); and Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz, The Immortal Ataturk: A Psychobiography (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984).

[36] Crapanzano, Tuhami, 136.

[37] Ibid., 7.

[38] Ibid., 124.

[39] Weintraub, “Autobiography and Historical Consciousness,” 824.

[40] I have referred to this enterprise as “psychopolitical studies” because the term captures the nature of the effort to use psychology to understand political phenomena. For the reasons suggested, psychobiography is inadequate, but so are psychohistory and psychosocial studies, since both of the latter fail to specify the domain of inquiry as political. As infelicitous as the term psychopolitical studies is, it appears to best capture the nature of the intellectual enterprise here being advocated.

[41] Marvin Zonis, Majestic Failure: The Fall of the Shah of Iran (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991). It is recognized that a variety of other, equally legitimate studies of the revolution could have been done. Almost nothing has been written, for example, from the point of view of the winners: nothing about the organization of the principal actors in the victorious coalition, their financing, and the precise leadership role of Ayatollah Khomeini and others. In addition, a study of the revolution could usefully adopt a more explicitly group focus.

[42] This is not the place for a detailed explanation of how the character structure of the Shah and the steps he took to provide himself with narcissistic supplies significantly helped to produce the rage of the Iranian people that fed the revolution. But by the 1970s, the Iranian people appear to have become ever less tolerant of the Shah’s ever increasing efforts to sustain his narcissistic balance. One such effort— his grandiosity and all that flowed from it—was especially offensive to them.

[43] One unconventional distinction between the physical and the social sciences, that concerning the role of prediction, may disappear with a new formulation of the physical sciences, a formulation based on the study of nonlinearity. For a description of nonlinearity, see Frank M. Richter, “Nonlinear Behavior,” in Metatheory in Social Science, ed. Donald W. Fiske and Richard A. Shweder (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986). For a description of the “new science” see James Gleick, Chaos, Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

[44] William M. Runyan, Life Histories and Psychobiography: Explorations in Theory and Method (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982), 127.

[45] Ibid., quoting here from D. B. Bromley.

[46] Hans-Georg Gadamer, “The Problem of Historical Consciousness,” in Interpretive Social Sciences: A Reader, ed. P. Rabinow and W. Sullivan (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1979), 116 (emphasis in the original). What precisely Gadamer means to suggest by the use of “true” is puzzling in this context.

[47] See the brilliant study of terrorism by Richard E. Rubenstein, Alchemists of the Revolution: Terrorism in the Modern World (New York Basic Books, 1987).

[48] See the important psychopolitical study by the Committee on International Relations, Self-Involvement in the Middle East Crisis, vol. 10, no. 103 (New York: Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry, November 1978).

[49] Crapanzano, Tuhami, 130.

[50] Runyan, Life Histories, 150.

[51] Peter Winch, “Understanding a Primitive Society,” American Philosophical Quarterly 1 (1964): 307-24, passim; E. D. Hirsch, “Old and New in Hermeneutics,” in his The Aims of Interpretation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), 33.

[52] For an article that argues the similarity of problems of interpretation and thus validity in the natural sciences and hermeneutics, see Mary Hesse, “In Defence of Objectivity,” Proceedings of the British Academy 68 (1972): 275-92.

[53] Roy Schater, “Narration in Psychoanalytic Dialogue,” Critical Inquiry 7 (Autumn 1980): 30. For a fascinating argument that another source of the “assumptions” is the language itself, see Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth Century Europe (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973), especially the section “Poetics and History.” If White is correct (and he presents a compelling argument), then the difficulties of cross-cultural investigations are greater than we had previously imagined.

[54] Donald Polkinghorne, Methodology for the Human Sciences (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983), 241.

[55] Carlo Antoni, From History to Sociology, trans. Hayden V. White (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1959).

[56] Vamik D. Volkan and Norman Itzkowitz, The Immortal Ataturk: A Psychobiography (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984).

[57] Vamik D. Volkan, “Problems of Methodology in Psychoanalytic Biography” (Paper presented at panel, “Freud’s Vision: Key Issues in the Methodology of Applied Psychoanalysis,” fall meeting of the American Psychoanalytic Association, New York, December 1986).

[58] William G. Niederland, “The Naming of America,” in The Unconscious Today: Essays in Honor of Max Schur, ed. M. Kanzer (New York: International Universities Press, 1971), 459-72.

[59] Peter Gay, Freud, A Life for Our Time (New York: Norton, 1988).

[60] Sigmund Freud, Leonardo da Vinci and a Memory of His Childhood, in Standard Edition, vol. n (1910; London: Hogarth Press, 1967), 130.

[61] Vamik D. Volkan, The Need to Have Enemies and Allies: From Clinical Practice to International Relations (Northvale, N.J.: Jason Aronson, 1988).

[62] Vamik D. Volkan, “Narcissistic Personality Organization and ‘Reparative’ Leadership,” International Journal of Group Psychotherapy 30 (1980): 131-52; Volkan and Itzkowitz, The Immortal Ataturk.

[63] See Erik Erikson, Young Man Luther (New York: Norton, 1958); J. E. Gedo, “The Methodology of Psychoanalytic Biography,” Journal of the American Psychoanalytic Association 20 (1972): 638— 49; J. E. Mack, “Psychoanalysis and Historical Biography,” Journal of the American Psychoanalytic Association 19 (1971): 143-79.

[64] A. Falk, “Aspects of Political Psychobiography,” Political Psychology 6 (1985): 605-19.

[65] Ives Hendrick, Facts and Theories of Psychoanalysis (New York: Knopf, 1950).

[66] Vamik D. Volkan, What Do You Get When You Cross a Dandelion with a Rose? The True Story of a Psychoanalysis (New York: Jason Aronson, 1984); Vamik D. Volkan, Six Steps in the Treatment of Borderline Personality Organization (Northvale, N.J.: Jason Aronson, 1987).

[67] Sigmund Freud, Fragments of an Analysis of a Case of Hysteria, in Standard Edition, vol. 7 (1905; London: Hogarth Press, 1953), 3-I2-[2]- [68] Harry Stack Sullivan, The Interpersonal Theory of Psychiatry (1946-47; New York: Norton, 1953); David Rapaport, “The Structure of Psychoanalytic Theory: A Systematizing Attempt,” in Psychological Issues, vol. 2, monograph 6 (New York: International Universities Press, i960).

[69] Rapaport, “The Structure of Psychoanalytic Theory.”

[70] Sigmund Freud, The Interpretation of Dreams, in Standard Edition, vols. 4 and 5 (1900; London: Hogarth Press, 1961).

[71] Phyllis Greenacre, Swift and Carroll: A Psychoanalytic Study of Two Lives (New York: International Universities Press, 1955); M. S. Bergmann, “Limitations of Method in Psychoanalytic Biography : A Historical Inquiry,”

Journal of the American Psychoanalytic Association 21 (1973): 833—50.

[72] William G. Niederland, “An Analytic Inquiry into the Life and Work of Heinrich Schliemann,” in Drives, Affects, Behavior, vol. 2, ed. M. Schur (New York: International Universities Press, 1965).

[73] Kemal H. Karpat, “Review Article: The Personality of Ataturk,” American Historical Review 90 (1985): 893—99.

[74] Mack, “Psychoanalysis and Historical Biography”; Falk, “Aspects of Political Psychobiography”; Peter Loewenberg, “Historical Method, the Subjectivity of the Researcher, and Psychohistory,” in Rapports, vol. 2, Psychohistory: A Frontier in Method (Stuttgart: Comite International des Sciences Historiques, 1985).

[75] See Shabtai Teveth, Ben-Gurion: The Burning Ground, 1886—1948 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987). Numerous discussions and quotes throughout the remainder of this essay are from this biography.

[76] James William Anderson, “The Methodology of Psychological Biography,” Journal of Interdisciplinary History it, no. 3 (Winter 1981): 455-75

[77] Uriel Dann, Iraq under Qassem: A Political History, 1958—1963 (New York: Praeger, 1969), 78-79.

[78] E. W. Polson Newman, The Middle East (London: Geoffrey Bles, 1916), after 172.

 Contributors

Uriel Dann is Professor of History Emeritus at Tel Aviv University. He is the author of Iraq under Qassem, Studies in the History of Transjordan, and King Hussein and the Challenge of Arab Radicalism.

Dale F. Eickelman is Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. He is the author of Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center, The Middle East: An Anthropological Approach, and Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a Twentieth-Century Notable.

Norman Itzkowitz is Professor of Near Eastern Studies at Princeton University and has trained with the National Psychological Association for Psychoanalysis. His books include Ottoman Empire and Islamic Tradition and (with Vamik D. Volkan) The Immortal Ataturk: A Psychobiography.

Elie Kedourie is Professor of Politics Emeritus at the University of London and Fellow of the British Academy. He is the editor of the quarterly Middle Eastern Studies and the author of many books on the political history of the Middle East. His most recent are Arabic Political Memoirs, In the Anglo-Arab Labyrinth, Islam in the Modern World, and The Crossman Confessions.

Martin Kramer, the volume editor, is Associate Director of the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. He is the author of Islam Assembled.

Bernard Lewis is Cleveland E. Dodge Professor of Near Eastern Studies Emeritus at Princeton University. His most recent books include The Muslim Discovery of Europe, The Jews of Islam, The Political Language of Islam, and Race and Slavery in the Middle East.

Shabtai Teveth is the author of a multivolume biography of David Ben-Gurion, of which three volumes have been published in Hebrew. His published books in English include Moshe Dayan: A Biography, Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs, and Ben-Gurion: The Burning Ground, 18861948.

Vamik D. Volkan, M.D., is a psychoanalyst of Cypriot Turkish origin and Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Virginia School of Medicine. His numerous books include Cyprus—War and Adaptation: A Psychoanalytic History and (with Norman Itzkowitz) The Immortal Ataturk: A Psychobiography.

Marvin Zonis is Professor in the Graduate School of Business at the University of Chicago. He is author of The Political Elite of Iran and Majestic Failure: The Fall of the Shah of Iran.

 Index

[Page numbers don't correspond to this version]

‘Abbas Hihni, 132

Abbasids, 94

“Abd al-Krim al-Khattabi, 45, 150M20 'Abdallah, king of Transjordan, 118, 120, 125,134,139

‘Abdin Palace, 123

‘Abduh, Muhammad, 130 Abdiilhamid II, 9, 20, 131-32 al-‘Abri, Ibrahim Sa'id, 52—55 'Abriyin, 52

Abu Dhahi, 49

Abu Iyad 139

Abu Nidal, 135

Adams, Charles, 94

Adler, Alfred, 85, 95

al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din, 8—9, 94, 128 Ahmad Bey, 131

Ait ‘Tab, 43

Ait Waryaghar, see Bani Waryajil Ajami, Fouad, 65-67, 134

Alam, Assadollah, 73

Aldington, Richard, 141 Algar, Hamid, 128, 137-38

Algeria, 36, 40

Ali, Muhammad, 131 ‘alim, see ulama Amanat, Abbas, 132 Amenemhet, 21 Ames, Robert, 80 Amin, Ahmad, 130 Amman, 125

Anatolia, 98-99, 102

Angola, 116

Ankara, 99

Annales school, 5-6, 94 anthropology, 14, 118, 139-40 Antoni, Carlo, 95

Antonius, George, 129

Arabia, 24, 33, 38. See also Oman;

Saudi Arabia

Arabs, see individual countries Arafat, Yasir, 135 Armenians, 101—2 Arnold, Matthew, 100 Arslan, Shakib, 129 Arutin, 31 al-Asad, Hafiz, 134 Assyria, 22

Ataturk, Mustafa Kemal, 16, 66—68, 97-103, 106-8, 136-37

Atlas Mountains, 42

Augustine, 1, 91 Augustus, 93 Austria, 32 autobibliography, 29—30 autobiography and self-narrative (as literary forms), 2—3, 13-14, 19, 21-26, 29, 31—34, 36, 39—41, 60— 65, 68, 125; bibliography of, 130, 138—40, 151H4, 152«5; and diaries, 2, 7—8, 10, 45, 60, 62, 105, 115, 141; and memoirs, 3, 20—21, 23—25, 28, 30—34, 40, 60, 62, 125, 138—40; and tarjamas, 14-15, 36, 39-47, 52-59, 149M15, 150^20; and travel, travelogues, 24, 26—28, 31—33, 62, 141. See also sources

Avicenna, 34

Ayyam al-Arab, 24

al-Ayyam (Stream of Days), 130 ‘Ayyash, 46

‘Ayyashi, Ahmad bin ‘Abd al-Salam al- Bu, 42, 45-48, 57, 149M15,

150H20

Azilal, 43—44

Aztecs, 93

Azulay, 31

Babar, 25

Babinger, Franz, 131

Baghdad, 9, 94, 120, 133

Bahia, 53-54

Baluch, 49

Bani Waryajil, 45—47

Baqir al-Sadr, Muhammad, 50

al-Barq al-Shami, 25, 32

Bashir, Suleyman, 94

Batatu, Hanna, 123

Baz, Rustum, 31

Beeson, Irene, 136

Beethoven, no—11

Behistun inscription, 22

Beirut, 80

Ben-Ami, Shlomo, 122

Ben-Gurion, David, 18, 109—11, 113— 17,i43

Bennabi, Malek, 40

Berber, 24, 42, 46

Bible, 22, 90

biography (as a literary form), 2—19, 25, 28, 30, 32, 36, 39—40, 55, 60— 68, 75, 89—90, 93-98, 101, 10313, 118-22, 125; bibliography of, 127—38, 141-43; relation to history and historiography, 2—7, 17—19, 62—63, 89—96, too —101, 107, 109—13, 118—26. See also psychobiography; sources

Birdwood, Lord, 133

Blake, Robert, 119

Bloomsbury, 8

Blunt, Wilfred Scawen, 141—42 Boujad, 45

Bradford, Selina, countess of, 119

Braudel, Fernand, 94

Brecht, Bertolt, 112

Britain, British, 5, 17, 116, 119—21, 125,141—42

Brown, L. Carl, 35, 131

Browne, Edward G., 94

Buckle, George Earl, 89

Buckley, William, 80

Burzoye, 24

Buyids, 29 Bzu, 42—45

Caesar, Julius, 30, no—n

Cairo, 8, 29—30

Carter, Jimmy, 71, 74, 80

Casey, William J., 80

Caspian Sea, 72 censorship, 8, 123 Chamberlain, Neville, in Champoilion, Jean Francois, 93 charisma, n, 102, 121, 128 Chelebi, Evliya, 27 childhood, children, 28, 40, 70—71, 75, 95, 101,105, 107, 125, 130, 140

China, 26, 38, 70

Christianity, Christians, 1, 38, 90 Churchill, Winston, 71, no CIA, 71, 80—81

Cicero, 93 communalism, 14 Constantinople, see Istanbul Contras, see Iran-Contra affair Cox, Henry, 125

Crapanzano, Vincent, 65—67, 83, 140 Critchfield, Richard, 140 Crusades, 25

Cyprus, 97

Damascus, 8—9, 133—34

Dann, Uriel, 18, 133

Darius, 22

da‘tva (Fatimid), 29 deconstructionism, 6 De Gaulle, Charles, 31 de Gaury, Gerald. 135 determinism, 16, 99 Deuteronomy, Book of, 22 Dhufar, 48—49 diaries, see autobiography Diba, Farhad, 137 dictionaries, biographical, 28, 30, 55, 89,138

Dilthey, Wilhelm, 93

Disraeli, Benjamin, 89, 94, 119

Dubai, 49

Eden, Anthony, 9

Egypt, Egyptians, 9, zi, z6, z8, 32, 40, 121, 123, 129—32, 136, 140

Eickelman, Dale F., 13-15, 139

Elizabeth I, no

Elon, Amos, 142

Erikson, Erik, 103

Essex, Robert Devereux, earl of, no

Evian Conference, 116

Falk, Avner, 103, 108

family relations, n, 14, 22, 31, 39

40, 50, 56, 105, 125, 132—33. See also childhood; women

Faruq I, 136

al-Fasi, ‘Allal, 40—41

Fatimids, 26, 29—30

Faysal, king of Iraq, 9, 133

Faysal, king of Saudi Arabia, 135

Fez, 40, 46—47

Fischer, Michael M. J., 138

Forrestal, James V., 96

France, French, 5—6, 8, 14, 22, 130; rule in Morocco, 43—46, 56-57

Frederick the Great, 121

Freud, Sigmund, 85—87, 95, 98—101, 103—4, 106

Friedlander, Saul, 17

Gadamer, Hans-Georg, 79

Gay, Peter, 99

Gaza, 123

Gendzier, Irene, 129

genealogy, 22-23, 31, 33, 41-43, 45~ 46, 53

Geneva, 129

Germany, Germans, 91, 116-17, 122

Ghazali, 1, 29, 34

Gibb, Hamilton, 5, 142

Gibbon, Edward, 126

Gilbert, William, 112

Glaser, Edward, 32

Gokalp, Ziya, 129

Goldziher, Ignaz, 93

Greece, Greeks, 22—23, 33» 102

Giintekin, Re§at Nuri, 140

Guyana, 116

Habshush, Hayyim, 32

Hadani, Eldad, 31

hadith, z6, 33, 93

Hadramawt, 48

hagiography, 1-2, 29, 40, 54, 56

Haifa, 115

Halevy, Joseph, 32

Hallaj, 5, 29

Hamra’ al-'Abriyin, 51

Hanover, 121

Hart, Alan, 135

Harun ibn Yahya, 27

Hashemi, Ali, 139

Hashemites, 125, 133, 139

Haslip, Joan, 132

Hatusilis, 21

Haykal, Muhammad Husayn, 129

Hegel, Wilhelm Friedrich, 92 hero, concept of, 11, 18, 101—2, 119—

21, 128, 135

Herzl, Theodor, 9, 142

Heyd, Uriel, 129

Hijaz, 26

Hindus, 48

Hirsch, E. D., 84

Hirst, David, 136 historicism, 13, 61—63, 91 historism, 61, 91 history, see biography

Hitler, Adolf, 102, in, 114—17, 121

Hittites, 21-22

Holocaust, 116-17 homosexuality, 128

Hormuz, 49

Hourani, Albert, 5, 127, 130, 142

Howarth, David, 135

Hunayn ibn Ishaq, 28

Hungary, 32

Husayn, king of Jordan, 118, 120,

124-25, 134, 139

Husayn, sharif of Mecca, 133

Husayn, Saddam, 121, 133

Husayn, Taha, 40, 130

al-Husayni, Muhammad Amin, 134 al-Husri, Sati‘, 129

Ibadiyya, 48, 50, 52, 54

Ibn Abi Usaybi'a, 28

Ibn Battuta, 27

Ibn Buluggin, ‘Abdallah, 24

Ibn Hisham, 94

Ibn Khaldun, 31

Ibn Miskawayh, 23

Ibn Qays, ‘Azzan, 5 3

Ibn Ridwan, 28

Ibn Sa‘ud, ‘Abd al-‘Aziz, 9, 46, 135

Ibn Tulun, 31

Ifham al-Yahud, 31

‘Imad al-Din, 25

imamate (Oman), 15, 48, 51-54

India, 24, 27, 38, 49 intellectuals, intelligentsia, 8, 35, 63, 66, 127-30. See also ulama interviews, see sources

Iran, Iranians, 9, 15, 22—25, 27> 35» 49, 66, 69—76, 79—82, 123, 128, i32> 137, 139-40, 153MI5

Iran-Contra affair, 79, 81-82

Iraq, Iraqis, 12, 29, 50, 81, 116, 118,

121, 123, 125, 133

Isfahan, 140

Islam, 1—4, 13-14, 20, 23-38, 55-58, 89—90, 128; and concept of individual, 1-5, 12—14, 37[-]4°, 61—63, 89—90

Islamic Jihad, 80

Isma'il, khedive of Egypt, 132

Ismail Kemal Bey, 138—39

Ismailis, 29

Israel, Israelis, 17, 82, no, 117, 123, 124, 151213. See also Zionism

Israeli, Raphael, 136

Istanbul, 8, 27, 98—99

Itzkowitz, Norman, 16—17, 65—67, i37

Jaffa, 115

Jamal Pasha, 139

Jamal zadeh, Muhammad ‘Ali, 140

Jerusalem, 31, 123, 134

Jesus, 1

Jews, 22—23, 3[i-]325 9°> [ITI]» [TI]3~

17, 123. See also Israel; Zionism Jordan, Jordanians, 12, 116, 118, 121, 123, 125, 133-34, i39

Josephus, 22—23, 33

journalists (as biographers), 9, 132—

34,136, 139-40

Jung, Carl, 85, 95

Kalila wa-Dimna, 24

Kamaliyin, 49

Kamil Pasha, 20

Karpat, Kemal, 107

Keddie, Nikki, 128

Kedoune, Elie, 16—17, 142

Kellerman, Barbara, 138

Khadduri, Majid, 138

al-Khalili, Muhammad ibn ‘Abdallah, 52

Khassab, 49

Khayar, As‘ad, 3 3

Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi, 3 3

Khomeini, Rouhollah, 35, 69, 137—

38, 1532115

Khusraw Anushirvan, 23

Khusru Parviz, 23

Kibrisli Mehmet Pasha, Mme., 3 3

Kiernan, Thomas, 135

Kinross, Lord, 136

Kittamya, 42

Kohut, Heinz, 15, 86

Kristallnacht, 116

Kuwait, 49, 133

Lacouture, Jean, 136

La Fontaine, Jean, 37

Laroui. Abdallah, 61

Lawrence, T. E., 9, 141-42

Leachman, Gerard, 142

Lebanon, Lebanese, 80, 124, 134

Lenin, no

Lewis, Bernard, 13

Libya, 12

Loewenberg, Peter, 108, 142

Longford, Elizabeth, 141

Lunt, James, 134

Mack, John E., 103, 108, 141—42

al-Maghribi, Samuel, 31

Majid bin Khamis, 53—54

Maliki school, 48

Malkum Khan, 128

Malti-Douglas, Fedwa, 130

Mansur bin Ahmad, 42

Mansuri, [c]Abd al-Rahman, 42—46,

149/115

Mansuri, Ahmad, 43—44, 56—57, i49«i5

Ma’oz, Moshe, 134

marabouts, 42, 46, 56

Marrakesh, 42-43

marriage, 40, 45, 51. See also women

Marsot, Afaf Lutfi Sayyid, 131

Marxism, 5, 92, 98

mashyakha, 26

al-Matsui, 42

Mattar, Philip, 134

Mauss, Marcel, 37-38

Mediterranean Historical Review, 122

Mehmed the Conqueror, 131

Mein Kampf, in

Meinecke, Friedrich, 91

Melman, Yossi, 135 memoirs, see autobiography Mishaqqa, Mikha’il, 31

Mitchell, Timothy, 140

Mohammad Reza Shah, 15, 69-76,

125, 137,139,153M16

Moin, Baqer, 137

Mommsen, Theodor, 93

Monroe, Elizabeth, 142

Monypenny, William Flavelle, 89

More, Thomas, 89

Morocco, Moroccans, 14, 36-37, 40

48, 56-58, 67, 123, 139-40, 150W20

Moses, 22

Mossadegh, Mohammad, 137

Mottahedeh, Roy, 65-67, 139

Mu'allaqa, 24

Mudar, 38

Muhammad, Prophet, 1-4, 5, 38, 40,

43,94

Muhammad V, sultan of Morocco, 44, 46

al-Muhasibi, Harith, 29

Mukhtar al-Susi, 41—42

Miinchhausen, Gerlach von, 118, r2o

Munich, in

Musa bin Haddu, 46

Musa, Salama, 130

Musandam, 49

Musaylima bin Habib, 3 8

Muscat, 49

Mussolini, Benito, 121

Miitercim Osman, 32

Nacquet, Vidal, 22

Najaf, 50

narcissism, 15-16, 70-72, 74—75, 87, 101—2

Nasir al-Din Shah, 9, 25, 132

Nasser, 9, 121, 136

Nehemiah, Book of, 22

Niederland, William, 99, 106

Nightingale, Florence, no

Nixon, Richard, 72

Nizwa, 51

Nuri bin Sa[c]id, 94, 133

Oman, Omanis, 14—15, 36—37, 41, 48-58

Orientalism, Orientalists, 2-6, 7, 14, 38

Ottoman Empire, Ottomans, 9, 20, 25, 27-28, 32-33, 97, 130-32. See also Turkey

Pahlavi, Ashraf, 73

Pahlavi dynasty, see Mohammad Reza

Shah; Reza Shah

Palestine, 114—17

Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Palestinians, 12, 134-35, 139,I49«i4

Pawel, Ernst, 142

Perron, Ernest, 73

Persepolis, 72

Persia, see Iran

Persian Gulf, 49, 69, 72

personality, cult of, 3, 9, 12, 131

Philby, H. St. John, 9, 142 pilgrimage, Muslim, 26, 46 Plato, 91

Plutarch, 89

poetry, poets, 24—26, 39, 42, 51—53, 62

political science, see social sciences Popper, Karl, 91

Prescott, William Hickling, 93 psychobiography, 10—n,15—17, 67— 68, 74-76, 78-79, 83-84, 95-98, 100, 105, 122, 137, 141—42; and psychoanalysis, 2, 15—16, 65, 8586, 97—108, 137. See also biography; psychopolitical studies psychopolitical studies, 15, 60, 68, 75-76, 78—79, 82-88, 153H14

Qajar dynasty, see Nasir al-Din Shah Qarawiyin mosque-university, 40—41, 46

Qasim, 'Abd al-Karim, 118, 120-21, 123-25, 133

al-Qays, Imr, 53

Qeshem, 49

Qum, 50

Qur’an, memorization and study of, 38-40, 44, 50-51, 53-54, 58

Rabi'a, 38

Rapaport, David, 105

al-Razi, Muhammad ibn Zakariya, 28

Reagan Ronald, 35, 82

Reich, Bernard, 138

Reinharz, Jehuda, 143

Reis, Sidi Ali, 27

Reubeni, David, 31

Reza Shah, 70, 137

Richard the Lion-hearted, 1

Rida, Rashid, 130

Rifian revolt, republic, 45-46

Rodinson, Maxime, 5

Rome, Romans, 27, 33, 37-38, 93

Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 71

Rosetta stone, 93

Rouleau, Eric, 139

Rubin, Jeffrey Z., 138

Runyan, William, 78—79, 83

Rushdie, Salman, 3

Russia, 32

Sadat, Anwar, 136, 139

al-Sadr, Musa, 66, 134

Sa'id bin Taymur, 48—49

St. Clair, Barrie, 136

Saladin, 1, 25

Sanskrit, 24

Sanu', Ya'qub, 129

Sasanids, 23

Satanic Verses, The, 3

Saudi Arabia, Saudi Arabians, 54, 135

Schafer, Roy, 86

Schliemann, Heinrich, 106

Seale, Patrick, 134

self-narrative, see autobiography

Selim III, 131

sexuality, n, 98-99, 119

Sha'ban, M. A., 94

Shafi'i school, 49

Shakespear, Captain W. H., 142

Shapira, Anita, 143

al-Sha'rani, 'Abd al-Wahhab, 29

Shaw, Stanford, 130

Sheean, Vincent, 135

Shi'a, 49—50, 66, 134

al-Shidyaq, Ahmad Faris, 31

Shiroye, 23

Simmel, Georg, 65

social sciences, 17-18, 76-78, 83-84, 88, 95-97, 138-40

sociology, 95, 118

Solzhenitsvn, Alexsandr, no

sources, 7-9, 15, 17, 45, 123-24; archival, 8, 10, 123—25, 128, 129, 131—32, 137; interviews, 9, 16, 47, 105—6, 124, 132, 134; letters, 8, 52, 105, 141—42. See also autobiography

Soviet Union, 69, 81

Spanish (in Morocco), 46—47

Stalin, 71, 121

Strachey, Lytton, no

Suez, 125

Suhar, 49

Sullivan, Harry, 105

Sunnis, 34, 48—50

al-Susi, Mukhtar, 41—42

Sykes, Henrietta, 119

Syme, Ronald, 93

Syria, Syrians, 9, 10, 12, 25, 31, 116, i34

al-Tabari, Muhammad ibn Jarir, 21, 38

Taheri, Amir, 137

Tahmasp, 25

al-Takmila, 125, 139

Tangier, 42

al-Tantawi, 'Ayyad, 32 tarjama, see autobiography

Tehran, 8, 71, 74

Tel Aviv, 97

Temesvar, 32

Tetouan, 47

Teveth, Shabtai, 17—18, 143

Tiglat Pileser, 22

Timur, 25

Transjordan, see Jordan

Tuhami, 66—67, 140—41

Tunisia, 131

Turkey, Turks, 16, 20, 32, 66, 97— 102, 107, 123, 129, 136-37, 139, 140. See also Ottoman Empire twinship, concept of, 71, 73

ulama, 35-36, 41-42, 54-55, 57-58, 89-90

United States, 6; policy toward Iran, 69, 7i-7*» 74, 80-82

Usama ibn Munqidh, 25

Vatikiotis, P. J., 136

Vienna, 27—28, 32

Volkan, Vamik, 16—17, 65—67, 137

Watt, Montgomery, 94

Weintraub, Karl J., 60—61, 63

Weizmann, Chaim, 143

Wilber, Donald N., 137

Wilson, Jeremy, 142

Wilson, Mary C., 134

Winstone, H. V. E, 142

Wittlin, Alma, 131

women, 11, 26, 33, 40, 70, 73, 89, 95, 98, 119—20, 132, 140. See also marriage al-Yamani, [c]Umara, 25

Yar-Shater, Ehsan, 132

Yemen, 32, 49

Young Turk Revolution, 20

Yusufiya mosque-university, 43

Zionism, Zionists, no—11,113—17, 142—43. See also Israel; Jews

Zirids, 24

Zonis, Marvin, 13-16, 137

 Printer Details

Middle East Lives

 was composed in 10.5/14

Sabon on a Merganthaler

Linotron 202 by Brevis Press; printed by sheet-fed offset on 6o-pound, acid-free Glatfelter Natural Smooth, and Smyth-sewn and bound over binder’s boards in

ICG Arrestox by Braun-Brumfield, Inc.;

with dust jackets printed in 2 colors and laminated by Braun-Brumfield, Inc.;

designed by Kachergis Book Design; and published by

SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY PRESS

 Syracuse, New York 13244-5160

 Contemporary Issues in the Middle East

This well-established series continues to focus primarily on twentieth-century developments that have current impact and significance throughout the entire region, from North Africa to the borders of Central Asia.

Recent titles in the series include:

The Arab-Israeli Dilemma. 3d ed. Fred J. Khouri

The Communist Movement in Egypt, 1920—1988. Tareq Y. Ismael and Rifa[c]at El-Sa[c]id

Egypt’s Other Wars: Epidemics and the Politics of Public Health.

Nancy Elizabeth Gallagher

Family in Contemporary Egypt. Andrea B. Rugh
Hydropolitics of the Nile Valley. John Waterbury
Islam and Politics. 3d ed. John Esposito

Law of Desire: Temporary Marriage in Shfi Iran. Shahla Haeri

The Middle East from the Iran-Contra Affair to the Intifada.

Robert O Freedman, ed.

The Prison Papers of Bozorg Alavi. Donne Raffat

The Rushdie File. Lisa Appignanesi and Sara Maitland, eds.

The Second Message of Islam. Mahmoud Mohammed Taha; Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na[c]im, trans.

The Vatican, Islam, and the Middle East. Kail C. Ellis, ed.

Women in Egyptian Public Life. Earl L. Sullivan

#title Intellectuals in the Modern Islamic World

#subtitle Transmission, Transformation and Communication

#author Stephane A. Dudoignon, Komatsu Hisao, Kosugi Yasushi

#date 2006

#source

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-06-21T16:33:11

#authors Stephane A. Dudoignon, Komatsu Hisao, Kosugi Yasushi,

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

* [Synopsis]

INTELLECTUALS IN THE MODERN ISLAMIC WORLD

This book reconsiders the typology and history of intellectuals in the Islamic world in the modern and contemporary periods from the late nineteenth century to the present day.

Intellectuals in the Modern Islamic World distinguishes itself from other major studies on modern thought in Islam by examining this topic beyond the context of the Arabic world. The first section of this book concentrates on a journal, al-Manār, published between 1898 and 1935, and read by a wide range of audiences throughout the Islamic world, which inspired the imagination and arguments of local intellectuals in the first half of the twentieth century. The second part concentrates on the formation, transmission, and transformation of learning and authority, from the Middle East to Central and South Asia, through the twentieth century.

Providing a rich variety of case studies, by international authors of the most varied disciplinary scope, Intellectuals in the Modern Islamic World meets the highest academic requirements in a spirit of comparative vision and openness to the dynamism of contemporary societies of the Islamic world. As such, this book is essential reading for those with research interests in Islam and intellectual thought.

Stéphane A. Dudoignon is a research fellow at the National Center for Scientific Research (Paris).

Komatsu Hisao is a professor at the Graduate School of Humanities and Sociology, The University of Tokyo.

Kosugi Yasushi is a professor at the Graduate School of Asian and African Area Studies, Kyoto University.

* New Horizons in Islamic Studies

Series editor:

Professor Sato Tsugitaka

The series New Horizons in Islamic Studies presents the fruitful results of Islamic Area Studies Project conducted in Japan during the years 1997–2001. The project has planned to do multidisciplinary research on the dynamism of Muslim societies in both the Islamic and non-Islamic worlds, considering the fact that areas with close ties to Islam now encompass the whole world. This series provides the newest knowledge on the subjects of “symbiosis and conflict in Muslim societies,” “ports, merchants and cross-cultural exchange,” and “democratization and popular movement in Islam.” The readers will find multifarious, useful achievements gained through international joint research with high technology of geographic information systems about Islamic religion and civilization, particularly emphasizing comparative and historical approaches.

PERSIAN DOCUMENTS

Social history of Iran and Turan in the fifteenth–nineteenth centuries

Edited by Kondo Nobuaki

ISLAMIC AREA STUDIES WITH GEOGRAPHICAL

INFORMATION SYSTEMS

Edited by Okabe Atsuyuki

MUSLIM SOCIETIES

Historical and comparative aspects

Edited by Sato Tsugitaka

INTELLECTUALS IN THE MODERN ISLAMIC WORLD

Transmission, transformation, communication

Edited by Stéphane A. Dudoignon, Komatsu Hisao, and

Kosugi Yasushi

* [Title Page]

INTELLECTUALS IN THE MODERN ISLAMIC WORLD

Transmission, transformation, communication

Edited by Stéphane A. Dudoignon, Komatsu Hisao, and Kosugi Yasushi

* [Copyright]

First published 2006

by Routledge

Published 2017 by Routledge

2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN

711 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017, USA

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

Copyright © 2006 Stéphane A. Dudoignon, Komatsu Hisao, and Kosugi Yasushi, selection and editorial matter; the contributors, their own chapters

Typeset in Times New Roman by

Newgen Imaging Systems (P) Ltd, Chennai, India

The Open Access version of this book, available at www.tandfebooks.com, has been made available under a Creative Commons Attribution-Non Commercial-No Derivatives 4.0 license.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

A catalog record for this book has been requested

ISBN13: 978-0-415-36835-3 (hbk)

* Contents

PrefaceList of contributorsPART I.Al-Manārin a changing Islamic world

1.Al-Manārrevisited: The “lighthouse” of the Islamic revival

KOSUGI YASUSHI

2.Al-Manārand popular religion in Syria, 1898–1920

DAVID D. COMMINS

3.The Manarists and Modernism: An attempt to fuse society and religion

MAHMOUD HADDAD

4.The Influence ofal-Manāron Islamism in Turkey: The case of Mehmed Âkif

KASUYA GEN

5.Echoes toal-Manāramong the Muslims of the Russian Empire: A preliminary research note on Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din and the Šura (1908–1918)

STÉPHANE A. DUDOIGNON

6.Rationalizing Patriotism among Muslim Chinese: The impact of the Middle East on theYuehuajournal

MATSUMOTO MASUMI

7.The Transmission of Al-Mānar’s Reformism to the Malay-Indonesian World: The case of al-Imām and al-Munīr

AZYUMARDI AZRAPART II. Intellectuals in Challenge: Situations, discourses, strategies

8.The Arabo-Islamic Constitutional Thought at 1907: ‘Abd al-Karim Murad (d. 1926) and his draft constitution for Morocco

STEFAN REICHMUTH

9.Constructing Transnational Islam: The East–West network of Shakib Arslan

RAJA ADAL

10.Muslim Intellectuals in Bosnia-Herzegovina in the Twentieth Century: Continuities and changes

ALEXANDRE POPOVIC

11.From Social Development to Religious Knowledge: Transformation of the Isma‘ilis in Northern Pakistan

NEJIMA SUSUMU

12.Islam on the Wings of Nationalism: The case of Muslim intellectuals in Republican China

FRANÇOISE AUBIN

13.Muslim Intellectuals and Japan: A Pan-Islamist mediator, Abdurreshid Ibrahim

KOMATSU HISAO

14.Clash of Cultures?: Intellectuals, their publics, and Islam

DALE F. EICKELMANGlossary—Index

* Preface

Since the turn of the twenty-first century, the weight of the world of Islam, and its significance for humanity in general, have become strikingly apparent. In the aftermath of 9/11 there has been a spectacular increase in academic as well as public concern for the pursuit of inquiries into sociopolitical, economic, and intellectual dimensions of the world of Islam. The “Islamic Area Studies Project” (IASP), which was implemented by the Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology (MEXT) of Japan during the last decade of the twentieth century, provided clear indications that foreshadowed the now universally recognized vital significance of these concerns.

From 1997 to 2002 the five-year IASP, consisting of six units, conducted interdisciplinary and cross-regional studies on the modern world of Islam. Among others, Unit 1 focused on the dynamism of thought and politics, and since 1999 this subgroup of ours aimed to analyze the evolution of contemporary thought. The essential question dealt with by this research subgroup can be summarized as follows.

Among the movements observable in the contemporary world of Islam one of the most outstanding issues is that of Islamic revivals. Far from being reduced to mere ideological phenomena, these revivals have been reflected in the most diverse political and social processes, in both Muslim-majority countries as well as in Muslim-background minorities throughout the world. Although based on the rich heritage of classical Islamic thought, these revivals reveal great changes in this tradition during the “long” twentieth century. What role should the Islamic world play in the twenty-first century? What significance will it embody in the future of humanity? In order to answer these questions one must understand holistically present-day Islamic revival movements.

We have endeavored to explore the ideas of major modern and contemporary thinkers from the world of Islam by making use of their texts. So doing, we were expecting to complement our comparative research between regions in order to elucidate the nature of twentieth-century Islamic thought and of the most varied Islamic revivalist movements. At the same time, we have tried to take into account the historical backgrounds and interregional influences that worked on various aspects and issues.

Over five years we conducted a number of seminars, workshops, and international conferences to discuss our common issues. Among various international conferences held by the IASP, two had special focus on the intellectual aspects of the modern Islamic world, namely “The Lighthouse of Modern Islam: Al-Manār (1898–1935) Revisited” in 1998, and “Intellectuals in Islam in the Twentieth Century: Situations, Discourses, Strategies” in 2000.

The former coincided with the one hundredth anniversary of the inception of the journal al-Manār. Its name, “The Lighthouse,” indicates the aspirations of its founder and main contributor, Muhammad Rashid Rida, and of his colleagues, to provide intellectual illumination for the faithful throughout the world. Early twentieth-century Islam was perhaps approaching a low point, if compared with the ever expanding West, but in spite of that general impression of decay, or perhaps because of it, the “Manarists,” who were associated with the journal, strove to stimulate a reinvigoration of Islam and of the world of Islam. The journal was published periodically until 1935, gathering information and opinions from, and disseminating them back to, the various parts of the world of Islam, from Java to Morocco. However, the journal was forgotten later as its authors’ call was judged a failure, until the new tide of Islamic revival from the late 1960s onward proved the contrary. The conference held in Tokyo in 1998 was to evaluate the historical significance of the journal and to revive its value as a historical source, both on Islamic thought and on the social realities of the world of Islam in modern times.

While this conference singled out a particular medium at a particular moment in the history of Islam, the latter conference held in 2000 encompassed the entire range of the world of Islam with its diverse areas in culture and history, throughout the turbulent twentieth century. Its three sessions included: “Muslim Intellectuals in an Era of Transformation,” “Modern/Contemporary Thought and Social Movements,” and “Communicating Knowledge and Ideas: Networks and Media.”

Intellectuals in the world of Islam were not only scholars, and men and women of letters, but also leaders and organizers of social movements. All of them had deep concerns about their own societies under the pressure of foreign domination and the mounting challenges of modernity. Though each had his/her own particular sociohistorical context, all of them endeavored to respond to the task of how a Muslim society in the new era of transition should develop itself, while each strove along the lines of his/her own particular orientation. The diversity and synchronicity of their thinking and works were impressive, and this conference was unique in its attempt to comprehend that diversity, as we usually see contemporary researchers and their work on Islamic thought focusing on the Middle East.

Having synthesized these two conferences with the fruits of later research into the current volume, the editors hope it will serve as an element for the mapping of the world of Islam through the twentieth century, which has been exceptionally significant in terms of social upheavals. Though not exhaustive in any sense, it will be a great satisfaction for us if these elements can serve further enquiries into the responses successively proposed by varied categories of intellectuals in the world of Islam to the question of how to live in the days of deepest transformation.

This volume aims to reconsider the typology and history of intellectuals in the Islamic world in the modern and contemporary periods, from the late nineteenth century to nowadays. Its two parts correspond to the two colloquia of which it provides the combined proceedings. While each chapter presents a separate regional case, with a historically and geographically different background, the two parts of the volume disclose commonalities, similarities, and intellectual echoes through comparative perspectives and identification of direct contacts.

Though numerous monographs and collective volumes on modern intellectual history of the Islamic world have been published, most deal with an individual region or country, and with more specific periods of time. Very few, if any, have tried to sketch direct intellectual exchanges between, for example, Egyptian and Indonesian reformist trends of the early twentieth century, or common features and differences in the modernization of Islamic scholarship between Cairo and rural locations in the Urals, in European and Asian Russia.

Last, this collective work proposes a unique contribution on the diachronic analysis of the modes of communication of information, learning, and authority throughout the Islamic world during the “long” twentieth century—from the international travel, teaching, and press activity of the late nineteenth-century activists to the early twenty-first-century upheavals produced by the generalization of elementary education and the diffusion of electronic medias.

In Chapter 1 of Part I of this volume, Kosugi Yasushi shows how the Islamic revival of the latter half of the twentieth century has stimulated a great deal of reflections among the students in the world of Islam about the role and function of Islam in the contemporary world. Being a pioneer or “the lighthouse” of modern Islam, as its name seems to suggest, the Journal al-Manār contributed substantially to later Islamic revivals. The journal contains an abundance of information on the world of Islam during its period of publication (1898–1935), as well as modern formulations of Islamic thought. This article reevaluates the journal in the light of more recent Islamic revivals, and advocates a renewed interest in the journal as a rich source for further historical studies. The author also touches upon the special role played by al-Manār in the field of Qur’anic commentary.

In Chapter 2 David Commins explores why the “Manarists” had only a limited influence in Syria, by focusing on the conflict between the sultan’s Islamic policy and the Manarist reformist movement in Syria. According to the author, Abdülhamid II succeeded in establishing an official version of Sunni Islam by utilizing popular Sufism and strengthening his own authority, while checking the Manarists through surveillance. It is more due to the Manarists’ failure to win the sympathy of the conservative urban populace by criticizing Sufism influential among them as an obstacle to modernization.

Following the arguments by the major Manarist ideologues such as Muhammad ‘Abduh, Rafik al-ʿAzm, and Rashid Rida, Mahmoud Haddad then delineates the transformation of the Manarists’ discourse. The Manarists had emerged as selective modernists who were inspired by modernization in the West and tried to fuse modern Western thinking with Islam, although in a later period they became critical of the West in the course of colonization by European powers and after the abolishment of the caliphate by secularist Turkey.

In Chapter 4, Kasuya Gen designates the fact that different Islamist currents such as traditionalism and modernism in the late Ottoman period were underlain by the endogenous themes shared with Westernism and Turkism of how to revitalize and modernize the Empire. Examining the works of Mehmed Âkif, a well-known pan-Islamist polygraph, the author points out that arguments of al-Manār led by the Arab ideologues were regarded as very provincial by him, and that their impact on the modernist Islamists in Turkey should not be overemphasized when we take into consideration the fact that there was incipient Ottoman Islamism endogenously emerging before Âkif.

Al-Manār ’s reach, however, extended far beyond the Muslim-majority world, up to the Turkic-speaking Muslim communities of the Middle Volga and the Western Urals in the north, and to the Malay-Indonesian archipelago in the east. Stéphane A. Dudoignon traces the role of an influential Tatar-Bashkir theologian from the southern Urals, Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din (1859–1936), whose journal the Mura was one of the most significant enterprises of the “Muslim” autonomous press of Russia, from its foundation in 1908 to its suppression by the Bolsheviks in early 1918. Largely modeled on al-Manār, Riza al-Din’s journal is contextualized within a network of madrasa colleges, of students returning from study at al-Azhar, and of multiple other autonomous journals of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire. All of these actors participated in a vibrant discourse about society, relations with the Russian Christian state, and access to modernity. Rather than passively absorbing the reformist teachings of Afghani and ‘Abduh from al-Manār, the Islamic communities of these regions actively discussed their quest for an indigenous form of modernity.

Our exploration of Muslim minorities in non-Muslim imperial states continues eastward toward China. Contrary to other Muslim minorities such as the Uyghurs in Xinjiang, the Hui have tried to remain loyal to the Chinese State. The alleged hadith, “The love of watan is an article of faith” was strongly demonstrated among the Hui during the Japanese occupation of Eastern China, mainly through the Yuehua journal. Through this Islamic journal that was modeled on al-Manār, Matsumoto Masumi examines how they strove to be patriotic and nationalistic in modern terms, and how they have absorbed the influence of the Islamic reformers in Egypt, especially of al-Manār.

In Chapter 7 of Part I, Azyumardi Azra deals with journals as channels of transmission of modernist or reformist ideas from the Near-East, especially from Cairo and Mecca, to the Malay-Indonesian world. The author focuses in particular on how and by whom the influence of al-Manār was transformed into two indigenous journals, al-Imām and al-Munir. Providing detailed biographical information of the editors and contributors of the journals, the author carves out the intellectual trends at the time, as well as the tensions between “young” reformists and “old” traditionalists.

The unprecedented expansion of the renewal movement throughout the world of Islam, of which the echoes of al-Manār bear testimony, had immediate effects in the fields of political thought. Whether there are indigenous roots of the constitutional theories and charters that were put forward in the Middle East and North Africa since the nineteenth to the beginning of the twentieth century is still open to debate. Stefan Reichmuth, comparing European and non-European constitutional movements and doctrines of this time, investigates the constitutional draft which was written in Morocco at the same period. It shows the strong interest of Islamic reformist scholars in local movements of opposition and constitutional reform, which had increased in response to European imperial encroachment. Despite its Utopian character, Murad’s confidence in the Shariʿa, as a source of dignity and a firm baseline for public consensus and political institution-building, reflects an important strand of Islamic political thought of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century.

A participant in the debates of this time, Shakib Arslan (1869–1946) is known as the most widely read Arab writer of the interwar period and the publisher of the French-language journal La Nation Arabe, that allowed him to reach Arab and non-Arab Muslims, Western policy makers, and anti-colonial activists, introducing concepts of the Arab world and the Islamic revival to new audiences. Raja Adal’s article traces the members of Arslan’s transnational network, looks into the manner in which it was constructed, and ultimately asks for its raisons d’être based on a systematic analysis of La Nation Arabe. Arslan’s network can be seen as operating on three ideological plans, linking the intellectual currents of Arabism, Islamism, and anticolonialism.

, by Alexandre Popovic, takes into consideration the most representative Muslim intellectuals of Bosnia-Herzegovina in the twentieth century, amounting to about fifty names, and classifies them into specific groups according to their status, discourses, and strategies as well as by respective periods. Based on this overview, the author describes the main intellectual trends that appeared in the Muslim minority society in the course of a long and gradual period, covering the decline of the Ottoman Empire, the emergence of the South-Slav Kingdom, the establishment of the Communist Regime, and the post-Communist era followed by the civil war in 1992–1995.

For the Ismailis, the twentieth century will be regarded as a time of social and religious revival. After the long period of time from the fall of Alamut, the Ismailis have returned to the center stage of the Islamic world. They have constructed a worldwide NGO network called the Aga Khan Development Network (AKDN). As Nejima Susumu suggests, the AKDN is under the general control of the Imamat (office of the Imam), and the Ismailis are voluntarily working within the network. The NGO activities, involving hundreds of schools, hospitals, and universities, have produced thousands of highly educated Ismaili youth. Some of them have proceeded to religious studies, especially on Nasir Khusraw, the early theoretician of the Ismailiyya. The author shows how this intellectual phenomenon is giving a new character to the followers of the Aga Khan.

In a comprehensive analysis of reformist and nationalist movements among Chinese Muslim intellectuals during the period of turmoil from the late Qing to the beginning of the Communist era, Françoise Aubin investigates the cultural associations, the educational institutions in the Chinese language, and the press established by Muslim intellectuals. She points out that their movements played a decisive role in making the minority Muslims Chinese citizens, and in favoring an overall modernization of Islam in China. In the course of the twentieth century more than ever, Sino-Islam was an integral part of the world Islam as well as of Chinese culture.

After the Russo-Japanese War in 1904–1905, Muslim intellectuals had begun to have substantial interest in the emergence of modern Japan. Of these Muslim intellectuals, Abdurreshid Ibrahim (1857–1944) was among the most outstanding. He not only introduced Japan and Japanese people in detail to the broad Turkic Muslim audience through his extensive travels, by means of his journal, The World of Islam: Spread of Islam in Japan, but also made efforts in later life to establish a close relationship between the world of Islam and Japan based on his Pan-Islamic ideology and strategy. Komatsu Hisao provides a preliminary survey of his vision of modern Japan and presents basic information for further research on a comprehensive subject, Islam and Japan, the significance of which is clearly growing in the contemporary world.

In Chapter 14, Dale F. Eickelman criticizes previous modernization theory, through an analysis of the significant dynamism of relations between intellectuals and their publics in the contemporary world of Islam. Together with the emergence of new intellectuals lacking formal religious training, a new sense of public is emerging thanks to mass education and mass communication. Thinkers such as Fethullah Gülen, Muhammad Shahrur, and others are redrawing the boundaries of public and religious life in the Muslim-majority world by challenging religious authority. The author stresses that the Muslim-majority world is demonstrating a vigorous and increasingly diverse intellectual pluralism.

In these matters, thanks to its scope and hopefully to the precision of its individual contributions, the present volume has endeavored to become a landmark of comparative studies in human and social sciences of the modern and contemporary Islamic world. At the same time, it sketches perspectives for a further enlargement of these comparative approaches toward global appraisals of the place and role of different types and categories of intellectuals in such issues as alien domination (whether Western, Russian/Soviet, or Chinese), modernization, community- and nation-building, access to education and learning, from colonization to the current aftermath of the cold war. In the future, the systematization, in this spirit, of separate area studies should permit the appearance of comparative studies on the history of modern intellectuals in the Islamic world and in other cultural areas —in particular in Western, European, and North American societies.

We would not like to put the final dot to this short preface without expressing our deep gratitude to the MEXT and Japan Society for the Promotion of Science (JSPS), which provided our IASP with Grant-in-Aid for Creative Scientific Research, as well as to the Japan Foundation (Japan-Europe Support Program for Conferences and Symposiums) and to the Embassy of France in Japan, whose support and attention enabled the organization of our second conference “Intellectuals in Islam in the Twentieth Century: Situations, Discourses, Strategies” in Tokyo. Our thanks, however, would not be complete without mentioning our special gratitude to all the panelists and participants in our two conferences, especially to the first al-Manār conference session chairs Profs Nakamura Kojiro, Hachioshi Makoto, Nakanishi Hisae, Sakai Keiko, Kimura Yoshihiro, and Takeshita Masataka, as well as to the discussants Profs Oishi Takashi, Kagaya Kan, Nakamura Mitsuo, Usuki Akira, Tomita Kenji, and Naito Yosuke. Finally we wish to express our gratitude to the staff members of the IASP, especially Ms Nakamura Chihisa and Ms Shimizu Yuriko for organizing our two conferences as well as to our assistants Dr Sawae Fumiko and Dr Nejima Susumu for supporting our editing works.

Our special tribute goes to the late Professor Yusuf Ibish, who presented a paper on the significance of al-Manār in the first conference, and was to read a paper on a female Sufi saint of Palestinian origin in the second conference. Unfortunately, however, neither paper could be included in this volume due to his long illness and his death in January 2003.

* Contributors

Raja Adal is a PhD candidate at the Department of History in Harvard University. His interest areas include comparative history of non-Western societies in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, concepts of time, and the formation of aesthetics consciousness. He is currently undertaking his doctoral research entitled “Aesthetic Consciousness and the Negotiation of Western Modernity: Fine Art Education in Egyptian and Japanese Elementary Schools, 1870–1930.” He has published an Index of La Nation Arabe (2002) and “Methodological approach to the study of Shakib Arslan: Islamic thought and the Arab world in the interwar period” in Asian and African Area Studies 1 (in Japanese, 2001).

Françoise Aubin is an emeritus research director at the National Center for Scientific Research (Paris). She earned her PhD from the University of Paris (Faculty of Law) in 1964 for her thesis “Les soulèvements populaires en Chine du Nord entre 1214 et 1230.” Currently she is conducting research on Chinese Islamic history in the nineteenth–twentieth centuries, post-communism in Mongolia, and history of Mongolian customary and written law. She is an editor of Etudes Orientales , 19–20 (2003), and the author of “Some Characteristics of Penal Legislation among the Mongols (13th-21st centuries)” in W. Johnson and I. F. Popova, eds, Central Asian Law: An Historical Overview (2004) and entries in The Encyclopaedia of Islam: “Tasawwuf [in Chinese Islam]” in vol. VIII (1999), “Wali [in Chinese Islam]” In vol. XI (2002), and “Khatt” in Supplement 7–8 (2004).

Azyumardi Azra is the rector of Syarif Hidayatullah State Islamic University in Jakarta. He earned his PhD from the Department of History, Columbia University in 1992 for “Transmission of Islamic Reformism to Indonesia from the Middle East in the 17th and 18th centuries.” He is continuing his research of Islamic movements in the premodern and modern Southeast Asia, and has published The Origins of Islamic Reformism in Southeast Asia (2004) and Shariʿa and Politics in Indonesia (editor, 2003).

David D. Commins is the executive director of The Clarke Center, Dickinson College. His PhD from the University of Michigan (1985) concerned the Syrian Salafi Movement in the late Ottoman era. His current research interest is in the history of Wahhabism and his recent publications are Historical Dictionary of Syria (2nd edition, 2004) and “Traditional Anti-Wahhabi Hanbalism in Nineteenth Century Arabia” in Y. Weisman, ed., Ottoman Reform and Islamic Regeneration: Studies in Honor of Butrus Abu-Manneh (2005).

Stéphane A. Dudoignon is a research fellow at the National Center for Scientific Research (Paris). He earned his PhD from the University of Paris III (Sorbonne-Nouvelle) in 1996. His areas of interest are the history and sociology of the spiritual and intellectual authorities of Islam in Russia, the Caucasus, and Central Asia from the eighteenth century to the present. He has recently edited Devout Societies vs. Impious States?: Transmitting Islamic Learning in Russia, Central Asia and China, Through the Twentieth Century (2004), and written “Faction Struggles among the Bukharan Ulama during the Colonial, the Revolutionary and the Early Soviet Periods (1868–1929): A Paradigm for History Writing?” in T. Sato, ed., Muslim Societies. Historical and Comparative Aspects (2004), and “From Ambivalence to Ambiguity? Some Paradigms of Policy Making in Tajikistan, since 1997” in L. de Martino, ed., Tajikistan at a Crossroads: The Politics of Decentralization (2004).

Dale F. Eickelman is a Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. He earned his PhD from the University of Chicago in 1971 for “Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Regional Pilgrimage Center, 1870–1970” (published 1976). His recent research themes are religious intellectuals and the new media in Muslim-majority societies, and he is a coeditor of Public Islam and the Common Good (2004) and New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere (2nd edition, 2003). He has also published The Middle East and Central Asia: An Anthropological Approach (4th edition, 2001).

Mahmoud Haddad is the chairperson of the Department of History, University of Balamand in Lebanon. He earned his PhD from Columbia University in 1989. He is currently researching the social and intellectual history of late Ottoman Syria, and the results are published as “A Brief History of Lebanon, Syria, and Iraq in the Twentieth Century” in Volume VIII of The History of the Scientific and Cultural Development of Humanity (2004), “The Ideas of Amir Shakib Arslan before and after the Collapse of the Ottoman Empire” in N. Yavari, L. G. Potter, J. R.

Oppenheim, and R. W. Bulliet, eds, Views From the Edge: Essays in Honor of Richard W. Bulliet (2004), and “The Impact of Foreign Missionaries on the Muslim Community in Geographical Syria in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century” in R. Simon and E. Tejirian, eds, Altruism and Imperialism: Western Cultural and Religious Missions in the Middle East (2003).

Kasuya Gen is a lecturer at Nihon University, Tokyo. His current research interest is in secularism and Islamism in Turkey in the late Ottoman and early Republican periods. He has published articles such as “Pan-Islamic policy of the Turkish nationalists in the War of Independence period” in Studies in Humanities and Social Sciences (in Japanese, 1999), “The boundary of the millet in the construction of the Turkish Republic” in K. Sakai, ed., Nationalism and Islam: Antagonism or Conformity? (in Japanese, 2001), and “Islamic currents in Turkey: Said Nursi and Fethullah Gülen” in Y. Kosugi and H. Komatsu, eds, Contemporary Islamic Thought and Political Movements (in Japanese, 2003).

Komatsu Hisao is a professor at the Graduate School of Humanities and Sociology, The University of Tokyo. His current theme is Modern History of Central Asia. He is a coeditor of Research Trends in Modern Central Eurasian Studies (with S.A. Dudoignon, 2003), and Islam in Politics in Russia and Central Asia (Early 18th to Late 20th Centuries) (2001), and an author of “The Andijan Uprising Reconsidered” in T. Sato, ed., Muslim Societies: Historical and Comparative Aspects (2003).

Kosugi Yasushi is a professor at the Graduate School of Asian and African Area Studies, Kyoto University. He earned his LL.D. on political systems, law, and Islam in the contemporary Middle East from Kyoto University (1999). He is a coeditor of Readings from Islamic Political Thought (in Arabic, 2000), Iwanami Dictionary of Islam (in Japanese, 2002), and Contemporary Islamic Thought and Political Movements (in Japanese, 2003), and the author of The Islamic World (in Japanese, 1998), Muhammad:

Visiting the Sources of Islam (in Japanese, 2002) and The Study of the Islamic World (in Japanese, 2006).

Matsumoto Masumi is a professor at Keiwa College, Niigata. She earned her PhD from Niigata University in 1997 in the field of modern Chinese history. Currently she is interested in Protestant missions to Muslims and Islamic awakening in China. She has recently published “Sino-Muslims’ Identity and Thoughts during the Anti-Japanese War —Impact of the Middle East on Islamic Revival and Reform in China” in Annual Report of JAMES 18/2 (2003), “Islamic New Cultural Movement in China” in Y. Kosugi and H. Komatsu, eds, Contemporary Islamic Thought and Political Movements (in Japanese, 2003), and “An Aspect of Islamic Revival in International City Shanghai” in Editorial Committee, ed., Plural Perspectives on the Sino-Japan Relations (in Chinese, 2002).

Nejima Susumu is an associate professor at the Faculty of Regional Development Studies in Toyo University. His PhD is from the Graduate University for Advanced Studies (1999) for his dissertation “Islam and NGO: Ismaili Community in the Northern Pakistan and Aga Khan Foundation” (published in Japanese, 2002). He continues researches on Islam and NGOs, fair trade and culture. He has recently published as a coeditor Contemporary Pakistan: Ethnicity, Nation and State (in Japanese, 2004), and an article “Refreshments in Pakistan and Islamic Philanthropy: Rooh Afza of Hamdard” in M. Takada, Y. Kurita, and CDI, eds, Cultural Anthropology of Refreshments (in Japanese, 2004).

Alexandre Popovic is an emeritus senior research fellow at the National Center for Scientific Research in France. Currently he is conducting research on Muslim communities in the Balkans from such perspectives as history, culture, mystical order, magic, and Muslim press. Among his recent publications are “A propos de la magie chez les musulmans des Balkans” in V. Bouillier and C. Servan-Schreiber, eds, De l’Arabie a l’Himalaya. Chemins croisés. En hommage à Marc Gaborieau (2004), “Le confraternite sufi nella regione balcanica” in M. Stepanyants, ed., Sufismo e confraternite nell’islam contemporanea. II difficile equilibrio tra mistica epolitica (2003), and The Revolt of African Slaves in Iraq in the 3rd/9th Century (1998).

Stefan Reichmuth is a professor at the Faculty of Philology in Ruhr University of Bochum. His recent publications include “Murtada al-Zabidi (1732–1791) and the Africans: Islamic Discourse and Scholarly Networks in the Late Eighteenth Century” in S. S. Reese, ed., The Transmission of Learning in Islamic Africa (2004), “Beziehungen zur Vergangenheit: Murtada az-Zabidi (gest. 1791) und seine Archaologie islamischer Kultur” in Asiatische Studien–Etudes Asiatiques 56/2 (2002), and “‘Netzwerk’ und ‘Weltsystem’: Konzepte zur neuzeitlichen ‘Islamischen Welt’ und Transformation” in Saeculum 51/2 (2000).

* Part I : Al-Manār in a Changing Islamic World

* 1. Al-Manār Revisited: The “lighthouse” of the Islamic revival

Kosugi Yasushi

The intellectual map of the Islamic world has experienced a number of rather drastic changes during the twentieth century, continuing on from the turbulent years of the previous century. Various trends of thought and sociopolitical ideas stemming from the West, such as modernism, liberalism, nationalism, socialism, and communism, among others, appeared in Muslim societies, and all of these cast serious doubts on traditional Islamic thought and institutions. Especially modernism, often associated with Westernization, and nationalism, more often secular than not, were undermining traditional Islamic values, while profound socioeconomic transformation was undermining the basis upon which traditional Islamic societies, as well as their intellectual leaders, used to stand.

Against this backdrop, a new Islamic trend calling for a reform of Muslim societies appeared. As this trend voiced the aspiration to revive the Islamic world, or the Islamic umma (community), to use their own terms, we may call this trend Islamic revivalism. The journal of al-Manār (Majalla al-Manār),[1] the main subject of this article, was the major mouthpiece for this trend. It was published regularly between 1898 and 1935, and its intellectual heritage was maintained by later popular movements such as the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and the Association of Algerian ‘Ulama’ in Algeria. The trend, however, seemed to have lost its momentum by the early 1950s, when Arab nationalism and other secular trends started to overshadow the previous Islamic trends. Accordingly, the contributions of al-Manār appeared obsolete.

“Manar ” in Arabic means a “lighthouse,” or a “beacon.” The journal tried to be a lighthouse in a turbulent ocean where all Islamic ships were suffering the awful storm of the modern world, metaphorically speaking. Many intellectuals in the Islamic world sought other solutions for their societies differing from that which Muhammad Rashid Rida (Muḥammad Rašīd Riḍā, 1865–1935), al-Manār ’s founder and editor in chief, and his colleagues strove to formulate. For others, al-Manār ’s orientation looked anachronistic, as it called for a return to the original purity of Islam. It was judged natural that it had failed by the 1950s.

After seeing the phenomena of Islamic revival in various parts of the world over the last three decades of the twentieth century, however, we can no longer subscribe to this view. This article offers an invitation to reevaluate al-Manār as a major platform of modern Islam, and to present an overview of its intellectual contributions.[2]

 Re-evaluating Islam in the modern age

Scholarly inquiries into the nature of vitality of Islam in the political domains of the Middle Eastern countries started in 1978–1979, when specialists and observers of the region were surprised and perplexed to see an “Islamic revolution” in Iran. Since the revolutionary high times in the region had already passed with the decline of radical Arab nationalism,[3] a revolution alone, against what was considered the most mighty monarchy in the Gulf region, was a surprise. Furthermore, it was under an Islamic banner with many Islamic symbols, such as jihad (struggle) against taghut (illegitimate power) led by faqih (jurist) or vali amr (holder of authority), revolution by the oppressed who will become martyrs willingly, and the like.[4]

Although the present author had already noticed the beginning of an Islamic revival in Egypt in the latter half of the 1970s,[5] it was still on a lesser level, and the revolution in Iran came as a startling event, as was the case for other students of Middle East studies. Retrospectively, there were many signs of an Islamic revival in various parts of the region during the decade. For example, an Islamic bank was established in Dubai in 1975, starting a new initiative to reinstitute Islam in the economic domain, followed later by many other banks.[6] However, these signs were not well-noticed, and arguments over the Islamic revolution in Iran in academic circles, let alone the mass media, were mostly skeptical about its durability, and therefore tried to explain it in terms of its regional specifics and historical contingencies.

The events of the following years in the Middle East and elsewhere, however, proved that there was something more generally Islamic than regional or sectarian in these phenomena.[7] To cite just a few politically serious cases, [8] we had observed an armed revolt in Mecca, the most holy city of Islam, in November 1979, nine months after the revolution in Iran. This was the very first armed struggle against the Saudi kingdom since its establishment in 1932, and a popular revolt in the Eastern region of the kingdom followed the next month. Then, in the same month the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan occurred, sparkling Islamic resistance movements, or Afghan mujahidin guerrillas. In October 1981, President Sadat was assassinated in Egypt for his peace-treaty with Israel, as a part of a failed rebellion by Islamic radicals, while Bahrain, a conservative monarchy in the Gulf, experienced a failed coup by an Islamic liberation front in the same year. Revolutionary and opposition groups taking an Islamic color were becoming the rule, not the exception.[9]

The reasons why Islamic dimensions had been ignored or underestimated lay in the question of paradigms and analytical frameworks of our studies. Until that time, the predominant paradigms were modernization and nationalism.

They were major paradigms for studies related to developing countries, not only in the Middle East but also in other regions of Asia and Africa, as well as in Latin America. This was occurring during the Cold War, and neither modernization studies nor nationalism studies were completely free from the reality of West-East bipolarity.[10] Both paradigms shared tendencies of secularism, and presupposed the tacit understanding that a modern society is a secular one, be it capitalist or socialist, where Islam continuously loses its sociopolitical significance.

Malcolm Kerr, the author of an authoritative book on the Islamic reformism of Muhammad ‘Abduh (Muhammad ‘Abduh 1849–1905) and Rashid Rida,[11] wrote in 1960 that “Rashīd Riḍā and others of his school, whatever their intentions may have been, have facilitated the accomplishment of a great undertaking of secular reform in Islamic countries,” thus concluding the failure of Rida and al-Manār.[12] Modernization and/or nationalism were well-rooted in the Middle East by then, or at least, seemed so to many, with their secularizing tendencies.

Once this premise came under serious doubt, studies in the field started to provide more accurate information on the Islamic revival. There were, and are today, grassroot activities which either produced Islamic revival or were produced themselves under Islamic revival. Islamic revival can be defined a reorientation of a Muslim society at mass level toward Islam (re-Islamization) after a significant degree of de-Islamization[13] has occurred, and that is accompanied by revitalization or reformulation of Islamic institutions, as well as Islamic discourses and symbols among Muslims in contemporary contexts.

This means that Islamic revival is far from anything “traditional.” The term “traditional” indicates continuity from the past. The “revival” apparently presumes a discontinuity, as it is to revive something that ceased to be vital or functional. Hence, Muslims themselves sometimes refer to revival as an “awakening” from negligence or illness.[14]

To illustrate this point, let us take the example of zakat (zakāt), an obligatory charity for Muslims through payment of a prescribed portion of one’s possessions. It is a part of the well-established Islamic tenets, and therefore the concept itself seems traditional. However, while collection of zakat was considered a duty of the state during premodern (Islamic) periods, it was suspended or left for private initiatives in the modern era, especially under national governments of the twentieth century. Revitalization of this institution is often called for as remedy for poverty, as a part of Islamic revival.[15] It involves reformulation of how and who should collect zakat, and how and for what it should be spent. Revived Zakat in a modern society is completely different from that of traditional society. Even though its religio-legal sanctions look identical because of the continuity of the legal codes related to it, the socioeconomic significance is quite different.

As collecting zakat cannot be done individually, and while modern states do not perform the duty of collection, an aspiration to activate zakat involves social organization. So, local “zakat committees” were organized in many places to fill the gap. The same can be said about building mosques. Mosques, or prayer halls, are crucially important for a Muslim district if one wants to perform his obligation of prayers. In new suburban districts or underdeveloped districts, there may not be a sufficient number of mosques, if any. Once its inhabitants aspire to have a mosque, they have to organize themselves for that purpose. When a mosque is built, its management or an organizational administration will be needed. Thus, activating Islamic teachings and institutions in a modern society necessitates collective social works, hence, what we may call “Islamic revival movements.”[16]

Why should Islam, then, be revived? That was one of the most basic themes for al-Manār and its writers and associates, the Manarists.[17] For one, Abd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi (ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kawākibī, 1854–1902), an Islamic thinker originally from Aleppo, argued the major causes of the decline of the Islamic umma in his Umm al-Qurā[The Mother of Cities, that is, Mecca] (Meccan Conference)[18] through the tongues of participants in a secret international conference in Mecca, supposedly held in 1316 AH [1898][19]

The beginning of the 14th century A.H. is a time when defects and weakness cover all Muslims….The Association [of Umm al-Qura][20] invited some scholars and political writers to investigate the reasons and to search for the best ways for the Islamic nahḍa (revival, or Renaissance), so that they will publish their opinions in Islamic papers of India, Egypt, Syria and of the Tatars.[21]

The participants included those from Aleppo, Damascus, Jerusalem, Alexandria, Cairo, Yemen, Basra, Nejd, Mecca, Medina, Tunis, and Fez in Arab regions, as well as of Kurdish, Iranian, Tatar, Kazan, Turkish, Afghan, Indian, Sind, and even Chinese and English origins. There was only one from Beirut, among the expected participants, who failed to arrive in time.[22]

They criticized the state of affairs of the Islamic world in general, and the Ottoman administrations in particular, and proposed social reform based on Islam properly understood. They urged the promotion of education among Muslims for the sake of the revival.

The theme of “revival” heard many echoes in later decades, especially in the latter half of the twentieth century. During the heydays of Arab nationalism, however, the Islamic dimension of al-Kawakibi was largely underestimated. As the conference ended by proposing an Arab caliphate, as a remedy to the shortcomings of the Ottoman empire, a Turkish-dominated dynasty, al-Kawakibi had been seen often as a pioneer of Arab nationalism.[23] This is apparently a point we need to reevaluate. He was an associate of al-Manār, and definitely Islamic in orientation.

In this sense, Dawish’s following statement is plausible: “the shift in religious authority from the Turks to the Arabs was proposed for the sole purpose of Islamic regeneration, and the Arabic khilafa was projected to be not a revolutionary nationalist, but a symbol of Islamic unity.”[24]

We certainly find emphasis of ʿurūba (Arabness, Arabism) in his and others’ writings in al-Manār. Rida was also very prominent in this respect. As they called for a return to a pure Islam, that is to say, Islam of the first generations (the Salaf, literally, the predecessors), it coincides with the period when Muslims were basically Arab. Once a call is made to return to the Qur’an, the sacred scripture of Islam recorded in Arabic, the prominence of the Arabic and Arab culture must be emphasized.

[25] However, as al-Manār in Arabic was read throughout the Islamic world, the Arabic language was considered universally Islamic in the minds of its readers. The Arabic has both national and transnational dimensions, and putting Arab Islamic thinkers along the line of Arab nationalism is precisely where one has to be very careful.

In evaluating al-Kawakibi's Meccan Conference, another important point is that this was a fictitious record of a conference that never occurred in reality. Beside what was said on the tongues of the participants, we must pay attention to why it was written as a record of an international conference. The message was that the Islamic umma should decide its affairs through a gathering of leaders, not depending on tyrannical, often not potent in the modern context, dynastic rulers.

This message seems to have recurred in Islamic conferences after the demise of the Ottoman empire. Among the early important meetings Rida was keen to record, there were the General Islamic Conference for the khilafa in Cairo in 1926[26] and the General Islamic Conference in Jerusalem in 1931.[27] Al-Kawakibi's aspiration was partially realized, one may observe, when the first Islamic Summit was convened in 1969, and an international body, the Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC) was set up to visualize the Islamic world in a contemporary form.[28]

Another answer to the question, why and how to revive, was given three decades later by Sakib Arslan (Šhakīb Arslān, 1869–1946), who wrote Limadhā ta'akhkhara al-Muslimūn wa taqaddama gharuhum? [Why Are the Muslims Backward While Others Are Advanced?][29] Arslan saw a remedy in proper understanding of Islam and its application within contemporary realities.

The fact that his writing was meant to serve as an answer to a question sent by a Muslim in Borneo (present-day Indonesia) reveals the nature of al-Manār, as a journal for the entire Islamic world.[30] Shakib's work "is an enduring contribution; it went through three Arabic editions during his lifetime and was reissued in 1965 and again in 1981."[31]

Al-Manār contains quite a substantial amount of writings and information in its nearly thirty thousand pages from 1898 to 1935. After Rida’s death, his immediate heirs published two issues. Then in 1939, the Association of Muslim Brotherhood, an heir in the call of Islamic reform in the form of popular organization, published the issues of the last volume until 1940. The government suppressed it, with the other journals of the Brotherhood in 1941.[32] Al-Manār is a treasure of historical sources for the Islamic areas of its days. Furthermore, when we read its writings in a broader perspective, and compare them with ideas in circulation in Islamic revival movements in recent decades, we see clear similarities as well as further developments. Some of the ideas, or lines of argument, are proved to have direct links, while others seem to have apparent echoes, though not proven in a definite manner. Many others still await scholarly investigation.

What is obvious for the present author is that al-Manār did not end its life by setting an Arab nationalism in a religious garment, nor giving an Islamic excuse for modernization of the Islamic world and resultant secularization. Al-Manār had its own aspirations and claims, and they were heard and followed, though they were overshadowed by other trends in decades preceding the current Islamic revival.

When the Islamic revival started to manifest itself, R. Stephan Humphreys clarified that Islam remained “a significant political force in the Arab lands after the Second World War,” due largely to the Muslim Brothers, who seemed to combine the militant activism of the Wahhābīya [of Arabian Peninsula], the Sanūsīya [of Libya], and the Mahdīya [of Sudan] with the reformist Quran-centered thought of the Salafīya and the anti-imperialism and mass politics of the secular nationalists.[33]

Salafiyya is a general term for a broad trend of Islamic thought, which claims and calls Muslims to found their understanding of Islam on that of the Salaf

(the Pious First Generations).[34] Although the term is used in this article without the qualification of “modern,” there was also premodern Salafiyya. Its greatest proponent was Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328), and it was al-Manār that revived his teaching by printing his works and promoting his ideas in the journal.[35]

The central force of thought, the Salafi school, originated in the late Ottoman period. To borrow Lahoud’s words, a “new intellectual movement in the Arab world,” was “characterized by a renewal (tajdīd) of Islam, as a response to the emerging sociopolitical and technological changes. This tajdīd served as an intellectual platform for the salafiyya, and it developed primarily under the influence, in chronological order, of Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (d. 1897), Muhammad ‘Abduh (d. 1905), and Rashid Rida (d. 1935).”[36] In the last stage of this formative phase, the Salafi school of reformism was elaborated and disseminated by the journal al-Manār.

 A brief description of al-Manār

The first journal calling for the revival of Islam, or that of the Islamic umma and its civilization, was al-ʻUrwa al-Wuṯqā (the Firm Bond) [37] published in Paris during an eight-month period in 1884. Though short-lived, it had an eminent impact on the Islamic countries. It gave a serious warning of the dangers of Western colonialism, and called for a reform of the umma and exercise of ijtihad (independent reasoning to find Islamic legal rules) to face the challenges of the time. Among the younger generation who received the message of this pioneering journal, was the young Muhammad Rashid Rida in Syria.

He was born in a village called Qalamūn, near the city of Tripoli on the eastern Mediterranean coast, in the year of 1865. The village belongs to Lebanon today, but in his days it was a part of Sham (historical Syria); Rida identified himself, and was identified by others, as a Syrian,[38] and was active in movements for the independent Syria.[39] He was educated under the reformist Shaykh Husayn Jisr of Tripoli (1845–1909),[40] and later obtained a qualification as an □ālim (independent scholar). When al-ʿUrwa al-Wuṯqā was published, he was still a young man, and was impressed by the journal. Rida recalled:

I found a copy of al-ʿUrwa al-Wuthqa among my father's papers. When I read its articles on the call to pan-Islamism, the return of glory, power and prestige to Islam, the recovery of what it used to possess, and the liberation of its peoples from foreign domination, I was so impressed that I entered into a new phase of my life. And I became very fond of the methodology of these articles to make and prove its arguments on topics with verses from the Qur'an, and of its tafsīr (exegesis) which none of mufassirs (exegetes) have written. The most important points in which al-ʿUrwa al-Wuthqa distinguished itself were: (1) Allah's rules in His creation and the order of human society, and the reasons for the rise and fall of nations as well as their strength and weakness; (2) clarification that Islam is a religion of sovereignty and power, combining the happiness of this world and that of the hereafter, while implying that it is a religion both spiritual and social, civil and military, and that its military power is for the sake of protection of the just law, general guidance and prestige of the community, and not for the sake of imposition of the religion by force; and (3) for Muslims there are no nationalities except their religion, so they are brothers whose bloodline must not separate them, nor their languages nor their governments.[41]

Rida became so fascinated with their ideas that he was called "Adorer of al-Afghani" by others.[42] It was, however, only after more than ten years in 1897, when he learned the death of al-Afghani,[43] the founder of the journal of al-ʿUrwa al-Wuṯqā, in Istanbul, he decided to move to Cairo to join Muhammad 'Abduh, the editor in chief of the journal:

When he [al-Afghani] passed away, my hope was hightened to get in touch with his viceroy Shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh to acquire his knowledge and opinions on Islamic reform. I waited until an opportunity appeared in the month of Rajab in 1315 [1897], and that was immediately after I completed my study in Tripoli, acquiring an□ālim status, permission to teach independently, from my mentors. Then I immigrated to Egypt, and established al-Manār for call to reform.[44]

While “everywhere the increased use of the printing press for publishing religious texts challenged the‘ulama’s role as guardians and transmitters of knowledge,” “[T]he reformers of Islamic law were aware of the opportunities that the print media opened up. They skillfully used periodicals and pamphlets to disseminate their opinions to a wide audience.”[45] Al-‘Urwa al-Wuṯqā and al-Manār were in their forefront.

Rida based himself in Cairo for more than three decades until his death, from where he made trips to Syria, Istanbul, India, Hejaz, and Europe.[46] Al-Manār was a “monthly magazine that researches the philosophy of religion and the affairs of society and civilization.”[47] The title of the journal was taken from a hadith, “He [Prophet Muhammad] said that there were for Islam landmarks and a lighthouse, like a lighthouse of the path.”[48]

This is a voice calling in a clear Arabic tongue, and an appeal to the truth reaching the ear of a speaker of the ḍād letter [an Arab] and the ears of all Easterners, calling from a close place [Egypt, located between the West and the East] which both the Easterner and the Westerner can hear, and it spreads out so that the Turks and the Persians also receive it. It says, “Oh, the sleeping Easterner who enjoys sweet dreams, wake up, wake up! Your sleep has exceeded the limit of rest.”[49]

The journal was published first as an eight-page weekly, then became a monthly journal from the second year.[50] He printed 1,500 copies for the first issues, and sent them to his acquaintances in Egypt and Syria. Soon the Ottoman authorities banned it in Syria and other provinces, Rida reduced the number of copies to 1,000. In a few years, however, the number of subscribers reached almost 3,000.[51] “By the twelfth year (1909), remaining copies of Volume I were selling for four times the original price; a second printing was therefore made, in the form which had been followed after the first year.”[52]

His claim that it was addressed not only to Arabs but also to all Easterners proved to be true, as its “eventually gained a wide circulation from Morocco to Java.”[53] Thus C. C. Berg wrote about the Indonesians: Al-Manār did not shine… for Egyptians alone. It illuminated the Arabs at home and abroad, the Moslems of the Malay Archipelago who studied at al-Azhar University or in Mecca, and the solitary Indonesian who had kept his old relations with the heart of the Moslem world after having returned to his border country of the Dār al-Islām.…And all these people now saw Islam in a new light… Those who had caught up and preserved the light of the Manār in Egypt, became lesser “manars” for their environments, once back in Indonesia.[54]

It started as a modest journal and ascended to be a mouthpiece of the Islamic reform, as its reputation spread. One of the reasons was that, while others were complaining the miseries of the Islamic world, “al-Manār proposed the cures for the illnesses of the umma in a general form, then with details and proofs.”[55] A Western scholar, contemporary to Rida, wrote about him, “the leading pupil of Muhammad ‘Abduh during the latter’s lifetime, and, since his death, his biographer, editor of his works, and the one who has principally carried on his tradition and interpreted his doctrines,” and he was “the man who has been perpetuating ‘Abduh’s influence for the quarter of a century since his death,”[56] and “al-Manār has been the organ through which his [‘Abduh’s] views have been given the largest publicity.”[57]

While this function of Al-Manār is confirmed, apparently Rida’s role in formulating a revivalist version of Islamic teachings is not confined to his place as ‘Abduh’s pupil. This is very clear in the political domain. ‘Abduh discouraged Rida from writing on political issues in al-Manār, and political writings increased only after ‘Abduh’s death, partly reflecting the deepening political crises of the Islamic world.[58]

When Rida passed away, the Grand Shaykh of al-Azhar at the time, Mustafa al-Maraghi (Muṣṭafā al-Marāghī, 1881–1945), a disciple of ‘Abduh and a reformer of al-Azhar, attended a memorial gathering at his funeral,[59] and gave a speech with words of praise:

Al-Sayyid Rashid [60] triumphed and his supporters and disciples became many, while there were once few supporters and disciples, and within academic circles there were found those who carry his principles and follow his path, and among the public those whose eyes were opened to light, and clouds of ignorance and falsehood were wiped out of their hearts.

He didn’t have any new principle in Islam, that could be justified as a school of his own, but his principle was the principle of the entire ‘ulama’ of the Salaf, that is, to return in judgment to God and His messenger by executing [the following Qur’anic order in the verse of] “and if you have a dispute concerning any matter, refer it to Allah and the Messenger”[Qur’an 4:59], and his principle was also that of the ‘ulama’ of the Salaf in choosing rules appropriate for the time and beneficial for nations in issues of ijtihad [where independent judgment should be exercised], and his principle was that of the ‘ulama’ of the Salaf in everything related to Divine attributes and the issues related to the last day, so he was a Salafi Sunni man who disliked taqlid (taqlīd , imitation, emulation) and propagated ijtihad, seeing it (ijtihad) an obligation upon himself and upon everyone capable.[61]

These words, even taking out the element of courtesy for the deceased, describe fairly Rida as the champion of Salafi school of thought, a reformist formulator of Islam. Associating him with these essential key terms, “Salafi,” “Sunni,” “ijtihad,” and “anti-taqlid (antitraditional),” his major contribution was that he disseminated these ideas widely in the Islamic world through the most enduring and consistent medium in the modern era, the journal of al-Manār.

 Contributions of al-Manār to modern Islam

The contributions al-Manār made toward modern Islam, or to put it more precisely, toward a reformulated understanding of Islam and its practices within the modern Islamic world, are multifaceted, and a careful examination is necessary to determine their extent. The difficulty stems partly from the scope and width of its circulations in geographical terms, and partly from the diverse nature of its topics. Some of its ideas were very innovative but it also promoted what was Islamic in a more general sense. Innovative arguments that had impacts on intellectuals are easier to discern and evaluate, while a more general contribution to the morale of Muslims in those days is subtle and difficult to determine. The reevaluation of al-Manār also involves the evaluation of the Islamic revival in later days, as this article calls for the reevaluation of al-Manār based on the evaluation of the recent revival. The evaluation of what has progressed over the last three decades or so, of course, may be even more controversial than the historical role al-Manār played.

The following remarks are, therefore, sketchy in nature, and offer only a limited outline, inviting to a further investigation.

 Validity of Islam

The apparent, and most striking, feature of al-Manār is its endurance over a long span of time. Maintaining the publication of a highly intellectual nature for almost four decades, especially under the strong winds blowing against Islamic trends, both traditional and revivalist, was an achievement. Through this achievement, al-Manār contributed to the maintenance of the banner of credibility of the Islamic teachings in the modern context. al-Manār insisted that Islam had been valid in the past, was valid in the present, and would be valid in the future.

In doing so, Rida depended upon al-Afghani and ‘Abduh to a great extent, especially at the beginning. This is partly because he had faith in their thought and believed that their cause was not only correct but also beneficial to all members of the Islamic world. Their authority and credibility were assets to him. Apparently, ‘Abduh’s support and patronage during the first years of al-Manār, until his death in 1905, lent strength to the journal and its founder. Al-Manār advocated the ideas and thought of al-Afghani and ‘Abduh, and circulated them in four corners of the Islamic world. In his writing on the khilāfa (Caliphate), Rida commented that ‘Abduh was just short of becoming the paramount leader of the Islamic world.

The Ustādh-Imām (mentor-imam) [‘Abduh],[62] may God bestow mercy upon him, reached the leadership position in this umma and the level of those in authority in the religious and temporal affairs, and he came quite close to the leadership of the entire umma . But this potential was not realized, because the umma was not formulated in such a manner to make it possible to move on the line which he planned.[63]

One may get the impression that this was an overestimate for ‘Abduh. With this high esteem for his own mentor, Rida strongly advocated ‘Abduh’s values through the pages of al-Manār . “If it were not for al-Manār most of ‘Abduh’s thoughts and wisdom would have been lost, and his reforms and history unknown. And as a result of al-Manār ’s influence, ‘Abduh had a party and followers in Tunis and Algiers.”[64] Actually, they were numerous in the Maghrib: to name a few, Abd al-Aziz al-Thaalbi (ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Tha ʿālibī, 1874–1944), Muḥammad al-Nahīl and īāhir b.ʿĀshūr in Tunisia, Ben Badis (ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd Ibn Bādīs, 1889–1940), and the Association of Algerian Scholars in Algeria,ʿAbdullāh Idrīs al-Sanūsī (d. 1931), Abū Shu□ayb al-Dukkālī (1878–1937), and Muhammad b. al-ʿArabī al-ʿAlawī (1880–1964) in Morocco.[65] The list of beneficiaries, of course, is not just confined to the Maghrib countries, and should be longer.[66]

The journal was also read in South Asia, and Rida kept close ties with the leaders of the Khilafat movement, and al-Manār published many articles on and by these leaders. For example, the theory of Caliphate by Abu al-Kalam Azad was serialized in al-Manār.[67] Being a leader of the Khilafat movement supporting the Ottoman dynasty, Azad took the position of discarding the importance of a caliph being of Quraysh origin (of the tribe of Prophet Muhammad), a position in a sharp contrast to Rida’s.

[68] Azad was still a very close ally of al-Manār for the Islamic revival. To the east, the reformist Muhammadiyah established in 1912 in Central Java with a call for return to the Qur’an and the Sunna,[69] which became the second largest Islamic organization in Indonesia today.[70]

Al-Manār ’s insistence on the validity of Islam in modern days generated strong support and encouragement for both ordinary and reform-minded Muslims in those days. In this sense, al-Manār should be placed in the category of Islamic journalism.[71] Rida was, therefore, not only an academic but also a journalist. This combination was essential in creating an Islamic journal of high quality. If such was one of the major objectives of al-ʿUrwa al-Wuṯqā, the first Islamic journal with a brief life, al-Manār as its successor was well managed over a sufficient span of time for its task, though it burdened Rida heavily with its time and energy requirements, as well as in financial terms.[72]

Other ideas of al-Afghani and ‘Abduh that al-Manār propagated included the Unity of the Islamic umma, solidarity of Muslims, harmony of Islam and modern civilization (revelation and reason), return to the pure and original message of Islam, exercise of ijtihad (independent reasoning) of the Islamic law and its applicability in the modern society, and new exegesis of the Qur’an, appropriate for the modern time.

Of these, the central issue at the earlier stage was that of ijtihad (independent reasoning and judgment), because they had to establish the legitimacy of exercising ijtihad if they wanted to reform the Islamic law to meet the social needs of the day, and the Qur’anic exegesis also requires ijtihad if new interpretations were to be made. Furthermore, in Rida’s view, the unity of the umma could be achieved only if ijtihad was exercised correctly.

 Ijtihad and reform of the Islamic law

For all reformers of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, on both Islamic and pro-Western sides, the defects of traditional Islam seemed apparent, as its incapacity in dealing with the reality of the world under Western dominance proved. The tradition was deemed responsible for the decline of the Islamic world in their eyes.

Al-Afghani called for ijtihad to revive the umma, as he saw the inflexibility of the interpretations of the law a part of the decline. ‘Abduh tried hard to reform Islamic legal institutions and the jurists themselves, and once he was appointed the Grand Mufti of Egypt, the highest Islamic legal position in the state, he issued many fatwas to express new interpretations. His fatwas were recorded in Dār al-Iftā’ (Mufti’s Office) in two large files, each containing more than five hundred fatwas.[73]

Rida had to move further, and elaborate the theme of ijtihad. The citadel of the traditional ‘ulama,’ al-Azhar, was very conservative, and was keeping the tradition of taqlīd (imitation, emulation). Although ‘Abduh’s pupils reformed al-Azhar,[74] it was only in later decades. In ‘Abduh’s time, this was still what Rida had to struggle against. The traditional system of the jurists in those days was based on the dominance of the four Sunni schools of law, while each school attained a kind of independence, so that each could stay within its own tradition. The strong inclination toward taqlīd (imitation) of the preceding scholars was in the air.

There was also the serious question of the “closure of the gate of ijtihad.” In the Western scholarship, this question has been debated as a historical question. Joseph Schacht stated that the gate was closed by the tenth century,[75] and the Schacht thesis was maintained until Wael B. Hallaq proved that this was not a historical fact and that ijtihad was exercised at least to the sixteenth century.[76]

On the other hand, it is also true that at the time of al-Afghani, Abduh, and Rida, there was a prevailing discourse of closure among the traditional scholars, especially those of the Hanafi school. The Hanbali school of law never acknowledged such a concept, as Rida relied on this position heavily. But, the Hanafi school was the official legal school of the Ottoman Empire, and the closure was presumed that against which Rida had to argue.

Rida wrote a dialogue in a serialized form in al-Manār, a dialogue between an aged traditionalist and a young reformer, apparently reflecting himself. The traditional shaykh seemed a typical conservative scholar of the time. What he said in the dialogue might be a little accentuated, as it was Rida's portrait of a traditionalist. Nevertheless, it must have reflected the reality of his time. What this conservative scholar was saying sounds today incredibly out of date, as the traditional and conservative 'ulama' today are all generations after the reforms of al-Azhar, and they don't resemble those whose logic Rida had to struggle with.

Muḥāwarāt al-Muīliḥ wa al-Muqallid (The Dialogues between the Reformer and the Imitator/Traditionalist) was published in al-Manār from Vol. 3, No. 28 (December 1900) to Vol.4, No. 22 (February 1902).[77] It contains a variety of topics, including definitions of man, early Islam, faith and disbelief, decline of the Islamic world and its causes, fatalism and reform, four schools of law, merits and faults of speculative theology, mysticism, saints, astrology, the Shiite and other factions, Judaism and Christianity, and interpretations of Islamic law.

The major issues that concern us here are the question of ijtihad, and the unity of umma. Lengthy arguments were exchanged between the two over the question of whether the obligation is ijtihad (reasoning) or taqlīd (imitation, emulation). The reformer strongly supports the necessity of ijtihad, and says:

The basic fundamentals of Islam are proper creed, ethics, control of one's own soul, and worshipping Allah in an appropriate manner, and general principles for social relations such as protection of life, honor and property. All these principles were established in the time of the Prophet.… As for the details of social relations, after the foundations are laid such as justice of rulings, equality of rights, prohibition of transgression, deception, and treason, and ḥadd punishments for some crimes, and after the principle of shūrā (consultation) is established, the details are entrusted to those with authority among the scholars and rulers, who ought to be possessors of knowledge and justice, deciding what is best for the umma according to [conditions of] the time.[78]

This distinction between the essential principles and the non-essential details, which are subject of reasoning, was a very important contribution made by al-Manār. This distinction opens the latter space of flexible reasoning, without harming the concept of the eternal Shariʿa (Islamic law), since only the former is eternal and unchangeable. For many Muslims, this question had crucial importance, unless they were inclined toward a secular solution.

The reformer in the dialogue was also eloquent in quoting the words of the masterly predecessors of the traditionalists, forbidding the blind imitation of others. Since Rida’s thinking was along the lines of the Hanbali school, which supports the continuity of ijtihad, he had an important segment of tradition as his resource. In the end, the reformer felt satisfied at the exhaustion of the arguments.

In Rida’s opinion, taqlīd is not only wrong in itself but also in its creation of factionalism. If one insists on the obligation to follow a particular school, this in turn will create intolerance:

What is harmful is fragmentation of Muslims into sects and parties, while each of them requires its members to follow a scholar whom they call an imam, and they follow him in every word and opinion, and assemble themselves against the followers of another scholar, leading finally to the negligence of the Book [Qurʿan] and the sunna (prophetic customs).[79]

To say that the ijtihad is possible is not sufficient. In order to put this principle in action, Rida published fatwas (legal judgment in Islamic law) in al-Manār.

“Beginning in 1903, first under the title ‘Question and Fatwa’, and later in ‘Fatwas of al-Manār ’, Rida responded to a wide variety of queries sent in by readers from all corners of the Muslim world.” As they were collected and compiled, “the 2,592 fatwas first published in the pages of al-Manār constitute a remarkable record of the preoccupations and interests of early twentieth-century Muslims.”[80]

Although fatwas have been constantly issued throughout Islamic history, they were not considered as an exercise of ijtihad when the taqlīd tradition was strong. Rida opened, following ‘Abduh, a new path of issuing fat was by his own judgment, that is, by ijtihad.

Reopening the gate of ijtihad had an impact that was gradually felt later. As Basheer M. Nafi says: “By liberating Islam from the monopoly of the traditional institutions, the reformists prepared the ground for the laymen, the modern Muslim intellectual and the Muslim professional, to speak on the behalf of Islam.”[81] Rida, with other advocates of the ijtihad exercise, scored, therefore, a crucial point for later development of the Islamic revival movements.

 Qur’anic exegesis

Al-Manār made a great contribution in the field of Tafsīr , that is, “interpretation” or “exegesis” of the Qur’an. When it was serialized in al-Manār from 1901 (Vol. 4), it was simply called “Tafsīr al-Qur’ān al-akīm (Exegesis of the Wise Qur’an),” and was later published as a separate multi-volume title named Tafsīr al-Manār (Exegesis of al-Manār), or we may call it the Manarist interpretation of the Qur’an.

The Qur’an, being the primary source of legislation and the ultimate reference for human ideas in Islam, has seldom been disputed in Islamic history. Any idea of a thinker or any policy of a ruler that contradicts the Qur’an has faced the resistance of literati and the general population. However, the compatibility of an idea or of a policy, or the lack of it, be this in a theological, juristic, sociopolitical, or even scientific respect, with the Qur’an, also depends on how one can explain the relationship between the Qur’anic verses and this idea or that policy. This is why we find numerous references to Qur’anic verses in many kinds of Islamic writing.

In a sense, the history of Islamic thought is the history of how these justifications were made, or how authors tried to incorporate their ideas into the Qur’anic verses. And, each time a new idea succeeds in grounding itself on the Qur’an, the understanding of Qur’anic verses is also expanded.

However, the Qur’anic exegesis is an art or an Islamic science in itself. While it is not difficult to quote a few verses as a support of one’s own argument, it is not at all easy to make interpretations of all verses related to the subject consistently in conformity with one’s claim. If there is suspicion that it involves arbitrary interpretation or projection of wishful thinking into the verses, the claim can be discredited. Even if it gains temporary acceptance, it must bear its validity with the passing of time in the eyes of Muslim intellectuals and masses. Although there is no ecclesiastical authority to judge permissibility of a particular interpretation, it is not free for a Muslim intellectual to read arbitrarily ideas into the Qur’an. Actually all existing tafsīrs in circulation have survived the test of time, and are accepted at one level or another.

Now, if we see the history of Islamic thought as a dynamic process of interpretation of Qur’anic verses, Tafsīr al-Manār is nothing strange in itself. In form, it may even look conventional. When we open any page of Tafsīr al-Manār, it starts with some Qur’anic verses, and the explanation of a particular word and its circumstances, how one should understand it within the context of the verses, and what kind of legal consequences one may draw from these verses. However, the uniqueness of Tafsīr al-Manār lies in its contents. The journal of al-Manār was meant to reaffirm the validity of Islam as a religion in the contemporary world, of Islam as a civilization in the modern context. In order to accomplish this, the editor and contributors of the journal had to introduce new ideas either as Islamic or as compatible with Islamic principles. Tafsīr al-Manār is an attempt to justify the reformulation of Islamic understanding of faith, society, life, and the world in modern days with its readings of the Qur’anic passages. Dhahabi called this kind of modern Tafsīr as “ethical (adabī) and social (ijtimāʿī) interpretation.”[82] Another description is the “rational and social school of interpretation (al-madrasa al-ʿaqliyya al-ijtimāʿiyya),” given by al-Rūmī.[83] Both emphasize the social nature of interpretation. But the latter is critical of the rationalist element in it, while the first evaluates favorably its linguistic precision. Al-Muhtasib named ‘Abduh’s school of Tafsīr, by emphasizing its reformist tendency, as “rational and revelational trend (ittiğah ʿaqlī tawfīqī)” combining Islam and Western civilization.[84]

Tafsīr al-Manār is also innovative in that its success proved that the traditional form of Tafsīr can still function as a vehicle for conveying new ideas through the interpretation of Qur’anic verses.

We need a small note here on its authorship. Tafsīr al-Manār started, basing itself on the lectures about Qur’anic verses given by Muhammad ‘Abduh and written by Rida. This sometimes gives the incorrect impression that Muhammad ‘Abduh was the real author and Rashid Rida only the record keeper, so that Tafsīr al-Manār is sometimes attributed to ‘Abduh rather than Rida. It is not accurate to say “Muhammad ‘Abduh presented his Qur’anic exegesis in the form of lectures at al-Azhar University and within the scope of legal opinions (fatāwā, sig.fatwā) which were published separately as in the periodical, al-Manār (“The Lighthouse”), and later, with the author’s approval, were compiled, revised from a literary viewpoint, and continued by Muhammad ‘Abduh’s pupil, Muhammad Rashid Rida.”.[85]

When we look actually into the pages of Tafsīr al-Manār, it is quite apparent that this is not a simple record of the lectures given by Muhammad ‘Abduh. We find paragraphs beginning with qāla al-ustādh al-imām (the mentor-imam said): these refer to what Muhammad ‘Abduh said in his lectures. Sometimes, Rida gave summaries of the lectures, by saying “qāla mā maʿnāhu, ” or similar expressions. Then we find the word aqūl, “I say,” writing Rida’s own comments. This may be seen to resemble the traditional style, that is, instead of each author writing an independent Tafsīr, one may add a sharḥ (explanation) to a preceding Tafsīr. So it is possible to think that ‘Abduh made the major interpretation, followed by Rida who added his notes. However, it is easy to find places where the passages of Rida are more abundant than the words of‘Abduh. For example, on the verse of “You are the best community that has been raised up for mankind,” (chapter Āl ’Imrān, 110), Rida wrote:

The essence of what the mentor-imam [‘Abduh] said is: This description [of the best community] is true about those to whom it was first addressed. They were the Prophet, may Allah bestow blessings and peace upon him, and his companions who were with him, upon them be Divine satisfaction. They were once enemies, but God united their hearts so that, by Divine Grace, they became brothers. And they were those who tied each other by the Divine Rope [Islam] and were not disunited in religion to become partisans of particular sects, and they were those who were ordering the good and forbidding the evil.[86]

‘Abduh continues to portray the companions with their praiseworthy natures and acts. Here we can see the very Salafi attitude of putting an emphasis on the model character of the first generation. Then, Rida adds his comment to accentuate the point:

I say: This is the summary meaning of what the mentor-imam said, except the phrase “and his companions who were with him”[which needs an explanation]. This is from his words, but he intended these noble attributes and perfect characteristics for that perfect faith not for everyone for whom the hadīth scholars apply the term of a companion, such as a Bedouin who just embraced Islam and saw the Prophet only… [87]

He clarifies that the loyal and enduring companions were the models to follow, not any companion. Then, he goes further, raising the question of later conflicts among these leading companions, and giving his answer to the question of internal divisions at length.

Sometimes Rida gave additional explanations, and on other occasions extended comments on his own line of arguments. He was always extremely polite when he raised an objection to ‘Abduh’s interpretation, obscuring the fact that he was raising a point against his mentor.[88]

‘Abduh gave lectures on 5 out of the 30 volumes of the Qur’an, as it is conventionally divided. ‘Abduh used to read what Rida wrote, mostly before the printing, and gave his approval.[89] ‘Abduh passed away in 1905. Since then, Rida continued writing the Tafsīr for another thirty years by himself, and it became progressively his own, though he was confident that if ‘Abduh were to read his writings, he would have confirmed them.[90] He himself did not, however, complete Tafsīr al-Manār. He finished the 12th volume 4 months before his death.[91]

This work can be considered a collective work of ‘Abduh and Rida, or even of the Manarists,[92] as it is called Tafsīr al-Manār. This question of authorship is also related to the question of how we see the relationship among the “trio of Islamic Reform,” namely, al-Afghani, ‘Abduh, and Rida. To use Badawi’s words, “Al-Afghani was the inspirer of the Salafiyya school and ‘Abduh was its brains, but Rashid Ridha was its spokesman.”[93] However, Rida’s function was more than that of a spokesman. We may put them as follows: Al-Afghani lived the life of a busy revolutionary who wielded influence over young Muslims, but did not spend much time to write the details of what he advocated. ‘Abduh continued his mission, though on quite a different plane with a different mode, and founded theoretical principles on which the school of Islamic Reform and Salafiyya rests. Rida gave details to the principles, and tried to formulate them in more concrete manners in al-Manār. One might be tempted to say that Rida went down a particular line of argumentation too rigidly while ‘Abduh left certain difficult questions with ambiguous answers. Here is a secret concerning why other liberal disciples could be confident of their being ‘Abduh’s followers while they distanced themselves from the Islamic line Rida pursued, despite Rida’s monopolization of the position of the most favored disciple of ‘Abduh. Rida could not help but go into detail as the needs of the Islamic world at the time called for. He may be blamed for not having given perfect answers, but not for giving detailed answers. If we recognize this relationship between the three, the same is applicable to Tafsīr al-Manār. Al-Afghani initiated the task of reading the Qur’an in the light of modern conditions of the Islamic world, and ‘Abduh later gave actual lectures on the Qur’anic exegesis. Then, Rida recorded it, and expanded it with more details.

What are the methodological contributions of Tafsīr al-Manār? Although it looks basically conventional in its form, it is not void of new methodological contributions in the field. Here we refer to two of them. The first is the analytical summary of chapters. As a notable example, Rida cites, after giving a general description of topics in Sūra al-Baqara (Chapter of Cow), twenty-one legal points, or practical sanctions of the Islamic law, addressed to the Islamic community, putting numbers to these items, starting from (1) establishment of daily prayers and paying zakat, (2) prohibition of magic, (3) punishment for murders, kindness to parents and relatives, to (21) a prayer at the end of the chapter as a seal of practical sanctions. Then, he spelled out 33 “general legal principles and rules” in this chapter.[94] For anyone who is familiar with modern Tafsīrs, this may not seem particularly impressive. Classical Tafsīrs are, however, mostly written in a form called Tafsīr taḥlīlī, that is, commentaries given to verses in their order in the Qur’an.[95] As the sequential order of the Qur’an does not follow the kind of order that a law book or a literary text book may follow, it is very difficult to grasp the general view of a chapter or to locate a particular issue in it. They neither give summaries of any chapter, nor a summary of what the exegete writes on that chapter. So, Tafsīr al-Manār pioneers to give such descriptions of a chapter in order to facilitate its understanding by ordinary Muslims.

The second point: The earlier methodology was not just a convenient tool. It had a theoretical basis, which is the thematic integrity of each chapter. In earlier centuries, the concept that each chapter constitutes an integrated unit with central themes was not found. In Mustansir Mir’s words, to see a “sura [chapter] as a unit,” is a definite break with the traditional style of exegesis.[96] On this, we agree with Mir, but he omits ‘Abduh and Rida from his list of most important exegetes in the twentieth century.[97] We would rather agree with‘Abdullah Mahmud Shihata that “‘Abduh’s contribution was in drawing the general idea of a chapter and the issues with which it deals and the principles and the realities it contains, and that it was carried on by Rida.”[98] Shihata cited the integrity of the chapter as the first of the nine foundations on which ‘Abduh’s methodology relied.

As we have seen earlier, Tafsīr al-Manār addressed the needs of Muslims at the beginning of the twentieth century. The journal was for those Muslims who aspired to revive the Islamic umma. Through its Tafsīr, ‘Abduh and Rida were able to justify reformist ideas with Qur’anic verses, and ground these ideas in sacred scripture. They also expanded understanding of the Qur’an by reading these ideas in its verses. As the Qur’an has been a living guide for Muslims throughout these centuries due to this dynamism of updating the understanding of the scripture according to the social and spiritual needs of each era, opening this function for the modern need was an extremely important role played by Tafsīr al-Manār.

Before the twentieth century, Rūḥ al-Ma’ānī by al-Alusi (1802–1854) [99] has been the last encyclopedic Tafsīr of the classical brand. After this complicated and voluminous work in the middle of the nineteenth century, there was a gap of Tafsīr writing until Tafsīr al-Manār appeared. Once Tafsīr al-Manār reestablished the art of exegesis to address the contemporary reader, modern Tafsīrs began to flourish.[100]

A brief and selective list of works may include, from Egypt, Al-Ǧawāhir fī Tafsīr al-Qur’an al-Karīm by Ṭāntawī Ǧawharī (d. 1940),[101] Tafsīr al-Marāghī by Aḥmad Muīīafā al-Marāghī (1881–1945), [102] and Tafsīr al-Qur’ān al-Karīm by Maḥmūd Shaltūt[103], from Tunisia, Tafisīr al-Taḥrīr wa al-Tanwīr by Muḥammad al-Ṭāhir b.’Āsūr[104], and from Algeria, The Tafsīr of Ben Badis. [105] All of these are intellectually related to ‘Abduh, Rida and al-Manār. An important work by the Syrian Salafi Reformer contemporary to Rida, Muḥammad Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qāsimī could be added to the list.[106] His Tafsīr is commonly known as Tafsīr al-Qāsimī. In one of its editions, Rida’s remarks of praise for al-Qasimi are quoted as “the renewer of Islamic sciences” and “the reviver of the prophetic sunna ” who is “one of the unifying links between the guidance of the Salaf and the civilizational ascent appropriate for the time.”[107]

In the middle of the century, one of the most important works, probably one next to Tafsīr al-Manār in terms of its wide influence, appeared: FI Zilal al-Qur’an by Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966).[108] Volumes of the work have been translated into English,[109] and it is widely read beyond the Arab countries. Its author was influenced by al-Manār, as “Tafsīr al-Manār & had a great impact on Sayyid Qutb, and he made it a major reference in writing his everlasting work, In the Shade of the Qur’an ”.[110]

The last two decades of the twentieth century also witnessed new Tafsīrs, such as Al-Asas fi al-Tafsīr by Saʿid Hawwa,[111] a leading ideologue of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, al-Tafsīr al-Munir and al-Tafsīr al-Wasit by a prolific Syrian scholar Wahba al-Zuhayli,[112] and al-Tafsīr al-Wasit by the then Grand Mufti of Egypt and now Grand Shaykh of al-Azhar, Muhammad Sayyid Tantawi.[113] The continuity of the Tafsīr literature as one of the most important avenue to express modern Islamic ideas in the form of Qur’anic exegesis seems firmly established by now, and it would not be an exaggeration to say that Tafsīr al-Manār had a major, if not the sole, role in opening this avenue.

 Modern Islamic political theory

We should now turn to political theory. Rida and al-Manār lived in an era when the Islamic world was in one of the most serious periods of political turmoil. Most of the proponents of the Islamic revival took a defensive position against Western encroachment. Many of them were very critical of the shortcomings of the Ottoman dynasty but did not wish for it to be dismantled. One of the most serious calamities for the Islamic world was the demise of the Ottoman empire. When the new Turkish leadership abolished the Sultanate in 1922, thus ending the long reign of the dynasty over six centuries, and keeping a separate Caliphate as a symbolic institution, it created a terrible crisis in the planes of both political reality and political thought.

The Ottoman dynasty in its later days depended upon the dual institution of the Sultanate-Caliphate for its legitimacy.[114] For the larger part of the Islamic world, the Caliphate was the main concern, as this feature distinguished the Ottoman dynasty from all other polities and made it a representative of the Islamic world, at least for the majority Sunnis. After the republic was declared in 1923, the new Turkish government abolished the formal Caliphate in 1924. For Muslims of other lands, this was not a Turkish domestic issue.

Rida started to write his al-Lilafa, aw al-Imama al-ʿUzma fi al-Islam (Caliphate, or the Supreme Leadership in Islam)[115] immediately after the abolishment of the Sultanate, and ended its argument before the abolishment of the shadowy Caliphate. For Rida, by then it had become a nominal institution—that Caliphate was not worthy of the name—and he formulated a theory of Islamic khilafa (Caliphate), which in his eyes was simultaneously realistic for the modern age.

Though lengthy and full of juristic arguments, his theory may be characterized, perhaps simplistically, by the following eight points[116] :

1 The khilafa (Caliphate) is the sole legitimate Islamic polity for the umma ;

2 It must be reinstituted in such a manner that it can function under contemporary conditions;

3 Government must be run by the Council of Shura (consultation), which is comprised of Ahl al-hall wa al-2aqd (people of authority). Currently, people of authority are not only Islamic scholars but also leaders of the political, military, economic, and other domains;

4 The khalifa (Caliph) will represent the government, and he must be a qualified mujtahid, well-versed in Islamic knowledge and capable of exercising independent reasoning to guarantee rule by al-Shari‘a;

5 He must be of Quraysh origin (a descendant of the Quraysh, the tribe of Prophet Muhammad);

6 The Muslims must strive to realize Islamic government (or, governments, if necessary) under a khalifa ;

7 If circumstances do not permit a khilafa with full conditions, even an imperfect khilafa should be established;

8 While all Muslims are under this obligation, especially the Arabs and the Turks should cooperate together for its achievement.

It is not unfair to say that it is the masterpiece of the Sunni Caliphate theory in the twentieth century. It is so because of the power of its elaborate discussions, and it provided a sufficient ground for the supporters of the Caliphate as the sole legitimate polity. For others, especially for the generations after the 1940s, the topic lost relevance, and no serious rival theory was offered.[117]

If we look back at the history of Islamic political thought, we find in the premodern periods the classical theories of Caliphate by the famous al-Mawardi (975–1058),[118] and Abu Ya’la al-Farra’ (990–1065)[119] who was no less important, though less known, than al-Mawardi, and a concluding masterpiece of all classical theories by Mihab al-Din Ahmad al-Qalqamandi (1355–1418).[120] We may be tempted to say that Rida’s comes after these in line as a modern masterpiece.[121]

Similarities between the classical theories and Rida’s stem partly from the latter’s numerous quotations from the former, to the degree that one may be tempted to claim that “Rida thinks the traditional system of government still the best.”[122] Certainly Rida didn’t hesitate to depend on great authorities in the past when appropriate for his own objectives. He was, however, far from being traditional. He mobilized all possible resources to make Islam viable under the contemporary conditions, and authentic according to the primary sources of Islam, that is, the Qur’an and the Sunna. The combination itself is quite revivalist, and therefore modern, however classical it may look, departing from the traditional.

Kerr stated in his conclusion that

[H]is revival of the classical theory of the Caliphate serves to remind us that the classical theory itself had not been a program for action but a hyperbolical, almost allegorical, rationalization…. RiÎa’s constitutional theory, despite his intentions, does not represent a serious program but a statement of ideals.[123]

On the contrary, it seems to the author that Rida had a full intention to lay a theoretical ground of a modern Islamic state, but was not optimistic about the scheme he had. He proposed:

[The proposal is]… to leave the issue of the khilafa (Caliphate) to the all Islamic peoples, and independent and semi-independent governments among them, and constitute a mixed independent committee or assembly with its headquarters in Istanbul, which will study all reports and proposals from the men of knowledge and judgment on the issue, and this will prepare an Islamic conference …[124]

If anything, Rida should be criticized for his lack of popular basis to translate his idea into an action plan, not for being unrealistic in his thinking itself. In fact, “he was increasingly marginal to the main events of the day. In a period when mass political organizations were being established, he remained without a formal organization to present his views.”[125] Al-Manār being an intellectual journal, his ideas had to wait for a mass movement such as the Muslim Brotherhood for realization of any idea. Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) established the organization in 1928, yet another reaction to the demise of the Ottoman Caliphate.

Kerr was content that Rida sanctioned modern, secular institutions through Islamic principles, and called it “assimilative function.”[126] This judgment was quite understandable as it was the time “[s]ince the suppression of the Muslim Brethren in Egypt and the demise of the Islamic constitution of Pakistan, there has ceased to be any visible likelihood that Islamic legal and constitutional principles would be made to serve as the operative basis of a modern state in any Muslim country.”[127] Now, after seeing many “visible” signs, such as the Islamic revolution in Iran and the de facto revival and expansion of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt,[128] as well as calls for Islamic constitutions, we may have a more positive, and probably fairer evaluation of Rida’s theory.

Mahmoud Haddad criticizes the preceding works on political ideas of Rida as taking the theory on the khilafa as an independent work, without contextualizing it in the development of Rida’s political thought.[129] He came to the conclusion that “Rida, throughout his career, usually placed the political independence of Islam above all other concerns, including theoretical consistency.”[130] His argument that Rida’s seeming inconsistency in al-Khilafa can be seen as the pragmatic attitudes seeking Islam’s independence, is quite convincing. This also reminds us of his contribution to the legitimacy of an Islamic state as such in the twentieth century, when we see his theory from a distance, as a close look tends to draw us into its details as a Caliphate, a very specific form of the Islamic state.

We can now put his theory in the category of “governance by the jurist,” together with Khomeini’s “guardianship of the jurist (wilaya al-faqih)” and Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr’s political guidance of the “righteous authority (al-mar?ga’iyya al-saliha).”[131] Al-Sadr was very instrumental in the contents of the Islamic Constitution of Iran in 1979, no less than Khomeini’s theory.[132] If we are to name Rida’s theory in this respect, we may call it khilafa al-mujtahid (Caliphate of the qualified jurist). Putting a jurist or a mujtahid on the top of the polity does not necessarily mean the government is run by Islamic scholars entirely. Actually, Rida conceived the khilafa as governance by both secular and Islamic leaders,[133] as is the case of Iran after the revolution. He was apparently a pioneer in this category of ideas on the contemporary Islamic governance.

 The third path in the middle

Rida named himself and his colleagues the “moderate party of Islamic reform (hizb al-islah al-islami al-mu’tadil).” Moderation (i’dal) means a balance between two extremes.

Al-Maraghi named three opponents of Rida at the time of his death, namely, “Disbelievers who do not believe in any religion,” “non-Muslim opponents,” and “Muslims who are stagnant.” The first refers, if we take off its religious jargons, not to non-Muslims but to the Muslim secularists, the second, Christian opponents who were again mostly secular,[134] and the third the conservative traditionalists. Rida himself spoke of the mutafarnij (“Franconizer,” that is, Westernizer, or “imitators of European laws and systems”) and the imitators (conservative traditionalists), and himself between these two poles.[135] Hourani, in his work, which became a modern classic in the field, summarizes Rida’s position: “[N]othing much could be hoped from the recognized religious institutions,” but also “nothing could be expected of the ‘westernizers’ who had dominated public life for the last few generations.” “Somewhere between the two extremes however stood a middle group, the ‘Islamic progressive party’: they had the independence of mind necessary to understand at the same time the laws of Islam and the essence of modern civilization.”[136]

Apparently, what is in the middle between the two extremes changes its position from one period to another, as the social realities as well as the intellectual map change over time. Although Rida criticized the secularists seriously, and was criticized by them, what secularism meant had also changed greatly as secularization of each society was progressing.

In Egypt, before the death of ‘Abduh, the reform of the ‘ulama’ and al-Azhar seemed essential for legal and educational reforms, as the ‘ulama’ were the traditional bearers of these two domains. By the time Rida neared the end of his life, these two domains had mostly passed into the hands of secular institutions. The traditional was then much less a focus of the reformists, as it lost ground to the secularists. On the other hand, the trend of the Islamic revival started to have its leaders among the new generation educated in secular institutions, such as Hasan al-Banna and Sayyid Qutb of the Muslim Brotherhood.

What is certain at the macro level is, however, the general position of the Islamic reformers who tried to find a middle ground where they could combine Islam and modernity. The combination was that of two substances, contradicting each other, “Islam and modernity,” “revelation and reason,” “religion and modern civilization,” “Islam and modern society,” and the like, and therefore a way had to be found in between. By the middle of the twentieth century, their attempts were considered a failure, and functioned only to facilitate de facto secularization.[137] As discussed earlier in this chapter, the failure was not final, and could be considered a tentative setback, as far as the strength of reformism as a social idea is concerned. It continued to survive as an ideal to which many Muslims strove and are still striving, as they felt unable to abandon Islam or modernity.[138]

The reformers’ capability to sustain the morale of the Muslims is not itself proof that this combination of seemingly contradictory natures can be successfully made. Basheer M. Nafi’s restrained assessment, however, that “[W]hile no religious system could escape the impact of modernity unscathed, Islamic reformist thought paved the way for the assimilation of modernity with the least possible loss for Islam,”[139] is quite agreeable.

Yet, many cast doubts on the actual possibility of the combination proposed by the reformers. Many were, and are, openly skeptical.[140] Investigation of this issue continues to our day in a different garment. Popular topics among the students of the Islamic world today, such as “Islam and modernity,” “Islam and modernization,” and “Islam and democracy”[141] are but a few among them.

What has drastically changed the underlying assumptions and the tone of arguments came from a totally different direction in the latter half of the twentieth century, namely from East Asia. Japan’s success in the postwar period, with its amazing economic growth from the 1950s to the early 1970s and subsequent rise as a leading economic power in the world in the 1980s, and the successes of the emerging economies in East and Southeast Asia following Japan’s model, had changed the fundamental assumption that modernization can be done only through Westernization and therefore traditional cultures such as Islam and Confucianism were nothing but a hindrance to development.

A combination of the inherent culture and modernization can be done, as Japan did.[142] Can this also happen to Islam? In 1930, Rida stated in a lecture:

We need an independent renewal like that of Japan to promote our economic, military, and political interests and develop our agricultural, industrial, and commercial wealth.[143]

Yet, for them, it was a distant dream. Can this actually happen now in the Islamic world? We don’t yet have a definite answer. In the recent decades, Malaysia, a Muslim country, rose as a successful developing country. Mahathir Mohamad, Malaysia’s prime minister from 1981 to 2003, was quite vocal in his country’s “quest for the status of a fully developed nation by the year 2020,”[144] that is to become the first developed country in the Islamic world to prove that the combination of Islam and modernity is possible. This is certainly an interesting case.

What we have to consider now is whether the former assumption that the reformist project was by definition contradictory was right or not. The assumption should be judged, by now, premature, if not totally wrong.

There is another element in this discussion. It is the change of the nature of science and technology, or their bearers. In the days of Rida and al-Manār, we can see many of the reformers were from humanities backgrounds, including Islamic studies. In olden days, the “Easterners” had to acquire a “modern mind” which could work scientifically. Reformers actually advocated that the students in Islamic studies must learn modern sciences. Rida himself learned modern science under his enlightened mentor, Husayn Jisr, and advocated the importance of the combination. Lately, however, in the last three decades or so, we see that many leaders in Islamic movements are of natural sciences background. These medical doctors, scientists, and engineers do not seem to bother themselves with the profound question of how to acquire a “modern scientific mind,” which many asked a century ago. It should be noted that Mahathir Mohamad is originally a medical doctor.

The medical doctors, scientists, engineers, and the like, are apparently the fruit of modernization in each country. Their turning to Islamic identity does not have a necessary correlation with the question of a “scientific mind,” though we need a detailed survey on this question. One might be tempted to say, at least, that these professionals simply learned modern sciences in a modern way, and only when they acquired the sciences did they turn to Islam as their cultural identity.

If we look at what kind of Islam they turn to, however, we find one which ‘Abduh, Rida, and their colleagues founded, that is, a reformist understanding of Islam, based on the primary sources, the Qur’an and the Sunna, exercising ijtihad (independent reasoning) in the Islamic law, advocating that Islam and modern civilization can be merged together. It is not yet time to jump to the conclusion that the Manarists’ formula of combining the two poles proved to be viable. We certainly need a re-evaluation of the issue, not only by examining the recent developments in the Islamic world but also by adding the latest debates on modernity and modernization in a truly global perspective.

 Islamic revival in the later decades

After Rashid Rida passed away, Hasan al-Banna, the founder and the General Guide (Head) of the Society of Muslim Brotherhood, tried to continue the journal al-Manār . Though he did not succeed except to publish the issues of the last volume in five years, his movement carried out the mission of Islamic reform at a mass level. Al-Banna used to visit Rida, and inherited the ideas of al-Manār for Islamic reform and revival, in a much simplified and popularized version. We can say that, to the extent that he was a Salafi, he continued the mission of al-Manār , which established the modern Salafiyya.[145]

As noted earlier, while the trend of ideas al-Manār established continued to flow in the underground “water veins,” metaphorically speaking, the momentum of the Islamic revival was lost in the 1950s to 1970s, when Arab nationalism and socialism swept across the Middle East scene. When the Islamic Revolution in Iran shook the entire region, this was reversed, and the phenomena of the Islamic revival started to manifest itself not only in predominantly Shiite Iran, but also in Sunni countries. The Muslim Brotherhood re-emerged as a political force to be reckoned with in Egypt, Syria, Jordan, and Palestine, among other Arab countries. As al-Manār elaborated Sunni theories of the Islamic revival in the earlier decades, its ideas also started to surface.[146]

When Rida wrote his theory of “khilafa of the mujtahid, ” or governance by the jurists, in the 1920s, it was seen as an obsolete nostalgia harkening to classical theory. When Ayatullah Khomeini’s theory of “guardianship by the jurist” became the backbone of the new Islamic republic in Iran, few remembered the significance of Rida’s theory. The political thesis that a qualified jurist should govern certainly reflects the contemporary plight of Muslims in the political domain, caught between the inability of the traditional Islamic elites and the non-Islamic nature of new ruling elites. As such, Rida was rather a forerunner, not an anachronistic observer in his time. Although the jurists’ taking power is not particularly prospective currently in Sunni countries, their political roles have been strengthened to a great extent, after a long period of deterioration.

It seems that many of reform ideas Rida and the Manarists proposed were later accepted and incorporated by mainstream Islamic scholars. Rida and his colleagues probably called for too radical a reform at that time. As the “great majority of the reformist ulama, including ‘Abduh, Rida, al-Qasimi and al-Jaza’iri, belonged to rural or small urban families, not to the entrenched ulama aristocracy of the urban notables,”[147] the establishment found their cause to be at odds with theirs. With the expansion of social space for the masses and the Islamic revival among them, however, their teachings began to reach more friendly ears. Today, what they advocated has become common sense. This subsequent success of the reformers obscures the innovativeness of their claims at their time. Al-Manār struggled hard to make ijtihad possible and to issue modern fatwas. Exercise of ijtihad and innovative fatwas have become more common today.

Of recent events of the Islamic revival, one conference attracts our attention. It was a founding conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama, held in London in July 2004. It was a gathering of more than two hundred Islamic scholars from Muslim countries, many of them prominent in their own countries as well as transnationally in the larger Islamic world. The conference immediately reminds us of the Meccan conference of al-Kawakibi, or his proposal to convene an international conference to discuss the affairs of the Islamic umma.

The formation of the Union aimed to form a common platform where a viable body of men and women of knowledge could create a foundation for the unity of the Islamic umma, and prepare the Islamic law in a way suitable to the times.[148]

The conference invited not only Sunni scholars but also Shiite and Ibadi scholars. Among those who made the first addresses were Dr Ekmeleddin İhsanog?lu, the prospective secretary general of the OIC (as of January 1, 2005), Shaykh Ahmad al-Khalili, the Grand Mufti of Oman, the highest position in the Ibadi school, and Ayatullah Muhammad ’Ali Tasliri, a prominent Iranian Shiite jurist and the president of the World Forum for Proximity of Islamic Schools of Thought. The conference established the Union, and elected as its president, Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, three vice presidents, respectively from the Sunni, the Shiite, and the Ibadi.

Al-Qaradawi inherited, it seems to the present author, the reformist school of al-Manār in many ways. When he was young, he joined the Muslim Brotherhood, the organizational heir to the Manarists' thought, led by Hasan al-Banna. While al-Banna was an Islamic leader with a secular school education,[149] and the founder of a mass movement, al-Qaradawi is an Islamic scholar who always argues with the Qur'an and the Sunna, the way Rida used to do.

Rida called his group the "balanced (muʿtadil) Islamic reform party." Al-Qaradawi developed the concept of the "wasatiyya (middle way)."[150] He explains that Islam is of the umma of 'adl (justice) and i'tidal (balance).[151] The concept expresses itself as being in the middle of the path. While al-Qaradawi describes the wasatiyya as one of the main characteristics of Islam, it is his vision of Islam, as the reformers' vision of Islam for Rida and the Manarists was the truly authentic understanding of Islam.

More importantly, al-Qaradawi continues the mission of 'Abduh and Rida in issuing fatwas to give answers to contemporary questions.[152] Al-Qaradawi says in his book on the question of fatwa:

After that [the periods of traditional fatwas], fatwas of al-ʿallama al-mujaddid [great renewer scholar] al-Sayyid Muhammad Rashid Rida had become famous, which were published in his noble Islamic journal, al-Manār , a journal which continued for thirty five years. Each issue always had one or more fatwas , answering questions from the readers of the journal in the Islamic world. For this reason, the questions and answers did not represent any particular locality, but addressed problems the entire Islamic umma and Muslims in all corners of the earth were facing….

These fatwas had many features. First, they treat modern issues and actual problems which peoples face and suffer and need to know the answers of Islamic law, or at least, contemporary Islamic ijtihad (judgment, reasoning) on them. Second, they are written with a spirit of intellectual independence, with freedom from bonds of sectarianism, imitation, and narrow-minded insistence on a particular view. He did not refer except to the Book [Qur'an], Sunna, and the foundations of the Islamic law.... Third, they carry the spirit of reform and the invitation to the balanced comprehensive Islam.[153]

Here we can see an apparent successor to the Manarists. The distance between the Manarists and this Union, however, can be seen in the question of khilafa (Caliphate). Rida spoke in strong tones that the Islamic umma needed the true Caliphate as a necessary condition of its revival, and that the Muslims had an obligation to rebuild it. He spelled out in detail the conditions of the khilafa in the contemporary context. In 2004, al-Qaradawi was very explicit that the Union does not seek to restore the khilafa.

Muslims used to have khilafa that united them together, and embodied their unity. It is, according to the 'ulama's definition, deputyship of the Messenger [Muhammad] for the protection of Islam and administration of society, and it is religious and earthly leadership, both spiritual and temporal. The Muslims lived under this unifying banner for more than thirteen centuries, until the khilafa was abolished in 1924, and with its end, Islamic umma's assembly under the banner of Islamic faith was lost.... If fatwa changes according to the changes of time, place and situation, then our fatwa of today is: The 'ulama' are those who have to perform the roles of khilafa (Caliphate) and khalifas (Caliphs).[154]

This does not necessarily mean that the Union departed from the point where Rida resided eighty years ago. Since Rida's theory emphasized essentially the necessity of an Islamic state and the leading function of the scholars in the affairs of the umma , both Rida's and the Union's positions can be seen as different formulations of the same school in different times. When Rida wrote al-Khilafa aw al-Imama al-2Uzma , the Caliphate was an important title just abolished, and therefore could be restored. After many decades without it, the title has become less significant than the substance of the polity itself. Yet, it took these many decades for Sunni scholars to declare what al-Qaradawi stated in a blunt manner.

 Concluding remarks

Seen from the beginning of the twenty-first century, with the Islamic revival having become a reality, the groundwork which al-Manār and its contemporary counterparts had done could be judged as having great relevance for our understanding of the Islamic world in the modern era. By now, al-Manār seems quite successful in many ways, even as it was judged to the contrary four decades ago.

While we abstain from an oversimplification or overestimation of the roles of al-Manār, certainly a re-evaluation must be done in the context of studying Islamic thought in the contemporary world, from the late nineteenth century, throughout the twentieth century, and well into the twenty-first century.

Since the present author began to call for such a re-evaluation in the middle of the 1980s, simultaneous re-evaluations have been made in some quarters so that we see a better presentation of Rida and his school than before. The attempt has not, however, been satisfactory, and further investigations on the pages of al-Manār and their historical contexts should be made. It will enhance the understanding of not only the Islamic world but also international society at large, as the beam of the lighthouse was directed at both in those days.

[1] A digitalized photographic edition of the complete set of the journal was published in 2003. Kosugi Yasushi (general editor), al-Manār 1898–1935 on CD-ROM (Kyoto: COE-ASAFAS, Kyoto University, 2003), with The Index of al-Manār. The index was published originally in a book form in 1998. Yusuf H. Ibish, Kosugi Yasushi and Yusuf K. Khoury, The Index of al-Manār (Tokyo: Islamic Area Studies Project and Beirut: Turath, 1998).

[2] Studies on al-Manār after the 1970s in the West were not null, though few in number, such as Mahmud Osman Haddad, Rashīd Riḍā and the Theory of the Caliphate: Medieval Themes and Modern Concerns (New York: Columbia University, 1991, unpublished PhD dissertation); Emad Eldin Shahin, Through Muslim Eyes: M. Rashīd Riḍā and the West (Herndon: International Institute of Islamic Thought, 1993). Anthologies have not often made justice to al-Manār. Bias in an earlier collection as Anour Abdel-Malek, Contemporary Arab Political Thought (London: Zed Books, 1983) is quite understandable given the dominance of the nationalist paradigm (the original French edition was in 1970). The complete absence of Riḍā, though al-Manār is used as a source for ‘Abduh, in a recent work as Mansoor Moaddel and Kamran Talattof, eds, Modernist and Fundamentalist Debates in Islam: A Reader (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002), for example, seems unfair. Charles Kurzman, ed., Modernist Islam, 1840–1940: A Sourcebook (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002) is well balanced and much fairer to Riḍā.

[3] Many revolutions, including military coups with the names of revolutions, were made in the 1950s and 1960s in the Middle East, then with September Revolution in 1969 in Libya, a relatively calm decade followed. For the revolutionary decades, see Hisham B. Sharabi, Nationalism and Revolution in the Arab World (New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1966).

[4] See Ruh Allah Khumayni, Islam and Revolution: Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini, trans. Hamid Algar (Berkeley, CA: Mizan Press, 1981).

[5] To cite a few, Islamic Groups (Gamaat Islamiyya) were active on university campuses; the Muslim Brotherhood was revived after dissolution for almost two decades, and its monthly organ, al-Dawa was widely read especially among the young generation with an Islamic inclination.

[6] Fouad Al-Omar and Mohammed Abdel Haq, Islamic Banking, Theory, Practice and Challenges (London: Oxford University Press, 1996); Nicholas Dylan Ray, Arab Islamic Banking and the Renewal of Islamic Law (London: Graham & Trotman, 1995). Citing the case of Islamic banking as an example of Islamic revival may look unconventional, while arguments on the Islamic revival tend to focus on the political, as the entire issue is sometimes labeled under the title of 'political Islam.' See Nazih N. Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World (London and New York: Routledge, 1991). There was an apparent prominence of the return of Islam in the political domain after the revolution in Iran. However, the Islamic revival which al-Manār sought was much wider in scope, so is the later phenomenon of the Islamic revival.

[7] For the Islamic 'commonalities,' see Kosugi Yasushi, 'Restructuring Islamic Political Theories: Basic Concepts in a Contemporary Framework,' in Kuroda Toshio and R. I. Lawless, eds, Nature of the Islamic Community (Tokyo: Keiso Shobo, 1991), 37–70. Twelve basic concepts are pointed as common between the Sunnis and the Shi'ite on pp. 53–59.

[8] A substantial number of literature on these cases appeared, and the number increased sharply in the 1980s. See Asaf Hussain, Islamic Movements in Egypt, Pakistan and Iran: An Annotated Bibliography (London: Mansell, 1983); Yvonne Yazbeck Hadded et al., The Contemporary Islamic Revival: A Critical Survey and Bibliography (Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1991).

[9] These events were described and analyzed in detail in Kosugi Yasushi, The Islamic World (Tokyo: Chikuma-shobo, 1998) [in Japanese].

[10] Nationalism in those days was equated with anticolonialism, anti-imperialism, national liberation movements widely observed in the Third World, nonalignment, and Asian and African solidarity, and also often intermixed with socialism and backed by the Soviet Union and the Eastern Bloc, as well-illustrated in the cases of Arab nationalism.

[11] Malcolm Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad ‘Abduh and Rashīd Riḍā (Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press, 1966).

[12] Malcolm Kerr, ‘Rashīd Riḍā and Islamic Legal Reform: An Ideological Analysis, Part II: Application,’ The Muslim World 50 (1960): 181.

[13] The concept of ‘Islamization’ used here is that an area or a region may be Islamized (spread of Islam as a religion among the population and accompanying cultural transformation of the society) while the new Muslims’ understanding of Islam takes the form of local culture, as if Islam has become localized. Islamization is not therefore a one-direction movement toward Islam, but a complementary process of Islamization/localization-indigenization. By the same token, when de-Islamization occurs, exteriorization (to consider Islam as an element coming from the outside earlier) happens. When re-Islamization occurs, as observed in the recent Islamic revival, it is not re-localization or re-interiorization, but mostly modernization/contemporarization and globalization, that accompany it. See the argument in Kosugi Yasushi, ‘Reconsidering ‘Unity and Diversity’ in the Islamic World: A Methodological Inquiry,’ Southeast Asian Studies 37/2 (1999): 143–149 [in Japanese].

[14] See, for example, ʿAndnan ʿAli Riḍā al-Nahwi, Al-Sahwa al-Islamiyya ila ayna? [Islamic Awakening, to Where?], Expanded 3rd ed. (Riyadh: Dar al-Nahwi, 1993). ‘Awakening’ can be yaqza in Arabic, as in Muhammad Imara, Al-Tariq ila al-Yaqza al-Islamiyya (Cairo and Beirut: Dar al-Shuruq, 1990).

[15] It is noted that one of the leading exponents of the Islamic revival today, Yusuf al-Qaradawi earned his 2alim degree by a thesis on zakat. Yasuf al-Qaradawi, Fiqh al-Zakat, 16th ed.[1st ed. in Egypt], 2 vols (Cairo: Maktaba Wahba, 1986) [The original edition appeared first in Lebanon in 1969].

[16] This term was formally used first in Japan in 1985, as the title of the main symposium at the first annual conference of Japan Association of Middle East Studies. Since then, it has been in circulation and greatly appreciated academically, as an alternative to the controversial term ‘Islamic fundamentalism,’ which is too heavily colored by threat perceptions, and tends to focus on political and violent dimensions of the Islamic revival. How individual ‘awakening’ can be translated into a social action is analyzed in Kosugi Yasushi, The Contemporary Middle East and Islamic Politics (Kyoto: Showado, 1994), 145–148 [in Japanese].

[17] Charles C. Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt: A Study of the Modern Reform Movement Inaugurated by Muhammad ‘Abduh (London: Oxford University Press, 1933), 205–247, uses the term the ‘ ‘Manar’ Party’ as ‘Abduh’s followers. In this article, the Manarists are Riḍā and his associates/contributors to al-Manār, as liberals among ‘Abduh’s disciples took a different path than Riḍā’s.

[18] Serialized posthumously in al-Manār 5 (1902–1903): 26–33, 65–71, 105–110, 141–146, 183–190, 223–228, 264–268, 304–308, 344–349, 381–385, 501–505, 668–678, 703–710, 771–778, 825–833, 859–864, 899–910. The page numbers from al-Manār given in this article are of the original. There is some incorrect numbering in the original, so certain numbers are printed twice in different places. The errata are clarified in the attached file in Kosugi, ed., al-Manār 1898–1935 on CD-ROM.

[19] Al-Kawakibi wrote the work in Aleppo, modified several times after he moved to Egypt in 1899. It was published as a book in 1900, then published in al-Manār. Sami al-Dahhan, ʿAbd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi, 4th print (Cairo: Dar al-Maarif, 1980), 55. Al-Kawakibi’s work as a book has been reprinted in Arab countries to this day. See the following edition, which also contains a detailed study by the editor on previous editions of the work: ʿAbd al-Rahman Al-Kawakibi Umm al-Qura: Mu1tamar al-nahda al-Islamiyya ed. Muhammad Jamal Al-Tahhan (Damascus: Dar al-Awa1il, 2002).

[20] The name was given in its announcement in the previous number of the journal as ‘Sigill gamiyya Umm al-Qura [The Record of Umm al-Qura Association],’ al-Manār 4 (1902): 956.

[21] ‘Al-Kitab al-mawud bi-namrihi [The Work Promised of its Publication],’ al-Manār 5 (1902): 26.

[22] Ibid., 27–28.

[23] For example, Sylvia G. Haim, ed., Arab Nationalism: An Anthology (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1962). A portion of Al-Kawakibi’s work is titled as ‘The Excellences of the Arabs,’ and he was judged to be the ‘first true intellectual precursor of modern secular Pan-Arabism’ in the editor’s introduction (p. 27).

[24] Adeed Dawisha, Arab Nationalism in the Twentieth Century: From Triumph to Despair (Princeton, NJ and Oxford: Princeton University Press, 2003), 24.

[25] See, for example, ʿAbd al-Haqq al-Azami (an Iraqi author), ‘Al-Arab wa al-Arabiyya, bihima salah al-umma al-Islamiyya [The Arab and the Arabic, with Them There Will Be the Wellness of the Islamic Umma],’ al-Manār 16 (1913): 753–771; ‘Lugha al-Islam wa al-lugha al-rasmiyya bayna al-mamalik al-Islamiyya [The Language of Islam and the Official Language among the Islamic Kingdoms],’ al-Manār 24 (1923): 753–765; ‘Ahamm ma yajib ala muslimi al-aajim min al-lugha al-Arabiyya [The Most Important Part of the Arabic Language Necessary for the Non-Arab Muslims (fatwa)],’ al-Manār 29 (1929): 661–664.

[26] Riḍā’s reports on the conference in Cairo: al-Manār 27 (1926): 208–232, 280–294, 370–377, 449–458.

[27] Riḍā’s reports on the conference in Jerusalem: al-Manār 32 (1932): 113–132, 193–208, 284–292, 555–558. He was the chair of the committee of Islamic Call and Guidance (al-dawa wa al-irmad) in the conference. The leading convener of the conference, Amin al-Husayni, had studied earlier with Rida in Cairo.

[28] It goes without saying that the OIC is not Islamic in the traditional sense as it is an international organization of nation-states. This is, however, a proof of Islamic revival being modern, rather than traditional or archaic. For OIC, see Hasan Moinuddin, The Charter of the Islamic Conference and Legal Framework of Economic Co-operation among its Member States (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987); Saad S. Khan, Reasserting International Islam: A Focus on the Organization of the Islamic Conference and Other Islamic Institutions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001).

[29] Makib Arslan, ‘Jawab al-Amir Makib Arslan,’ al-Manār 31 (1930–1931): 355–370, 449–464, 529–553. For Arslan, see the chapter on him in the present volume.

[30] The question sent by Muhammad B. Umran was (1) why the Muslims, especially ‘we, the Muslims of Java and Malaya,’ entered into a state of weakness and degeneration; (2) why Europeans, Americans, and Japanese made tremendous progress. Al-Manār 31 (1930): 355. Another example of an Indonesian question and Riḍā’s answer is translated as Rashīd Riḍā, ‘Patriotism, Nationalism, and Group Spirit in Islam,’ in John J. Donohue and John L. Esposito, eds, Islam in Transition: Muslim Perspectives (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982), 57–59.

[31] William L. Cleveland, Islam against the West: Shakib Arslan and the Campaign for Islamic Nationalism (Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1985), 115.

[32] Richard P. Mitchell, The Society of the Muslim Brothers, new edition with a foreword by John O. Voll (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993), 23. The last issue of al-Manār 35/10 was published in September 1940.

[33] R. Stephan Humphreys ‘The Contemporary Resurgence in the Context of Modern Islam,’ in Ali E. Hillal Dessouki, ed., Islamic Resurgence in the Arab World (New York: Praeger, 1982), 77.

[34] Respect for the Salaf itself is more generally observed, and not particular to Salafiyya, and as such, the term is used in an extremely varied ways by contemporary thinkers. See ʿAbd al-Rahman b. Zayd al-Zanaydi, Al-Salafiyya wa qadaya al-asr (Rayadh: Dar Ambiliya, 1998), 31–49. In this article, the Manarist understanding of Salafiyya has been maintained.

[35] As an example, a book review on Ibn Taymiyya’s multi-volume fatwa collection, al-Manār 15 (1912): 555–556, praises the work, and says that it is available from the publisher or through Dar al-Manār.

[36] Nelly Lahoud, Political Thought in Islam: A Study in Intellectual Boundaries (London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2005), 16.

[37] Al-SayyidGamal al-Din al-Afghani, Mayl Muhammad ‘Abduh, Al-Urwa al-Wutqa, ed. Sayyid Hadi Khusru Shahi (Cairo: Maktaba al-Muruq al-Duwaliyya, 2002).

[38] See Thomas Philipp, The Syrians in Egypt: 1725–1975 (Stuttgart: Steiner Verlaf Wiesbaden GmbH, 1985), 111–116.

[39] On his political thought on Sham and actual involvement in Syrian politics, Suechika Kota has made a significant contribution. See his work based on his doctoral thesis, Islam and Politics in Contemporary Syria: From Islamic Reformism to Muslim Brotherhood (Kyoto: Nakanishiya, 2005) [in Japanese].

[40] See a short tribute to him, al-Manār, 12 (1909): 560, and Riḍā's memoir on him, al-Manār, 21 (1919): 160–163. For other mentors of Rida, see Muhammad Ahmad Darniqa, Al-Sayyid Muhammad Ramid Ridā: Islahatuhu al-ijtima'iyya wa al-diniyya (Beirut: Mu1assasa al-Risala and Tripoli: Dar al-Iman, 1986), 23–35.

[41] Riḍā, 'Fatiha Tafsir al-Qur'an al-Hakim,' Tafsir al-Manār 1 (Cairo: al-Hay1a al-Misriyya al-ʿAmma li-l-Kitab, 1972), 11. His first encounter with the journal, a similar account, is quoted from his biography of 'Abduh in Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age 1798–1939 (London: Oxford University Press, 1967), 226.

[42] ʿAbd al-Basit Muhammad Hasan, Gamal al-Din al-Afghani wa atharuhu fi al-alam al-Islami al-hadith (Cairo: Maktaba Wahba, 1982), 229.

[43] Al-Afghani is referred to in this article as 'al-Afghani (of the Afghan origin).' He was always described as 'al-Afghani' with the title of 'al-Sayyid' (a descendant of Prophet Muhammad) in al-Manār. While his Iranian origin is basically accepted by Western and Iranian scholarship, this is not the case in Arab countries and Afghanistan. In the Arab and non-Arab Sunni countries, al-Afghani is called al-Afghani even to this day, a prolongation of the Manarists' position. In the latest, and probably best, collection of al-Afghani's works in Arabic and Persian, see a defense of al-Afghani by its Iranian editor: Sayyid Hadi Khusru Shahi, 'Gamal al-Din al-Afghani: Hayatuhu wa nidaluhu,' in al-Afghani and 'Abduh, Al-Urwa al-Wuthqa, 56–57.

[44] Riḍā, 'Fatiha Tafsir al-Qur1an al-Hakim,' 12.

[45] Felicitas Opwis, ‘Changes in Modern Islamic Legal Theory: Reform or Reformation?’ in Michaelle Browers and Charles Kurzman, eds, An Islamic Reformation? (Lanham: Lexington Books, 2004), 34–35.

[46] Ahmad al-Marabasi, Ramid Riḍā: Sahib al-Manār (Cairo: Al-Majlis al-Ala li-l-Mu1un al-Islamiyya, 1970), 145–161. See his own reports of trips in al-Manār, as collected and edited in Yusuf Ibish, ed., Rahlast al-Imam Ramid Riḍā (Beirut: Bisan, 2000).

[47] Al-Manār, the front page of Vol. I, 2nd ed. (1327/1909).

[48] Al-Manār 3 (1317/1900): 1 [The title page]. This is the first part of a longer hadith, not in any of the six canonical collections, but in minor collections.

[49] ‘Preface of the First Volume of al-Manār [of the First Edition],’ al-Manār 1, 2nd ed.[1909]: 9.

[50] Ibid., 5. In the 2nd ed. which Riḍā put in circulation later, even the first volume was made in the new form, as he omitted news and telegrams with little enduring significance from the first issues.

[51] Ibid., 3.

[52] Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt, 180–181. The original of the journal available today for the first volume is from this second printing.

[53] H. A. R. Gibb, Mohammedanism: An Historical Survey, 2nd ed. (London: Oxford University Press, 1964), 178.

[54] C. C. Berg, ‘Indonesia,’ in H. A. R. Gibb, ed., Whither Islam?: A Survey of Modern Movements in the Moslem World (New York: AMS Press, 1973 [1932]), 268–269.

[55] Muhammad Ramid Riḍā al-Husayni ‘Introduction to the Second Edition of the First Volume [written in 1327/1909],’ al-Manār 1, 2nd ed., 8.

[56] Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt, 177.

[57] Ibid., 205.

[58] Riḍā’s writings on political issues were compiled in six volumes. Muhammad Ramid Riḍā, Maqalat al-Mayl Ramid Ridā al-Siyasiyya, eds Yusuf Ibish and Yusuf Quzma al-Khuri (Beirut: Dar Ibn ʿArabi, 1994).

[59] Commemorative gatherings were also held in Tunis, Baghdad, and Damascus. Al-Marabasi, Ramid Riḍā, 214–215.

[60] As a descendant of Prophet Muhammad, he was called by the honorary title of ‘al-sayyid,’ indicating his lineage. After the republican revolution of 1952, the title became a word to mean ‘Mr’ in Egypt, rather than a noble descent.

[61] Mayl al-Gami al-Azhar, ‘Lutba al-Ustadh al-Akbar,’ al-Manār 35 (1936): 187–188.

[62] To call ‘Abduh by this title has become common in Egypt. It was Riḍā who started the title for ‘Abduh. Al-Amir Makib Arslan, Al-Sayyid Ramid Riḍā, aw ikha1 arbain sana (Damscus: Matbaa Ibn Zaydun, 1937), 7.

[63] Ramid Riḍā, ‘Ahl al-hall wa al-aqd fi hadha al-zaman’ (a chapter in his treatise on the Caliphate), al-Manār 24 (1923): 59–60.

[64] Anwar al-Jundi, Tarajim al-alam al-muasirin fi al-alam al-Islami (Cairo: Maktaba al-Anglo al-Misriyya, 1970), 105, quoted in Assad Nimer Busool, ‘Shaykh Muhammad Rashīd Riḍā’s Relations with Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and Muhammad ‘Abduh,’ The Muslim World 66 (1976): 281.

[65] Emad Eldin Shahin, Political Ascent: Contemporary Islamic Movements in North Africa (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997), 22–33; Emad Eldin Shahin, ‘Salafiyah,’ in John L. Esposito, ed., The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, III (New York & Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995), 466–467.

[66] For the echoes of al-Manār in Turkey, Central Asia, Southeast Asia, and China, please see the respective chapters in this volume.

[67] Mawlana Abu al-Kalam Muhiy al-Din Azad, ‘Kitab al-khilafa al-Islamiyya,’ trans. ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Mulihabadi, al-Manār 23 (1922): 45–56, 102–106, 193–201, 282–289, 361–372, 466–471, 509–512, 691–702, 753–757.

[68] Ibid., 753–757. Azad subscribed himself to the equality of Muslims without ethnic distinction.

[69] Nakamura, Mitsuo, The Crescent Arises over the Banyan Tree: A Study of the Muhammadiyah Movement in a Central Javanese Town (Yogyakarta: Gadjah Mada University Press, 1983).

[70] Citing these cases is not to say that these were products of al-Manār ’s influence. Such an ‘impact-response’ approach would be too simplistic for all cases. For the reform trend in the Southeast Asia before al-Manār, see Azyumardi Azra, The Origins of Islamic Reformism in Southeast Asia: Networks of Malay-Indonesian and Middle Eastern ‘Ulama’ in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (Crows Nest, Australia: Allen & Unwin and Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 2004).

[71] See the brief history of daily papers and journals with Islamic colors in Anwar al-Jundi’s introduction in his Taril al-sahafa al-Islamiyya I: al-Manār (Cairo: Dar al-Ansar, n.d.[1983]). This book is probably the most concise introduction of the contents of al-Manār, volume by volume, with descriptions of the sociopolitical background. It divides al-Manār in four periods: From the beginning to the death of ‘Abduh, to First World War, to the abolishment of the Caliphate, and to the death of Riḍā.

[72] He owed two thousand pounds at his death, and his house was on mortgage. Al-Marabasi, Ramid Riḍā, 169.

[73] ʿAbd al-Halim al-Jundi, Al-Imam Muhammad ‘Abduh (Cairo: Dar al-Maarif, 1979), 110.

[74] See Kate Zebiri, Mahmud Shaltut and Islamic Modernism (Oxford: Clarendon Press and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993).

[75] Joseph Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964), 70.

[76] Wael B. Hallaq, ‘Was the Gate of Ijtihad Closed?’, International Journal of Middle East Studies 16 (1984): 3–41.

[77] Riḍā, ‘Muhawarat al-Muslih wa al-Muqallid,’ al-Manār 3 (1900–1901): 635–640, 675–683, 715–725, 795–804; 4 (1901–1902): 51–60, 161–170, 205–217, 281–297, 361–371, 521–529, 567–573, 852–866.

[78] Ibid., 4 (1901): 209–210.

[79] Ibid., 362–363.

[80] Muhammad Khalid Masud, Brinskley Messick, and David S. Powers, ‘Muftis, Fatwas, and Islamic Legal Interpretation,’ in Masud, Messick, and Powers, eds, Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and Their Fatwas (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1996), 31. The compilation is: Salah al-Din al-Munajjid and Yusuf Q. al-Khuri, eds, Fatāwā al-Imam Muhammad Ramid Riḍā, 6 vols (Beirut: Dar al-Kitab al-Jadid, 1970–1971). When Muslim Brotherhood succeeded in publishing al-Manār for a brief period, Hasan al-Banna wrote his fatwas. See the section in a collection of Banna’s writings: Ḥasan al-Bannā, Fiqh al-wāqiʿ (Mansura: Dār al-Kalima, 1999), 43–75.

[81] Basheer M. Nafi, ‘The Rise of Islamic Reformist Thought and its Challenge to Traditional Islam,’ in Suha Taji-Farouki and Basheer M. Nafi, eds, Islamic Thought in the Twentieth Century (London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2004), 52–53.

[82] Muhammad Husayn Dahabi, Al-Tafsir wa al-mufassirun, 2nd ed. (Cairo: Dar al-Kutub al-Haditha, 1976), Vol. 2, 547–589.

[83] Fahd b. ʿAbd al-Rahman b. Sulayman al-Rumi, Ittigahat al-tafsir fi al-qarn al-rabi ashr, 4th ed. (Riyadh: Maktaba al-Rumd, 2002), Vol. 2, 703–848.

[84] ʿAbd al-Majid ʿAbd al-Salam al-Muhtasib, Ittigahat al-tafsir fi al-asr al-rahin (Beirut: Dar al-Bayariq, 1982), 101–125, 164–176.

[85] Helmut Gätje, The Qur1an and its Exegesis: Selected Texts with Classical and Modern Muslim Interpretations, trans. Alford T. Welch (London and Henley: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1971), 42.

[86] Tafsir al-Manār, Vol. 4, 48.

[87] Ibid.

[88] ‘Abdullah Mahmud Shihata, Manhag al-Imam Muhammad ‘Abduh fi Tafsir al-Quran al-Karim (Cairo: Matbaʿa Gamia ‘al-Qahira, 1984), 204–205.

[89] Riḍā, ‘Fatiha Tafsir al-Qur1an al-Hakim,’ 15.

[90] Ibid.

[91] J. Jomier, ‘Al-Manār ,’ EI2, VI (1991), 361, states clearly that ‘[Tafsir al-Manār] from the third year onward was the work of Rashīd Riḍā; it included lengthy extracts from the commentary expounded by Muhammad ‘Abduh in the evening lectures at al-Azhar, and the respective contributions of the two men were clearly distinguished.’

[92] Riḍā had worked on Verse 101 of the chapter of Yusuf (Joseph) at the end of his life (the chapter has 110 verses). Bahjat al-Bitar completed the exegesis of the chapter and published it as a booklet under Riḍā’s name. Dhahabi, Al-Tafsir wa al-mufassirun, 567.

[93] M. A. Zaki Badawi, The Reformers of Egypt (London: Croom Helm, 1978), 97. Badawi’s overall judgment of the reformers’ achievements is also negative.

[94] Tafsir al-Manār, Vol. 1, 91–102.

[95] A typology of tafsir s was proposed in Kosugi Yasushi, ‘Typological Inquiries into Exegesis of the Qur1an: An Introduction to Tafsir Studies,’ The Toyo Gakuho 76/1–2 (1994): 85–111 [in Japanese]. This was the first detailed study on the topic in Japanese.

[96] Mustansir MIR, ‘The Sura as a unity: A Twentieth Century Development in Qur1an Exegesis,’ in G. R. Hawting and Abdul-Kader A. Shareef, eds, Approaches to the Qur1an (London and New York: Routledge, 1993), 211–212.

[97] Ibid., 212–217. Among the 6 tafsirs listed, 3 were written in Arabic, namely, by Sayyid Qutb, Izzat Darwaza, both Egyptian, and Muhammad Husayn al-Tabataba1i, an Iranian.

[98] Shihata, Manhag al-Imam Muhammad, 36.

[99] Shihab al-Din al-Alusi, Ruh al-mani fi tafsir al-Qur’an al-‘azim wa al-sab‘ almathani (Beirut: Dar al-Fikr, 1978). See also Basheer M. Nafi, ‘Abu al-Thana1 al-Alusi: An Alim, Ottoman Mufti, and Exegete of the Qur1an,’ International Journal of Middle Eastern studies 34 (2002): 482–486.

[100] Al-Manār revived certain classical works. Riḍā’s trust in and reliance on Ibn Kathir among the classical tafsir s (see, Shihata, Manhag al-Imam Muhammad, 214–226) seems to be instructive in the popularity of Ibn Kathir’s exegesis among today’s Islamic activists with the Salafi inclination in the Arab countries.

[101] Tantawi Jawhari, Al-Ëawahir fi Tafsir al-Qur1an al-Karim (Cairo: Mustafa al-Halabi, n.d.). This work was among the study materials for the Brotherhood members during al-Banna’s time.

[102] Ahmad Mustafa al-Maraghi, Tafsir al-Maraghi, 5th ed. (Cairo: Mustafa al-Halabi, 1974).

[103] Mahmud Shaltut, Tafsir al-Qur1an al-Karim, 7th ed. (Beirut and Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq, 1979).

[104] Muhammad al-Tahir b. Amur, Tafsir al-Tahrir wa al-Tanwir (Tunis: Al-Dar al-Tunisiyya, 1984).

[105] ʿAbd al-Hamid b. Muhammad b. Badis, Tafsir Ibn Badis fi al-Tadhkir min Kalam al-Hakim al-Labir (Beirut: Dar al-Kutub al-Ilmiyya, 1995).

[106] For al-Qasimi, see David Dean Commins, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria (New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990).

[107] Muhammad Ëamal al-Din al-Qasimi, Tafsir al-Qasimi al-musamma Mahasin al-Ta1wil, 2nd ed. (Beirut: Dar al-Fikr, 1978), vol. 10, 3. Originally in al-Manār, 17 (1914): 558.

[108] Sayyid Qutb, Fi Zilal al-Qur1an (Beirut: Dar al-Shuruq, 1973–1974).

[109] Sayed Qutb, In the Shade of the Qur1an, vols 1–11 [out of the total 18 vols], trans. Adil Salahi and Ashur Shamis (Leicester: Islamic Foundation, 1999–2004). Vol. 30 of the work (exegesis of the thirtieth volume of the Qur1an) was translated and published in English in 1979.

[110] Ahmad Ra1if, ‘Tafsir al-Manār ’ (the publisher’s introduction), in Muhammad Ramid Riḍā, ed. Tafsir al-Manār, No.1 (Cairo: Al-Zahra1 li-l-Ilam al-Arabi, 1991), 7–8.

[111] Said Hawwa, Al-Asas fi al-Tafsir (Cairo: Dar al-Salam, 1989) [The first ed.: 1985].

[112] Wahba al-Zuhayli, Al-Tafsir al-Munir fi al-Aqida wa al-Sharia wa al-Manhag (Beirut: Dar al-Fikr al-Muasir and Damascus: Dar al-Fikr, 1991); al-Zuhayli, Al-Tafsir al-Wasit (Damascus: Dar al-Fikr, 2001).

[113] Muhammad Sayyid Tantawi, Al-Tafsir al-Wasit li-l-Qur1an al-Karim (Cairo: Dar al-Maarif, 1992). Tantawi has been active in innovative interpretations on contemporary issues, though often controversial.

[114] Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought: The Response of the Shii and Sunni Muslims to the Twentieth Century (Basingstoke and London: Macmillan, 1982), 52–53.

[115] Muhammad Ramid Riḍā, ‘Al-Ahkam al-mariyya al-mutaallaqa bi-l-lilafa al-Islamiyya,’ al-Manār 23 (1922): 729–752; 24 (1923): 33–67; ‘Al-Lilafa al-Islamiyya,’ al-Manār 23 (1922): 98–120, 185–200, 257–271, 345–373; ‘Fatiha kitab al-lilafa, aw al-imama al-uzma,’ al-Manār 23 (1922): 459–465. It was published as al-Lilafa, aw al-imama al-uzma (Caliphate, or, the Supreme Leadership) by al-Manār Press in 1341 A.H. (1923). Printed on the title page, it was ‘presented to the courageous Turkish people and the reform party in Arab and Indian countries and the rest of Islamic peoples.’ It was translated in the West in French. Le Califat dans la doctrine de Ramid Riḍā: Traduction

annotée d1al-Lilafa au al-Imama al-uzma (Le Califat ou l1Imamat suprême), trans. Henri Laoust (Beirut: Institut français de Damas, 1938). It has detailed notes (pp. 243–274), but omits the introduction that Riḍā wrote at the end of the serialization (‘Fatiha kitab al-lilafa, aw al-imama al-uzma’ earlier). An annotated Japanese translation, partially abridged, was published in 1987. Rashīd Riḍā, Modern Islamic Theory of Governance, trans. Kosugi Yasushi (Niigata: Graduate School of International Relations, International University of Japan, 1987).

[116] This is a summary from the author’s study on Riḍā’s work, Yasushi Kosugi, ‘al-Manār ists on the Islamic State,’ Bulletin of the Graduate School of International Relations 3 (1985): 35–53 [in Japanese]. See Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 70–83, for another version. This author sees Riḍā’s work from a longer perspective, more positive than Enayat, as the summary here shows.

[117] A notable exception is Hizb al-Tahrir (Liberation Party, or commonly known as Islamic Liberation Party), established in 1949 by a Palestinian, Taqi al-Din al-Nabhani (d. 1977). It aims at establishing the khilafa (Caliphate) as an ideal Islamic polity. See Taqi al-Din al-Nabhani, Al-Lilafa (Hizb al-Tahrir, n.d.).

[118] Abu1l-Hasan Al-Mawardi, Al-Ahkam As-Sultaniyyah: The Laws of Islamic Governance, trans. Asadullah Yate (London: Ta-Ha Publishers, 1996); Hamilton A.R. Gibb, ‘Al-Mawardi’s Theory of the Caliphate,’ in Stanford J. Shaw and William R. Polk, eds, Studies on the Civilization of Islam (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1962), 151–165.

[119] Abu Yala al-Farra1, Al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya, ed. Muhammad Hamid al-Faqi, 3rd ed. (Cairo: Mustafa al-Halabi, 1983); Yusuf Ibish and Kosugi Yasushi, eds, Qiraat fI al-fikr al-siyasi al-Islami (Beirut: Dar Amwag, 2000), 151–211.

[120] Ahmad b. ʿAli al-Qalqamandi, Ma1athir al-inafa fi maʿAlim al-lilafa, ed. ʿAbd al-Sattar Ahmad Farrag (Kuwait: Wizara al-Irmad wa al-Anba1, 1964); Ibish and Kosugi, eds, Qira1at, 315–342.

[121] For the Sunni political theories of the classical periods, see Ibish and Kosugi, eds, Qira1at. For the entire spectrum of Islamic political thought from the eighth to the twentieth centuries, please consult a collection of primary sources in Yusuf Ibish and Kosugi Yasushi, eds, Turath al-fikr al-siyasi al-Islami (Beirut: Turath, 2005).

[122] J. M. S. Baljon, Modern Muslim Koran Interpretation (1880–1960) (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1961), 104. Baljon quoted from Riḍā's al-Wahy al-Muhammadi, whose small section on governance is based on al-Lilafa and Tafsir al-Manār. See Muhammad Ramid Riḍā, al-Wahy al-Muhammadi, 3rd ed. (Beirut: Mu1assasa Izz al-Din, 1406 AH [1985/6], 287–291 (The first edition: 1352 AH [1933/4]).

[123] Kerr, Islamic Reform, 220.

[124] Riḍā, 'Al-Lilafa al-Islamiyya,' al-Manār 24 (1923): 372–373.

[125] John O. Voll, 'Fundamentalism in the Sunni Arab World: Egypt and the Sudan,' in Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby, eds, Fundamentalisms Observed (Chicago, IL and London: University of Chicago Press, 1991), 358.

[126] Kerr, Islamic Reform, 221.

[127] Ibid., 2.

[128] For the revived Brotherhood and its activities, Yokota Takayuki made an important contribution based on field work in his PhD dissertation, An Islamic Mass Movement in Contemporary Egypt: The Thought and Practice of the Muslim Brotherhood (Graduate School of Asian and African Area Studies, Kyoto University, Japan, 2005) [in Japanese].

[129] Mahmoud Haddad, ‘Arab Religious Nationalism in the Colonial Era: Reading Rashīd Riḍā’s Ideas on the Caliphate,’ Journal of the American Oriental Society 117/2 (1997): 253–277. The main focus is on Henri Laoust, Malcolm Kerr, and Hamid Enayat.

[130] Ibid., 277.

[131] Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, ‘Utruha al-margaiyya al-mawduiyya,’ in Muhammad al-Husayni, ed., Al-Imam al-mahid al-sayyid Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr: Dirasa fI siratihi wa manhagihi (Beirut: Dar al-Furat, 1989), 383–390. An annotated Japanese translation of this short treatise was published with al-Sadr’s other political treatises. Kosugi Yasushi, ed. and tr., Revolution and State in Islam: Political Thought of the Contemporary Arab Shiites (Niigata: The Institute of Middle Eastern Studies at International University of Japan, 1992). For al-Sadr, see Husayn Baraka al-Shami et al., Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr: Dirasa fi hayatihi wa fikrihi (London: Dar al-Islam Foundation, 1996).

[132] Chibli Mallat, The Renewal of Islamic Law: Muhammad Baqer as-Sadr, Najaf and the Shi1i International (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), 59–78.

[133] Haddad, ‘Arab Religious Nationalism in the Colonial Era,’ 274.

[134] For Arab secularists in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, see Azzam Tamimi, ‘The Origins of Arab Secularism,’ in John L. Esposito and Azzam Tamimi, eds, Islam and Secularism in the Middle East (London: Hurst, 2000), 13–28.

[135] Riḍā, ‘Al-Ahkam al-mariyya,’ al-Manār 24 (1923): 62–65.

[136] Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age 1798–1939, 242–243. Though a good summary, to translate the moderate Islamic reform party as ‘progressive’ seems misleading. Basheer criticizes Hourani for his locating these positions as merely responses to the Western challenge (Nafi, ‘The Rise of Islamic Reformist Thought,’ 29–30). While Basheer’s emphasis on the ‘inner impulses’ is quite agreeable, we can still see Riḍā’s own categorization as defining the positions in relation to Islam as he conceived.

[137] See Kerr, Islamic Reform, 209–223.

[138] It goes without saying that the very concept and contents of what modernity constitutes change. Here the author uses the term to mean both modern in the historical sense and modern as the ‘contemporary,’ thus including even what some would like to distinguish as ‘post-modern.’

[139] Nafi, ‘The Rise of Islamic Reformist Thought,’ 52.

[140] See the debates in Nissim Rejwan ‘A Wild Goose Chase: To Cope, Must Islam ‘westernize’ in Michael J. Thompson, ed., Islam and the West: Critical Perspective on Modernity (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003), 153–182.

[141] See, for example, John Cooper, Ronald Nettler, and Muhammad Mahmoud, eds, Islam and Modernity: Muslim Intellectuals Respond (London: I. B. Tauris, 1998); Johan Meuleman, ed., Islam in the Era of Globalization: Muslim Attitudes towards Modernity and Identity (London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002); Larry Diamond, Marc F. Plattner, and Daniel Brumberg, eds, and Islam Democracy in the Middle East (Baltimore, MD and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003); Akbar S. Ahmad, Postmodernism and Islam: Predicament and Promise, revised ed. (London and New York: Routledge, 2004).

[142] On the Japanese model, or a non-Western path of modernity, the author is in debt to works by Murakami Yasusuke, Tsunoyama Sakae, and other pioneers in theoretical investigations on the Japanese paradigm. See Murakami Yasusuke, ‘Modernization in Terms of Integration: The Case of Japan,’ in S. N. Eisenstadt, ed., Patterns of Modernity, II: Beyond the West (New York: New York University Press, 1987), 65–88.; Murakami Y. and Kosai Yutaka, eds, Japan in the Global Community: Its Role and Contribution on the Eve of the 21st Century (Tokyo: Round Table Discussions on Japan in the Global Community, distributed by the University of Tokyo Press, 1986); Murakami Y., An Anticlassical Political-Economic Analysis: A Vision for the Next Century, trans. Yamaura Kozo (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996). See also Kosugi Yasushi, ‘Tradition and Modernization: Reflections on Islam and Confucianism in Japan,’ in Osman Bakar and Cheng Gek Nai, eds, Islam and Confucianism: A Civilizational Dialogue (Kuala Lumpur: University of Malaya Press, 1997), 163–171.

[143] Muhammad Rashīd Riḍā, ‘Renewal, Renewing, and Renewers,’ trans. Emad Eldin Shahin in Kurzman, ed., Modernist Islam, 78.

[144] Mahathir Mohamad, Islam and the Muslim Ummah: Selected Speeches by Dr Mahathir Mohamad, Prime Minister of Malaysia, ed. Hashim Makaruddin (Selengor Darul Ehsan, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1995), Vol. 1, 51.

[145] On the Salafiyya in Syria, see an excellent work of Commins, Islamic Reform.

[146] The other most important Sunni trend of Islamic revival, parallel to the Manarists and the Muslim Brotherhood, is the line of Iqbal, Mawdudi, and Jamaat-i Islami in South Asia, which despite its importance is out of scope of this article, and left untouched.

[147] Nafi, The Rise of Islamic Reformist Thought, 40.

[148] ‘Al-Bayan al-ta1sisi li-l-Ittihad al-Alami li-l-Ulama1 al-Muslimīn,’ July 11, 2004, made available to the author by the secretariat.

[149] Al-Banna’s father was an Azhar scholar, and education at home was not secular.

[150] Mawil Izzi Dien, Islamic Law: From Historical Foundations to Contemporary Practice (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2004), 145.

[151] Yusuf Al-Qaradawi, Al-sahwa al-Islamiyya bayna al-guhud wa al-tatarruf, 2nd ed. (Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq, 1984), 28.

[152] Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Fatāwā Muasira, 2 vols (Beirut, Damascus, and Amman: Al-Maktab al-Islami, 2000). He is also active in the European Council for Fatwa and Research as its president. See European Council for Fatwa and Research, Fatwas of European Council for Fatwa and Research, trans. Anas Osama Altikriti and Shakir Nasir Al-Utaydi (Cairo: Dar al-Tibaa wa al-Nashr al-Islamiyya, n.d.).

[153] Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Al-Fatwā bayna al-indibat wa al-tasayyub, 3rd ed. (Cairo: Dar al-Sahwa, 1992), 17–18.

[154] Yusuf al-Qaradawi, ‘Kalima al-iftitah,’ Mu1tamar al-Ittihad al-Alami li-l-Ulama1 al-Muslimīn, July 11, 2004, provided by the secretariat to the author.

* 2. Al-Manār and Popular Religion in Syria, 1898–1920

David D. Commins

On July 23, 1898 a Damascene subscriber to the Islamic modernist journal al-Manār wrote a letter to the editor complaining that the journal had ceased to appear for several weeks because the censor’s office had confiscated copies of recent issues. In a comment on this letter, Rashid Rida, the journal’s publisher, noted that the governors in Beirut and Damascus had banned the publication.[155] Years later, Rida reported that Ottoman authorities in Beirut and in Tripoli had banned the second issue published in 1898, on the orders of the sultan’s religious advisor, Abu al-Huda al-Sayyadi, who knew that Rida was an admirer of the modernist figure Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (who had died in Istanbul the previous year).[156] Affirmation of Istanbul’s alarm at Rida’s enterprise comes from Russian and German diplomatic sources reporting in 1899 that Sultan Abdülhamid II was upset at Egyptian Khedive ʿAbbas Hilmi for allegedly sponsoring al-Manār ’s publication.[157]

Why did the Ottoman authorities banish a religious reform periodical? Because under Sultan Abdülhamid (r. 1876–1909), religious issues were enmeshed with political controversy. Al-Manār ’s mission of reforming Muslim beliefs and practices interfered with Ottoman efforts to establish an official version of Sunni Islam that would strengthen the sultan’s authority. Part of these efforts included support for popular Sufism whereas Rida’s journal called on Muslims to abandon such Sufism in the name of a return to Islam’s original beliefs and practices. This oppositional stance was not coincidental. Al-Manār was part of a struggle over who had the authority to define proper religious practice, and that struggle naturally spilled over into Ottoman political battles. The present essay assesses the effectiveness of al-Manār in those struggles by examining the extent and limits of its influence in Syria. To properly situate the journal in its context, I first examine the place of popular religion as a pillar of Abdülhamid’s power. I then consider al-Manār ’s opposition to the sultan and his religious policy, its function as a platform and arena for religious reformers, and measures of the journal’s impact in Syria.

 Politics and popular religion

M. Sükrü Hanioglu’s study of the Young Turks has demonstrated the breadth of opposition to Sultan Abdülhamid’s regime throughout the Ottoman provinces during the 1890s, and that opposition’s particular strength in Syria.[158] The Committee of Union and Progress established branches in several cities and towns between 1895 and 1897. Disgruntled military officers, civil officials, ulama, Sufis, and notables joined the underground movement, but its plan for a coup d’état launched from Syria was aborted when authorities uncovered it and ordered mass arrests. Such political threats from the activities and propaganda of constitutional forces had been worrying the sultan for a number of years, and it was, in part, to counter his critics that he embraced an Islamic policy to wrap his throne in the banner of religion. Perhaps the best known individual associated with that policy’s implementation was the sultan’s controversial Syrian adviser, Shaykh Abu al-Huda al-Sayyadi, whose prominence made him a target for religious reformers’ attacks.

Controversy swirled around Sayyadi for two reasons: his power and his support for popular Sufism. He rose from humble circumstances in northern Syria to a position of tremendous influence in the sultan’s court. His means to advancement appear to have included a charismatic personality, a knack for poetry, a fine singing voice, and a talent for ingratiating himself with the powerful. He took his first step in his climb to influence when he approached the mufti of Aleppo and asked to be appointed naqīb al-asraf (head of descendants of the Prophet) in the nearby Jisr al-Shaghur district.[159] Sayyadi was able to advance to other posts and ultimately made his way to Istanbul, where he made the right personal connections to gain an audience with the sultan. Abdülhamid’s Islamic policy of fostering greater loyalty and support for the Ottoman sultanate depended on the allegiance of men such as al-Sayyadi, who published dozens of essays arguing for loyalty to the sultanate and adherence to religious practices and beliefs associated with popular Sufi orders.

Muhammad Salim al-Jundi, the Syrian historian of Marʿarrat al-Nuʿman, Sayyadi’s home district, offers a balanced assessment of this controversial figure that takes into account his influence-peddling and at the same time exonerates him from accusations of participating in the suppression of political dissent. On the former score, Sayyadi was reported to have determined that a railroad between Hama and Aleppo would not pass through Maʿarrat al-Nuʿman, whose inhabitants desired its passage in order to revive local commerce, but through the village his brother resided in.[160] On another occasion, Sayyadi is supposed to have arranged the acquittal of a good friend who had committed a murder before a number of witnesses.[161] On the other hand, Jundi maintained that suspicions that he operated an extensive network of spies were unfounded. Jundi concluded that Sayyadi did not involve himself in the sultan's dealings with political opponents; rather, he sought to increase his following and to raise the status of the Rifaʿiyya Sufi order above all others. He did use influence to get jobs for imams, muezzins, and other religious personnel; he forged a noble ancestry to get ahead; but he was loyal to the sultan and treated his followers well. In this view, Sayyadi's critics envied him and they had little legitimate ground for their complaints.[162] Envy there may well have been in abundance among men living in exile because, they believed, of Sultan Abdülhamid's repressive policies. But there was also the substantial issue of proper observance of religion, and on this point, Sayyadi stood for religious practices that had long been viewed with suspicion by ulama associated with the shariʿa-minded Sufism that was present at the birth of religious reform in Syria.[163]

The first religious reformer to clash with Sayyadi was Jamal al-Din "al-Afghani" Asadabadi. Their initial encounter, however, was not at all contentious. In fact, it arose from Sultan Abdülhamid's effort to increase the prestige of his religious entourage by recruiting Afghani, and thereby buttress his campaign to be recognized as caliph.[164] Sayyadi played a part in the sultan's efforts to persuade Afghani to relocate from London to Istanbul in 1892. First, the sultan made an attempt through the Ottoman ambassador to London to convince the activist to take up residence in Istanbul, but to no effect. Abdülhamid then instructed Sayyadi to correspond with Afghani. It is not clear if two letters from the shaykh or other factors were the cause, but Afghani indeed decided to move to the Ottoman capital, perhaps from a hope that Sultan Abdülhamid might lead Muslim resistance to European encroachments. In Istanbul, Jamal al-Din initially got along quite well with the sultan and his Syrian advisor.[165] At some point in 1895, however, Sayyadi's opinion of Jamal al-Din became less sympathetic: he charged him with expressing heretical ideas, and he helped persuade the sultan that the activist was in fact dangerous.[166] Furthermore, Sayyadi is reported to have used his influence to thwart an effort by Afghani to release from prison some of his Iranian associates suspected of subverting the Qajar shah’s regime.[167] Sayyadi also called into question Jamal al-Din’s claim to be Afghan and indicated that he was in reality from Iran.[168]

Tensions between Sayyadi and Jamal al-Din appear to have fueled the enmity expressed by members of the religious reform camp toward Sayyadi. For instance, ʿAbd al-Qadir al-Maghribi, a reformer and journalist from Lebanese Tripoli, apparently became a critic of the sultan’s confidant as a result of Jamal al-Din’s influence. Maghribi’s background included attendance at the National School (al-Madrasa al-Waṭaniyya) founded by Shaykh Husayn al-Jisr, himself a precursor to the reform movement’s attention to the need for Muslims to reconcile scientific advances with religious understanding of the natural world. At Jisr’s school, Maghribi met another youth from Tripoli, Rashid Rida. Maghribi would frequently receive forbidden Egyptian newspapers through the consular mail and share them with Rida. Maghribi’s first awareness of Afghani came from hearing the principal of Beirut’s Sultaniyya School praise The Firmest Bond, published in 1884 (when Maghribi and Rida were 17 and 19 years old, respectively). The youth was so impressed by the reformist publication that he copied a number of articles by hand. In 1892, he traveled to Istanbul and met Jamal al-Din, who had himself just arrived there. On returning to Tripoli, he took to teaching the reformist opinions of Jamal al-Din and Muhammad ‘Abduh. He later became known as a critic of Sayyadi, supposedly because the sultan levied a special tax in Aleppo in order to pay for embellishing the tomb of Sayyadi’s father,[169] but perhaps out of loyalty to Afghani.

 Al-Manār ’s opposition to Sultan Abdülhamid and popular Sufism

Rida’s early admiration for Afghani is well-known, as is his intention for al-Manār to serve as a pan-Islamic organ for the views of ‘Abduh.[170] In the journal’s early years, the connection between opposition to the sultan and Sayyadi was evident when Rida published a full review in 1901 of ʿAbd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi’s essay, The Characteristics of Tyranny (Ṭabāyiʿ al-istibdād), a scathing attack on the Hamidian regime.[171] The following year, Rida published the Aleppan author’s next treatise for fundamental political and religious reform,

Mother of Cities (Umm al-qurā), in serial form.[172] According to Albert Hourani, Kawakibi's attacks on the sultan and popular religion stemmed from personal animosity toward Sayyadi that arose from competition between his family and Sayyadi's for religious influence in Aleppo.[173] Rida reiterated support for Kawakibi's views in a laudatory obituary for him entitled, "Great Loss: On the Death of the Wise Scholar," where Rida described his delight at having become acquainted with him in Egypt during the previous two years, and he mentioned the essay on tyranny as a splendid work.[174]

Yet another Syrian associate of Rida's, ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi, combined political opposition to the sultan with calls for religious reform. Al-Manār 's obituary on him summarizes this facet of his life.[175] Zahrawi's first effort was the underground publication of a journal in his hometown of Homs some time around 1895.[176] According to Rida, the journal was part of an effort by the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) to save the Ottoman Empire from misrule by the sultan.[177] It addressed the question of Muslim leadership (imāma), the qualifications for leadership, the duty to depose an unjust leader (imām), and a call to fight tyranny. He distributed free issues by mail, but when the authorities heard about it, they issued orders to ban it.[178] In 1902, Zahrawi left the Ottoman lands for Egypt after a number of clashes with the authorities, including the tumult occasioned by his essay on law and Sufism.[179] In Egypt, he published an article in the newspaper al-Mu'ayyad in response to the question of whether Sultan Abdülhamid was the rightful claimant to the caliphate. Zahrawi listed twenty-two reasons why the sultan was not fit to rule and called for his deposition.[180]

Explicit political opposition among Manarists was related to frequent criticism of popular Sufism. Rida's and Zahrawi's writings on Sufism reflected both a political stance of opposition to the Hamidian regime as well as their views on proper religious observance. In Rida's case, concern with this issue long preceded his familiarity with Afghani and the broader questions of political support for certain religious forms. In his later years, Rida wrote about an incident from his youth when he witnessed the Mawlawiyya order's blending of music and dance in its ceremony, and he recalled that he openly condemned the dervishes' exercises.[181] By the time he began publishing his journal, popular Sufism was not a purely religious question because

Sultan Abdülhamid’s policy of fostering loyalty to Ottoman sultanate included patronage for the Rifaʿiyya order. Moreover, favoring this particular order precipitated a reaction from adherents to the rival Qadiriyya order. Hanioëlu notes that Qadiri Sufis, particularly in Hama but also in general, tended to support the CUP’s efforts in Syria between 1895 and 1897.[182] When Rida launched al-Manār in 1898, he addressed the rivalry between the Rifaʿiyya and Qadiriyya orders. The gist of one article was that the Rifaʿi Sufis incorporated forbidden innovations (bidʿa) into their ceremonies. Rida cited two of Sayyadi’s publications that defended the customs of snake-eating, inserting needles in one’s body, and walking on hot coals in Rifaʿi ceremonies because they effectively dispel the doubts of anyone who might deny the truth of religion. To support his criticism of the Rifaʿis, Rida quoted the Baghdad scholar Shihab al-Din al-Alusi’s exegesis of the Qur’an, where he observed that the practice of Rifaʿi Sufis walking on fire demonstrated their ignorance of religion.[183] Subsequent issues of the first volume discussed the controversy between Rifaʿis and Qadiris until a truce was reported.[184]

A second Manarist critic of popular religion, ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi, published in 1901 a scathing attack on common views of Sufism and jurisprudence. The essay itself germinated from a correspondence between Zahrawi and Rida concerning the benefit and harm of traditional jurisprudence.[185] In the essay’s section on Sufism, Zahrawi went much further than Rida’s criticism of specific practices associated with the Rifaʿi order. He argued that Sufism is alien to Islam and was invented two centuries after Muhammad revealed the Qur’an.[186] He considered it to be a concoction of philosophy and a few religious texts; and he regarded most Sufis as idlers who scheme to live on the gullibility of ordinary folk.[187] Such complete rejection of Sufism was not characteristic of the views of religious reformers during that period. The elder shaykh of Damascene Salafis, ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Bitar, assessed the essay in his biographical dictionary entry on Zahrawi. In Bitar’s view, the essay was correct in some respects, but contained excessively harsh criticisms of the ulama; to widely circulate the essay was not wise because it was certain to stir up trouble. He added that he found it curious that the essay had generated a strong response from prejudiced readers who concluded that its author was a heretic who deserved to be condemned to death.[188] Likewise, when Rida reviewed the essay, he noted that its author did not present a balanced view on law and Sufism, focusing only on the latter’s negative aspects. He wrote that it should not have been published because it was one-sided, even though the author had good intentions.[189] Zahrawi’s untempered assault on popular Sufism most likely stemmed from his political commitments, in particular what one biographer described as his desire to denigrate Abu al-Huda al-Sayyadi for backing the sultan; it should be noted, however, that Zahrawi does not mention either one in his essay.[190]

A more moderate reformist view on Sufism is found in the works of the leading Damascene reformer, Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi.[191] He had grown up in the milieu of shariʿa-minded Sufism practiced by ʿAbd al-Qadir al-Jaza’iri and local branches of the Naqshbandiyya order. He observed that the proper practice of Sufism deepened the believer’s religious life by cultivating habits of worship and nurturing such praiseworthy personal traits as humility and sincerity. It was possible to hold Sufi ceremonies without straying from prescribed forms of worship. At the same time, Qasimi observed that many Sufis held views that could not be reconciled with the Qur’an and the Sunna. Further, eating fire and playing music at Sufi ceremonies gave an unfavorable impression of Islam to educated youth fascinated with European culture. Qasimi also condemned a common practice associated with popular Sufism: visiting tombs to seek the intercession of saints. It was permissible, however, to visit the tombs of deceased family members to honor their memories and to pray to God.

A more balanced approach also characterized Rashid Rida’s review of Sayyadi’s 1906 essay on the shariʿa. Rida called it the best work seen by him because it took sensible positions on questions that would benefit ordinary Muslims. In particular, Rida commended the passage on the alms tax (zakāt) and urged Sayyadi to use his influence with Sultan Abdülhamid to collect the tax more regularly. On the other hand, Rida did criticize the shaykh for including passages about having visions of spirits, or jinn.[192] In another issue, Rida reviewed Sayyadi’s essay on the five pillars of Islam that was intended for use in Ottoman state schools. Rida opposed its adoption as a text on the grounds that it used obscure Sufi terminology.[193] It seems that no matter how the reformers appraised Sayyadi’s ubiquitous works, they could not ignore them.[194]

Two main points emerge from Manarists' writings on popular Sufism. First, politics and religion clearly overlap because criticism of popular Sufism was tied to opposition to Sultan Abdülhamid and his Sufi supporters like Sayyadi. Second, Manarists expressed a range of views on Sufism, from Zahrawi's unqualified attack to a more nuanced view expressed by Qasimi. More generally, Manarists viewed popular Sufism as a problem with different dimensions. It represented a deviation from true Islam; it also represented an obstacle to technical progress. This latter point is crucial because it indicates that an instrumental concept of religion was part of the Manarist outlook. The most immediate concern of early twentieth-century Ottoman Muslims in general was to increase the empire's economic, political, and military power. The reformers claimed that the Muslim world would remain vulnerable to European domination as long as Muslims did not revive true Islam, for only such a revival would make possible scientific and technical advances. Moreover, their outlook in both religious and secular realms emphasized the vanguard role of educated elites, ulama, and scientists, leading the ignorant masses. Given this emphasis on leadership, the reformers considered the political realm to hold the key to the interlocking issues of proper religious observance and technical progress: Sultan Abdülhamid was held responsible for blocking change in both areas.

The activities and writings of the Damascene author Rafiq al-ʿAzm illustrate the Manarist view on connections among politics, religion, and technical progress.[195] As a young man in the early 1890s, ʿAzm became attached to a circle of reformist ulama that included Tahir al-Jaza'iri and Salim al-Bukhari. According to one source, ʿAzm's home became the regular meeting place for this group every Friday after the congregational prayer.[196] The religious reformers associated with Ottoman officers and officials sympathetic to the movement for restoring the constitution. ʿAzm himself joined the local branch of the CUP. When the authorities began a crackdown on constitutionalists in 1894, he moved to Egypt. Rida met ʿAzm shortly after his own move to Cairo, and the two men developed a long and deep association on the basis of their common interest in social and political reform. They joined with Turks, Armenians, and Circassians residing in Egypt to found the Ottoman Consultation Society.[197] ʿAzm served as the society's treasurer and Rida as head of the administrative council. When the society published a newspaper in 1907, ʿAzm edited the Arabic portion. The society was disbanded following the 1908 constitutional revolution after ʿAzm visited Istanbul and joined the CUP in order to unify the empire's constitutional forces.

One of the central ideas in ʿAzm’s writings is the primacy of knowledge as the basis of nations’ power and wealth. This idea had become the widely accepted explanation for European domination over the Muslim world. ʿAzm expressed the common modernist view that it was necessary for Muslims to catch up with Europeans in medicine, chemistry, mathematics, and engineering.[198] It is noteworthy that in al-Manār ’s first volume, ʿAzm published a short piece in which he argued that Sultan Abdülhamid’s regime was to blame for the Ottoman Empire’s backwardness in these fields because its censorship and suppression of scholarly societies perpetuated the empire’s weakness and vulnerability.[199] A decade later, following the constitutional restoration in 1908, ʿAzm saw an opportunity to remedy the recently deposed sultan’s neglect of education, economic development, technical modernization, and efficiency.[200] The connection between ʿAzm’s modernist agenda and other writers’ critique of popular religion may not be evident at first sight. But the two themes do share the intellectual elitism, one technical and potentially secular, the other scriptural and religious, that characterized the sultan’s political opponents in the Committee of Union and Progress and in the Syrian religious reform camp.[201]

 Al-Manār as a platform and arena for religious reform

Rida’s journal served the cause of religious reform in three ways: by publishing the works of various authors; by reviewing reformers’ books and essays; and by spreading the reputation of reformers in obituary notices. Among the most famous essays to appear in al-Manār were those by ʿAbd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi. In a similar fashion, ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi’s book on Muhammad’s first wife, Khadija, appeared in al-Manār in serial form, and ʿAzm put out portions of his own writings in his friend’s periodical.[202] Reviews of reformers’ works included Tahir al-Jaza’iri’s school primer on theology. The review served as an occasion to tout Jaza’iri to the journal’s widespread audience as the most famous scholar and advocate of reform in Syria.[203] Rida also highlighted the writings of Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi with reviews of his works on topics not always directly related to religious reform, such as health (tea, coffee, tobacco).[204] A single review published in 1911 examined four of Qasimi’s publications that give an idea of the range of concerns in the reform movement.[205] One essay represented the impulse to revive the classical heritage by publishing the eighth century hijri Shafiʿi scholar al-Zirkishi’s treatise on jurisprudence, philosophy, and logic. A second work introduced readers to religious duties; a third argued for using independent legal reasoning (Igtihād) to support the use of the telegraph in declaring the beginning and end of Ramadan; the fourth essay under review was a summary of the history and nature of the fatwa. Other works by Qasimi that were reviewed included Proofs of God’s Unity (theology),[206] The Opinions of Arabs on Jinns (literary history),[207] The Balance of Judging Prophetic Traditions Sources (legal theory),[208] Wiping the Socks and the Soles (ritual practice),[209] and Sermons.[210]

Besides publishing and reviewing reformers’ works, Rida spread reformers’ reputations through obituary notices. An issue in March 1905 announced the death ofʿAbd al-Baqi al-Afghani, a Peshawar-born ʿālim who had lived in India, Hijaz, and Syria.[211] Rida published extensive notices on Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi,[212] ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi,[213] ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Bitar,[214] Rafiq al-ʿAzm,[215] and Salim al-Bukhari.[216] A proper obituary for Tahir al-Jaza’iri did not appear, it would seem, because of some falling out between him and Rida. There is, however, a review of a biography of Jaza’iri written by one of his admirers, Muhammad Said al-Bani.[217] According to this review, Bani’s biography inaccurately depicts Jaza’iri and inflates his importance. The review credits him with knowledge of numerous manuscripts and acknowledges his role in spreading government schools and founding public libraries in the 1870s and 1880s. At the same time, the review portrays him as stubborn, narrow-minded, and quarrelsome. He possessed neither great learning nor a talent for teaching. It seems, then, that Rida’s journal could also convey splits within the reform camp and shifts from earlier estimations, recalling that years earlier Rida had called Jaza’iri a leading reformer and scholar.

Perhaps the most elusive facet of al-Manār ’s role in Islamic reform in Syria is the ways that readers responded to and used the journal.[218] Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi’s library in Damascus contains evidence of how he used the journal in developing and forming his ideas.[219] A copy of his Proofs of God’s Unity contains his handwritten notes citing an opinion of Muhammad ‘Abduh’s, published by al-Manār, to support ideas in his own essay.[220] In this instance, Qasimi finds new evidence in Rida’s journal to bolster a work that he had already published and that Rida had reviewed.[221] The review explains to readers that Qasimi referred to ‘Abduh in the work without referring to him by name but by describing him as “a recent sage” (ḥakīm min al-muta’ahhirīn) and that he drew on Rida’s journal when he cited “certain men.” Rida also noted that Qasimi did not mention Rida’s or ‘Abduh’s name because he composed the work when Sultan Abdülhamid was still in power, when their mention could incur persecution.[222]

Al-Manār was also embedded in a web of exchanges on the Shiʿi practice of cursing Muʿawiya. The exchanges appear to have begun with Rida’s fatwa against the practice. A Singapore reformer of Hadramawt origins, Muhammad ibn ʿAqil, wrote to Rida and informed him that he intended to collect and publish in an essay the opinions of traditionists and historians who found fault with Muʿawiya for opposing ʿAli and who argued that Muʿawiya could not be regarded as a trustworthy source of Prophetic traditions.[223] Rida advised against this, and he urged Ibn ʿAqil not to exaggerate differences of opinion on an issue that is not a fundamental aspect of religion.[224] The Singapore reformer went ahead with his project anyway. We learn how Qasimi became involved in this issue from notes he recorded in the margin on his copy of the title page of his own essay on the subject. Ibn ʿAqil sent Qasimi a copy of his essay, perhaps in draft form. Qasimi then wrote to a Meccan scholar, ʿAbd-Allah al-Zawawi, inquiring about Ibn ʿAqil, and his Meccan friend replied that the man was a studious scholar-merchant who had composed an essay on Muʿawiya that differed from Rida’s view. Qasimi wrote some observations on the essay, probably criticisms, because Ibn ʿAqil then wrote again. In this letter, he asked for the reformer’s indulgence for his mistakes because he was very occupied with his trade and there were very few books in his part of the world.[225] In addition to the notes that Qasimi made on his essay, his published biography reproduces a number of letters in which he mentioned this issue. He wrote to a friend in Jeddah, Muhammad Nasif, describing Ibn ʿAqil’s essay as one written in a fine style and with sound reasoning. Qasimi stated, however, that he did not wish to revive the feud between ʿAli and Muʿawiya because it opened the door for degrading ancestors who related Hadiths from Muʿawiya and his companions. So he told his correspondent that he wrote to Ibn ʿAqil and stated that he would rather promote moderation, evidently to avoid aggravating tensions between Sunni and Shiʿi Muslims.[226]

A more public form of reaction came out when Ibn ʿAqil's essay was published. Rida issued a notice, but not a review, about it, in which he observed that the essay had created a controversy among Muslims in Singapore and Java, and that readers were soliciting Rida's opinion of the essay. He commented that he opposed the practice of cursing Muʿawiya, but preferred not to discuss the essay and advised Muslims excited over the issue not to go overboard in attacking each others' opinions.[227] The matter did not end there, however. Qasimi then composed and published an essay pointing out what he considered to be mistakes in Ibn ʿAqil's essay. The reformer wrote that he intended his essay to set out an alternative point of view, but not to discredit Ibn ʿAqil, whose work he credited for displaying the author's broad knowledge and independent use of reason (igtihād, but not in the technical legal sense).[228]

Rida described Qasimi's essay in the context of a piece on the entire controversy. He noted that a certain Sayyid Hasan ibn Shihab had written an essay refuting Ibn ʿAqil. Rida suggested that Ibn Shihab envied Ibn ʿAqil's scholarly status among fellow Hadramis in Singapore and nearby parts, so he composed his refutation to gain the support of ulama in a contest with Ibn ʿAqil. There followed a rebuttal of this work by a certain Shaykh Abu Bakr ibn Shihab, a teacher in Hyderabad, whom Rida termed the most famous living Hadrami scholar. For readers seeking an exemplary way to respond to Ibn ʿAqil's points, Rida recommended Qasimi's essay for its balanced critique and the moderate tone it adopted in expressing disagreement with Ibn ʿAqil. It was particularly noteworthy that Qasimi recognized certain merits in the essay. Rida concluded that if all controversial issues were addressed in such a style and tone, then Muslims would not suffer from such deep divisions.[229] That Qasimi and his friend Muhammad Nasif remained concerned with the issue is reflected in their correspondence. Qasimi wrote to Nasif in January 1911 reporting that a new essay had come out in Singapore rebutting Ibn ʿAqil.[230] The following month, Qasimi informed Nasif that he had recently seen a reference to a speech by ʿAli forbidding anyone to curse Muʿawiya. The reformer then wrote that he wished he had seen that particular reference before so he could have included it in his essay.[231] Three years later, Qasimi received a letter from a Kuwaiti scholar announcing the completion of yet another rebuttal to Ibn ʿAqil’s essay, one that incorporated some of Qasimi’s observations.[232]

The entire episode illustrates two aspects of al-Manār ’s influence. First, it served as a platform for debating issues of concern to men versed in Islamic history and religious sources. By coming out at regular intervals in printed form, the journal represented a new kind of more widely disseminated expression of venerable conversations among Muslims on a range of religious matters: ritual, law, theology, history, heresiography, exegesis, and so forth. Second, the journal’s articles were part of public and private conversations carried on through book publishing, private correspondence, and notations in personal copies of essays. A clue to the limits of the journal’s influence is embedded in the requisite literacy and interest in these kinds of issues as well as to its disdain for expressions of popular religion.

 Gauging al-Manār ’s influence

That Rida’s journal made only limited headway in winning Muslims of Syria to its point of view may be inferred from a singular incident and from the association between Manarist views and Amir Faysal in the immediate postwar years. The singular incident occurred when Rashid Rida visited Damascus in October 1908, three months after the constitutional restoration that he had long favored and striven for.[233] During his visit, opponents to the new constitutional regime incited a disturbance by rousing a mob against Rida and the Damascene reformers he associated with (Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi and ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Bitar). Rida delivered a public lecture at the city’s main congregational mosque on the subject of educational reform. In the course of his talk, he was asked to address a completely different issue touching on popular religious observance, namely, praying to saints at their tombs for intercession with God, which he was known to oppose.

His attempt to skirt the issue, the bold challenge to his opinion on the matter, and his quick exit from the mosque all indicate his awareness that in the court of public sentiment, the reformist position was out of favor. In fact, he was advised to leave the city at first opportunity for his own safety and for the sake of public order. It appears that a decade of publishing the reformist line had not made much of an impression in Damascus.

Yet another decade later, popular nationalism swelled in Damascus and other Syrian towns during the brief rule of Amir Faysal.[234] Historian James Gelvin paints a convincing portrait of two distinct nationalist subcultures, one popular and another elitist. The late Ottoman reformers' interest in the sciences, technology, schools, libraries, and leadership by intellectuals characterized the views of Faysal's supporters.[235] These men perpetuated the Manarists' idea of society's need for a vanguard of educated men to lead society as well as their conviction that their own educational attainments entitled them to leadership.[236] Gelvin's account shows that these themes did not strike a responsive chord beyond a small segment of educated opinion whereas the proponents of popular nationalism were able to mobilize in a brief span a significant portion of the country's urban population. One small detail reflects the continuation of disagreements between reformist and conservative ulama factions from before the First World War into the Faysali era and the alignment of these factions with elitist and popular nationalist camps, respectively. In 1911, members of the reformist faction had attended a play on a historical theme. The conservative faction's journal al-Ḥaqā'iq published a number of articles and readers' letters condemning theatrical performance as an innovation forbidden by Islam.[237] Eight years later, men surrounding Amir Faysal staged plays to rally patriotic feeling to his cause. Members of the popular nationalist committees, however, included in their ranks individuals opposed to theatre since the earlier controversy.[238]

 Conclusion

The Manarists' failure to reshape popular religious attitudes in Syria in the journal's first twenty years cannot be blamed on censorship. Sultan Abdülhamid certainly did his utmost to minimize any impact. On the other hand, he was deposed in 1909; Syria then had nearly ten years of constitutional government and a brief period under Amir Faysal, himself surrounded by men of modernist outlook. In order to fully understand the limits on al-Manār 's influence, it is not sufficient to focus on its publisher, its contributors, and its sympathizers. More attention should be paid as well to the defenders of more conservative religious views, and in particular to their resonance with the values and outlook of popular urban culture. Then we would know better why Rida’s message had not much altered many Muslims’ notions of proper religious observance and why the sultan and the shaykh did not need to censor the journal after all.

[155] Al-Manār 1/24 (1898): 380–382.

[156] Al-Manār 12/1 (1909): 3. In yet another issue, Rida included al-Manār in a list of newspapers and books that had been banned under Sultan Abdülhamid: al-Manār 15 (1912): 796.

[157] L. Hirszowicz, “The Sultan and the Khedive, 1892–1908,” Middle Eastern Studies 8 (1972): 299, 309 n. 122.

[158] M. Vükrü Hanioælu, The Young Turks in Opposition (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), 105–107.

[159] Muhammad Salim al-Gundi, Taril Maʿarrat al-Nu2man, 3 vols (Damascus: Ministry of Culture, Tourism, and Nationalist Guidance, 1963–1967), 2: 218. The post did not even exist at the time because the population was mostly ʿAlawi—a heterodox sect that does not concern itself with descent from the Prophet. It may be that the Ottoman authorities agreed for political reasons. Selim Deringil documents efforts under Sultan Abdülhamid II to convert heterodox sects to Sunni Islam. Sayyadi’s appointment to this post preceded Abdülhamid’s reign, so perhaps it had nothing to do with such a policy, or such measures were already applied. Selim Deringil, The Well-Protected Domains: Ideology and the Legitimation of Power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909 (London: I. B. Tauris, 1998), 68–84. Details on Abu al-Huda’s career appear in Butrus Abu-Manneh, “Sultan Abdulhamid II and Shaikh Abulhuda al-Sayyadi,” Middle Eastern Studies 15 (1979): 131–153.

[160] al-Gundi, Taril Maʿarrat al-Nu2man, 1: 214–215.

[161] Ibid., 1: 257–258.

[162] Ibid., 2: 222–229; a similar view is echoed by ʿAbd al-Hafiz al-Fasi, Riyad al-ganna aw al-mudhim al-mutrib, 2 vols. (Rabat: Wataniyya Press, 1932), 2: 149. Fasi wrote that Sayyadi's enemies included frustrated seekers after treasure, who were neglected by the sultan and more sincere critics of the sultan unhappy with Sayyadi's support for him.

[163] On the sources of religious reform in Syria, see David Commins, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990), 21–48.

[164] Nikki R. Keddie, Sayyid Jamal ad-Din "al-Afghani:" A Political Biography (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1972), 380.

[165] Sayyadi's letters to Afghani are paraphrased in Keddie, Sayyid Jamal ad-Din 370; on Afghani's early relations with Sayyadi, see 372.

[166] Ibid., 383.

[167] Ibid., 382.

[168] Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939 (London: Oxford University Press, 1970), 108, 112.

[169] Sami Dahhan, Qudama1 wa muʿasirun (Cairo: Dar al-maʿArif, 1961), 273–276; Keddie also describes Maghribi's acquaintance with Afghani, 379.

[170] Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 226–228.

[171] Al-Manār 4/3 (1901): 105–106.

[172] Al-Manār 5 (1902).

[173] Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 271.

[174] “Asab ʿazim bi wafa ʿalim hakim,” al-Manār 5/6 (1902): 237–240.

[175] “Al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi,” al-Manār 19/3 (1916): 169–178.

[176] The title of the journal is given as al-Minbar by Adham al-Gundi in A2lam al-adab wa al-fann, 2 vols. (Damascus: Voice of Syria Press, 1954), 1: 11. Qadri Qal’agi gives the same name and writes that Zahrawi was 25 years old when he issued the journal; al-Sabiqun (Beirut: Knowledge for the Millions Press, 1954), 31–32. A biographical notice by Ahmad Nabhan al-Humsi gives the journal title as al-Munir. “Targama al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Hamid ibn al-Sayyid Muhammad Makir ibn al-Sayyid Ibrahim al-Zahrawi,” al-Manār 21/3 (1919): 151. Rida’s obituary notice cited earlier gives the same title.

[177] “Al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi,” 169.

[178] Qal’agi, al-Sabiqun, 31–32; al-Humsi, “Targama al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Hamid ibn al-Sayyid Muhammad Makir ibn al-Sayyid Ibrahim al-Zahrawi,” al-Manār 21 (1919): 151.

[179] On his departure to Egypt, see al-Gundi, Taril Maʿarrat al-Nu2man, 1: 11; on the controversy over Zahrawi’s essay, see Commins, Islamic Reform, 55–59.

[180] Adham al-Gundi, Muhada1 al-harb al-2alamiyya al-kubra (Damascus: Arab Press, 1970), 97.

[181] Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 225, citing Rashid Rida’s al-Manār wa al-Azhar.

[182] Hanioëlu, The Young Turks in Opposition, 55–56, 106–107.

[183] “Al-Hikma al-mar2iyya fi muhakama al-qadiriyya wa al-rifa2iyya,” al-Manār 1/31 (1898): 598–601.

[184] “Garaid suriyya al-muta2bada,” al-Manār 1/32 (1898): 665–667; “al-Insaf min mazaya al-amraf,” al-Manār 1/33 (1898): 639–647.

[185] ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Zahrawi, al-Fiqh wa al-tasawwuf (Cairo: Al-Umumiyya Press, 1901): 2–11.

[186] Ibid., 41–43.

[187] Ibid., 61.

[188] ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Bitar, Hilya al-bamar fi taril al-qarn al-t-alit-ʿamar, 3 vols. (Damascus: Arabic Language Academy, 1961–1963), 2: 792.

[189] “Al-Fiqh wa al-tasawwuf,” al-Manār 4/21 (1902): 838–839.

[190] Anwar al-Gundi, Taragim al-alam al-muasirin fi al-alam al-islami (Cairo: Anglo-Egyptian Bookshop, 1970), 215.

[191] For Qasimi’s views on Sufism, see Commins, Islamic Reform, 80–82, and the sources cited therein.

[192] Review of al-Haqiqa al-bahira fi asrar al-mari2a al-tahira ; cited in al-Manār 9/4 (1906): 309–311.

[193] Review of Firqan al-qulub ; cited in al-Manār 9/7 (1906): 550–552.

[194] The index of Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi’s personal library includes five works by Sayyadi.

[195] “Rafiq al-ʿAzm: Wafatuhu wa targamatuhu,” al-Manār 26 (1925): 288–299; additional biographical information is found in the journal of another Syrian religious reformer, Muhibb al-Din al-Latib, “Rafiq al-ʿAzm,” al-Zahra1 2/3–4 (1925): 224–234.

[196] Al-Latib, “Rafiq al-ʿAzm,” 226.

[197] In addition to the ʿAzm obituaries listed in n. 42, see Hasan Kayali, Arabs and Young Turks: Ottomanism, Arabism, and Islamism in the Ottoman Empire, 1908–1918 (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1997), 46.

[198] Rafiq al-ʿAzm, Tanbih al-afham ila matalib al-haya al-igtimaiyya wa al-islam (Cairo: al-Mawsua Press, 1900), 66–67; ʿAzm also develops this theme in al-Durus al-hikmiyya li’l-nami1a al-islamiyya (Cairo: Al-Mu1ayyad Press, 1899).

[199] Rafiq al-ʿAzm, “Man al-mas1ul (al-hukuma am al-ma2b),” al-Manār 1/45 (1898): 866–869.

[200] Rafiq al-ʿAzm, “al-Inqilab al-maymun,” al-Manār 12/5 (1909): 340–349.

[201] On the intellectual elitism of the Syrian reformers, see Commins, Islamic Reform, 78, 87–88, 102, 143. On intellectual elitism in the Committee of Union and Progress, see Hanioëlu, The Young Turks in Opposition, 205–208.

[202] Zahrawi’s work came out in volumes 11 and 13; ʿAzm’s in volume 10. Rida’s journal, however, was not the only platform for publishing reformers’ works, especially after the 1908 constitutional restoration. For example, the Damascene reformer Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi had a work on the traditionist al-Bukhari issued in a Sidon journal (al-2Irfan 4/1 (1912): 28–35; 4/2: 65–72; 4/3: 99–107; 4/4: 165–171), and his essay on the jurist’s opinion (fatwa) appeared in a Damascus review (al-Muqtabas 6/2 (1911): 89–116; 6/3: 177–197; 6/4: 275–298).

[203] Review of al -Gawahir al-kalamiyya fi al-aqaid al-islamiyya, al-Manār 5/23 (1903): 914–915. The journal also reviewed Jaza1iri’s Tawgih al-nazar ila usul al-at ¯ ar on the Hadith sciences in al-Manār 15/2 (1912): 160, and called it an indispensable work.

[204] Review of Risala fi al-may wa al-qahwa wa al-dullan in al-Manār 7/8 (1904): 313.

[205] “Matbu2at al-Mayl Muhammad Gamal al-Din al-Qasimi,” al-Manār 14/11 (1911): 870–872. The works were Marh luqtat al-2aglan, Tanbih al-talib ila maʿrifa al-fard wa al-wagib, Irmad al-lalq ila al-2amal bi labar al-barq, and al-Fatwa fi al-Islam.

[206] Al-Manār 12/5 (1909): 387–388.

[207] Al-Manār 14/3 (1911): 230, Maùahib al-aʿrab.

[208] Al-Manār 16/1 (1913): 69, Mizan al-’garh wa al-taʿdil.

[209] Al-Manār 18/4 (1915): 317, al-Mash ʿala al-gawrabayn wa al-naʿlayn.

[210] Al-Manār 18/7 (1915): 556–560; 18/8: 61–634; 18/9: 692–695, Magmu lutab.

[211] Al-Manār 8/2 (1905): 79–80.

[212] Al-Manār 17/7 (1914): 558–560; 17/8 (1914): 628–636.

[213] “Masabuna bi1l-Zahrawi wa Kaylani,” al-Manār 19/2 (1916): 124; 19/3 (1916): 169–178; Humsi, “Tarëamat al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Hamid,” al-Manār 21/3 (1919): 150–152; 21/4 (1919): 207–211.

[214] Muhammad Bahga al-Bitar, “Tarëjama al-Mayl ʿAbd al-Razzaq al-Bitar,” al-Manār 21/6 (1919): 317–324.

[215] “Rafiq al-ʿAzm: Wafatuhu wa targamatuhu,” al-Manār 26/4 (1925): 288–299.

[216] “Wafa al-2allama al-galil al-Mayl Salim al-Bulari,” al-Manār 29/8 (1928): 633–634.

[217] Sayyid Salih Mullis Rida, al-Manār 22/8 (1921): 635–640.

[218] Information on subscriptions would also be welcome. In a 1909 letter to a correspondent in Jeddah, Qasimi mentioned that Rida was sending him issues of the journal. Zafir al-Qasimi, Ëamal al-Din al-Qasimi wa ʿasruhu (Damascus: al-Hashimiyya Press, 1965), 591.

[219] The Qasimi Library is described in Commins, Islamic Reform, 179.

[220] Qasimi indicated that the piece by ‘Abduh appeared in volume 11, number 12.

[221] The point for which Qasimi found support is on page 56 in his text. Rida reviewed Dala1il al-tawhid in al-Manār 12/5 (1909): 387–388. The review praised Qasimi’s use of classical and recent scholars to present a compendium on theological reasoning.

[222] Qasimi also kept a copy of al-Manār’s review of his essay, Pleasing Responses (al-Agwiba al-murdiyya), which deals with a matter of jurisprudence. The copy in the Qasimi library of this work contains new footnotes that he wrote.

[223] Muhammad ibn ʿAqil helped manage a Malay reformist journal, al-Imam. I owe this information to Azyumardi Azra’s chapter in this volume, which mentions Ibn ʿAqil. Prof. Azra noted that Ibn ʿAqil’s “Shi2i” bent is the subject of an article by Werner Ende, “Schiitische Tendenzen bei sunnitischen Sayyids aus Hadhramaut: Muhammad b. ʿAqil al-2Alawi," Der Islam 50/1 (1973).

[224] "Al-Nasa1ih al-kafiyya li man yatawalla Muʿawiya," al-Manār 13/2 (1910): 152; "Kitab al-nasa1ih al-kafiyya wa al-rudud ʿalayhi wa al-intisar lahu," al-Manār 14/4 (1911): 314–316; Gamal al-Din al-Qasimi, Naqd al-nasa1ih al-kafiyya li man yatawalla Muʿawiya (Damascus: al-Fayha1 Press, 1910), 2.

[225] Muhammad ibn ʿAqil, Al-Nasa1ih al-kafiyya li man yatawalla Muʿawiya, copy in Qasimi library, Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi's handwritten notes on title page. Qasimi gave the date of the letter from Ibn ʿAqil as July 1908.

[226] Letter to Muhammad Nasif, July 30, 1909, in Zafir al-Qasimi, Ëamal al-Din al-Qasimi wa ʿasruhu, 602–603. On the margin of page 221 in his copy of Ibn ʿAqil's essay, Qasimi wrote that he read it in the course of the last ten days during the evening. He dated his note July 22, 1909, so he wrote to Nasif eight days later.

[227] "Kitab al-nasa1ih al-kafiyya," al-Manār 14 (1911): 314–316.

[228] Gamal al-Din al-Qasimi, Naqd al-nasa1ih, 2–3.

[229] "Kitab al-nasa1ih al-kafiyya," al-Manār.

[230] al-Qasimi, Ëamal al-Din al-Qasimi wa ʿasruhu, 617.

[231] Ibid., 618.

[232] Letter from ʿAbd al-2Aziz ibn Ahmad al-Ramid al-Baddah, March 1914; Al-Qasimi, Gamal al-Din al-Qasimiwa2asruhu, 551–554.

[233] The incident is described in detail and sources are given in Commins, Islamic Reform, 128–132.

[234] For details of popular nationalism in the Faysali period, see James Gelvin, Divided Loyalties: Nationalism and Mass Politics in Syria at the Close of Empire (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1998).

[235] Gelvin cites officially sanctioned sermons that urged Muslims to strive for technical progress; Gelvin, Divided Loyalties, 190.

[236] Ibid., 194–195, 203–204.

[237] Commins, Islamic Reform, 122.

[238] Gelvin, Divided Loyalties, 258–259.

* 3. The Manarists and Modernism: An attempt to fuse society and religion

Mahmoud Haddad

The first generation of American independence witnessed an energetic, almost a convulsive, effort to “create” an American culture. There was to be an American language, and Noah Webster set himself resolutely to champion American speech and prove its superiority to British speech. There was to be an American literature … an American education… an American science… and even an American arithmetic, for as Nicholas Pike wrote: “As we are now an independent nation it was deemed proper that we should have an independent arithmetic.”[239]

In Europe it was also felt necessary to hide the more offensive aspects of utilitarian industrial modernism under the cloak of an earlier age. One historian wrote:

In London even the railway stations struck archaic poses: Euston Station sought in its façade escape to ancient Greece, St. Pancras to the Middle Ages, Paddington to the Renaissance. This Victorian historicism expressed the incapacity of city dwellers either to accept the present or to conceive the future except as a resurrection of the past.[240]

Although not everyone who wrote in al-Manār can be considered a Manarist, it is commonplace for al-Manār to be associated with the Salafi movement. In the words of W. Ende:

The origin and early development of the Salafiyya in [Egypt and Syria] is above all connected with the names of al-Afghani [1839–1897], ‘Abduh [1849–1905], al-Kawakibi [1854–1902], and Rashid Rida [1865–1935]….With al-Manār , the last mentioned created in Cairo in 1898 the most influential organ of the Salafiyya. From 1926 onwards, al-Manār was joined by al-Fatḥ (Cairo), a periodical of similar tendency which, after the death of Rashid Rida and the cessation of al-Manār in 1935, was considered until 1948 the most important (although not the only) journalistic forum of the Salafiyya in Egypt….Its editor and main author, Muhibb al-Din al-Khatib… had founded, together with his Syrian compatriot ʿAbd al-Fattah Katlan [d. 1931], the Matbaʿa Salafiyya (including a bookshop), a printing press whose production reflects all the essential desiderata of the movement.[241]

It is necessary to point out from the outset, that the Salafiyya or the Manarists/Salafis were not a homogenous group, nor even a group, and even when taken as individuals they are not devoid of contradictions and inconsistencies in their various expositions. It should be made equally clear that the Manarists’ thinking was not completely rigid and underwent changes over time. The most glaring example of such developments and differences of opinion is Rashid Rida’s transformation in the last phase of his life into a spokesman for the Wahhabi movement in the Arabian Peninsula, and its comparison with Muhammad ‘Abduh’s earlier description of the same movement. In 1902, ‘Abduh lauded the Wahhabiyya for brushing away the dust of tradition and removing the layers that stood between men and a true study of the Qur’an and the Hadith, so as to allow them to derive God’s teachings from the source.[242] For ‘Abduh, however, the Wahhabiyya could be more narrow-minded than the traditionalists. He was bold enough to say:

Though its members may denounce many innovations and corruptions that have been added to the faith unjustly over the years, they advocate a strict interpretation of the literal text, with no regard for the principles on which Islam was built and for which the Prophet called. These are no scholars, and no friends of civilization.[243]

The main thesis of the Salafiyya was the need for Islamic renewal or reform (taǧdād) in order to modernize and update the religious law (shariʿa), even if that entailed partial Western influence. It proposed to do so by marrying two trends: an Islamic trend that called for going back to the early sources of Islam (i.e. the Qur’an and the Hadith) shunning harmful innovations (bidʿa) that came later, and a second trend, the modern Western trend of thought. Thus, it considered itself a modernist movement that accepted Western ideas, but within the general Islamic cultural framework. This approach made the Salafiyya face a double challenge from opposite directions: one from the old Islamic school of imitation (taqlīd) that adhered to interpretations of older ulama, and the second from the newer trend of secularization and uncritical westernization represented by the new emerging elite in the Arab and Muslim worlds. Additionally, the Salafi reformists perceived a need to work harder to inject Muslim moral values into Islamic society before Western style secularism or irreligion had a chance to seep in, or to reverse what they perceived to be not just secularism but de-Islamization. The need to preserve an Islamic identity was extremely relevant in this regard.

Explicitly or implicitly the Manarists/Salafis acquiesced in or rather called for the separation of religion and politics, and in this they were very different from the contemporary Islamic movements that call for their fusion.[244] The former were, probably without knowing it, in agreement not with ideological, but with historical Islam which organized Islamic society and the Islamic state according to separate norms. As Gibb and Bowen once noted, in the days before the 1979 Iranian revolution, religion and state in Islam were united “only in the realms of theory.”[245] What the Manarists/Salafis were after was a fusion or unity of religion and society rather than of religion and state.

This may be confirmed by the writings of a number of Manarists/Salafi thinkers. Shaykh Muhammad ‘Abduh, in his interpretation of the Sura al-ʿImran, wrote:

The worst thing that can bedevil the faith and lead to a loss of the true Book [the Qur’an] is to put the livelihood of religious scholars and their ranking in the hands of princes and rulers. Religious scholars must be totally independent of rulers, particularly the oppressive ones. I cannot comprehend the purpose of putting scholarly ranks and wages in the hands of kings and princes, except to render these golden chains into bonds around their necks, with which they can be led to where the unjust rulers wish to deceive the public in the name of religion and hold them servile. If the public were to realize this they would not put much stock in the pronouncements of any official scholar bound by these chains. In the Ottoman Empire, religious ranks were bestowed not only on ignorant men but even upon children. There is a long poem mocking this sad state of the State written by a scholar from Tripoli (Syria). Yet, later on and from among those same scholars adorned with fancy outfits and shining medals, and who daily praised their benefactor the sultan, emerged some who declared their desire for the state to reform. This position was a ruse to mislead the public about their true allegiances. Is it possible then to trust a scholar close to the oppressive rulers? [246]

‘Abduh went on to say:

Scholars of the early generations (salaf) used to avoid the embrace of unjust rulers more stridently than they would avoid snakes and scorpions. There are many sayings and accounts about this, including the Prophet’s hadith: “There will come after me princes [one rendition is: lying and unjust princes], and whomsoever befriends them and believes their lies and helps them in their oppression is not of me, nor I of him, and will not join me in heaven.” (Relayed and authenticated by Tirmidhi, Nasa’i, al-Hakim, and Bayhaqi). Another hadith mentioned, “You shall have imams who control your livelihood, tell you lies and misrule among you. They will not be satisfied until you approve of their evil and believe their lies. You must stay true to the Right as long as they will tolerate it, and if they cross that boundary then whoever among you dies in opposition will die a martyr.” (Relayed by al-Tabrani, with variations. We chose it because it includes the phrase “they will control your livelihood.”[247])

The contemporary state of Islamic society was the subject of ‘Abduh’s response to Renan, the French philosopher, who asked where exactly lay the general atrophy in Islam that was leading others to argue that religion is an obstacle in the path of Muslims, preventing their success and progress. Would it be correct to assume that this rigidity is in the nature of the faith?[248] ‘Abduh answered that this rigidity has to do with the relation that developed between religion and politics and not with Islam per se.[249] He said that we hear about political authorities arresting those who revive the arguments of the Salafi scholars calling for renewal, but these measures are not an expression of adherence to the faith. The traditional scholars afflicted with rigidity (ğumūd) who instigate such steps are motivated by envy and not by concern for the welfare of the religion. The arrests are a political necessity, out of fear that if one scholar was allowed to escape from the bonds of tradition, the practice might spread and others might follow. Then perhaps the practice would spread to other matters outside religion, leading to freedom of thought, which the conservatives abhor.[250] ‘Abduh concluded on a light, but revealing note:

If you wish to argue that politics involve the oppression of thought, religion and science, then I agree. May God protect us from politics, from the word “politics,” from the meaning of politics, from each letter in this word, from each image of it that comes to my mind, from each person that speaks or thinks of politics, and from each form of the verb “politics.”[251]

Equally important, Rafiq al-ʿAzm (1867–1925) wrote in al-Manār in 1904 about the reasons for the decline of Islamic nations, asking:

Is it not saddening and heartbreaking that there is not a single Muslim nation that can match the smallest Christian emirate in progress and advancement? Consider states like Bulgaria, Serbia, and Romania, which only recently seceded from the great [Ottoman] Islamic nation, how they have outstripped the Muslim nation and have become its most stubborn opponents. What, I wonder, is the cause of such devastating and pervasive inertia that has enslaved the Muslims, interrupted their system, and made them lag behind other nations? Christians and Buddhists have outdistanced the Muslims in progress, their opponents have subjugated them over authority, and their rivals have defeated them in all aspects of life in all areas of the world.[252]

After considering many answers based on religion, ethnicity, or character, and dismissing them all, he came to a rather novel conclusion for a Muslim:

As a divine religion, Islam is only meant for the happiness and good of mankind. And no rational human being can claim that Islam prohibits its followers from attaining the happiness that God intended for His people through religion. It is only different minds throughout different ages and nations that differ in their comprehension of the meaning of religion. As is well known, the first nation to receive Islam was the Arab nation, which was steeped in aberrance and Bedouinism, and which had no social laws or an advanced or civilized system of government. When Islam came down to the Arabs with its rules, exhortations, commands, and prohibitions, they found in it an accessible goal, a momentous event, and eloquent wisdom. Thus, they embraced Islam and considered it the only and ultimate thing in their lives. They went to such extremes in their belief that it blinded them from the fact that excessiveness in religion, to the extent of associating it with all worldly matters, especially the political life of the nation, is a departure from the true intent of religion. It is a strong distortion of the Prophet’s legislation: “If what troubles you is a religious matter, then come to me with it. But if it is a worldly matter, then you are more cognizant of it than I.”[253]

Such was the result of the Arabs' total devotion to religion, in their Bedouin days, and their failure to place politics separately so that it may develop and grow in line with the developing state of affairs of the Muslims themselves. An indication of their error in that matter is the fact that the Bedouin governments that did not embrace aspects of civilization and did not keep pace with the changing times and with the advanced countries and their forms of government are still to this day considered by many the least developed among Muslim states. The people of such "Bedouin" states as those of the Maghreb and of the Arabian Peninsula are seen in the Middle East as most ignorant of social life, and their deteriorating state of affairs is perceived as a proof of this overall situation.

This is identified by many authors as the cause of the disasters that have afflicted Muslims and the source of their social misery to the present day. According to these authors, a nation that has placed itself in such a position of shunning worldly affairs and of attaching all matters of civil progress to religion and of succumbing to its despotic rulers for hundreds of years cannot strive for an advanced state or learn the lessons of the past without long toil and great hardships. The Muslims could have learnt from "non-religious"[sic] Japan which collectively rose and embraced the means of progress and advancement, reached in thirty years the level of European nations, and challenged the greatest "Christian" nations—while Muslim rule was being wrested away and the states of the Muslims were threatened with extinction, and developed nations dominated them and their governments. There is not a single Muslim state that would have willingly undertaken the formation of an advanced government that could have matched the smallest European nation; that would have repelled the raids of civilized peoples who fought the Muslims for survival with the power of knowledge and the weapons of civilization, or that would have purged governments of their elements of deadly corruption. The Europeans had enslaved three quarters of the Muslims, and before the lapse of a quarter of a century, they might have taken control of the remaining quarter of them. That quarter might have lost their countries to the Europeans had they remained steeped in error and ignorance, and if they did not manage their own affairs and stop relying on their tyrannical governments, the kind of tyranny that consumed kingdoms, toppled towers of glory, and drained the strength of nations while they lie unaware.[254]

One of the characteristics of the Manarist/Salafi trend is that it opted for selective modernism—that is if we think of modernism as an approximation of the stage that the West had reached in thought or behavior at that time. It therefore did not see a problem in accepting modern thinking and found it compatible with Islam in certain areas. In others, it refused modern, or more precisely Western, thinking or behavior as incompatible with Islam. The yardstick one may generally use to differentiate among its varying stances is to evaluate whether a certain stance was in contradiction with basic Islamic teachings or if it posed a problem to Islamic identity according to their definition of it or to historical circumstances. For the Manarist/Salafi movement, modernism was to be respectful of Islam, of the Arabs, and of their past. In that sense, it was necessary to weave the national with the religious. Otherwise, modernism would remain alien and devoid of any acceptable identity (see Appendix). From this perspective, modernism advanced the cause of an Arab nationalism intertwined with Islam. An article entitled, “Love of the Arabs is a True Pillar of Islam, “[255] published in al-Fatḥ in 1947 is a case in point. More importantly, and much earlier, Muhammad ‘Abduh considered that modernism implicitly entailed Arab cultural nationalism and revival in the form of modernizing the Arabic language by going back to study its sources and enabling it to express new genres of literature.[256]

As an example of a modernism that is compatible with Islam, a series of articles by Rashid Rida in 1907 is most revealing.[257] The series, entitled “The Benefits and Harms of Europeans in the East,” lists clearly what benefits the Muslims got from the Europeans. Rida cited, as the first benefit, “independent thought” and said that newspapers write plenty about the independence of nations, but rarely about the independence of the individual, which is the foundation for the independence of the larger group called the nation. He went on to say that “civilization is a form of human perfection of individuals. Its opposite is tyranny, which prevents the perfection of individuals that is required in civilization. Tyranny manipulates individual independence, and controls the learning behavior of individuals.”[258] Rida proceeded to explain that in countries where tyranny is predominant, the educational system is built on imitation and rote learning, following the nature of government. Thus, since the East is more rooted in imitation than the West, it is also more rooted in tyranny. Although Europe suffered from tyranny more in the Middle Ages than the East, in modern times the tables were turned. Consequently, science and business thrived in Europe to unprecedented levels while the East remained backward. This allowed Europe to penetrate into the East, colonizing the land, spreading the call for its own religion, and seeking profits. People of the two areas mixed together and created mutual ties, when Europeans established schools in the East, and took over many positions and functions. Rida interestingly concluded:

This is a major benefit we have derived from Europeans. We should be grateful to them for the education, and learning they possess. A Muslim should not deny that, or fail to use the argument that, the noble Qur’an itself has taught us to dismantle imitation, and that it is founded on the principle of independent logic. Though this is true… it was not a factor in this age of awakening of the East in general and the Muslims in particular. Our proof is that today our men of religion remain the staunchest enemies of independence [of thought], and the most beholden to imitation. We should be fair, and express our gratefulness to those who have awakened us to our self-interest.[259]

The second benefit we acquired from the Europeans, according to Rida, was “the emergence from tyranny.”[260] He surveyed Islamic and Eastern history in a very open and liberal way and concluded that tyranny was the norm in these lands even before European colonization started. For him, “the greatest benefit that the East has derived from the Europeans is knowledge of what a government should be. That deep conviction leads to an attempt to replace absolute authority in the hands of individuals with a government subject to the rule of consultation (šūrā) and religious law (sharʿia). Some, like Japan, have reached that goal. Others, like Iran, have proceeded along that path. Still others, like Egypt and Turkey, continue to struggle toward that end, with speech and printed word.”[261] Again, Rida’s conclusion is not based on any Islamic premise:

A Muslim should not say that this form of government is a foundation of our faith, and that we derive it from our own clear Book (the Qur’an), and from the conduct of the early caliphs, not from contacts with Europeans and understanding of Western affairs. Without such contacts, Muslims would not have realized that this is a true aspect of Islam. Otherwise, the first to declare the need for fulfilling this command of the faith would have been religious scholars in Constantinople, Egypt, and Morocco. In fact, however, most of them remain staunch supporters and tools of tyrannical governments ruled by individuals. Most of those who demand the rule of consultation, which is subjected to laws, are those who have become familiar with Europe and European ways.[262]

The third and last benefit which Rida thought the East had received from Europe was “communal societies or communal organizations.” Rida writes that social scientists believe that the primary factor in furthering the advancement of nations is voluntary communal organizations that are obviously independent of the state. For him, such organizations or societies have led the way to the development of science and art, to the increase in glory and power, and to the accumulation of wealth. They also helped spread Europe’s religion throughout the world and guaranteed European domination of East and West.[263] He added that the East had preceded the West in all forms of civil and social progress, but civilization in the East remained lacking and was not established on firm foundations which, according to him, caused it to collapse. The reason was that these foundations were the creation of individual effort and not based on work through communal societies. “Without these societies, modern Western civilization would not have been as strong and as deserving of stability and longevity.”[264] Rida then made the point that,

Today, we see the East beginning to learn from the West how to create communal societies and corporations. The Japanese have been very successful in this field and have reached a level of maturity. The Ottomans and Egyptians remain in a state of childhood in this life of collective effort. Yet, without this effort, it is impossible for a nation to reach maturity….

[Voluntary] societies and corporations are the measure of a nation’s progress and its life. This is indisputable. You should not be deceived by the brilliant achievement of one individual, or several, in some science or enterprise. If they do not find in their nations societies that appreciate their value and assist them into bringing to life the fruits of their brilliance, the efforts of these individuals will be wasted and their abilities squandered. [265]

It is noteworthy that in the series of articles entitled, “The Benefits and Harms of Europeans in the East,” Rida’s impressions were exclusively about benefits with no mention of any harmful effects.

This attitude is drastically reversed on the eve of the First World War. The threat of European colonization, its realization in the core Arab-Muslim areas, and the rise of extreme or militant secular movements calling for near complete Westernization similar to that in Atatürk’s Turkey, had drastically changed the political and cultural picture. From that point on there would be no escape from political issues. These were connected with national and religious integrity and identity. More importantly, they were not simply concerned with the issue of religion and state as expressed by the wisdoms received from a revealed religion, but came to encroach on the relation between religion and society. With the spread of European colonization on the eve of the First World War, Rida perceptively commented:

It is not Islam that shuns the Europeans, but the Europeans who force Islam to give them a wide berth. Harmony between them is not an impossibility, but the way to reach it requires the exercise of a large mind. [266]

Nothing can better describe the new type of conflict that developed between the Manarist/Salafi defenders of Islamic identity and the “new modernists” or Westernizers than the controversy about the wearing of a hat or a turban. This episode exemplifies the clash between Islamic society and religion on the one hand and the state on the other. In an article entitled “The Turban and the Tarbush [fez],” al-Fatḥ, edited by Muhibb al-Din al-Khatib,[267] reprinted a commentary that had previously appeared in the pro-British Egyptian newspaper al-Muqattam. The latter had published a piece by an unknown writer accusing Muhibb al-Din al-Khatib, who was himself a wearer of the fez, of becoming an advocate of wearing turbans. The writer claimed that the subject had nothing to do with religion and that Islam had no specific costume or required appearance. This was a matter best left to social customs and personal taste. Islam never introduced any such requirements. Anyone who claimed that religion required a certain outfit was making a false allegation at the expense of the faith and misrepresenting Islam. Indeed, the turban worn today as a symbol for religious scholars was not the same one worn by the good ancestors. Neither did our worthy ancestors wear a qūftān, ğūbba (overcoat), or belt as is common today. All these were recent introductions. Al-Khatib replied the next day ridiculing some of the minor points made by his adversary. However, he made a lengthy defense of wearing the turban for reasons having to do with both Islamic identity and economic independence:

The turbans are the crowns of the Arabs. They were the symbol of the Arabs and the Muslims when they were masters. They were also the ornament of their heads and the pride of their manhood. When Muslims became enslaved, some of their nation stooped low enough to follow the ways of other nations, a stage which was the subject of a pioneering psychological analysis by Judge Wali al-Din Abu Zayd ʿAbd al-Rahman ibn Khaldun.[268]

The author then makes a point about the “economics of wearing Islamic dress” that is rarely found elsewhere:

Before some Muslims moved away from the turban to the fez, they used to wear textiles produced in their own lands. National industry used to have teeming markets, and the trade of the East was in the hands of the Easterners. This provided the livelihood for hundreds of thousands of workers, many of who have since turned into thieves or beggars. Ever since the Ottoman Sultan Mahmud [II] adopted the Frankish costume, the East has paid to the west hundreds of millions of pounds as the price for foreign textiles. Households in the West prospered with this income, while their equivalent in the East went bankrupt. Every pound that left the pocket of the Easterners to the coffers of the West in payment for their clothes was a nail in the structure of the Western domination of the East. One wishes that the turban had remained our symbol. Then we would have preserved our beauty and dignity. The textile industry in the East would have progressed, and we would have preserved our economic independence to assist us in protecting our national independence, or at least in restoring it.[269]

The shock of the abolishment of the caliphate in Turkey in 1924 and the pursuit of a policy undermining the shariʿa in both state and society had two effects in the Muslim World. For one, it empowered similar trends in other Muslim countries; for the other it put the modernist Manarist/Salafi forces in those countries on the defensive, pushing them to abandon their middle ground and lash out against the Westernizing elements. Such was the shock that the Nation Arabe published by Shakib Arslan in Geneva wrote in March 1930 that the Turkey of Angora or Ankara, as it now wants to be called, prides itself of being in the process of complete modernization in a European sense. Hat, dance, Roman alphabet, Swiss civil code, Italian penal code, etc., they have gone as far as possible in breaking with the past. It is said that they no longer even tolerate oriental music, and at a given moment they spoke of changing even Turkish cuisine in the strictest sense into a purely Occidental cuisine.[270]

Even more theatrical projects were proposed, such as that of replacing Turkish first names, almost all of Arabic origin, with Latin or Germanic first names. Instead of Ali Riza, Ismail Haqqi, Hüsseyin Kâzim, etc., one would thenceforth be named Jean, Jules, Marcel, Xavier, William, Max, etc. That was to say that Kemalist Turkey was no longer content with Western teachings in the sciences, arts, law, and regulations, but wanted to become completely European in a social sense. In order to better break with the past, they even thought of no longer teaching Turkish history. Some wanted Turkish history to begin with Mustafa Kemal, and no longer wanted to speak of the events which linked Turkey to Asia. The difficulty with this attempt, however, was, according to our authors, that it went around the issues by playing with historical and geographical truths and claiming that Turkey had always been a European power and had never received anything from Asia. It is thus that Tevfik Ravid Bey, the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, declared at the disarmament Conference in Geneva something which, moreover, had no relation to the purpose of the Conference, that is, that all of Turkish history proved that it had always been an essentially European country. “The Kemalist Turks, not content therefore to be Europeans in the future, want to have been Europeans in the past. They do not intend to modernize in the manner of Japan, for example, and seek to be taught European knowledge by adapting themselves to modern technology, while remaining essentially Japanese. No, the Kemalist Turks were determined to focus on a radical revolution which left little trace of their past.” Such attitudes in the name of “progress” made Shakib Arslan disapprovingly write that the Turkish method of “modernization is merely an attempt to extinguish the Muslim spirit.”[271]

Earlier, in June 1929, Rashid Rida had written a preface for the thirtieth volume of al-Manār.[272] One of the topics that he discussed was “The Renewal of Our Atheists and the Renewal of the Westerners (Franks).”[273] Rida started his attack early by comparing the developments that were taking place in Europe with the opposite kind of developments taking place in the Arab and Muslim worlds:

The destruction of the Islamic aspects of government by renegade Turks and what appear to be initial indications that the Afghan and Iranian governments are emulating them, as well as the events in Egypt (and the contagion is spreading to every province) have tempted colonialists and Christian missionaries in Europe to deliver the coup de grâce to Islam, sweep away all vestiges of Islamic rule, and to revive Christianity and consolidate it in the West and the East.[274]

Rida presented the following list that included, according to his evaluation, some of the efforts by Europeans to renew their religion, most of which he regarded as pretexts to transgress against the Islamic religion:

1 British and other Protestant missionaries had convened one conference after another in Jerusalem, the cradle of Christianity, to consult about increasing the effort to Christianize Muslims. One of their organizations in London had published a statement claiming that the only territory where Islam had truly deep roots was in the Arabian Peninsula. Moreover, it alleged that only 100 dedicated missionaries were needed to destroy it in its first cradle and last redoubt.

2 The French government returned to Catholic organizations all of the money and endowments that it confiscated from them in order to encourage them to spread Christianity in the French colonies in North Africa and Syria.

3 New books were being published in French and other languages reviling Islam and urging the Christianization of Muslims, by force if necessary. Rida had published some excerpts from their books in this and in previous volumes and promised to publish more in the future.

4 The Italian government had reconciled with the Vatican, restoring to the Pope political sovereignty in his domain and hundreds of millions of his (frozen) assets, thus reinvigorating the Catholic Church and commencing a new era in the revival of Christianity, in both the East and West. This did not harm Muslims per se unless the Church transgressed against them, and it remained less injurious than secularism and atheism.

5 The organizations calling for the unification of all Christian churches and sects had shown a greater activism in the East and West. In fact, they had made some progress in that direction.

6 The religious revivalist movement in England was only second to that of Italy. By now the controversy surrounding the suggestion to amend the official Book of Prayers, and the parliament’s repeated rejection of it, had become well known. Other organizations had been formed to look into Christian doctrines and the traditions of the Church, with a view to reconciling them with science and the modern age.

7. Italian and British publications were competing to spread the message urging women to return to (religious) decency in dress and public conduct, and especially to resist the latest excesses in display of feminine charms and dissoluteness, which leads to moral depravity. Some of these writings by well-known British writers had been published in Egyptian newspapers. Moreover, the Italian prime minister, who was a great reformer, had banned excesses in dress, dancing, and swimming, hoping by reviving religion and morality to renew the strength and greatness of his nation. Furthermore, every virtuous man found this praiseworthy.[275]

As for the lessons to be derived from “Europe’s renewal and the renewal of our atheists, “ [276] as he put it, Rida held that the renewal of “our country’s atheists” and advocates of disbelief and licentiousness entailed the destruction of religious bonds and the elements of honor and dignity, namely everything that tied the nation together, gave it strength, unified its word, and preserved it morals. They called disbelief and debauchery originality in renewal and progress and advancement in civilization. They referred to religious consciousness and chastity as old and worn-out notions.[277]

Indeed, for Rida, their mockery and corruption were spreading and the threat that they posed was growing with the growth of magazines and newspapers through which they squirted their poison. This was so despite their low prestige and bad reputation; none of them had superior skill in a useful science or a good deed. Rather, their influence came through the attractiveness of their expression, which they employed to sanction the desires of old trespassers and young juveniles. Knowledgeable people asserted that much of the extent of uncertainty of belief, corrupted honor, and debauched women could be attributed to the corrupting influence of magazines and newspapers.[278]

Rida then shifted to another more sensitive topic, showing not the moderate modernist face, but the conservative side of the Manarists/Salafis, when it came to the issue of women. Writing under the subtitle, “The Danger of Liberating Women, “ [279] he wrote that the question of female anarchy, called women’s liberation (which was shamelessness exemplified by the preference of removing the veil over the chastity exemplified by the veil), had brought Egypt and other Europeanized Eastern peoples to an abyss that threatened their dignity, family unit, health, and wealth, even though the depraved advocates of licentiousness and cuckolding may have called this danger a civilizing renewal.[280]

Rida makes the point that nowadays, women, housewives, mothers, and educated maidens roam the streets day and night with men, their arms around each others’ waists. They frequent promenades and nightclubs in different states of dress and nudity, holding hands with men and more. Some of them swim at sea, in front of men or even with men. Some frequent mixed dance halls where they dance with men in a state much worse than their foreign counterparts, in terms of nakedness, impudence, wantonness, buffoonery, and silliness. Some of them visit the salons where they have their hair cut and their backs and bosoms beautified. There they meet their lovers; ask not what they speak openly and what they promise secretly. Do not mention the multiplicity of secret brothels, let alone the prevalence of the open ones and the personal trysts. Naturally, the many newspapers and magazines instigate to this temptation. Thus, one of the most serious consequences of this corruption is a decrease in the number of marriages. This threatens the nation by stopping its demographic growth, leading to its diminution and potential extinction.[281] But one should not derive the conclusion that Rida's stance on the issue at hand was novel at that time. In 1908 Qasim Amin (1863–1908), the Egyptian writer in the circle of Muhammad 'Abduh's friends, had died. Rida was very reserved in his eulogy. He described Amin who had called for shunning the veil and was well-known as the "liberator of the [Muslim] woman," which was the title of his first book on the subject, as having been more theoretical than practical and that his writings were in contradiction to the general opinion of the majority of people.[282] Rida was also critical of Amin, though more mildly, when Muhammad 'Abduh was still alive and when Amin published his second book entitled al-Mar'a al-ǧadīda ("The New Woman") in 1901.[283]

Rida went on sounding a pessimistic note when he stated:

The enemies of Islam lie in wait and are happy for the ignominy that Muslims brought on their faith. They are paving the way for enslaving Muslims and colonizing their countries. They carefully monitor every faint whisper for reform that issues from the mouth of any Muslim ruler and every movement for renewal that might arise among them. Then they set out to caution their governments and to urge the neutralization of its salutary effects. They work to defame the advocates of such movements so that unaware Muslims may turn away from them. This is demonstrated in the article "What is Said about Islam in Europe," printed in this volume and based on the writings of Jules Sicard,[284] a French military man, Father Lammens, a Jesuit priest, and Dr Snouk [Hurgonje], a Dutch statesman. Consider what these Europeans have to say about the Imam [Muhammad 'Abduh] and the owner of al-Manār and their call for reform, al-Manār and its analysis, the Epistle ofUnicity [Risālat al-tawḥīd by Muhammad 'Abduh] and its implementation, and their views regarding the modern Europeanization movement. It should be noted that our authors (the owner of al-Manār and the Imam [Muhammad ‘Abduh]) lament the fact that this movement has begun to erode the fundamentals of religion. They also lament the fact that the ideas of Shaykh Muhammad ‘Abduh, which struck root among thinkers and had wide appeal among Muslim youth, now are most vehemently rejected by the ossified and ultraconservative turban wearers. As the Europeans above put it, “for this reason, one finds that the followers of ‘Abduh are diminishing and are unable to publicize their ideas because they are few in number and face strong resistance from the conservatives.”[285]

Yet, Rida does not despair and, in a twist, he perceives “good omen for reform.” First, he takes heart that his old enemies at al-Azhar have received a higher budget, that the book The Epistle of Unicity (Risālat al-tawḥīd) by Shaykh Muhammad ‘Abduh started to be taught at that institution, and, better still, that the books of the medieval Islamic scholar Ibn Taymiyya have become standard authoritative texts for basing fatwas. Some of the latter’s works, according to Rida, have been used to reform personal statutes in canonical courts. Moreover, the Mufti of Jerusalem is considered one of his disciples, as is the head of the Islamic Council recently established in Beirut.[286] Ibn Taymiyya (661–728/1263–1328) was, of course, not known for works that would give later credence to what the Manarists/Salafis would strive for, that is, separating Islamic state and society, but rather the opposite. He had written the Siyāsa šarʿiyya, a model for a profoundly Islamic state in accordance with the shariʿa.[287] He was a great Muslim scholar engaged in defending Islamic cultural and religious identity at a time when the threat of Mongol invasion was casting a long shadow upon the Arab Muslim world.[288]

Second, and in another expression of optimism, Rida cited the formation of the Organization of Muslim Youths (Gamʿiyyat al-šubban al-muslimūn) and its opening of numerous chapters in Arab countries. He proceeded to say that al-Manār ’s message included, among other things, arguments to counter bad innovations and myths, arguments to refute the suspicious theses of atheists and unbelievers, and arguments to expose the calumnies of imitators of the Europeans. It further included warnings against the deception of missionaries, the errors of materialists, and the dangers of colonialism.[289] The predominant emphasis on these objectives, together with the revival of the tradition of Ibn Taymiyya, put in question whether the Manarists/Salafis were still “the reform party which occupies the middle ground between the party of uncritical imitation and ossification and the party of modernism identified with renewal.”[290] But there is a possible rationalization: the state increasingly interfered in the affairs of Islamic society through extreme Westernization, thus making it very difficult for the Manarist/Salafi trend to chart a middle course and preserve the independence of society and religion from the state. In actuality the Manarist/Salafi trend lost its raison d’être and, having paved the way for other groups advocating extreme Islamization, found nowhere to go.

 Appendix

From Muhibb al-Din al-Khatib’s The Campaign for Renewal and Reform: Does it have Wise Leaders, and Have They Drawn for it Wise Plans? [291]

Renewal and reform are not mere desires; they are necessities of the first order to preserve the last breath of national life and to protect the last vestige of national greatness. Otherwise, we would be as good as finished.

We have exchanged the art of transcription for the art of printing. And whereas we used to cross the sea in sailboats for purposes of trade or pilgrimage, we now do so on steamers. Furthermore, our Islamic governments stripped their soldiers of bows and catapults and equipped them instead with automatic rifles, hand grenades, and amazingly heavy artillery.

My ancestors used to read and write using oil lamps for light, whereas I dispensed with the lamp willingly and happily to enjoy electric lights, which make the night brighter than day. I write this section and in front of me is a letter from a friend in Baghdad; my answer will be sent by airplane to be delivered in a couple of days instead of a month as in past days.

All this is renewal; all this is well and necessary. But it entails extraneous elements that shame me when I remember them. It is part and parcel of renewal and reform not to deceive my people or myself by concealing them.

For renewal in printing to be genuine [for example], and for me to feel pride in it, the printing press, its materials and parts, and the paper used should all be manufactured in my homeland using native labor. This way, its cost as well as the wages of its labor remain inside the homeland, enabling it to expand its sources of power and might.

For renewal in sea transport to be genuine, the steamer should be one that flies the flag of my nation and whose parts are made in my homeland.

For renewal in armament to be genuine, Islamic governments must not be dependent on others to obtain the gun or the hand grenade or the cannon. Rather, they ought to put themselves on a path such that after 1 year or 10 or 30 years they would manufacture weapons in their own factories using their own laborers and engineers.

Therefore, renewal is necessary and inevitable if we are to carry out what we have been enjoined to do when facing enemies, namely “to organize all of the power we are able to muster.” And reform is inescapable if we intend to shed the cloak of obsequiousness.

There is in the East today—I mean the Arab East, which encompasses West Asia and North Africa—a thing called a renewal movement. To me it is axiomatic that renewal of both the Arab East and the Islamic East is the way to survival. I am expressing this sincerely and candidly, because if I arrive at the truth of something and believe in it, nothing will prevent me from broadcasting it for all to hear. I have made it plain in what I have said that the campaign for renewal cannot be considered a jihad, or a holy struggle in the way of God and the homeland unless it is based on clear principles and strives for specific goals, and follows correct plans. Moreover, its leaders should work for it sincerely, voluntarily, and with enthusiasm. In other words, they should be free of spies and planted intriguers.

The true colors of the leaders of the renewal movement will remain unknown until the movement's principles, goals, and plans are specified. Thereafter, those who work sincerely and with conviction for the realization of the stated goals and commit themselves not to lead the nation astray will be true leaders of renewal in the way of God and the homeland. Those who have other ways and other goals are moles in our ranks working for the benefit of our enemy. This is true whether they serve the enemy wittingly or whether they are mere tools who do the job unconsciously.

There is then genuine renewal, and there is a tainted one, the distinguishing criteria being the specific principles, goals, and plans and the extent of adherence to them. Moreover, one cannot distinguish a traitorous reformer until his message is tested and found to aim at leading the nation away from the correct path.

What then are the principles, goals, and plans of the true renewal movement that the Arab East needs?

- We want to be intrinsically powerful and respected by powerful nations. This is an important goal.

- We must preserve our national, patriotic, and religious existence. We ought to sever the hand that would cut our connection with this principle.

- The plan that would reconcile this principle with that goal requires us to borrow from any source the means of power that we need. Of course, we ought to preserve all elements of our national, patriotic, and religious existence that cannot be regarded as factors of meekness and impotence. The more numerous and significant the elements we find appropriate to keep, the greater the proof of our worth, of good fortune, and of God's blessings. By the same token, the fewer elements and the lesser in importance we findnecessary to borrow from others, the more reason we have not to change our character and to melt into another. The upshot of this is: we ought to keep all parts of our national character except what is harmful; and we ought not to borrow anything from others unless it is necessary.

Our national and religious existence is akin to the body of a man. Would a man accept to cut his ears, even if they are not graceful, or to scrape off his skin, even if it is afflicted with smallpox? Or would he sever his fingers, even if they were thick? He who would accept this would not be in his right mind. None of us would accept to sever his sick hand, especially if a medicinal cure is available. We ought to defend our character with all of our might, even unto death. We should sacrifice of it only the excess hair and nails, and remove from it only the dirt that a bath would remove. And he who calls on me to cut muscle or bone or nerve from my body is an enemy or a messenger of the enemy. What I can legitimately borrow from others should be confined to things that would help me to organize times of work and leisure, procure the means of work and production, and secure the requirements of health, well being, and all other factors that contribute health and strength to the body.

We want a renewal that will teach us to organize our lives and to manage our places and offices of business. We favor a renewal that will help us replace the manufactured goods of others with goods that we manufacture ourselves in our homeland.

We want a renewal that would make us aware that we were once the mightiest and most knowledgeable of nations and that would stir us to strive to become in the near future one of the mightiest and most knowledgeable of nations.

We want a renewal that would make us aware that our forefathers were able, after eliminating the Byzantine and Persian empires, to foster the most advanced industries in the world, and that would spur us to become one of the most advanced manufacturing nations.

But a renewal that exploits our present relative insignificance to convince us that we never amounted to anything and that we lack the germ to achieve high rank; or a renewal that exploits our present relative ignorance to convince us that we never had knowledge and that we lack the germ to become knowledgeable; or a renewal that exploits our state of dissolution and anarchy to convince us that our history is inferior and that our only life is through merging with Europeans body and soul; suffice it to say that a renewal of this sort would undoubtedly be a plot conceived by enemies and carried out in the East by enemies in friends' clothing.

I do not hesitate to state firmly and clearly that ignorance is better than a renewal with which foreigners intend to "colonize" our hearts so as to spare them the toil of colonizing our lands. That is because when we become theirs, the slave and his belongings belong to his master. Would the youth of the glorious Arab East accept this sort of renewal?

Jesus, peace be upon him, says: "Ye shall know them by their fruits"["Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" (Mathew 7:16)]. The test of those who call for renewal and reform is to look at their message: do they encourage to earn power through virtue and knowledge; do they manifest the signs of good counsel to their nation, the respect for its ideals, and the revivification of its feats? If so, then they are true messengers of reform. But if they fill the newspapers with ravings that have no relation to development, or have no purpose except to deceive innocent youth about their history with allegations that they descend from a nation without a virtuous past or an accomplished civilization, then they are without doubt conspirators in our midst. Perhaps an enemy who declares his enmity is less harmful than the bearer of such a rotten fruit to a nation seeking goodness and good standing.

[239] Allan Nevins and Henry Steele Commager, A Pocket History of the United States (New York: Pocket Books, 1976), 147.

[240] Carl E. Schorske, Thinking with History: Explorations in the Passage to Modernism (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998), quoted by Gordon A. Craig, “The Good, the Bad, and the Bourgeois,” New York Review of Books (August 13, 1998), 8.

[241] W. Ende, “Salafiyya,” EI2, s.v.

[242] Muhammad ‘Abduh, al-Islam wa al-nasraniyya maʿa al-ʿilm wa al-madaniyya, 2nd ed. (Cairo: Dar al-Manār, 1323 [1905]), 116. This work is a compilation, first published in 1905, of articles published in al-Manār in 1902.

[243] Ibid., 116–117.

[244] Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Dual Nature of Islamic Fundamentalism (New York: Cornell University Press, 1997), 12–13.

[245] H. A. R. Gibb and Harold Bowen, Islamic Society and the West: A Study of the Impact of Western Civilization on Modern Culture in the Near East (London: Oxford University Press, 1957), 1: 1; 2: 79. See also Ira Lapidus, “The Separation of State and Religion in the Development of Early Islamic Society,” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies (October 1975): 363–385.

[246] Muhammad ‘Abduh, Tafsir al-Qur1an al-hakim (Cairo: s.l., n.d.): 4: 283–284.

[247] Ibid., 384.

[248] ‘Abduh, al-Islam wa al-nasraniyya, 119–120.

[249] Ibid., 122.

[250] Ibid., 120–121.

[251] Ibid., 121.

[252] Rafiq al-ʿAzm, “Hadha awan al-2ibar,” al-Manār 7/8 (June 30, 1904): 307.

[253] As related by Ahmad, Muslim, and Ibn Baja, cited in al-ʿAzm, “Hadha awan al-2ibar,” 308–309.

[254] Al-ʿAzm, “Hadha awan al-2ibar,” 311–312.

[255] “Mahabba al-2Arab asl min usul al-islam,” al-Fath (Du1l-Qa2da 1367 [1947]): 257–258.

[256] ‘Abduh, al-Islam wa al-nasraniyya, 120–121.

[257] Ramid Rida, “Manafi2 al-urubbiyin wa madaruhum fi al-marq,” parts 1–3, al-Manār 10/3 (May 12, 1907): 192–199; 10/4 (June 11, 1907): 279–284; 10/5 (July 11, 1907): 340–344.

[258] Rida, “Manafi2 al-urubbiyin wa madaruhum fi al-marq,” part 1, al-Manār 10/3 (May 12, 1907): 197.

[259] Ibid., 199.

[260] Rida, “Manafi2 al-urubbiyin wa madaruhum fi al-marq,” part 2, al-Manār 10/4 (June 11, 1907): 279.

[261] Ibid., 282.

[262] Ibid., 283.

[263] Rida, “Manafi2 al-urubbiyin wa madaruhum fi al-marq,” part 3, al-Manār 10/5 (July 11, 1907): 340.

[264] Ibid., 341.

[265] Ibid., 343–344.

[266] In “Russian and French Moslem Subjects,” The Near East and the Anglo-Egyptian Mail (July 19, 1911), 250.

[267] “Al-2imama wa al-tarbum,” al-Fath (Rabiʿ al-Öani 14, 1353 [1934]), 8–9.

[268] Ibid.

[269] Ibid.

[270] Shakib Arslan, “Le modernisme turc et la civilisation arabe: Une mise au point,” La Nation Arabe (March 1930): 39.

[271] Makib Arslan, in al-Fath (Du1l-Qaʿda 29, 1352 [January 1934]), 1–5, 16–17.

[272] Ramid Rida, “Fatiha al-mugallad al-¯tala¯tin,” al-Manār 30/1 (June 7, 1929): 1–16.

[273] Ibid., 10.

[274] Ibid.

[275] Ibid., 10–11.

[276] Ibid., 11.

[277] Ibid., 11–12.

[278] Ibid., 12.

[279] Ibid.

[280] Ibid., 12–13.

[281] Ibid.

[282] Ramid Rida, “Musab Misr bi-Qasim Amin,” al-Manār 11/3 (May 1, 1908): 226–229.

[283] Ramid Rida, “Ra1y al-nas fi al-kitab wa ra1yuna fihi,” al-Manār 4/1 (February 20, 1901): 30–34.

[284] Author of Le Monde musulman dans les possessions françaises (Paris: Librairie Coloniale et Orientaliste Émile Larose, 1928).

[285] Rida, “Fatiha al-mugallad al-¯tala¯tin,” 13–14.

[286] Ibid., 14–15.

[287] Ibn Taymiyya, al-Siyasa al-mar2iyya fi islah al-ra2i wa al-ra2iyya (Beirut: Dar al-kutub al-2arabiyya, 1966).

[288] H. Laoust, “Ibn Taymiyya,” EI 2, s.v.

[289] Rida, “Fatiha al-mugallad al-¯tala¯tin,” 13–14.

[290] Ibid., 16.

[291] Muhibb al-Din al-Latib, “Hamla al-tagdid wa al-islah wa hal laha qada hukama wa hal rasama laha al-litat al-hakima?,” al-Hadiqa, 5 (Cairo: al-Matba2a al-salafiyya, 1349 [1930–1931]): 190–206. Khatib wrote this piece at a time when, according to him, Cairo’s intellectual and cultural atmosphere was too influenced by Western culture with all its positive and negative attributes. Most of the intellectuals used to look at any Islamic inclination as representative of reaction and rigidity. See Muhibb al-Din al-Latib, Muhibb al-Din al-Latib: Hayatuhu bi-qalamihi (Damascus: Gamʿiyya al-tamaddun al-islami, 1979): 78.

* 4. The Influence of Al-Manār on Islamism in Turkey: The case of Mehmed Âkif

Kasuya Gen

In the years from 1908 to 1918, starting with the 1908 revolution that opened the floodgates for publication up till the Ottoman defeat in the First World War, intellectual circles in the Ottoman Empire eagerly took up the discussion of the place and role of Islam in Ottoman society. The so-called “Islamic modernism” or “Islamic reformism,” often used interchangeably with movements calling for islah (reform), ihya (revival), and tecdid (renewal), was one of the most influential current within the Empire.

It is sometimes mentioned that the ideas of the three major modern Salafi thinkers in the Arab world, Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897), Muhammad ‘Abduh (1849–1905), and Rashid Rida (1865–1935), were the ideological roots of Islamism (Islamcilik in Turkish) in the Ottoman Empire during this period. Their ideas of Islamic reform permeated the articles in al-ʿUrwa al-Wutqā (“The Indissoluble Bond”) published by Afghani and ‘Abduh in Paris in 1884, and Rida’s periodical al-Manār (“The Lighthouse,” 1898–1935), whose impact was felt on Islamic currents throughout the Muslim world.

This article is meant to be a reexamination of the impact of al-Manār and the “Manarists” on the development of Islamism in Turkey from 1908 to 1918.

 Islamism (Islamcilik) in Ottoman thought after 1908

Before engaging in a discussion of the impact of al-Manār and of the Manarists on Islamism (Islamcilik) in Turkey, we will begin by categorizing Islamism as it appears within Ottoman intellectual currents after 1908. According to Niyazi Berkes, Ottoman intellectual circles at that time can be divided into three schools of thought: Westernists, Islamists, and Turkists.[292]

The Westernists came out of the 1908 revolution as the most vigorous group, despite their lacking the sectlike cohesion of the Islamists and Turkists, except for the followers of the late Ottoman political theorist “Prens ” Sabahaddin (1877–1948). The Westernist school had two prominent figures, the poet Tevfik Fikret (1870–1915) and Dr Abdullah Cevdet (1869–1932), one of the founders of the İttihad ve Terakki Cemiyeti (Committee of Union and Progress), which was the primary ruling power in the Ottoman Empire in the period 1908–1918. Without attacking religion itself, the former attacked the doctrines of the Islamic state in his famous poem Tarih-i kadim (“Ancient History”), written in 1905 but which remained unpublished during Abdülhamit II’s reign. The latter, known for his atheism, published the review İctihad (1904–1932), first in Geneva then in Cairo, which became the chief organ of Westernist ideas. İctihad was published until Cevdet’s death in 1932 and provided much of the inspiration for Mustafa Kemal (later Atatürk)’s reforms during the early years of the Republic. In all cases, the Westernists appeared as the opponents of the Islamists, and the clash of the two helped to develop the Turkist position as an alternative.[293]

With regard to the Islamists, it should be noted that they did not constitute a single block, and that at least three broad subdivisions can be observed among them. The first is that of the traditionalists: many prominent Turkish-speaking Ottoman ulama opposed the modernist current in the Muslim world during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The opponents to a modernist Islam voiced their ideas in the periodical Beyânülhak (“Presentation of the Truth,” 1908–1912), the organ of the Cemiyyet-i İlmiyye-i İslâmiyye (Association of Islamic Scholars), and were led by Mustafa Sabri Efendi (1869–1954), who was to become Veyhülislâm in the years 1919–1922, and to go into exile after the Republic was proclaimed in 1923. The motto of Beyânülhak, “amr bi’l-maʿrufwa nahīʿan il-munkar (Command that which is approved and prohibit that which is rejected), “ [294] symbolically expressed how particularly disturbed its contributors were by the proposal to reopen “the gate of iğtihād (independent judgment)” in Islam, bypassing the precedents established by the classical commentators of Islam. They criticized such proposals as the notion of mezhepsizlik (the refusal of submitting oneself to a theological school), since it meant undermining the traditional legal apparatus (the Islamic schools of law).[295] This accusation can still be heard in contemporary Turkey.

The second subdivision is a group gathered around the İttihâd-i Muhammedî Cemiyeti (the Mohammedan Union), and the newspaper Volkan (“The Vulcano,” 1908–1909) led by the Naqshbandi veyh Derviv Vahdetî (1870–1909). The latter instigated the counterrevolution of April 1909, better known in Turkish history as the “31 Mart Vakʿasi (March 31 Incident),” and was hanged together with other figures of the group. One of the survivors of this incident was Bediüzzaman Said Nursî (1876/77–1960), who later became the founder of the Nurcu movement, probably the largest Islamic cemaat in twentieth-century Turkey. The Volkan pledged itself to fight against the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) régime. According to this newspaper, the new régime after the revolution of 1908 was not Islamic, but made up of dehrîs (secularists), and its promoters did not apply the shariʿa under the pretexts of the presence of non-Muslim nations within the Empire, and of pressures from European great powers.

The third and most influential circle of Islamists gathered around the journal Sirât-i müstakîm (“The Straight Path”), founded by Mardinîzâde Ebul’ulâ and Evref Edib [Fergan] (1882–1971) in 1908; from 1912 onwards, it was entitled Sebîlürrevâd, which has a meaning similar to that of Sirât-i müstakîm. The editor of the journal was Mehmed Âkif [Ersoy] (1873–1936). Among the yazi kadrolari (core writers) appearing in the list of the Sirât-i müstakîm were intellectuals such as Manastirh Ismail Hakki (1846–1912), Bereketzâde İsmail Hakki (1851–1918), Babanzâde Ahmed Naim, a member of Meclis-i Maarif, Abdürrevid İbrahim (1857–1944), Bursali Mehmed Tâhir (1861–1925), Salih E v-Verif-et Tunusî, Ferid Bey, Ahmed Agayef (1869–1939, later to become Ahmed A ëaoëlu), Yusuf Akçura (1878–1935), Halim Sabit [Vibay] (1883–1946), Ali Veyh-i el-Garib Efendi, Tahir-el Mevlevî, Midhat Cemal [Kuntay] (1885–1956), Ibrahim Alaeddin [Gövsa] (1889–1949), Halil Halid, Edhem Nejat, Alim-Can el-Derisî, Hasan Basri, Giyaseddin Hüsnü, and Ragib Bey.[296] Other leading contributors to the Sirât-i müstakîm and the Sebîlürrevâd were such as Aksekili Ahmed Hamdi, Mehmed Fahreddin, Veyhülislâm Mûsâ Kâzim (1858–1921), E vref Edib, Hasan Hikmet, ÖmerRiza, S. M.Tevfik, and Mehmed Vemseddin [Günaltay] (1883–1961).

The Sirât-i müstakîm published many translations of articles by well-known modernist authors like Muhammad ‘Abduh, Muhammad Farid Wadjdi (1875–1954) and Azmizâde Refik (Rafik Bek al- ʿAzm?). This gave the journal modernist tendencies. The Sirât-i müstakîm and its successor Sebîlürrevâd became the organ of Islamic modernism and pan-Islamism in the Ottoman Empire, and had a wide circulation among not only Ottomans, but also Turkic peoples outside of the Ottoman lands, especially in the Russian Empire.[297]

For the other categorizations, one may cite Hilmi Ziya Ülken, who classified Turkish Islamists into four groups: (1) traditionalists like Babanzâde Ahmed Naim, (2) modernists like İzmirli İsmail Hakki (1868–1946) and Mehmed Vemseddin [Günaltay], (3) those espousing a moderate stance between traditionalists and modernists like the Veyhülislâm Mûsâ Kâzim Efendi, and (4) anti-modernists like Mustafa Sabri Efendi.[298]

Both traditionalist and modernist Ottomans seem to have shared the conviction that Anatolian Islam as it appeared in the Sufi lodges or tekkes, and in the madrasas, was suffused with superstition, to which they proposed various solutions. Young Turk Islamic reforms essentially consisted of reorganizing the judicial and educational systems along the lines of the “modernizing” tendencies of the Young Turks. But “modernizing” did not necessarily mean “secularizing.” In 1916, the Veyhülislâm was removed from the cabinet, and during the next year his jurisdiction was limited in various ways. In 1917, the shariʿa courts were brought under the control of the Ministry of Justice, the madrasas were brought under the Ministry of Education, and a new Ministry of Religious Foundations was created to administer the waqfs. At the same time the curriculum of the higher madrasas was reorganized, and the study of European languages was made compulsory. In essence, the Young Turks seemed to regard these reforms as having revitalized Islam and strengthened the Islamic society.[299]

The Turkists [300] appeared later than the other two groups. They can be divided into two groups according to their place of origin. One group consisted of Osmanlilar (Ottomans) such as Ziya Gökalp (1876–1924), the theoretician par excellence of Turkish nationalism.

The other consisted of Turkic exiles, mostly from Russia, such as Yusuf Akçura (1878–1935), author of the pan-Turkist manifesto Üç Tarz-i Siyaset (“Three Types of Policy”) in 1904, as well as Ahmed Agayef (1869–1939) and Halim Sabit [Vibay] (1883–1946). The Turkists published reviews in their organs such as the Genç kalemler (“Young Pens,” 1911–1912), Türk yurdu (“Homeland of the Turk,” 1911–1914), and İslâm mecmuasi (“Islamic Review,” 1913–1918).

But the ideological relationship between the three schools of thought under the headings of “Westernists,” “Islamists,” and “Turkists” was complex, and the categories themselves mutually overlapped. Their organs were supported by different intellectual circles owing to changing conditions, and they sometimes made ideological alliances for political purposes. The authors who sided with the Westernists on one issue sometimes appeared to be Islamists on another. For example, as Niyazi Berkes notes, the İctihad, known as a Westernist organ, showed frequent interest in Islamic reforms and allotted pages to Muhammad ‘Abduh long before the Islamists said anything about him.[301] Similarly, while the İslâm mecmuasi is known to have been published by Turkists, it displayed a wide range of contributors. These included ulama such as Veyhülislâm Mûsâ Kâzim Efendi, İzmirli İsmail Hakki, and Verafeddin [Yaltikaya] (1879–1947), who introduced the pioneer Salafi thinker Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) in the İslâm mecmuasi. It also included Islamic modernists such as Mûsâ Cârullah Bigi (1875–1949), Mehmed Vemseddin [Günaltay], Halim Sabit [Vibay], Turkists such as Ziya Gökalp, Ahmed Agayef, Kâzim Nami [Duru] (1876–1967), and Köprülüzâde Mehmed Fuad (1890–1966), a founder of Turkology in Turkey. What the İslâm mecmuasi eagerly contended was the need for an Islamic reform of Ottoman society. The motto “Dinli bir hayat, hayatli bir din (A Religious Life, an Existential Religion),” was printed on the front cover of every issue. It therefore seems improper to classify the journal only within the current of Turkism.[302] Yusuf Akçura, known as a Turkist, and Bereketzâde İsmail Hakki, known as an Islamist, were involved with both the İslâm Mecmuasi and the Sirât-i müstakîm. Though the majority of the contributors to the Sirât-i müstakîm were Islamists, ranging from traditionalists to modernists, there were many authors who were not, or who later took different political courses. Examples include Ahmed Agayef, Ahmed Midhat Efendi (1844–1912), Yusuf Akçura, Bursali Mehmed Tâhir, Cami [Baykurt] (1869–1949), Edhem Nejad, Emrullah

Efendi (1858–1914), Feyzullah Sacid (Ülkü), Halil Halid, İbrahim Alaeddin [Gövsa], İsmail Gasprinski (1851–1914), Ispartali Hakki, Kazanli Ayaz [İshakî] (1878–1954), and Midhat Cemal [Kuntay]. It can be seen that these three categories are neither universal nor diachronic.

Furthermore, within the category of “Islamists,” the framework of “traditionalist” versus “modernist” is itself debatable. Interestingly enough, in spite of the Salafi tendency of the Sirât-i müstakîm, the Sebîlürrevâd, and the İslâm mecmuasi, some contributors had links with Sufi orders. Unlike in the Arab world, where the doctrine of anti-Sufism were spreading, little radical opposition to the role of the Sufi orders can be observed in Ottoman Islamist circles. Sufi groups published periodicals such as the Cerîde-i sûfiyye (“Sufi Journal,” 1909–1919), Tasavvuf (1911), Muhibbân (“Men of Love,” 1909–1919), Hikmet (“Wisdom,” 1910–1911), and Mihrab (1923–1925) and founded their associations Cemiyyet-i Sûfiyye-i İttihadiye and Cemiyyet-i Sûfiyye. They represented a wide political spectrum, including both members of the İttihad ve Terakki Cemiyeti and members of the opposition party, the Hürriyet ve İtilâf Firkasi (Freedom and Association Party). The president of the Cemiyyet-i Sûfiyye was Veyhülislâm Mûsâ Kâzim Efendi, who belonged to the Naqshbandi order as well as to the İttihad ve Terakki Cemiyeti.[303] Articles on Ibn Taymiyya were published in the pages of the Mihrab.[304] Babanzâde Ahmed Naim was a member of the Khalwati order.[305] Bediüzzaman SaidNursî’s collective writing, entitled the Risale-i Nur (“Epistle of Light, “) clearly shows the influence of Naqshbandi-Khalidi teachings. Simply labelling Sufi orders as “traditionalist” brings the risk of obstructing the understanding of Ottoman Islamic currents.

Furthermore it should also be added that, with the exception of the émigrés, who could think of the nation as a notion crossing over the Ottoman borders, all three schools of thought were inseparable from Ottomanism until the end of the Ottoman state. Regardless of whether they were Islamists or not, the question of how to save the Ottoman state was most fundamental.

 The influence of al-Manār on Mehmed Âkif’s Islamism

In order to avoid categorical generalizations, we will focus on a Turkish nationalist-Islamist poet, an outstanding figure among Islamists in the Young Turk era, Mehmed Âkif [Ersoy] (1873–1936). Since Âkif continued to wield a profound influence on the later development of Islamism in Turkey, this will constitute a case study of the influence of al-Manār and “Manarism” on Islamic intellectual currents in Turkey.

Âkif was born in Istanbul. His father Mehmed Tahir was a migrant from Ipek in Albania (the modern Pel in Serbia and Montenegro), his mother of Bukharan origin. After receiving his early education in a traditional school and learning Arabic from his father,[306] Âkif attended the Fatih Rüvdiye or secondary school.[307] Graduating from the Rüvdiye school, he continued his higher education at the Mekteb-i Mülkiye (School of Political Science) in Istanbul and then at the Mülkiye Bay tar Mektebi (Civilian Veterinary School). He served as a veterinary surgeon from 1893 onwards for twenty years. After the 1908 revolution, he actively began to publish poems and articles, while at the same time lecturing on literature at the Dârülfünun (later Istanbul University), and still at the same time gained fame as a preacher committed to Islamic reform and national integration of the Ottoman State or pan-Islamic unity. After leaving his job in 1913, he taught at various schools and preached at mosques in Istanbul.

Âkif continued to show a strong interest in pan-Islamism through the period of the İkinci Mevrutiyet (Second Constitution). During the Balkan wars of 1912–1913 and the First World War he worked for the Tevkilât-i Mahsusa (“Special Organization,” the Intelligence Service) of the CUP and tried to disseminate pan-Islamic propaganda in Egypt, Hijaz, Najd, Lebanon, and Germany. Furthermore he was appointed as the first bavkâtip (secretary-general) of the Dârü1l-Hikmeti’i-/slâmiyye (Academy of Higher Islamic Studies) attached to the Veyhülislâm’s office in 1917, but after the First World War lost his post when he joined the newly formed Anatolian resistance movement against the Greek forces which had entered Anatolia in 1919. Âkif became a deputy of the first Grand National Assembly in 1920 and the author of the new national anthem, the İstiklâl marvi (“Independence March”) showing a religious enthusiasm in 1921. He traveled from town to town and propagated the idea that the “Independence War” would be the last struggle for the existence of Islam. However he became increasingly anxious about the course of events beginning with the abolition of the Caliphate in March 1924, a consequence of the Independence War. Unlike other ideologists of his time, such as Ziya Gokalp, Akif was unable to adjust his ideas to the secular nationalist ideals of the Republic and left Turkey voluntarily for Egypt in 1926 to stay with an old friend, Abbas Halim Pava (1866–1934), a member of the Khedival family of Egypt. Until 1936 he lectured on Turkish literature at Cairo University. Akif also engaged in translating the Qur ’an into Turkish at the request of the Diyânet İvleri Riyâseti (Directorate of Religious Affairs) of Turkey, although he did so unwillingly, for he had a firm belief in the impossibility of translating the Qur’an. He eventually retracted what he had written, fearing that his work might be used as Atatürk’s secular Turkicisation plans. The eventual fate of his translation remains to this day a controversial and mysterious episode of his life. He died shortly after his return to Turkey in 1936.

Already as a student, Âkif devoured the Islamic classics, especially the poetry of Ibn al-Farid (1181–1235) and Saʿdi Shirazi, as well as French romantic and naturalist authors such as Victor Hugo and Émile Zola.[308] He published Turkish translations of the Persian classics Saʿdi and Hafiz in the Servet-i fünûn in 1898,[309] and his own poetry in the Resimli gazete (“Illustrated Gazette”) from 1897 to 1898, and then he wrote poetry on social themes, although he was unable to publish these under the Hamidian censorship. After the 1908 revolution opened the floodgates for publication, Âkif and his friend E vref Edib started publishing the Sirât-i müstakîm. After 1908 Âkif published all of his poetry, articles and translations in the Sirât-i müstakîm and the Sebîlürrevâd. From 1911 onwards he began publishing collections of all of his poetry under the title “Safahat (Phases),” with a total of 109 poems in seven volumes: Safahat (1911), Süleymaniye kürsüsünde (“At the Süleymaniye’s Pulpit,” 1912), Hakkin sesleri (“Voices of the Truth,” 1913), Fatih kürsüsünde (“At the Fatih’s Pulpit,” 1914), Hatiralar (Memoirs, 1917), Asim (“Hanging,” 1924), and Gölgeler (“Shadows”), which was published in Egypt in 1933 and contains his works written during the years 1918–1933.[310]

As to the ideological roots of Mehmed Âkif’s Islamism, it is often stressed that the modern Salafiyya, represented by Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, Muhammad ‘Abduh, whose works were banned during the Hamidian era, and Rashid Rida, made a deep impact on him. Âkif obviously did take sides with ‘Abduh’s school. Âkif’s many translations of ‘Abduh and of his Egyptian disciple Muhammad Farid Wadjdi (1875–1954), famous for his encyclopaedia and commentary of the Qur’an, show the influence of‘Abduh’s teachings.[311]

On the other hand, Âkif described various Muslim personalities in the Sirât-i müstakîm and the Sebîlürrevâd. As to his editorials and columns which are not contained in the Safahat, my research yielded thirteen referring to Namik Kemal (1840–1888), the writer, poet, and one of the prominent leaders of the Yeni Osmanlilar (Young Ottomans), four referring with respect to ‘Abduh, two praising and defending Afghani, attacked by the Veyhülislâm at his first stay in Istanbul and slandered as a “Vehhabî (Wahhabi), “[312] and only one reference to Rida.[313] As to the Young Ottomans other than Namik Kemal, three mention Ziya Pava (1825–1880), a writer and poet who served as third secretary to the Sultan Abdülmecit II, three refer to Yusuf Halis Efendi (1805–1882),[314] one refers to Ahmed Midhat Pava (1822–1884), known as the architect of the Ottoman constitution and parliament, one refers to Ahmed Midhat Efendi (1844–1912), the father of Turkish popular journalism, one mentions İbrahim Vinasi (1824–1871), and one Vemseddin Sami (1850–1904). In the Safahat, which contains all his published verses, one refers to Afghani and ‘Abduh in long verse Asim.[315] As for Rida, no verse makes mention of his name.[316]

These figures seem to prove that Mehmed Âkif was under the strong influence of the Young Ottomans as well as that of Afghani, ‘Abduh and Wadjdi, while he had few intellectual links with Rashid Rida, the publisher and editor of al-Manār.[317] Mehmed Âkif supported the idea of Namik Kemal and Ziya Pa va as he has stated himself.[318]

It would be possible to argue that the Young Ottomans projected the earliest systematic expression of Islamic modernism comparable to Rifaʿa Rafiʿal-Tahtawi (1801–1873)’s in Egypt and Khayr al-Din (1810–1889)’s in Tunisia. The Young Ottomans reinterpreted and popularized the concepts of vura (Ar. mura, counsel), bi2at (Ar. bayʿa, oath of allegiance) and icma (Ar. igmd consensus of the learned) to mean an elected parliament and constitutionalism. Mardin suggests that nineteenth-century Islamic modernist currents were able to find a meeting point with Young Ottoman thinkers.[319] The Young Ottomans considered the superficial adoption of parts of European culture as immoral. They opposed the trend of legal secularization that had started with the Tanzimat. Namik Kemal rejected a Europeanization “which consists of letting women walk around with ‘naked arms.’ “[320] It was also the Young Ottomans who invented the concept of pan-Islamism (İttihad-i islam, or Islamic unity), even if as a kind of national integration ideology of a multiethnic empire (İttihad-i anasir, or National [Ottoman] unity). As early as the late 1860s, the newspaper Hürriyet (“Freedom”), published by the Young Ottomans in London between 1868–1870, had argued about pan-Islamism.[321] In the 1870s, the newspaper Basiret (“Insightfulness,” or “Watchfulness”), published by the Young Ottomans in Istanbul for a decade between 1869 and 1879 and the most widely read popular newspaper of its time, had made further progress toward pan-Islamism.[322] Âkif is known to have read the works of Namik Kemal and Ziya Pa va in his youth, along with the Islamic classics and French romantic and naturalist literature. Âkif, like the Young Ottomans, maintained an anti-despotic and constitutionalist stance in his works. Bereketzade İsmail Hakki, whose articles appeared in Kemal’s newspaper İbret (“Warning,” 1870–1873), maintained close connections with him.[323] This proves the existence of a link between the Young Ottomans, who were the first intellectual group to espouse Islamist ideas in Ottoman history, and the Young Turk Islamists. The Ottoman Islamists (Islamic modernists) of the Young Turk era such as Mehmed Âkif were able to build upon the intellectual legacy of the Young Ottomans.

Interestingly enough, Âkif seemed to see ‘Abduh as one of the “regional [in this case Egyptian] alims” in the world of Islam.[324] His editorial includes the following passages:

Manastirh Jam idi? Müteahhirîn-i ulemânin en büyüklerinden idi. Su son zamanlarda Seyh Muhammed Abduh diyâr-i Misir'in; Mevlâna Hüseyin Cisr Suriye'nin; Seyh Emin Kürdistan'in en büyük hakîmi, en mevhûr ulemâsi olduëu gibi Manastirli da bu diyarin en mütebahhir bir âlim-i nihrîri idi (Who was Manastirli? He was one of the greatest ulama of the recent years. As Shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh of the Egyptian land, Shaykh Amin of Kurdistan and Mawlana Husayn Jisr of Syria are the wisest and most famous alims [in their regions], so was Manastirh [Ismail Hakki] the most perfumed and the wisest alim in this region [i.e., in Manastir]).[325]

We can here see the world from Âkif's eyes, from Istanbul as the seat of the Caliphate, which for the Ottomans is nothing less than the center of the world of Islam.

 Conclusion

As Sükrü Hanioğlu has pointed out, in contrast to Egypt, Ottoman statesmen believed that their destiny lay in Europe. Moreover, the Turkish ulama, due to their proximity to the establishment, were uneasy about producing ideologies that challenged the westernization movement, leaving fervent popular feeling against westernization without a strong guiding ideology. On the other hand, the Islamic movements led by reformers such as al-Afghani, 'Abduh, and Rida, namely the Salafi or Manarist movement which emerged in Egypt and Syria, had little influence on the Turkish intelligentsia of the Empire until 1908.

Even the Islamic reformism movement after 1908, represented by the Sirât-i müstakîm and subsequently by the Sebîlürresâd, was relatively weak in comparison to parallel movements in the Arab provinces. Contrary to these Arab lands resisting against colonial encroachment, in the Ottoman state the Islamic state was somehow in existence. It cannot be taken for granted that Manarist thought was adopted in the same context in Istanbul.[326] Furthermore, in the 1920s-1930s, at the time of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, a Kemalist form of secularism (laiklik) gradually replaced Islami. The Sebîlürrevâd, which published articles against the secularist policies of the newly established Republic, was characterized as “reactionary” and banned in 1925 by the Takrir-i Sükûn Kanunu (Law on the Maintenance Order). The voice of al-Manār could no longer easily reach Turkey.

[292] Niyazi Berkes, The Development of Secularism in Turkey (Montreal: McGill University Press, 1964), 337.

[293] Ibid., 337–338. Mehmed Âkif’s antipathy and criticism toward Fikret’s Tarih-i kadim provides an example of this lasting antagonism.

[294] Quoted by Berkes, The Development of Secularism in Turkey, 340.

[295] Verif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi (Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1989), 143–144. As for Mustafa Sabri Efendi’s thought, see Mustafa Sabri, Dinî Müceddidler (Istanbul: Sebil Yayinevi, 1969).

[296] Sirât-i müstakîm 6/131 (Vubat 1326[1911]).

[297] On the Sirât-i müstakîm and Sebîlürrevâd, see Akshin Somel, “Sirat-i Müstakim: Islamic Modernism in the Ottoman Empire, 1908–1912,” The Journal of the Middle East Studies Society at Columbia University 1/1 (1987): 55–80; Esther Debus, Sebilürrevâd: Eine vergleichende Untersuchung zur islamischen Opposition der vor- und nachkemalistischen Ära (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1991); “Sirat-i Müstakim,” Türk Dili ve Edebiyati Ansiklopedisi (Istanbul: Dergah Yayinlari), 8 (1998): 6–9; Abdullah Ceyhan, Sirat-I Müstakîm ve Sebîlürrevad Mecmualari Fihristi (Ankara: Diyanet İvleri Bavkanliëi, 1991), a table of contents of the Sirât-i müstakîm and the Sebîlürrevâd.

[298] Hilmi Ziya Ülken, Türkiyede Çagdav Düsünce Tarihi, 2 (Konya: Selçuk Yayinlari, 1966), 443.

[299] Arai Masami, Turkish Nationalism in the Young Turk Era (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992), 93–95. Vükrü Hanioglu insists that the heavy Islamic rhetoric and references used by the Young Turks in their writings should be deciphered, and that even the titles of Young Turk organs such as Ezan, Hak (“Right”), İctihad, or Mevveret (“Consultation”) had been selected for their appeal to a Muslim readership: M. Vükrü Hanioëlu, The Young Turks in Opposition (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), 200.

[300] Since the term “Turkism” is often confused with pan-Turkism, and even (pan-) Turanism, we must bear in mind their differences while remembering that these terms overlap at certain points.

[301] Hanioëlu, The Young Turks in Opposition, 340. For example, see Abdullah Djevdet, “Des morts qui ne meurent pas: Cheikh Mohamed Abdou,” Idjtihad 9 (October 1905); Abdullah Cevdet, “Veyh Muhammed Abduh,” İctihad 11 (April 1906). The İctihad also had interviews with ‘Abduh, such as Abdullah Cevdet, “Vâhzâde Veyh-ül Reis Hazretleriyle mülâkat,” İctihad 126 (January 1914).

[302] On the İslâm Mecmuasi, see Arai, 83–95, 141–154; Tuba Çavdar, “İslam Mecmuasi,” Türkiye Diyanet Vakfi İslam Ansiklopedisi (Istanbul: Türkiye Diyanet Vakfi), 23 (2001): 53–54.

[303] Mustafa Kara, Din, Hayat, Sanat Açisindan Tekkeler ve Zaviyeler (Istanbul: Dergâh Yayinlari, 1980, second ed.), 275–297; “Cem’iyyet-i Sûfiyye,” Türkiye Diyanet Vakfi İslam Ansiklopedisi, 7 (1993): 335.

[304] Kara, Din, Hayat, Sanat Açisindan Tekkeler ve Zaviyeler, 283.

[305] Somel, “Sirat-i Müstakim: Islamic Modernism in the Ottoman Empire,” 78.

[306] Mehmed Tahir was a müderris (madrasa teacher) and mürid of the Naqshbandi order. Evref Edib, Mehmed Akif: Hayati, Eserleri ve 70 Muharririn Yazilari (s.l.: Asâri İlmiye Kütüphansesi Nevriyati, 1938), 517–518.

[307] Âkif learned at this school Turkish, Arabic, Persian, and French. His favorite teacher was Hoca Kadri Efendi, who exiled himself in Egypt during Abdülhamid’s reign, and published there the newspaper Kanun-i esasi (“Constitution”); he then went to Paris and stayed there until the First World War. Âkif himself states that Hoca Kadri Efendi had a great influence on him. Cf. Edib, Mehmed Akif: Hayati, Eserleri ve 70 Muharririn Yazilari, 517–518.

[308] Mithat Cemal, Mehmet Akif (Istanbul: Semih Lûtfi Kitabevi, 1939), passim.

[309] “Bedayiü1l-Acem,” Servet-i fünûn, 16/399 (1314 [1898]): 401, 403.

[310] On Âkif’s life and ideas, see Edib, Mehmed Akif: Hayati, Eserleri ve 70 Muharririn Yazilari ; Cemal, Mehmet Akif ; Fevziye Abdullah Tansel, Mehmed Akif: Hayati ve Eserleri (Istanbul: Kanaat Kitabevi, 1945); İsmail Kara, Türkiye1de İslâmcilik Düvüncesi, 1 (Istanbul: Risâle Yayinlari, 1986), 309–406; Fahir İz, “Mehmed ʿAkif “, EI2 ; Zeki Sarikan, Mehmet Akif (Istanbul: Kaynak Yayinlari, 1996); İsmail Kara, “İslâm modernizmi ve Akif’e dair birkaç not,” Vefatinin 60. Yilinda Mehmed Âkif Sempozyumu Bildirleri: 30 Aralik 1996 (Istanbul: İslâm Tarih, Sanat ve Kültürünü Aravtirma Vakfi, 1997): 43–54.

[311] Âkif’s translations from ‘Abduh in the Sirât-i müstakîm are: “Müslümanlikta esaslar,” 1/10, 24 (Tevrinievvel-Kanûnusani 1324[1908–1909]); “Bugünkü müslümanlar, yahud müslümanliëa müslümanlarla ihticâc,” 1/25 (Kanûnusani 1324 [1909]); “Ataletin intac ettiëi fenaliklar,” 1/26–27 (Vubat 1324 [1909]); “Atalet ve mekatib-i resmiye talebesi,” 2/28 (Vubat 1324 [1909]); “Atalet geçici bir hastaliktir,” 2/29 (Vubat 1324 [1909]); “Araplarin fünûnu ve kevfiyati,” 2/32 (Mart 1325 [1909]); “Kaza ve kader,” 2/35–36 (Nisan 1325 [1909]); “Din ne kadar müsaid imiv?,” 2/37 (Mayis 1325 [1909]); “Garb medeniyeti nasil bulmuv?,” 2/38 (Mayis 1325 [1909]); “Müslümanlarin esbab-i inhitâd ve meskeneti,” 2/39 (Mayis 1325 [1909]); “Milletler üzerinde câri olan Kavânin-i İlâhiye,” 2/40 (Mayis 1325 [1909]); “Fezâil ve rezâil,” 2/44 (Haziran 1325 [1909]); “Emel ve talebe-i mecd,” 2/46 (Temmuz 1325 [1909]); “Veref,” 2/47 (Temmuz 1325 [1909]); “Zikr-I cemil,” 2/48 (Temmuz 1325 [1909]); “Mülkü muhafaza esbabi,” 2/9 (Temmuz 1325 [1909]); “Milletin mâzisi, hâli ve hastaliklarinin çaresi,” 2/50 (Aëustos 1325 [1909]); “Hiristiyanlik ve müslümanlik,” 2/51 (Aëustos 1325 [1909]); “Vahdet-i islâmiye,” 2/52 (Aëustos 1325 [1909]), “Vahdet ve hakimiyet,” 3/53 (Aëustos 1325 [1909]); “Cinsiyyet ve diyaneti-i islâmiye,” 3/54 (Eylül 1325 [1909]); “Taassub,” 3/55 (Eylül 1325 [1909]); “Merhum Veyh Muhammed Abduh1un Mösyö Hanotaux1a cevabi,” 3/61–63 (Tevrinievvel -Tevrinisani 1325[1909]); “Hanûtû ve islâm,” 3/64, 68, 71 (Tevrinisani-Kanûnuevvel 1325 [1909–1910]); “İslâm ve Hanotaux,” 3/69–70 (Kanûnuevvel 1325[1909–1910]); “Laf ne kadar çok da, iv ne kadar az,” 3/72 (Kanûnusani 1325 [1910]); “Asr Sure-i Celilesinin tefsiri,” 3/73–77 (Kanûnusani-Vubat 1325[1910]). One article of ‘Abduh was translated by Âkif in the Sebîlürrevâd : “Fezâil ve rezâil,” 24/612 (Eylül 1340 [1924]). The earlier ‘Abduh’s articles (no. 61–71) replying to Gabriel Hanotaux (1853–1944), a French historian and statesman, were published in book form: Mehmed Âkif, Hanûtû (Hanotaux)1nun Hücumuna karvi Veyh Muhammed Abduh1un/slâmi Müdafaasi (/stanbul: Tevsi-i Tibaat Matbaasi, 1331[1914]). Âkif introduced this famous controversy between ‘Abduh and Hanotaux before translating these articles: “Hanûtû (Hanotaux) ile Veyh Muhammed Abduh1un münakavasi—Hanûtû1nun makalesi,” Sirât-i müstakîm 3/57–60 (Eylül—Tevrinievvel 1325[1909]). Muhammad Farid Wadjdi (Muhammed Ferid Vecdi)’s refutation of Qasim Amin’s Tahrir-al mar1a was translated by Âkif under the title “Müslüman kadini,” Sirât-i müstakîm 1/3–19 (Aëustos-Kanûnuevvel 1324 [1908–1909]) and then published in book form as Muhammed Ferid Vecdi, Mehmed Âkif (tr.), Müslüman Kadini (Istanbul: Ahmed Saki Bey Matbaasi, 1325[1909–1910]). Âkif’s short preface shows clearly his sympathy to Wajdi. The other works of Wadjdi translated by Âkif are: “Hadikay-I fikriye,” Sirât-i müstakîm 2/27–41, 43–48 (Vubat 1324-Temmuz 1325 [1908–1909]); “Bütün alem-i islâm1a açik mektup,” Sirât-i müstakîm 2/43 (Haziran 1325 [1909]); “Müslümanlikla medeniyet,” Sirât-i müstakîm 5–7/126–132, 134–138, 141–144, 146, 149–156, 158–159, 161–163 (Kanûnusani 1326-Tevrinievvel 1327 [1911]); “Felsefe: maddiyyun meslek felsefesinin edyana hucûmu,” Sebîlürrevâd 12/298 (Mayis 1330 [1914]). Wadjdi was the editor-in-chief of the official journal of the Azhar University from 1933 to 1952: J. J. G. Jansen, “Muhammad Farid Wadjdi”, EI2. Âkif also translated Azmizâde Refik’s article from al-Manār : “Müslümanlikta ferdin hakimiyeti ile cemaatin hâkimiyeti,” Sirât-i müstakîm 4/82–84 (Mart-Nisan 1326 [1910]).

[312] Mehmed Âkif, “Cemâleddin Efgâni,” Sirât-i müstakîm 4/90 (Mayis 1326 [1910]); “Hasbihal,” Sirât-i müstakîm 4/91 (Mayis 1326 [1910]).

[313] Mehmed Âkif, “Medeniyet-i islamiye tarihinin hatalari,” Sebîlürrevâd 1:8/187 (Mart 1328 [1912]). There exists, however, a series of translations of Rida’s “Akaid-I islamiye” by A. Hamdi Aksekili in the Sebîlürrevâd 10–11/237–245, 247–250, 268, 270–273 (Mart-Tevrinisani 1329 [1913]).

[314] On Halis Efendi, one of the first Turkish authors of a French-Turkish grammar: Miftah-I lisan (1849–1850), see Verif Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1962), 210–211.

[315] The following refers to Afghani and ‘Abduh in Asim : “Misr1in en muhtevem üstâdi Muhammad ‘Abdu, Konuvurken neye dâirse Cemâleddin1le; Der ki tilmîzine Afgan1li [The greatest Master in Egypt, Muhammed ‘Abduh. He always relates his talks with Jamal al-Din and says to be an Afghani’s disciple.]”. Mehmed Âkif Ersoy, Safahat, comp. M. Düzdaë (Istanbul: İz Yayincilik, 2nd ed., 1995), 429. Translation mine.

[316] It must be remembered that Rida harbored feelings against the Young Turks. During his stay in Istanbul from 1909 to 1910, he was disappointed with the Turkish nationalist policy of the CUP. After his return to Egypt, he began to publicly criticize the centralization policy of the CUP, made under the cloak of pan-Islamism, and to advocate the decentralization of the Ottoman Empire. On Rida's decentralization or federalist idea, see Kobayashi Seiichi, "Rashid Rida's View on the Decentralization of the Ottoman Empire" (in Japanese), Seinan Ajia Kenkyu [The Bulletin of the Society for Western and Southern Asiatic Studies, Kyoto University] 40 (1994): 39–54. During the First World War, Rida supported the "Arab revolt" in Hijaz.

[317] Kara, "İslâm modernizmi ve Akif'e dair birkaç not," 49.

[318] Servet-i fünûn 54/1429 (Tevrinievvel 1335[1919]).

[319] Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought, 82.

[320] On Kemal's Islamist ideas, Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought, 280–319.

[321] Jacob M. Landau, The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994), 2–3.

[322] It must be remembered that Afghani stayed in Istanbul from 1869 to 1871. On Basiret 's pan-Islamism or Islamism, see İlhan Yerlikaya, XIX. Yüzyil Osmanli Siyasi Hayatinda Basiret Gazetesi ve Pancermenizm, Panislamizm, Panslavizm, Osmanlicilik Fikirleri (Van: Yüzüncü Yil Üniversitesi Fen-Edebiyat Fakültesi Yayinlari, 1994), 113–120; Kemal H. Karpat, The Politicization of Islam: Reconstructing Identity, State, Faith, and Community in the Late Ottoman State (New York: Oxford University Press, 2001), 121–124.

[323] Somel, “Sirat-i Müstakim: Islamic Modernism in the Ottoman Empire” 67–68.

[324] Kara, “İslâm modernizmi ve Akif’e dair birkaç not,” 50.

[325] Mehmed Âkif, “Ya hasreten ba’de hasretin ale’l-mü’minîn,” Sebîlürrevâd 9/225 (Kanûnuevvel 1328 [1912–1913]). Translation mine.

[326] Hanioğlu, The Young Turks in Opposition, 10. The Turkish Islamist Sezai Karakoç also stated that Islamic modernist thought in the Ottoman Empire was weak in relation to its counterparts in Egypt and India. Sezai Karakoç, Mehmet Âkif: Hayati, Aksiyonu, Düvünceleri ve Siiri (İstanbul: Yağmur Yayinevi, 1968), 22–24.

* 5. Echoes to Al-Manār Among the Muslims of the Russian Empire: A preliminary research note on Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din and the Šura (1908–1918)

Stéphane A. Dudoignon[327]

The question treated in this chapter will be the diffusion of al-Manār, not outside of Egypt, nor even simply outside the Arab world, but according to some authors outside the dar al-islam itself, that is, among the Sunni Muslim communities of the Russian Empire, with special mention of the Turkic-speaking Muslim communities of the Middle Volga and the Western Urals. The Muslims of the Middle Volga had been submitted to Russian authority since the mid-sixteenth century. They had then faced successive Christianization campaigns, especially during the eighteenth century, in the immediate aftermath of Peter the Great’s reforms. At the turn of the twentieth century, after new statuses for the Russian peasantry were implemented between 1861 and 1907, it was the turn of the Muslim populations of the Eastern Urals and Siberia to be confronted with the massive migration of Slavic peasants coming from Russia’s heartland.

In the particular social context of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, characterized by an overall confrontation of the Christian and Muslim faiths, newspapers and journals from the central part of the Islamic world began to be distributed extensively in these regions, albeit irregularly and to varying degrees from one location to another. Among these periodicals, al-Manār enjoyed a special status. During the short period of relative political liberalization, which lasted from the revolution of 1905 to the beginning of the civil war in the winter of 1917, it was the journal from the distant Islamic world that was probably most often quoted, translated and commented in the press of the Sunni Muslim communities of the Russian Empire.[328]

Some Muslim intellectual circles of European Russia even considered al-Manār as a model to be followed, if not imitated. This perception gave rise to the creation of a Turkic copy or emulation of it: the journal Mura (Council), edited in an ottomanized Tatar language in the southern Uralian city of Orenburg by the outstanding ‘alim and popularizer Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din (1859-1936). Sura was to become one of the most significant editorial enterprises of the entire Muslim press of Russia, from its creation in January 1908 up to its suppression by the Bolsheviks exactly ten years later in January 1918.

As a matter of fact, Muhammad ‘Abduh’s death in 1905 was globally synchronic with the first revolution of Russia, in the immediate aftermath of which a highly politicized Muslim press could make its appearance throughout the Russian Empire. In spite of censorship, this press could enjoy a relatively high degree of autonomy during the years 1905–1911, and again during the revolutionary year from March 1917 to the very first months of 1918. It is during this last period that ‘Abduh’s influence could be expressed fully, albeit posthumously, in the public life of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire.

We may remember that Egypt, and in particular Cairo’s religious institutions, exerted during those years a sort of fascination on the Sunni Muslims of the Russian Empire. The prestige of Egyptian Islamic culture appears, for example, in the debates that arose in the 1900s about the style of the Great Mosque which was to be built in Saint Petersburg during the years preceding the First World War. In 1908 the architectural commission, which included prominent members of the local and imperial Muslim community, attributed the first place to a project called “Arabesque,” a concrete-made imitation of the Mamluk architecture of Baybars’ time.[329] In 1908 also, during the World Islamic Congress which was convened that year in Cairo, the Tatar polygraph from Crimea Ismail Gaspralï (Gasprinskij, 1869–1914) locally published three issues of his journal al-Nahda (“Revival”) in Arabic language, with the aim of promoting the idea of the unity of the Muslim world.[330]

However, newspapers and journals created in Russia after 1905 remained under the strict control of the imperial censorship. This situation obliged Muslim journalists and columnists to restrain from making explicit references to the outside Islamic world, for fear of being accused of “Pan-Islamism” or “Pan-Turkism” (two grievances commonly formulated against nonconformist Muslim authors of the Russian Empire in the years preceding the First World War). For this reason, among others, intellectual borrowings made by the new Muslim press of Russia from al-Manār, and from other periodicals of the external Islamic world, took place during a relatively short period, and were restricted to questions which would not arouse the concern of censors. This sometimes makes difficult the identification of influences from the outside, most particularly that of al-Manār and the Manarists.

Nevertheless, the way for cultural borrowings from Cairo had been paved during the previous decades by numerous travels of pilgrims and talabat al-2ilm from Russia, the Caucasus and Central Asia, to Egypt, and sometimes from Egypt on to Mecca. Muhammad ‘Abduh and al-Manār’s influences were thus far from being limited to the press. They were also present in a new network of reformed and modernized madrasas, which had been created in the Middle Volga and the Urals since the late 1880s.

Up to the closure of these madrasas by the Bolsheviks in 1918–1919, young Tatar or Bashkir theologians and Arabists, who had received their intellectual education at al-Azhar, popularized in Russia ideas partly inspired by Muhammad ‘Abduh’s teaching. (Recent documental discoveries even suggest that despite the eventual emigration of many of these young ulama, after 1920, from Russia to Turkey, the Arabic peninsula, Xinjiang, Manchuria, or Japan, their reformist teachings continued to be perpetuated in some of the learned circles of European Russia, of the Caucasus and of Central Asia, at least until the great purges of 1937—largely due to the vitality of traditional discussion circles in the Muslim communities of the young USSR.) [331]

In the early twentieth century the Sunni Muslim communities of the Russian Empire were particularly well prepared to receive and to take profit from ‘Abduh’s teachings and Rida’s writings, thanks to their social and cultural evolution since the end of the eighteenth century. In the 1900s and 1910s, an authoritative quotation of ‘Abduh, or the translation of a paper from the prestigious al-Manār were sometimes intended not to introduce a new idea, but to reinforce or to confirm a position already adopted by particular Muslim clerics of Russia. In such cases, a quotation is not to be interpreted by modern historians as the sign of an unequivocal transfer or borrowing from Egypt to Russia, from the Arab to the non-Arab world, or from a giver to a receiver—in short, from a center to a periphery of the world of Islam. “Ideas such as those of ‘Abduh were ‘in the air’ in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, “ [332] and the most self-evident appearances of servile imitation may sometimes be misleading.

 A well-prepared substratum

The questions that arise here are: what was relevant in ‘Abduh’s teachings and in al-Manār ’s editorials for the Muslims of Russia? Through which canals and to which extent could the influence of al-Manār be propagated among the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire? Who were the interpreters, popularizers, or contradictors of ‘Abduh and Rida’s ideas in Russia? As we shall try to suggest in this paper, the political context of the Russian Empire in the aftermath of the 1905 revolution, and the discussions about the confessional character of the Russian state presented a very favorable substratum for the diffusion of al-Manār, notably through permanent disputes about the place of Islam in the process of modernization.

In fact, the entrance of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire into the twentieth century was not characterized by a general movement toward secularization, as was the case for Ottoman Turkey during the same period (although the dominant Eurocentric and state-centered view of Turkey's modern history may perhaps have led to an overevaluation of the secularization of Turkish society during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries).

As for the Muslims of Russia, we should rather speak of a growing political instrumentalization of religion in the framework of a still confessional Christian Orthodox state. Most of the quotations and readings of 'Abduh and al-Manār must be resituated in this peculiar context, which naturally led to the valuation of Islam as a source of civilization and as a guide to social reform.

By the first years of the twentieth century, the Middle Volga had been submitted to Russian power for three centuries and a half (from the time of the conquest of the khanate of Kazan by Ivan the Terrible in 1551). Only at the end of the eighteenth century did the Russian state put an end to its policy of conversion, encouraged or forced, of the Muslim populations of the Volga and the Urals to Orthodox Christianity. Russian authority had been successfully challenged in the Urals by endemic azawats from the 1730s to the 1770s (i.e. predating Muhammad bin 'Abd al-Wahhab's movement in the Arabian Peninsula).[333] The Edict of Religious Tolerance signed by Catherine II in June 1773 forbade the Orthodox clergy from intervening in the affairs of the other confessions of the Empire. The aim of this political step was to bring peace among the Muslim populations of the Volga and the Urals. It was also supposed to win over those of the Qazaqs who had been recently integrated into the Empire, as well as the subjects of the khan of Crimea, which was to be annexed to Russia in 1783.

At the same time, the Czarina's government was creating the nucleus of an official Muslim "clergy," following the model of structures instituted earlier in the century by Peter the Great for a better state control of the Orthodox Church. A muftiyyat was created in Ufa in 1782, and a Spiritual Assembly of the Muslim Law in 1788 (first in Ufa, then in Orenburg after 1796).[334] In addition to controlling the religious hierarchy, this system was intended to turn the Hanafi Sunni Muslims of European Russia, as well as those of the more recently annexed territories of the northern Qazaq steppe and Crimea, away from the authority of the Ottoman sultan-caliph.

Nevertheless, the weak financial means of the muftiyyat and of the Spiritual Assembly, and the discussed religious legitimacy of both bodies, aroused a debate among the Muslim subjects of the Czar that lasted until the end of the imperial period: could the Russian Empire be considered a dar al-islam if the shari ‘a was restricted to those acts otherwise executed by notaries, while the Orthodox clergy enjoyed official support for its conversion campaigns? Should the faithful obey fatwas elaborated under the supervision of the Russian Ministry of the Interior by a religious bureaucracy devoid of great spiritual authority? These discussions undermined all of the theological and judicial polemics of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Between the reign of Catherine II and the 1880s Islam, as promoted by the “Tatar”[335] mullahs under the formal leadership of the mufti, was seen by the Russian authorities as an instrument for pushing Russian influence toward the Black Sea, the Qazaq steppe, and southern Central Asia along the caravan roads. However, after Central Asia was conquered in the 1870s and camels were replaced by trains in the 1880s, the “Tatar” commercial intermediaries lost a great part of their initial function. The steppe populations, which had been previously subjected to a new wave of Islamic proselytism, came to be considered a new target for Orthodox Christian missions. After the Islamic renewal of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century, this late nineteenth-century revival of Orthodox Christian missionary activity in several regions of the empire with a predominantly, if not exclusive Muslim population (like the Urals or the Qazaq steppe),[336] contributed to make confessional considerations the focus of public debates in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

The colonizer was used to viewing the pastoral Turkic-speaking populations of the Urals and the Steppe territory as former pagans less attached to the Muslim faith than the sedentary agrarian and urban communities of the Middle Volga and of the southern Central Asian oases. In addition to making efforts to convert them to Orthodoxy, the Bashkirs and Qazaqs were submitted to a new policy of school instruction given in vernacular languages. Literacy was taught in the “national” Cyrillic alphabets, which had been elaborated in the early 1870s under the direction ofNikolai Il’minskii (1822–1871), the director of the Kazan seminar for Orthodox missionaries. [337]

Under influence from the Ottoman Empire and the Southern Caucasus, Muslim literati of the Middle Volga attempted to face this new challenge through the elaboration of a “new method” (usul-i ëadid) for teaching the Arabic alphabet in Turkic languages, using a phonetical principle which was to replace the old syllabic one. The usul-i ëadid was first experimented in an elementary school (maktab) which was opened in Crimea in 1881 by the Sorbonne-educated polygraph Ismail Gasprali (the future editor of the short-lived al-Nahda in 1908). It was then spread throughout the Russian Empire by means of the journal Tarëuman [“The Interpreter”] which was created by the same Gasprali two years later, and was to remain the main platform for the central ëadidiyya tendency until the beginning of the First World War.

Such an innovation introduced a radical change in the practices of reading, which had until then been based on manuscripts of sacred texts written in the classical Arabic language.[338] The establishment of a fixed teaching program, which would be common to all pupils belonging to the same level, and the distribution of pupils into different classes, entailed rupturing the strong personal relationship that had previously existed between masters and their disciples. This transformation gave a new impetus to the anti-brotherhood discourse, which from the late eighteenth century onwards had developed in Inner Eurasia in connection with new readings and interpretations of Ahmad Sirhindi’s works. It led to the harsh criticism by increasing numbers of young reformist mutakallims, such as Musa Jar-Allah Bigi (1875–1949), a former pupil of Muhammad ‘Abduh at al-Azhar, against the traditional mode of transmission of learning and spiritual authority among the Sufi turuq.[339] (We must note, however, that the adoption of the usul-i ëadid did not necessarily mean a revolution in the master-pupil relationship. Sometimes the choice of the usul-i ëadid could even go with a powerful renewal of the cult of the murmid, and a reinforcement of the spiritual link between the former and his disciples. Such was, for example, the case of the well-known Shaykh Zayn-Allah Rasuliyeff (1833–1917), the founder and mudarris of the Rasuliyya madrasa of Troitsk in the Eastern Urals, whose personal prestige and authority went far in Western Siberia and in the Qazaq steppe, up to the years following the 1917 revolution.[340] As we can observe in this case, the ëadid reform was implemented with a great variety of applications, which can hardly be summarized under the common denomination of “Jadidism,” as has been done by modern historians.)

However, the fact remains that after 1905, direct access to an autonomous press allowed a young generation of literati with an intermediate status in the ranks of the muftiyyat, like the qaris or the teachers (mu‘allims) of the ëadid schools, both of whom had not finished the full cycle of the classical madrasa, to supersede the influence of the ulama, and to turn upside down the traditional hierarchy of the minbars. The diffusion of the usul-i ëadid and the propagation throughout European Russia of the print press in Arabic characters rapidly undermined the position of religious representatives as dominant transmitters of the learned culture. At the same time, the first modernized madrasas begun to appear in the Middle Volga and the Urals. From the prestigious Muhammadiyya which was reformed in Kazan starting in 1891 by the Bukhara-educated alim Alimjan Barudi (1857-1921), who had met with Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838/9–1897) and Muhammad ‘Abduh in Cairo on his way to Mecca in 1887,[341] to the no less famous ‘Aliyya which was created in Ufa in 1906 by Ziya Kamali (1873–1942), a former pupil of ‘Abduh—like the previously mentioned Musa Bigi, a fellow student of Kamali at al-Azhar, and the latter’s hajj companion from Cairo to Mecca during their study years.[342]

The economic and social positions of the ulama were further shaken by the fact that both modernized maktabs (schools) and madrasas were financed not through the traditional awqaf and zakat which had previously been administered by the muftiyyat and the Spiritual Assembly, but by direct patronage of benevolent societies (layriyya ëam2iyyatlari).[343] The latter were to be created in increasing number after 1905, on the initiative of wealthy individuals, or of the local Muslim communities. They had two very different, although not contradictory, models: the Christian Orthodox charitable organizations that had multiplied throughout the Empire since the 1890s, and the benevolent associations that were promoted by ‘Abduh in Cairo in the last decade of the nineteenth century.

In both the reformed maktabs and madrasas, accent was put on the renewal of Islamic ethical education, notably through the translation or adaptation in Tatar of the classical ethics (allaq) literature from Arabic, Persian, and Chaghatay Turkic. (Hence, in the years preceding the First World War, one could regularly read in the Muslim press of Russia Tatar translations of al-Jahiz, side by side with apparently anachronistic controversies on the adaptation of Sa’di’s works for Turkic audiences.)

We can find several reasons for this general insistence on moral education. The first was doubtlessly the need to differentiate the Muslim communities from the dominant Christian communities. This need was sharply felt in the Urals, in Siberia and in the northern Qazaq steppe, three regions under intensive Slavic colonization and exposed to subsequent social violence. Such a need for differentiation can explain the interest shown by Muslim literati of European Russia of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, in the rigorist ideas developed much earlier by the Indian Muslim reformist thinker Shah Wali-Allah of Delhi (1703–1762), and which spread toward Inner Eurasia through the continental Sufi networks of the Naqshbandiyya-Mujaddidiyya.[344]

A second motive for this ethical renewal was a general need for public respectability. This new sentiment was directly linked with the rapid progression of capitalism among Muslim communities of the Russian Empire, and with the appearance of new Muslim wealth with a strong need for honorability.[345] We may notice in this respect that the general movement toward Islamic moral rigorism (with new arguments about alcoholism, or the wearing of the veil by women and young girls) echoed similar tendencies in the Orthodox Christian communities of the Russian Empire. As to capitalism itself, although it was sharply criticized by renowned reformist ulama for its fragmenting effects among Muslim communities of the Russian Empire, its specific attributes and devices, in particular the principles of interest loan and the modern credit banks, were generally praised in the modernist Tatar press as the only means for the Muslims of the Empire to face the encroachments of the Russian business community.[346]

 A madrasa-centered modernization movement

The result of these concordant evolutions was an overall renewal and reinforcement of Muslim communal consciousness and institutions. This began with the madrasas, which played a key role in the modernization process of European Russia until the very first years of the Soviet period. At the same time, as we have suggested in the preceding paragraphs, this general process occurred during a period of strong challenge to the traditional authority of the ulama. How can we explain this paradoxical success of a madrasa-centered model of modernization in European Russia at a time when the region was exposed to fierce controversies on the status and legitimacy of the Muslim clergy?[347]

The most tempting explanation is to be found in the double pressure exerted by the Russian state and by the Orthodox church, in particular during the periods of intensive missionary activity, that is, from the 1710s to the 1760s, and again in the last decades of the nineteenth century. How did the Muslim inhabitants of European Russia face the previously unseen demographic, economic, social, and cultural pressure of the Russian state and society? In touch with the contemporary intellectual currents that circulated inside Russian society itself, modern education and family values were soon identified as the key tools for the preservation of the Islamic community under Christian domination.

Nevertheless, up to the end of the Czarist regime Russian legislation forbade the creation of higher educational institutions in languages other than Russian. The only tolerated schools in vernacular languages were the “confessional” (konfesional’nye) ones, whose teaching program was restricted to religious matters. For implementing their own educational renewal the Muslims of Russia enjoyed a limited choice of three possibilities: (1) entering Russian schools, technical institutes, and universities, all placed under the more or less formal supervision of the Christian Orthodox clergy; (2) attending the so-called “Russo-Tatar” (russko-tatarskie) or “Russo-indigenous” schools (russko-tuzemnye mkoly) which had been created since the 1870s, but which were perceived by many Muslim subjects of the Czar as an instrument of Russification and Christianization; (3) reforming their own “confessional” maktabs and madrasas (or dini madrasas—“religious schools”—as they were called in official practice since the 1780s).

The dini madrasas offered limited possibilities for developing disciplines outside the classical ulum-i ‘arabiyya, such as modern history, geography, mathematics, or the European languages. However, the modernized madrasas of European Russia, which appeared in the late 1880s, included these disciplines in their curriculum and contributed greatly to disseminating them among the Muslim communities of the Empire. Moreover, the religious teaching given by the reformed madrasas of Crimea, the Volga region, and the Urals was deeply influenced by Salafi and reformist ideas imported from the outside Islamic world.

These trends permitted a deep renewal in the perceptions of the nature and in the social function of Islam in the context of Imperial Russia. The origins of this renewal must be sought in both the intellectual movements which developed in Inner Eurasia since the end of the eighteenth century, and in the direct influence of ‘Abduh on the Turkic students from the Russian Empire who attended al-Azhar or used to read al-Manār.

After Catherine II’s Edict of Religious Tolerance, and the creation of the muftiyyat, the talabas of the Volga, the Urals, and Siberia had been once again permitted to attend the greatest of the Hanafi madrasas in Bukhara, Samarqand, and Kabul. Students from European Russia arrived there en masse at a time when a strong reformist movement was spreading from India to Russia via Afghanistan and Central Asia, through the previously mentioned networks of the Mujaddidiyya. In the spirit of the pre-Mongol Hanafi tradition, the renewal of kalam raised new questions about the choice between taqlid and iëtihad in the theological and judicial problems that were not addressed in the Qur‘an or the Sunna.

The influx of the talabas from Russia contributed to an unprecedented renewal of theological studies in the old Bukharan madrasas. In the first decade of the nineteenth century, a young nonconformist scholar from the village of Korsa on the Middle Volga, ‘Abd al-Nasir Abu1l-Nasr al-Qursawi (1776-1812), aroused an acute controversy about the night prayer Qisa’) in sub-boreal regions.[348] These arguments, and the subsequent debates among Inner Eurasian Hanafis about the reopening of the iëtihad found their way to the Middle-Volga region, thanks to Shihab al-Din al-Marjani (1818–1889), an alim from Kazan.[349] Although Marjani spread throughout European Russia the idea of a cultural decay of the Central Asian oases, his teachings, and publications were deeply influenced by his early years in the madrasas and libraries of Bukhara and Samarqand. (Even the idea of an overall “decadence”—inqira/—of Central Asia may have been inspired to him by mid-nineteenth-century reform-minded Bukharan ulama, only to be later reinforced by his reading of contemporary Russian orientalist literature.)[350]

In his historiographical works Marjani praised the first centuries of Islam among the Volga Bulghars, and the practice of the sharia in the Hanafi madhhab before the Mongol invasion.[351] In so doing, the Kazan alim was stressing the central place occupied by Islam in the collective memory of the Volga Muslims. At the turn of the century, the role of Islam as a structuring element for the community life of Muslims of European Russia was being reinforced by colonization movements linked with the great migrations of Slavic peasants toward the Urals, Siberia, the northern Qazaq steppe, and the Caucasus.

After the Crimean War of 1854-1855 (which was largely perceived among the Muslims of Russia as an Ottoman victory over the Russian Empire), and during the period of political reforms under the Czar Alexander II (r. 1855–1881), the local Muslim communities which had been forcibly converted to Orthodoxy during the eighteenth century asked permission to return openly to the practice of Islam—something that they would only be allowed to do only after the second Edict of Religious Tolerance of 17 (30) April 1905.[352] Forced migration, departure for the Ottoman Empire, and the memory of conversion were closely associated in the collective mind of the Muslim communities of European Russia on the eve of the twentieth century.[353]

In this general context characterized less by secularization than by an overall re-Islamization process, and by a growing political instrumentalization of religion in the framework of a still confessional state, the presence of a powerful group of Bukhara-educated ulama favorable to the new ideas, and the rich private patronage of an emerging Muslim bourgeoisie, also contributed to orient the cultural renewal toward a reform of the maktabs and madrasas. Except for the specificities of the usul-i ëadid and the debates on the translation of sacred texts and moralist literature, one can only be surprised by the parallels between the reform of the madrasas of Russia and the events observed slightly earlier in Cairo, in spite of very different social and political substratums.

As in the case of al-Azhar, the program of reforms implemented in the first modernized madrasas and maktabs of European Russia from the late 1880s onwards was essentially practical. Like their colleagues in Cairo, the reformist mudarrises (madrasa teachers) of Kazan, Orenburg, and Ufa were mainly preoccupied with enriching the curriculum with new subjects, namely modern and secular ones. The reformers of the Islamic educational system advocated the creation of fixed course schedules, the distribution of pupils among different levels instead of in haphazard classes organized around individual teachers. Annual examinations were to be organized for all courses of the new teaching programs so as to guarantee academic standards comparable to those of the Russian gimnazii, technical institutes, and universities.[354]

As to the content of teaching, instead of secondhand commentaries and explanations by late medieval authors, preference was given to the use of great texts by the classical scholars of Islam, as was also done in al-Azhar. The content of the program was deeply marked by the heritage of both Jamal al-Din al-Afgani and Muhammad ‘Abduh. The overall practice of Qur1anic justification of the most recent scientific discoveries followed a form of casuistry initiated by al-Afghani during his years of teaching at al-Azhar. At the same time, one could observe a general focusing of kalam on the central pillars of the religion so as to arouse a more vital faith in the fundamental beliefs of Islam, in the spirit of ‘Abduh’s Tawhid.[355]

As for the infrastructures to be created, in Russia, like in Cairo, many authors expressed concern about the need for public libraries to take the place of private collections of books, which some of the more authoritative ulama often gathered in their own residences. In the absence of initiatives from the Russian state authorities, some of the leading figures of the ëadid circles, like ‘Alimjan Barudi in Kazan, and later Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din in Orenburg, would gather huge personal collections of books accessible to the students. (Some of these libraries were to be offered by their owners to the Soviet authorities in the aftermath of the October 1917 revolution, which allowed them to escape destruction or dispersion.) Simultaneously, an editorial system was rapidly developed for the impression of didactical literature, which multiplied throughout the Empire from the mid-1880s.[356] Similar insistence was put on the improvement of sanitary conditions in mosques, maktabs, and madrasas: the quality of architecture was one of the key criteria for the various assessments made by the early twentieth-century Muslim press of Russia of this or that modernized educational institution.

Like al-Azhar, the reformed madrasas of European Russia were accused by the most conservative ulama of being mere schools of philosophy and literature, if not instruments of cultural Europeanization. Moreover, at the turn of the twentieth century, these madrasas had to face fierce criticism from their own students: the talaba revolts of the years 1905–1914 in the Middle Volga and the Urals gave way to the islahi (reformist) movement in Tatar press and literature. Young writers who had received their education in the first ëadid schools of the late nineteenth century, like the novelist Muhammad ‘Ayyaz Ishaqi (1878–1954) and the poet ‘Abd-Allah Tuqay (1886–1913), sharply criticized the madrasa-centered strategy of modernization of the Muslim communities of Russia, in a spirit close to that of the revolted talaba of al-Azhar in the same years.[357]

In the same way as al-Azhar in the early 1910s, the most advanced madrasas of Russia would have to change several times their curricula in order to adapt it to the demand of students, and in order to face challenges from the competition. In a first phase they diversified their programs in accordance with the unattractive prospects of the clerical path, in a country where the muftiyyat and the Muslim Spiritual Assembly had very limited needs for qualified staff. In the mid-1910s, however, the reformed madrasas compensated the creation of special courses for future mu‘allims by reassessing the religious sciences in the special curriculum.

At the same time, voices began to request the opening of a teacher training college in Ufa, the seat of the muftiyyat. Some former Azharians even ventured to demand the creation of a national university. Only after the 1917 revolution could some attempts be made in this matter, although not in European Russia itself, where the Bolsheviks were too prompt to establish exclusive power, but in the Republic of Azerbaijan, and in the former Russian protectorates of Central Asia (in particular in the Soviet Popular Republic of Bukhara, which escaped from Moscow’s complete control until 1923).[358]

Such characteristics correspond more or less to the innovations that were progressively introduced in al-Azhar starting in 1872. Our question, however, is whether we can speak of unequivocal cultural borrowings from Cairo? In fact, although scarcely documented before the Russian revolution of 1905, al-Azhar’s direct influence is without doubt. It can be detected in the content of the teaching of the reformed madrasas of European Russia, as well as in the manner in which organizational matters inside these madrasas were dealt with. The intermediaries for this influence between Egypt and Russia can also be easily identified. They were the Tatar and Bashkir ulama and literati who had established occasional contacts with al-Afghani and/or ‘Abduh, whether in Egypt or during the former’s short visit to Saint Petersburg in 1888; or the leading Tatar or Bashkir students of the Riwaq al-Turk at al-Azhar at the turn of the century.

Among the former, we can see very different figures of the Muslim clergy of Russia, such as ‘Ata-Allah Bayazitoff (1847-1911), the Muslim chaplain (alund) of the Imperial Guard of Saint Petersburg and editor of the journal Nur (“The Light”), published in Tatar in the capital of the Russian Empire between 1904 and 1914.[359] His role as intermediary between the Muslim community of Russia and the Russian authorities allowed Bayazitoff to obtain permission to build the Great Mosque of Saint Petersburg (he was a member of the architectural commission that elected the “Mamluk” project), and to organize throughout the Empire a collection of funds for its construction.[360] Although a cleric with a conservative reputation who practiced a form of political quietism, Bayazitoff was the author of popular booklets in which he echoed and discussed al-Afghani’s writings on the Islamic legitimity of modern sciences.[361] An outsider with a strategy opposite to that of Bayazitoff, the pan-islamist activist ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahimoff (1857–1944) is much better known to modern historians.[362]

Another more central figure of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire is the Bukhara-educated alim Alimjan ‘Aliyeff, alias al-Barudi (1857-1921). Al-Barudi met with al-Afghani and ‘Abduh in Cairo during his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1887 before he undertook, in 1891, a fundamental reform of the Muhammadiyya madrasa, which had been founded in Kazan by his father Muhammadjan.[363] The founder and editor of the journal al-Din wa’l-Adab (“Religion and Good Manners,” 1906-1908 and 1913–1917),[364] al-Barudi used the press to popularize his own form of madrasa teaching focused on the key subjects of the 2ilm al-tafsir and the usul al-fiqh. His lectures were inspired by the renewed Hanafi tradition as practiced in the Bukharan reformist circles in the mid-nineteenth century, and based upon a rational approach of the fundamental texts of Islam, the Qur‘an, and the Sunna. Emerging as a respected shaykh of the Naqshbandiyya after his return from a short Syrian exile in 1908–1910, al-Barudi was to be elected as the new mufti of the Muslims of Inner Russia in the aftermath of the February revolution in May 1917. During the tragic years of his short term as mufti, between 1917 and his death in 1921, he tried to promote the reformist ideas and principles that he had taught as mudarris of the Muhammadiyya and shaykh of the local Naqshbandiyya. (One of his most notable innovations was the admission of the first female qadi in the muftiyyat.)

Al-Barudi’s successor as mufti of Inner Rusia in 1922, Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din, who had studied in a provincial Russian madrasa and knew about al-Afghani through the reading of al-’Urwa al-wuöqa, met with Jamal al-Din in Saint Petersburg in 1888, only one year after al-Barudi. As we can see through these illustrative examples, the direct contact with al-Afghani and ‘Abduh, whether problematic as in the case of Bayazitoff, or more productive as the cases of Ibrahimoff, al-Barudi, and Fakhr al-Din, crossed the whole spectrum of the reformist conglomeration inside the Muslim clergy of Russia, at the very beginning of the reform of the madrasas between the 1880s and 1890s.

Ten years later, at the turn of the twentieth century, travel to Cairo and Istanbul had become a common feature in the biography of Russian Muslim intellectual figures. From the 1890s onwards, a combination of administrative measures and travel facilities contributed to ease the pilgrimage to Mecca for the Muslims of Russia. These new conditions allowed a growing number of learned people and students from the Russian Empire with various social backgrounds to undertake long stays in Istanbul, and on occasion in Cairo, under pretext of the hajj or otherwise. We must insist on the extreme significance that the pilgrimage to Mecca at the turn of the twentieth century had upon the appearance of modern Muslim intelligentsias in the Russian Empire, whether in Kazan or in Bukhara. Modern historians, who are generally more interested in secularization processes or in modern nation building, have largely underestimated this phenomenon. An elementary statistical survey, which remains to be done, would reveal that a surprisingly high percentage of the leading figures of the various ëadid tendencies, whether from European Russia or from Turkestan, took part in the hajj at an early adult age, although in the present official circles of Russia and of Central Asia these same figures are nowadays considered to have been at the vanguard of secularization and Europeanization.

One of the consequences of the relative liberalization of personal circulation in the 1890s was the great number of Muslim students from the Russian Empire who attended al-Azhar. Their presence there is revealed to us by the functioning of the Riwaq al-Turk at the turn of the century, and by the creation of a “Fraternity of the Tatar students in Cairo” (Qahirada tatar talabasi ëam’iyyati) in 1906,[365] which was to play a significant role in the diffusion of innovations from al-Azhar.[366] The return to Russia of the young Azharian theologians and Arabists after the revolution of 1905 created a strong generational cleavage inside of the Muslim “clergy,” between official mullahs and ulama, most of whom had been educated in the traditional madrasas of Russia,[367] and a handful of young theologians with the legitimacy of al-Azhar and a strong taste for radical discourse.

There is not sufficient space here to offer the reader a complete presentation of these young theologians. Let us simply say a few words on three of them who left a deep imprint on the history of the reformed madrasas and the Muslim press of Russia in the 1910s.[368] We have already mentioned the two outstanding theologians Ziya Kamali (1873–1942) and Musa Jar-Allah Bigi (1875–1949).[369] Both studied in the same years at al-Azhar and accomplished the hajj together from Cairo to Mecca. They were followed in Egypt by the Arabist Dhakir al-Qadiri (1878–1954), who would later popularize the writings of leading Egyptian intellectuals on the status of women in the Muslim society of Russia.[370] After their return, all became prominent sources of intellectual inspiration for the political party Ittifaq al-muslimin (Union of the Muslims), which was created in 1905 to promote the interests of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire; they taught in the most famous reformed madrasas of Russia, and wrote regularly in the Mura. All left Russia between the revolution and the time of collectivization, and eventually died in exile (Bigi in Cairo, Kamali and Qadiri in Turkey). Their work would be popularized in Turkey and in the Near-East by a younger fellow student of al-Azhar, ‘Abd-Allah Battal (1882–1969), the author of comments on ‘Abduh’s Tawhid and of papers on female education.[371]

The Azharians, however, also had to face the secularist trend of the first Muslim students educated in Russian and European universities and technical institutes. Last but not least, inside the ëadid tendencies, they would have to mingle with reformist ulama and udaba of an older generation, with a Bukharan or “Russian” background, who dominated the cultural life in European Russia up to the Bolshevik take over. Differences would soon appear between these various tendencies of the ëadid loose conglomeration. These variations can be compared with those existing between ‘Abduh and his Syrian disciple Rashid Rida. Curiously enough, the audacious and sometimes radical Tatar and Bashkir Azharian theologians of the 1905 generation were generally keen to claim that they were followers of ‘Abduh, while the more well-established figures of the ëadid press and publishing system, like Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din, the editor of the Mura in Orenburg, were getting closer to Rida and the Manar.

Despite all of these elements of proximity, differences are clearly evident between the reforms at al-Azhar and the changes that were implemented in the madrasas of European Russia from the late 1880s onwards. In the Russian Empire, the lack of direct state control and the weakness of the muftiyyat prevented any centralization of the reform movement. The renewal of the madrasas responded to a multiplicity of private initiatives, to which the most conservative ulama and mullahs could hardly oppose a united front. For this reason, among others, the transformation of the modernized madrasas of Kazan, Ufa, and Orenburg seems to have advanced more quickly than at al-Azhar, despite the fact that their first significant initiatives came later than in Cairo.[372] Budgetary questions, and the thorny problem of teachers’ salary were perceived in very similar terms in both Egypt and Russia. However, if compared with the rest of the Islamic world, the Russian Muslim community was in a special situation, under the longest-lasting Christian domination ever seen by the umma, and with only limited financial means in the hands of the muftiyyat. This peculiar state of things forced each madrasa to look to private patronage for financial support, and to modify its own curriculum according to the demands of the public. This determining role of private financing and public demand explains the very big qualitative and quantitative inequalities which existed in the first years of the twentieth century between a few well-equipped urban institutions of the Middle Volga and the Urals (like the previously mentioned Muhammadiyya of Kazan, ‘Aliyya of Ufa, and Husayniyya of Orenburg),[373] and those which depended on the mobilization of more modest local communities in rural and remote areas.

At the same time, an important if not a key role was played by modernized madrasas in rural or semi-rural zones, such as the Bubi madrasa in Izh-Bobino (in the district of Sarapul in the western Urals, now in Bashkortostan). It is there that from 1895 onwards ‘Ubayd-Allah Ni’matullin, known as Bubi (1866-1936), a former pupil of the Bubi madrasa in Istanbul, and his younger brother ‘Abd-Allah (1871–1922), a prolific theologian and translator of Muhammad ‘Abduh, undertook the modernization of their local madrasa. Confronted with the fierce opposition of the most conservative Muslim clergy, their adversaries denounced them to the Russian police as notorious “Pan-Islamists” and they were prosecuted. When the brothers were imprisoned in 1911 the madrasa was closed. In spite of its short history, the case of the Bubi madrasa is interesting as it contributed to the propagation of reformist ideas—notably through literal translations from ‘Abduh’s works—in rural zones situated far from the main cultural crossroads of European Russia. [374] In this sense, the Bubi madrasa appears as a perfect instrument for the diffusion of Azharian intellectual fashions to a remote northern periphery of the umma. At the same time, the geographical location of the Bubi madrasa, its dimensions, and its history, make it a very different institution from its far-away Egyptian model, if not the latter’s exact opposite.

 Riza al-Din bin Fakhr al-Din and the Šura

Like Rashid Rida, the Bubi brothers and many Muslim reformist thinkers of Russia were born in rural areas. Such was the case of the Tatar-Bashkir theologian and polygraph Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din b. Sayf al-Din (in Russian Rizaetdin Fakhretdinov, 1859-1936), who was born in the village of Kuchuchat in the gov-ernorate of Samara on the Middle Volga.[375] The son of a local mullah, he received his primary education in his father’s maktab before attending the huëra of the mudarris ‘Abd al-Fattah bin ‘Abd al-Qayyum in Nizhnye Chelchely, a village only 15 km from Kuchuchat. During his last years of study in the countryside of the Middle Volga, Riza al-Din was initiated to the works of such reformist thinkers of his time as the Tatars Qursawi and Marjani, as well as Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and Muhammad ‘Abduh (he went to Saint Petersburg in 1888 to meet personally with the former, who left a deep impression on him).[376] Riza al-Din simultaneously begun a prominent and abundant literary career with four manuals on the Arabic language, fiqh, and ethics, which were published in Kazan in 1887-1888 and brought immediate public attention to their author.

After serving as the imam of the village of Il’bak from 1889 to 1891, Riza al-Din was nominated to the Spiritual Assembly of the Muslim Law and moved to Ufa, where he was able to complete his intellectual education as an autodidact. Recognized by Shihab al-Din al-Marjani as one of the most promising authors of the young generation,[377] Riza al-Din was able to continue his biographical work by publishing between 1900 and 1909, the first thirteen fascicules of his unfinished Aöar (“Monumentae”), a biographical dictionary of the great intellectual figures of the Russian Muslimhood, with critical theological considerations on their works. In the same spirit, he published in Orenburg in 1906 a series of critical biographies on great classical authors of Islam, Mamhur erlar (Great Men): Ibn Rushd, Abu’l-‘Ala al-Ma‘arri, al-Ghazali, and Ibn Taymiyya. This penultimate work bears the deep imprint of the Central Asian renewal of kalam studies as it had been transmittted to the Volga-Urals region by Marjani (al-Ghazali was one of the most often revisited authors in mid-nineteenth century Bukharan madrasas); it also reveals the influence of al-Afghani’s casuistry on the Qur1anic justification of modern sciences. As to Riza al-Din’s monograph on Ibn Taymiyya, it suggests the influence of ‘Abduh and Rida’s rehabilitation of the great thirteenth-century Hanbali theologian.[378] Like Rashid Rida, although personally hostile to the heterodox practices of Sufi brotherhoods (like the Naqshbandi shaykh al-Barudi), he remained close to modernized forms of Sufism, as can be seen in the biography of Zayn-Allah Rasuliyeff of Troitsk that Riza al-Din published during the revolutionary year.[379]

He had earlier devoted a book to famous women of the Islamic world, from both the remote and more recent past, which was dominated by ethical preoccupations.[380] Similarly, the didactical novels that he published in the first years of the twentieth century were centered on female characters confronted with the moral decay of the Muslim community. Allegedly inspired by nineteenth-century Russian literature (especially Dostoevskii and Tolstoi), his works reinterpreted its themes in a militant ëadid spirit. Although these works are devoid of great literary originality if compared with the average Tatar ëadid literature of that time, they nevertheless brought their contribution to the ethical response of the Muslim community of Russia, and tell much about the epoch in which they were written.[381]

Riza al-Din’s theoretical works of the same period are concerned with refuting the theory of miracles by saints, and the insistence on karama as an exclusive attribute of the Prophet Muhammad. Through this abundant literary production, in which he constantly advocated the purification of Islam and the focusing of religious teaching on the Qur‘an and the Sunna, Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din acquired as early as the first decade of the 1900s, the status of one of the most outstanding spokesmen for the reformist trend in the Muslim communities of European Russia. Ethical problems, notably through the “women question,” continued to occupy a central place in his work up to his final years and well after the 1917 revolution.[382] In this matter Riza al-Din advocated not perfect equality between women and men (an anachronism often formulated by apologetic modern critics), but the better integration of women in the public life of the Muslim community. In a country where the Muslim population did not enjoy the same electoral rights as the Orthodox community, Riza al-Din’s preoccupations, like those of ‘Ata-Allah Bayazitoff in Saint Petersburg before him, continued to be less political than ethical until the 1917 revolution. His appeals focused on the reform of the family-based and school-based Islamic educational system.

In the aftermath of the first revolution of Russia, in 1906 Riza al-Din gave up his charge as qadi of the Spiritual Assembly and moved to Orenburg in the Southern Urals to act as vice chief redactor of the newspaper Waqt (“Time”). The latter had been created that same year by the Ramiyeff brothers, Muhammad Shakir (1857-1912) and Muhammad Dhakir (1859-1921), two wealthy Muslim entrepreneurs active in gold extraction. The Waqt’s chief redactor and copublisher was the pamphleteer and traveler Muhammad Fatih Karimi (1870-1 937), an early representative of the Tatar didactical ëadid literature.[383] On the initiative of the Ramiyeffs, Riza al-Din participated in the foundation of a new biweekly journal, Mura (“The Council”), a supplement to the Waqt. As its chief redactor, Riza al-Din would steer the new journal from its inception in January 1908 to its banning by the Bolsheviks in January 1918.

The Mura was generously patronized by the Ramiyeffs, and in the 1910s Karimi and Riza al-Din’s salaries each amounted to about 70-80 roubles a month, twice that of the mudarris of a well-established madrasa in the same period.[384] Riza al-Din was thus able to fully dedicate himself to his new task, devoting much time and means to the accumulation of a large library and documental collection. His exceptionally prolific editorial and literary work during the decade 1908–1918 offers one of the very first, and still a very rare, example of professional intellectual activity outside of the madrasa system of the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire. At the same, however, Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din accepted to serve as mudarris and to teach the Hadith, one of his favorite subjects, at the Husayniyya madrasa of Orenburg. The three Husaynoff brothers, prominent figures of the new industrial Muslim bourgeoisie of the southern Urals, had created this madrasa in 1889. It seems that Riza al-Din developed closer relations with one of them, Ahmad Bay Husaynoff (1837-1906), who is presented in a biography by Riza al-Din as a model benefactor of the Muslim community, and the incarnation of the potential for an Islamic ethics of capitalism.[385]

Interestingly enough, in order to better compete with the most prestigious madrasas of Kazan and Ufa, in the early 1910s Riza al-Din and the Husaynoffs promoted a rearrangement of the curriculum (which, since 1889, had been dominated by secular sciences) in favor of the religious disciplines. They also prolonged the curriculum of the ulum-i mar2iyya from a total of 12 years to 14 years, which was more in accordance with the classical tradition of the madrasas than with the overall practice of the ëadid educational institutions after the late 1880s. Among its more temporary teaching staff, the Husayniyya brought, from time to time, such brilliant Azharians as the theologian Musa Jar-Allah Bigi and the Arabist Zakir al-Qadiri, who both exerted some influence upon the editorial content and overall orientation of the programs of the Mura.

Accused several times of Pan-Islamism by the Russian authorities, Riza al-Din had his most problematical works censored during the years preceding the First World War, especially those dealing with the demands of the Muslim community, or protesting against governmental measures concerning Muslim communal institutions.[386] The same thing happened to his biography of the Ottoman Turkish reformer and popularizer Ahmed Midhat, a book that Riza al-Din submitted to the censorship during the Second Balkans War.[387] Things did not go better after the Bolshevik takeover in November 1917. Deprived of his resources after the closure of the Mura by the new Russian government, Riza al-Din was invited by the new mufti ‘Alimjan Barudi, one of the leading figures of the former ëadid circles, to recover his position as a qadi of the Muslim Spiritual Assembly. Riza al-Din thus returned from Orenburg to Ufa.

After Barudi’s sudden death in 1921, Riza al-Din fulfilled the latter’s functions before being officially elected in 1923 chairman (mufti) of a newly created “Central Spiritual Board of the Muslims of Inner Russia and Siberia,” which was to replace the old Spiritual Assembly. As the mufti of Russia, Riza al-Din led the 1926 Soviet delegation to the first World Islamic Congress in Mecca. Although his official functions and the new political climate prevented him from openly expressing his views, this period of his life seems to have been marked by a growing pessimism about Western civilization and sympathy for the neo-Hanbali movements which were gaining impetus throughout the Muslim world. Riza al-Din’s ideological turn was marked by a tendency toward a general over-evaluation of the role of Islam in the history of mankind, an idealization of the Islamic Orient in opposition to the Christian West, and a growing reluctance for inter-confessional dialogue.

However the history of the Mura came to an end even before this change. Thus, at least from this perspective, the evolution of the Mura is not comparable to that of al-Manār. The two journals shared nevertheless many common characteristics, up to and including Rashid Rida’s pro-Wahhabi tendencies. Moreover, al-Manār clearly appears not only as the implicit model of the Mura, but also as the most oft quoted periodical publication from the outside Islamic world, especially in the years 1908–1909 and again in 1917.

The Mura was a “literary, scientific and political” (“adabi, fanni wa siyasi”) supplement to the newspaper Waqt, also sponsored by the Ramiyeffs. Like al-Manār it was created in close association with the printing house of the Waqt (Waqt matba‘asi), which published most of Riza al-Din’s works until its closure in 1917. Like al-Manār, the Mura was, from beginning to end, the work of one man. As such, it had an intimate relation with Riza al-Din’s teaching at the Husayniyya madrasa. At the same time, the journal enjoyed the contribution of many authors from the Muslim reformist movement. Riza al-Din’s fellow companion, Muhammad Fatih Karimi, signed a considerable number of papers and columns on educational questions. The teachers of the Husayniyya, like Musa Jar-Allah Bigi and Zakir al-Qadiri offered a more or less regular collaboration and had their works extensively commented before the latter’s departure to Ufa in 1909. The journal received the regular collaboration of many independent and famous columnists such as the Kazan Tatar nationalist thinker Yusuf Aqchura, the female writer Mahbub-Jamal Aqchurina, the lawyer and politician from Ufa Salim Giray Janturin, the polygraph and memorialist Jamal al-Din Walidoff, the previously mentioned former Azharian student and specialist of questions on education ‘Abd-Allah Battal, et al. The Bashkir traveler Nushirwan Ya’usheff (d. 1917) [388] used to send numerous and regular correspondences from the various areas that he was visiting throughout Inner Eurasia. In a spirit which had been that of the Tatar ëadid and islahi literature since the end of the nineteenth century, Ya’usheff’s columns were centered on problems such as the decadence of Islam, the progress of colonization, or the history and current situation of the Turks of Western and Eastern Turkestan. Such a thematical orientation permitted him to exert the deepest impact upon the Turkestanian readership of the Mura, especially during the revolutionary year 1917. [389]

The sending of open letters by readers from the whole Sunni Muslim Inner Eurasia made the Mura a kind of platform for proponents of Islamic reform throughout the Russian Empire.[390] In terms of the geographical expanse and quality of its audience, the Mura can be compared only with the more conservative journal Din wa ma’imat (“Religion and Life”), which was published in Orenburg in the years 1906-1917 as a tribune for Muslim clerics of the Russian Empire. The letters to the editor published in the Mura reveal that it also functioned, like the Din wa ma’imat, as a forum for questions touching upon the dogmas and rituals of Islam.[391] Its audience explains for a large part the exceptional duration of the Mura, a rare phenomenon in the history of the Muslim press of Russia, even if the constant financial support by Muhammad Zakir Ramiyeff proved salutary in various circumstances.

In spite of a long list of collaborators, a big part of the literary production in the Mura was written by Riza al-Din himself (under his name, his initials, or various pseudonyms, if not anonymously).[392] His encyclopedic expertise, his extensive personal coverage of the mainly Russian academic literature of his time, especially in history, oriented the Mura toward a highly cultured minority readership very similar to the readership of the Manar. Through his activity as popularizer of European and Russian science for a Muslim audience, Riza al-Din can also be compared with the Ottoman Ahmed Midhat, to whom he devoted a very laudative biography in which Midhat himself is compared to both Suyuti and Tolstoi.[393]

The publication by Riza al-Din of a set of comments on the Hadith gave him a high reputation in the Muslim religious establishment of the Russian Empire.[394] It permitted the Mura to enjoy a much larger audience than most of the other journals of the Russian Muslim communities. These were generally aimed at more targeted audiences, and revealed the segmentation of the Muslim communities of Inner Eurasia into multiple factions and ideological trends. Riza al-Din tried to maintain the link between these different factions, at least until the year 1917, when the Mura took on a more political complexion, although it was eclipsed by more radical publications and movements. On the major contemporary questions relevant to the umma, the Mura's leading articles, like those in the Manar, conveyed progressive but still orthodox views based on detailed arguments and formulated with great moderation.

At the same time, the Mura provided extensive news from throughout the whole worlds of Islam, with special attention to the Ottoman Empire, by means of innumerable quotations and translations from Arabic, Ottoman, and North Indian newspapers and journals. The relatively free treatment of the events from a region such as Xinjiang allowed the journal and its partner, the Waqt, to receive correspondences by prominent figures of the East Turkestanian Muslim communities, and to also enjoy some credit in that region.[395] After the end of real Muslim participation in the debates of the State Duma in 1907, news from the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire, through excerpts of the Tatar press such as the Waqt, were focused on the reform of education and on Muslim teachers' congresses of the 1910s. In addition, the journal offered innumerable editorials about the activity of Orthodox missionaries; papers on the relations between Muslims and Christians; studies on the greatness and decadence of nations; and reviews of books from the whole Muslim world. This very wide scope, which remained without equivalent in the Muslim press of Russia before the October revolution, made the Mura an irreplaceable link between dozens of regular authors and occasional correspondents writing from throughout Sunni Muslim Inner Eurasia. In that respect, although Russian censorship imposed strong limitations on the free circulation of information, the Mura reproduced in Inner Eurasian dimensions the world-scale project of the Manar.

Without being affiliated to any particular school of thought, Riza al-Din's journal had adopted the overall reformist line of the Salafi tendencies. There was, however, a very important difference with Egypt and the other regions of the Islamic world, and that was the Mura's strategy of accommodating with Russian authorities, who supported a more conservative Islam consisting of brotherhoods, sanctuaries, and popular "non-political" piety. The Mura nevertheless shared with the Manar a general will for restoring Islam to its past vigor, and for reestablishing the trust of the faithful in traditional values. This was to be done by means of a biweekly magazine with the fittings of a contemporary journal, redesigned in the 1910s according to the aesthetical innovations of Art Nouveau and Jugen Stijl.

Riza al-Din's constant interest in history was always oriented toward comparison and confrontation between Islam and non-Islam. His evocations of the Volga Bulghars and of the Golden Horde are indeed based on nineteenth-century Russian historiography (Karamzin and Rychkov are often quoted and commented with regard to the Golden Horde and the Khanate of Kazan, as well as Bartol'd about Central Asia). However, like Marjani before him, Riza al-Din persistently insisted on the history of conversion to Islam, and on the practice of the shari'a in the Hanafi madhhab in the pre-Mongol era.[396] His general nostalgia for the Volga Bulghars was nuanced by the first controversies, once again influenced by contemporary Russian historiography, about the arrival of the Tatars in the early thirteenth century and their influence upon the progress or regress of Islamic civilization in the Volga-Urals region.[397]

The first translation from Muhammad ‘Abduh appeared as early as the Autumn of 1908,[398] and was followed by many others. Those from al-Afghani appear slightly later,[399] but the mention of their author seems to have been globally avoided until the end of the Imperial period (one must remember Riza al-Din’s problems with the Russian authorities for his alleged “Pan-Islamism” during the years preceding the First World War). The first extensive papers devoted by the Mura to the biography of Shaykh Jamal al-Din appeared after the edition of excerpts of the Ottoman and Arabic press; [400] they were published by Riza al-Din in the confused period after the October revolution, and just before the final closure of the journal.[401] In addition to these two key figures, the Mura published in its section on “Famous Men and Great Events” numerous biographical notices on the great figures of Christian civilization, like the philosophers Descartes and Spinoza, undertaking an implicit reflection upon the causes of the decadence of Islam and the need for the rehabilitation of reason. In a spirit which is also very close to that of al-Manār, the series also devoted numerous biographical essays to the rulers and learned peoples of the Islamic world, from both the classical and modern periods.[402]

Among the common themes developed in parallel by both the Mura and the Manar, we find the same insistence on key subjects such as the education of women and their place in the Muslim community,[403] the place and role of the ulama in society (through endless debates about the collection of the zakat, for instance), [404] or the response of the Muslim communities to Christian missionary activity. The highly politicized subject of the conciliar movement, which occupied a central place in the Manar, is treated with many rhetorical precautions in the Mura, which prefers to devote more attention to the congresses of Muslim teachers of Russia. Concerned with the unity of the community, the Mura made constant appeals for Muslims to transcend inner divisions. However, like Rashid Rida, Riza al-Din and the Ramiyeffs’ great project was to teach about the compatibility of Islam with reason and science, in the best interest of mankind (maslaha).

Beyond this typological comparison—which could equally well have stressed such common features as the general aspect of both journals, the distribution of their various sections, their volume numbering and pagination, the presence of annual indexes in both of them, etc.—, more can be learned about the reception of its message by the Muslim readership of Russia through the translations, quotations, and comments on al-Manār. At first glance, al-Manār appears in the Mur beside many other journals and newspapers from Egypt and the Arab Near-East (like al-Mu‘ayyad and al-Hilal), especially when covering contemporary political and cultural events. The Manar was not even the unique vehicle for the popularization of‘Abduh’s thought in Russia, since the old al-’Urwa al-wuöqa continued to enjoy a high reputation at the turn of the 1910s, and to be read and commented in Russia well after its disappearance.[405] In addition to the press, Egyptian books rapidly began to be diffused even in the most remote regions of the Russian Empire, thanks to the development of mail-order sales through catalogues dispatched by Arab and even some Tatar bookstores in Cairo, or by Muslim booksellers in Russia.[406]

For the Muslim readership of Russia, however, the Manar remained the main canal for the penetration of al-Afghani and ‘Abduh’s teachings in the early twentieth century. The Qur1anic justification of science was in a good position,[407] followed by multiple echoes to ‘Abduh’s tafsir,[408] and comments on his Tawhid.[409] For key texts concerning general aspects of Islam in the modern world, al-Manār clearly appeared as the most authoritative source and its articles were translated, quoted and commented.[410] The translation of the Manar itself, in addition to the translation of the sacred and classical texts of Islam, responded to a fundamental need expressed by both the contributors and the readership of the Mura. Voices rose in the 1910s demanding the construction of a Turkic national community by allowing all of its member to freely access and read its texts, that is, texts written in the vernacular Turkic languages of Inner Eurasia, and freed from the “Arabisms” and “Persianisms” that had previously made it impossible for common people to read written literature. The Arabic sources of the Islamic renewal were not to be forgotten or eliminated: they were to be properly translated.[1] Modernization, as it was conceived within this logical framework, presupposed the existence of a corporation of good specialists of the Arabic language and literature. The Mura gave extensive publicity to former Azharian students, who constantly advocated improving the teaching of Arabic in the madrasas of European Russia as a key means for social transformation. At the same time, Riza al-Din and Muhammad Zakir Ramiyeff's journal never ignored the strong currents for Turkification and for transition from an umma to a nation, which were expressed with growing impetus in the Muslim press and political life of Russia during the decade preceding the 1917 revolution.[411]

 Conclusion

What we have tried to suggest in this preliminary study is that al-Afghani, 'Abduh, and Rashid Rida's works were largely discussed in the 1900s—1910s among the Muslim communities of the Russian Empire, notably by means of translation from and comment on the Manar. This was notably so by the protagonists of the whole reformist spectrum, to whom the Mura offered a unique platform during the last decade of the Imperial period. Ideological relations between the different schools of thought were as complex in Russia or Central Asia as they were in Egypt or the Ottoman Empire during that transitional period, and such categories as modernism and traditionalism ("Jadidism" and "Qadimism" in the case of Russia) were often overlapping. Significantly, the Manar was even more often quoted, translated, and commented in the reputedly conservative (if not reactionary) journal Dm wa ma'imat of Orenburg, than in any other journal of the Muslim press of the Russian Empire including the Mura. Further studies should focus on the various echoes to al-Manār in the Muslim communities of Russia, which could shed new light upon the varieties of modernization strategies.

These studies should further stress the clear disequilibria between an apparent giver and an apparent receiver. Allusions to al-Manār in the Muslim press of Russia are indeed much more numerous than references to the Muslims of the Russian Empire in al-Manār. If we take into account the rich intellectual substratum of the Russian Muslimhood at the end of the nineteenth century, the strength of its re-

Islamization processes, and the openness and dynamism of the Muslim press in the years 1905-1917, such dissymmetrical relations between the Mura and its model the Manar do not necessarily speak in favor of the latter. What about the effective influences from Cairo? Paradoxically, that of al-Azhar seems to be more easily traceable after ‘Abduh’s death, which coincided with the revolution of 1905 and with the beginning of the politicization of the ëadidiyya movement through the Muslim press and Russian Muslim congresses, and through the creation of the party Ittifaq al-Muslimin. ‘Abduh’s influence seems to have grown with the young Azharian intelligentsia, which rapidly politicized after 1905, while that of the Manar gained in the clerical milieus organized around the main reformist madrasas and around the community’s press. We can only imagine what would have been the evolution of the Mura after 1917: this could be the subject of further research on the personal evolution of Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din during the early decades of the Soviet period.

For the moment, our first reading of the Mura as an echo to al-Manār has suggested to us that, for early twentieth-century Muslim spiritual leaders of European Russia, modernization, and even the transition from umma to nation, did not necessarily go with or through secularization. It could even mean the contrary, a modernization through Islamization (or re-Islamization), to the extent that the laws and regulations of the Russian Empire offered no real satisfactory alternative. Although the role of the colonial powers should not be overestimated in the history of Islam in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the case of the Mura and of its understanding of al-Manār shows us in which way and in which measure the long-lasting domination of a Christian state with a policy of confessional discrimination could orient the development strategy of an Islamic minority. This should encourage researchers to attempt to re-place the Mura in the history of sensibility, and to deal with this exceptional document as a source for religious perception, ethics, and inter-confessional relations in the context of a colonial state, in a period of spectacular expansion of capitalism.

Such an approach would also permit external observers to understand why leaders of current Islamic movements throughout European Russia read now the early twentieth-century Mura with renewed curiosity. Although reinterpreted by the post-Soviet authorities of the Volga-Urals region in a purely secular fashion, and within the logical framework of the old ideology of “peoples’ friendship,” Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s work must be replaced in its original context of an overall confrontation between Islam and Christianity. This may help explain why “Jadidism” is so often appropriated by contemporary proponents of social and political Islamization in the former USSR.

[327] The author would like to express his gratitude to Prof. Hisao Komatsu for his friendly help in the last stage of the redaction of this paper, and for having given him the possibility to consult his personal reproductions of the Mura as well as those kept on microfilm at both the Toyo Bunko and the Faculty of Letters of the University of Tokyo.

[328] For a general overview of this press, see the classic and still irreplaceable work by Alexandre Bennigsen and Chantal Lemercier-Quelquejay, La presse et le movement national chez les musulmans de l1Empire russe avant 1920 (Paris—Den Haag: Mouton, 1964). See also Dilara M. Usmanova, “Die tatarische Presse 1905–1918: Quellen, Entwicklungsetappen und quantitative Analyse,” in Michael Kemper, Anke von Kügelgen, Dmitriy Yermakov, eds, Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia from the 18th to the Early 20th Centuries, 1 (Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1996), 239–278.

[329] See the anonymous paper: “Pitirbur∫ ëami2ning rasmi”[The Draft for the Great Mosque in Saint Petersburg], Mura (Orenburg) 1/16 (1 ma2ban 1326 [15 [28] August 1908]): 516–517 (the two dates in square brackets are respectively those of the Christian Julian—the official one in the Russian Empire—and Gregorian calendars). The project was disapproved by the Russian authorities for its “Pan-Islamic” character and was replaced by another of a more colonial design, with its main body in Caucasian style and a cupola seeking to imitate that of Tamerlane’s funeral complex in Samarqand (both Caucasus and Central Asia were included among the territories of the Russian Empire).

[330] Cf. notably Thomas Kuttner, “Russian Jadidism and the Islamic World. Ismail Gasprinski in Cairo—1908,” Cahiers du monde russe et soviétique 16/3–4 (1975): 383–424.

[331] For more details on this aspect, see my paper: “Islam et nationalisme en Asie Centrale, au début de la période soviétique (1924–1937). L1exemple de l1Ouzbékistan, à travers quelques sources littéraires,” Revue des mondes musulmans et de la Méditerranée 95–98 (2002): 43–73.

[332] Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1962; reed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), 222.

[333] On Batirma1s uprising in 1755, see: Iskander Giliyazov, “Die Islampolitik von Staat und Kirche im Wolga-Ural-Gebiet und der Batïrma Aufstand von 1755,” in Kemper et al., ed., Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia [quoted in note 2]: 69–90; by the same author, “Mulla Batyrma i ego pis1mo imperatrice Elizavete Petrovne [Mulla Batirma and His Address to the Empress Elizabeth],” in Damir Ishakov, ed., Iz istorii Al1met1evskogo regiona (Elements of History of the Region of Almetevsk) (Almetevsk: Izdatel1stvo Tatpoligraf, 2000), 129–140. On Muslim participation in the so-called PugaTev revolt, see notably: I. M. Gvozdikova, Bamkortostan nakanune i v gody krest1janskoj vojny pod predvoditel1stvom E. I. PugaTeva [Bashkortostan at the Eve of and during the Peasant War under the Leadership of Emeljan PugaTev] (Ufa: Kitap, 1999), 346–360 ff.; Salavat Tajmasov, Vosstanie 1773–1774 gg. v Bamkortostane (The 1773–1774 Uprising in Bashkortostan) (Ufa: Kitap, 2000), 184–257.

For a general approach of Russian legislation on the Muslims of Russia, and of the successive reactions of the Muslim communities to it, see Aydar Nogmanov, “L1évolution de la législation sur les musulmans de Russie, de la conquête de Qazan à la guerre de Crimée,” in Stéphane A. Dudoignon, Dämir Is1haqov, and Räfyq Möhämmätshin, eds, L1islam de Russie. Conscience communautaire et autonomie politique chez les Tatars de la Volga et de l1Oural, depuis le XVIII e siècle (Paris: Maisonneuve et Larose, 1997): 115–130.

[334] Danil Azamatov, Orenburgskoe magometanskoe duhovnoe sobranie v obsˆestvennoj I duhovnoj zizni musulmanskogo naselenija Juznogo Urala v konce XVIII–XIX vv. [The Muslim Spiritual Assembly of Orenburg in the Social and Spiritual Life of the Muslim Populations of the Southern Urals, Late 18th–19th Centuries] (masters thesis, Rossijskaja akademija nauk, Ufimskij nauTnyj centr, Institut istorii, jazyka i literatury, 1994), 51–85 ff.; Danil1 Azamatov, “Russian Administration and Islam in Bashkiria (18th–19th Centuries),” in Kemper et al., ed., Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia, 91–112; still by the same author, “The Muftis of the Orenburg Spiritual Assembly in the 18th and 19th Centuries: The Struggle for Power in Russia’s Muslim Institution,” in Anke von Kügelgen, Michael Kemper, Allen J. Frank, eds, Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia from the 18th to the Late 20th Centuries, 2. Inter-Regional and Inter-National Relations (Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1998): 355–384.

[335] Up to the 1870s the ethnonym “Tatar” (in Russian tatar, tatarskij) was commonly used by the Russian administration as a superordinate to designate the Turkic-speaking Muslim population of the Empire: cf. Donald Ostrowski, Muscovy and the Mongols. Cross-Cultural Influences on the Steppe Frontier, 1304–1589 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), XIII. This term retained something of its inclusive characteristics in Muslim sources of the early twentieth century. However the Russian practice evolved during the nineteenth century, especially after the conquest of Central Asia in the 1860–1880s. At this time, the imperial administration tried to establish a distinction between the Crimean, Volgian, and Siberian “Tatars,” and the other Muslim populations of European Russia, the Caucasus, and Central Asia, so as to fight against the threats of the day, that is, “panislamism” and “panturkism.” From that time on, the term Tatar was to become restricted to the Tatar-speaking Muslim populations of Crimea, the Middle and Lower Volga, and Western Siberia. On these questions, see A. J. Frank, Islamic Historiography and “Bulghar” Identity among the Tatars and Bashkirs of Russia (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998), 5–6, 42–43.

[336] Paul Werth, Subjects for Empire: Orthodox Missions and Imperial Governance in the Volga-Kama Region, 1825–1881 (PhD diss., University of Michigan, 1996); Robert Geraci, “Russian Orientalism in an Impasse: Tsarist Education Policy and the 1910 Conference on Islam,” in Daniel R. Brower and Edward J. Lazzerini, eds, Russia’s Orient. Imperial Borderlands and Peoples, 1700–1917 (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1997), 138–161.

[337] Ingeborg Baldauf, Schriftreform und Schriftwechsel bei den Muslimischen Russland—und Sowjettürken (1850–1937) (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1993), 3–52.

[338] On this key aspect of Muslim reformism see: Adeed Khalid, The Politics of Muslim Cultural Reform. Jadidism in Central Asia (Berkeley, CA, Los Angeles, CA, and London: The University of California Press, 1998), 114–154.

[339] See for example Thierry Zarcone, “Un aspect de la polémique autour du soufisme dans le monde tatar, au déut du XXe siècle: mysticisme et confrérisme chez Mûsâ Djârallâh Bîgî,” in Dudoignon et al., eds, L1Islam de Russie, 227–247; Ilmat Gyjmadiev, “Musa Bigiev sufiTylyk hakynda [Musa Bigiyeff about Sufism],” in Ramat Ämirxanov and Väliulla Jag1kub, eds, Idel buenda sufiTylyk: tarixy häm üzenTälekläre [Sufism in the Volga Region: Its history and Specificities] (Kazan: Iman nämrijaty, 2000), 49–54.

[340] See Hamid Algar, “Shaykh Zaynullah Rasulev: The Last Great Naqshbandi Shaykh of the Volga-Urals Region,” in Jo-Ann Gross, ed., Muslims in Central Asia. Expressions of Identity and Change (Durham, NC and London: Duke University Press, 1992), 112–133; see also Marsil1 Farhmatov, “Rasulev, Zajnulla, and Rasulija,” in S. M. Prozorov, ed., Islam na territorii byvmej Rossijskoj imperii. EnciklopediTeskij slovar 1 (Islam on the Territory of the Late Russian Empire. An Encyclopaedic Dictionary), 1. (Moscow: Izdatel1skaja firma “VostoTnaja literatura” R[ossijskoj] A[kademii] N[auk], 1998): 85–86, further references.

[341] Marsil1 Farhmatov, “al-Barudi,” in Islam na territorii byvmej Rossijskoj imperii, 2: 14–15; R. Ämirxan, “Möhämmädija Mädräsäse [The Muhammadiyya Madrasa],” in Röstam Mähdiev, ed., Mädräsälärdä kitap kimtäse. Mämhür mäg1rifat üzäkläre tarixynnan [The Bookshelves in the Madrasas. Elements of History of Famous Educational Institutions] (Kazan: Tatarstan kitap nämrijaty, 1992), 12–32.

[342] Tavkil1 Kamalov, Zija Kamali: myslitel1, prosvetitel1, religioznyj dejatel1 [Ziya Kamali: Thinker, Educator, Religious Figure] (Kazan: Izdatel1stvo Iman, 1997), 8–9; see also Marsil1 Farhmatov, “Kamali, Zija,” in Islam na territorii byvmej Rossijskoj imperi, 1: 41–42.

[343] Stéphane A. Dudoignon, “Qu1est-ce que la qadîmîya? Eléments pour une sociologie du traditionalisme musulman, en Islam de Russie et en Transoxiane (au tournant des XIXe et XXe siècles),” in Dudoignon et al., eds, L1Islam de Russie : 207–226; by the same author, “Status, Strategy and Discourse of a Muslim ‘Clergy’ under a Christian Law: Polemics about the Collection of the Zakat in Late Imperial Russia,” in Stéphane A. Dudoignon and Hisao Komatsu, eds, Islam in Politics in Russia and Central Asia, Early 18th—Late 20th Century (London—New York: Kegan Paul International, 2001): 43–73.

[344] On the mutual articulation between India and Central Eurasia through the Naqshbandiyya-Mujaddidiyya during the nineteenth century, see the exploratory study by Anke von Kügelgen, “Die Entfaltung der Naqmbandiya Muëaddidiya im mittleren Transoxianien vom 18. bis zum Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts: ein Stück Detektivarbeit,” in Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia, 2: 101–152; see also Baxtiyor Babadzanov, “On the History of the Naqmbandiya Muëaddidiya in Central Asia in the Late 18th and Early 19th Centuries,” in Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia, 1: 385–413.

[345] Cf. M. Kemper, “Musul1manskaja elita i duh kapitalizma [The Muslim Elite and the Spirit of Capitalism],” Tatarstan 1997/8: 75–81.

[346] See G. N. Hismätova, “XX gasyr bamynda tatar ëämgyjatynda 2riba’ mäs1äläse [The Question of Interest Loan in the Early 20th-Century Tatar Society], in J. G. Abdullin, R. M. Amirhanov, and F. M. Sultanov, eds, Islam v istorii i kul1ture tatarskogo naroda [Islam in the History and Culture of the Tatar People] (Kazan: RIC Mkola, 2000), 155–162.

[347] For comparison with contemporary developments in other regions of the Russian Empire, such as the Southern Caucasus and Siberia, where madrasas played a more limited role in the social life and modernization strategies of the Muslim communities, see: François Georgon, “Une note sur le modernisme en Azerbaïdjan au tournant du siècle,” Cahiers du monde russe 37/1–2 (1996): 97–106; Stéphane A. Dudoignon, “Un islam périphérique? Quelques réflexions sur la presse musulmane de Sibérie à la veille de la Première Guerre mondiale,” Cahiers du monde russe 41/2–3 (2000): 297–340.

[348] Michael Kemper, “Entre Boukhara et la Moyenne-Volga: 2Abd an-Nasîr al-Qûrsâwî en conflit avec les oulémas traditionalistes,” Cahiers du monde russe 37/1–2 (1996), 41–52; by the same author, Sufis und Gelehrte in Tatarien und Baschkirien, 1789–1889. Der islamische Diskurs unter russischer Herrschaft (Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1998), 278–286; G. G. Idijatullina, “Problema idztihada i Abu Nasr Kursavi [The Question of iëtihad and Abu1l-Nasr Qursawi],” in D. G. Tumameva et al., eds, Katanovskie Ttenija [Katanov Conferences] (Kazan: Izdatel1stvo Master Lajn, 1998), 128–135.

[349] Thierry Zarcone, “Philosophie et théologie chez les djadids. La question du raisonnement indépendant (iëtihâd),” Cahiers du monde russe 37/1–2 (1996), 59–60.

[350] Stéphane A. Dudoignon, “La question scolaire à Boukhara et au Turkestan russe, du ‘premier renouveau’ à la soviétisation (fin du XVIIIe siècle-1937),” Cahiers du monde russe 37/1–2 (1996), 134–146. The stereotypes about the decadence of Central Asia, which were common in the late nineteenth and early twentieth-centuries Tatar literature and press—including the Mura —were vehemently discussed by Turkestanian intellectuals during the 1900s and 1910s. See for instance the critique of a travel account published by the Tatar writer Muhammad Zahir Bigi: “Mawara al-Nahrga sayahat [A Journey to Transoxiana],” Mura 1/5 (safar 11, 1326 (March 1[14], 1908)): 148–149. For an example of Tatar representations and Turkestanian answers to them, see 2Abd al-Karim Sa2id’s classical reformist view of the “decadence” of Islam in Central Asia, in particular in the khanate of Khiva: “Ruhsiz 2alam [A Soulless World],” Mura 2/18 (rama/an 13 1327 [September 15 [28], 1909]): 549–551; and in the same “reformist” spirit, a protestation of the representation given by 2Abd al-Karim Sa2id of a decadent and moribund Khwarezm: Qari Muhammad Rahim, untitled correspondence from Bukhara, Mura 2/20 (mawwal 13, 1327 [October 15 [28], 1909]), 632–633.

[351] Frank, Islamic Historiography and “Bulghar” Identity among the Tatars and Bashkirs of Russia, 149–157; N. G. Garaeva, “Materialy ‘Vafjjat al-Aslaf ‘ M. Mardzani po istorii Povolzja [The Materials of M. Marëani1s Wafiyat al-aslaf for the History of the Volga Region],” in R. M. Amirhanov et al., eds, Mardzani: nasledie i sovremennost1 [Marëani: His Heritage and Actuality] (Kazan: Izdatel1stvo Master Lajn, 1998), 51–60.

[352] For a rare demographic analysis of this “apostasy” movement, see D. M. Ishakov, IstoriTeskaja demografija tatarskogo naroda (XVIII-naTalo XX vv.) [Historical Demography of the Tatar People (18th–Early 20th Centuries)] (Naberezhnye Chelny: PeTatnyj Dvor, 1993), 97–99.

[353] See the documents published by I. N. Morozov and N. N. Semenova, eds, Agrarnyj vopros i krest1janskoe dvizenie v Tatarii XIX veka [The Agrarian Question and Peasant Movement in 19th-century Tataria]

(Moscow—Leningrad: Izdatel1stvo Akademii nauk SSSR, 1936), 156–164; see also Kemal H. Karpat, “The Hijra from Russia and the Balkans: The Process of Self-Definition in the Late Ottoman State,” in Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, eds, Muslim Travellers. Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination (London: Routledge, 1990): 131–152; Christian Noack, Muslimischer Nationalismus im Russischen Reich. Nationsbildung und Nationsbewegung bei Tataren und Baschkiren, 1861–1917 (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag, 2000), 45–49.

[354] See notably M. N. Farhmatov, Narodnoe obrazovanie v Bamkirii v poreformennyj period, 60–90 e gody XIX v. [Popular Instruction in Bashkiria during the Reform Era (from the 1860s to the 1890s)] (Moscow: Nauka, 1994), 77–95.

[355] See notably R. Ämirxan, “Möhämmädija Mädräsäse,” 26–30; Söläjman Rähimov,” ‘Galija1 Mädräsäse [The 2Aliyya Madrasa],” in Mädräsälärdä kitap kimtäse, 118–119.

[356] See Abrar Karimullin, Tatarskaja kniga poreformennoj Rossii [The Tatar Book in Russia during the Reform Era] (Kazan: Tatarskoe kniznoe izdatel1stvo, 1984), 37–98.

[357] See Ä. H. Safina, “G. Ishaqyj häm Tuqay iëatlarynda mäkert1lär mäs1äläsene Tagylymy [The Talaba Question in the Works of Ishaqi and Tuqay],” in F. K. Bämirov, ed., Tuqaj häm XX gasyr mädänijate. Magyjrdneˇ 110 ellygynda bagymlangan xalyqara konferencija materiallary (Kazan: IJaLI im. G. Ibragimova ANT, 1997), 158–160; Michael Friederich, Ghabdulla Tuqaj (1886–1913). Ein hochgelobter Poet im Dienst von tatarischer Nation und sowjetischem Sozialismus (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz Verlag, 1998), 93–108.

[358] See Komatsu Hisao, Kakumei no Chuo Ajia. Aru jadido no shozo [Revolutionary Central Asia. A Portrait of Äbduräuf Fiträt] (Tokyo: Tokyo Daigaku Shuppansha, 1996), 191–219.

[359] Bennigsen and Lemercier-Quelquejay, La presse et le mouvement national, 44–45; R. Muhametshin, “G. Bajazitov,” in R. Muhametshin, ed., IstoriTeskie portrety. Duhovnaja kul1tura i tatarskaja intelligencija (Kazan: Izdatels1tvo Magarif, 2000): 42–46.

[360] On Bayazitoff and his role among the Muslim community of Russia, see the assessment written in 1920 by the mufti [2Alimëan Hazrat Barudi], Pamjatnaja knizka (Xäter däftäre) [Book of Memories], trans. from Tatar to Russian by E. Nigmatullin (Kazan: Izdatel1stvo Iman, 2000), 63–64. See also Anas B. Khalidov, “The History of Islam in St-Petersburg,” Religion, State and Society 22/2 (1994): 245–249.

[361] See [Ataulla Bajazitov], Vozrazenie na reT1 Ernesta Renana “Islam i nauka” Sankt-Peterburgskogo muhamedanskogo ahuna imam dzamija hatyb mudarrisa Ataully Bajazitova [Reply to Ernest Renan’s Lecture on “Islam and Science” by the Muslim Alund 2Ata1-Allàh Bayazitoff, Latib, Mudarris and Imam-Ëami2 of Saint Petersburg] (Saint Petersburg: Tipografija A. S. Suvorina, 1883); by the same author, Islam I progress [Islam and Progress] (Saint Petersburg: Tipografija A. S. Suvorina, 1898); by the same author, Otnomenie islama k nauke i k inovercam [The Attitude of Islam Towards Science and Non-Believers] (Saint Petersburg: Tipografija Nur, 1906).

[362] On Ibrahimoff ‘s relations with al-Afghani in particular, see Ismail Türkoëlu, Sibiriyalı Mevhur Seyyah Abdürrevid Ibrahim [2Abd al-Ramid Ibrahim, a Famous Siberian Traveller] (Ankara: Türkie Diyanet Yayınları, 1997). See also the paper by Hisao Komatsu in the present volume.

[363] See Farhmatov, “al-Barudi,” 14–15, bibliography.

[364] Bennigsen and Lemercier-Quelquejay, La presse et le mouvement national, 59–60.

[365] See Zavdat Z. Minullin, “ZemljaTestva i blagotvoritel1nye obûestva tatarskih uTaˆsihsja v musul1manskih stranah (naTalo XX v.),” Mir islama (Kazan) 1 (1999): 135–144; English translation available as “Fraternal and Benevolent Associations of Tatar Students in Muslim Countries at the Beginning of the 20th Century,” in Anke von Kügelgen, Michael Kemper and Allen J. Frank, eds, Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia (Berlin: Schwarz, 1998), 271–280.

[366] See for example Qahirada Tatar Talabasi Æam2iyyati, “Misr al-Qahirada: al-Azhar (Misrdan) [In Cairo: al-Azhar (A Correspondence from Egypt)],” Mura 1/4 (muharram 26, 1326 [February 15 [28], 1908]), 114–116; 1/6 (safar 25, 1326 [March 15 [28], 1908]), 168–171; 1/7 (rabi2 al-awwal 13, 1326 [April 1[14], 1908]), 200–202. About the Fraternity of the Muslim Students from Russia in Mecca, and its relations with the Fraternity in Cairo, see the anonymous column: “Makka-yi Mukarramada Rusiya islam talabasiniˇ ëam2iyyat-i 2ilmiyyasi [The Learned Society of Students from the Russian Muslimhood in Mecca],” Mura 3/6 (rabi2 al-awwal 17, 1327 [March 15 [28], 1910]), 191–192.

[367] Azamatov, Orenburgskoe magometanskoe duhovnoe sobranie, 355–384.

[368] See Madina Rahimkulova, Medrese “Husainija” v Orenburge. 2oe dopolnennoe jubilejnoe izdanie, posvjaûennoe 160-letiju Ahmet baja Husajnova [The Husayniyya Madrasa in Orenburg. 2nd Edition, Completed in the Honor of the 160th Birthday of Ahmad Bay Husaynoff] (Orenburg: Jana Vakyt, 1997), 56–60; about the teaching staff of the Madrasa-yi 2Aliyya in Ufa, see Rähimov,” ‘Galija’ mädräsäse,” 115.

[369] See the anonymous paper “Ta1ril-i adiyan darslari [Lectures in the History of Religions],” Mura 2/22 (zul- qada 15, 1327 [November 15 [28], 1909], 679–682. This is the presentation to a course prepared by Musa Bigi for the Husayniyya starting in 1906, and dealing with the diversity of religions, a key issue in 2Abduh’s teachings and work.

[370] About al-Qadiri, see Bennigsen and Lemercier-Quelquejay, La presse et le movement national, 81–82; Dudoignon, “Un islam périphérique?,” 302–304, 322–328.

[371] Abdullah Battal-Taymas, Rizaeddin Fahreddinoëlu (Istanbul: M. Siralar Matbaası, 1958); by the same author, Musa Carullah Bigi (Istanbul: M. Siralar Matbaası, 1958); by the same author, Âlimcan Barudî (Istanbul: M. Siralar Matbaası, 1958). Also see by the same author, “Türk dünyasında Usulü Cedit hareketi [The Movement of the Usul-I Ëadid in the Turkic World],” Türk Kültürü 2/18 (1964), 119–125.

[372] See notably Bayart Dodge, Al-Azhar. A Millenium of Muslim Learning (Washington, DC: The Middle East Institute, 1974), 132.

[373] See M. Rähimkulova and A. Hamidullin,” ‘Hösäjnija1 mädräsäse [The Husayniyya Madrasa],” in Mähdiev, ed., Mädräsälärdä kitap kimtäse, 74–114; Rahimkulova, Medrese “Husajnija” v Orenburge, 4–15.

[374] Abdallah Bubi, Bubi madrasasining qisqa ta1rixi [An Abridged History of the Bubi Madrasa] (Bubi-Sarapul and Ghulja: s.n., 1913–1918; reprinted in cyrillic alphabet by Raif Märdanov and Söläjman Rähimov, Kazan: s.n., 1991). For other analogous examples from the eastern Volga-Kama region, see: I. R. Gabdullin and R. R. Ibragimova, “Mektebe i medrese Bugul1minskogo i Menzelinskogo uezdov v konce XIX—naTale XX vekov [The Maktab s and Madrasas of the Districts of Bugul1ma and Menzelinsk in the Late 19th and Early 20th Centuries),” in Ishakov, ed., Iz istorii Al1met1evskogo regiona, 174–179.

[375] Although the recent bibliography on RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din remains very problematic due to the tendency of most authors to ignore the religious aspects of his work and to promote secularist interpretations of it, we may mention the following contributions: in addition to the previously mentioned monograph by Battal-Taymas, Rizaeddin Fahreddinoëlu, see Mahmud Tahir, “Risaeddin Fahreddin,” Central Asian Survey, 8/1 (1989): 111–115; F. N. Bajmev, Ob◊estvenno-politiTeskie i nravstvenno-etiTeskie vzgljady Rizy Fahretdinova [The Socio-Political and Ethical Conceptions of RiÁa Falr al-Dinoff] (Ufa: Kitap, 1996); ¸aisa Hösäjnov, Rizaitdin bin Fäxretdin (Ufa: Kitap, 1997); Mädinä Rähimkulova, ed., Rizaetdin bin Fäxretdingä 140 jam tulu mönäsäbäte belän (1859–1936) [On the Occasion of RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din’s 140th Anniversary (1859–1936)] (Orenburg: Agenstvo Pressa, 1998); Raif Märdanov, Zavdat Mi˘ullin, and Söläjman Rähimov, eds, Rizaetdin Fexretdin. Fänni-biografik Ëyentyk / Rizaetdin Faxretdinov. NauTno-biografiTeskij sbornik [RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din. Collected Studies and Elements of Bibliography] (Kazan: Ruxijat nämrijaty, 1999); M. Farhmatov, “Fahretdinov, Rizaetdin,” in Islam na territorii byvmej Rossijskoj imperii, 1, 94–95; Ismail Türkoëlu, Rusya Türkleri arasındaki yenilevme hareketinin öncülerinden Rizaeddin Fahreddin [RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din, the Vanguard of the Renewal Movement among the Turks of Russia] (Istanbul: Ötüken nevriyatı, 2000).

[376] Rizaetdin Fahretdinov, “Moja avtobiografija (My Autogiography),” trans. from Tatar to Russian by R. Märdanov, in Märdanov, Mi˘nullin, and Rähimov, eds, Rizaetdin Fexretdin. Fänni-biografik Ëyentyk/Rizaetdin Faxretdinov. NauTno-biografiTeskij sbornik, 100.

[377] Riza al-Din published the manuscript of Marëani1s hajj account with a short biography of the great Kazan 2alim : Riza al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Rihlat al-Marëani (Kazan: Tipo-Litografija naslednikov M. ÷irkovoj, 1897). On this work, see my paper: “Us et usages du voyage et de sa narration, par les lettrés et savants de Russie au tournant du XXe siècle. La Rihlat al-Marëani (1880),” presentation at the round table L1Univers en partage. 3: La relation de voyage et ses usages, dir. Alain Roussillon (Rabat: Université Mohamed V, January 26, 2001).

[378] Riza al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Ibn Taymiyya (Orenburg: Waqt matba2asi, 1913), passim (Mamhur erlar maëmu2asindan 5-nëi ëuz2 [Series on Great Men, 5]).

[379] Riza al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Mayl Zayn-Allàh Hazrat tarëuma-yi hali [A Biography of Mayl Zayn-Allàh] (Orenburg: Waqt matba2asi, 1917); for a short analysis of Riza al-Din's writings on Rasuliyeff, see Mäsgud Gäjnetdinov, "Tamkyn koTagynda bir majak [A Lighthouse in the Tempest]," Gasyrlar avazy (Kazan) 1/2 (1997): 136–141.

[380] RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Mamhur latunlar (Famous Ladies), 2nd ed. (Orenburg: Muhammad Fatih b. ¸ilman Karimoff Matba2asi, 1904); on this work see Türkoglu, Rusya Türkleri arasındaki yenilevme hareketinin öncülerinden Rizaeddin Fahreddin, 312–314.

[381] After a long period of censorship under the Soviet regime, Riza al-Din' s fiction works Salima, yaki 2iffat [Salima, or Virtue] (Kazan: s.n., 1899) and 2Isma, yaki 2amal wa ëaza1 [2Isma, or Crime and Punishment, 1903] (Orenburg: s.n., 1903) were read again in the decade preceding Perestroika in Tatarstan, and curiously reinterpreted in a purely secular sense: see for instance Möhämmät Gajnullin, Tatar ädipläre [Tatar Literati] (Kazan: Tatarstan kitap nämrijaty, 1978), 79–98.

[382] See my paper "Women at Stake, and Protagonists in the Intellectual Life of the Muslim Communities of European Russia, Siberia and the Qazaq Steppe (Early 20th Century)," communication to the colloquium Intellectuals in Islam in the 20th Century: Situations, Discourses, Strategies, Tokyo: Islamic Area Studies Project, October 13–15, 2000.

[383] On Karimi, see a short biographical sketch with a rich bibliography in Türkoëlu, Rusya Türkleri arasındaki yenilevme hareketinin öncülerinden Rizaeddin Fahreddin, 350–353; B. Sultanbekov, "F. Karimi," in IstoriTeskie portrety : 111–117.

[384] Raif Märdanov,” ‘Mura’ zurnaly [The Journal Mura],” Gasyrlar avazy (1999/1–2): 227–243 and especially 232.

[385] RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Ahmad Bay Afandi (Orenburg: Waqt matba2asi, 1911), especially 22–24 (chapter on “Diyanati wa allaqi [His Religiosity and Ethics]”), 24–28 (chapter on “Umid wa fikrlari [His Hopes and Thoughts]”), and 51–52 (chapter on “Haëë ga yubarmak [Sending to the Pilgrimage],” a eulogy of the financial support given by Ahmad Bay Husaynoff to the organization of the Pilgrimage to Mecca).

[386] See for example RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Rusiya musulmanlarini˘ ihtiyaëlari wa anlar haqinda intiqad [The Needs of the Muslims of Russia and the Critiques about Them], ed. Imam Layr-Allàh al-2Uömani (Orenburg: Muhammad Fatih b. ¸ilman Karimoff Matba2asi, n.d.), passim.

[387] Riza al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Ahmad Midhat (Orenburg: Waqt matba2asi, 1913).

[388] See his obituary by Mir Muhsin Mir Muhammad (from Tashkent), “Sayyah Numirwan AfandiYa1umeff [The Traveller Numirwan AfandiYa1umeff],” Mura 10/18 (zul-hiëëa 11, 1335 [September 15 [24], 1917]), 419–420.

[389] Cf. Shin1ichiro Oishi, “Nushiruvan Yaushefu no Torukisutan shuyu ni tsuite [About Numirwan Ya1umeff ‘s Journeys to Turkestan],” Kobe Daigaku Shigaku Nenpu 13 (1998), 20–36; reviewed by Hisao Komatsu in Abstracta Iranica 22 (2001): 130.

[390] See, for example, a letter from the Turkestanian adib and playwriter Hajji Mu2in b. Shukr-Allah Katta-Qurghani asking for more attention on the problems of teaching Arabic language and literature: Haëëi Mu2in b. Mukr-Allàh, untitled correspondence from Samarqand, Mura 8/24 (safar 21, 1334 [December 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1915]), 759. The author complains about the lack of attention of the Mura to Arabic classical literature and to biographies of great Arab scholars and scientists of the past. Significantly, Haëëi Mu2in also asks for the publication of more biographies on the great figures of Central Asian history (such as Amir Temur, Uluʃ Beg, or Babur), and of those of modern Ottoman culture (such as Namık Kemal or Vemseddin Sami). On Haëëi Mu2in's theatrical works, and the Tatar influence on it, see Muhrat Rizaev, Ëadid dramasi [The Ëadid Drama] (Tashkent: Marq, 1997), 86–87, samples of his work on 245–316.

[391] See, for example, Muhammadëan Muhammad Salih Aʃli Luëandi, untitled correspondence from Qarghali [Orenburg], Mura 1/18 (ramazan 3, 1326 [September 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]): 573–576. In it the author, a Muslim traveller from the city of Khujand in Russian Turkestan, questions the Editor on the ritual of the namaz-ëum2a, making references to both Abu Hanifa and al-Marjani. Having asked in vain for a fatwa from the ulama of Tashkent and Bukhara, Muhammadëan decided to submit his question to the Mura.

[392] Statistics in Märdanov," 'Mura' zurnaly," passim.

[393] Riza al-Din, Ahmad Midhat, 42–46.

[394] Riza al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Ëami2 al-kalim marhi (Orenburg: Waqt Matba2asi, 1916); on this work, see a short summary by Türkoëlu, Rusya Türkleri arasındaki yenilevme hareketinin öncülerinden Rizaeddin Fahreddin, 296–298.

[395] Cf. Shin1ichiro Oishi," 'Wakuto1 shijo no Buruhan Shahido no kiji ni tsuite [Burhan Mahid's Articles in the Waqt], Seinan Ajia Kenkyu 49 (1998): 68–84; reviewed by Hisao Komatsu in Abstracta Iranica 22 (2001): 130.

[396] In the series “Mamhur adamlar wa buyuk hadiöalar [Famous Peoples and Great Events],” which was sometimes published anonymously by Riza al-Din himself: [RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din], “Ëa2far bin 2Abd-Allàh (Almas bin Saski),” Mura 1/1 (20 zulhiëëa 20, 1325 [January 10 [<verbatim>23</verbatim>], 1908]), 4–7. This is about the king of the Bulghars who is credited by tradition for the conversion of his people to Islam in the early tenth century CE. Significantly, the paper was published in the very first issue of the Mura ; by the same author, “Berke Lan,” parts 1 and 2, Mura I/2 (muharram 1 1326 [January 21 [February 4], 1908]): 34–38; I/3 (muharram 16, 1326 [February 5 [<verbatim>18</verbatim>], 1908]), 65–76. This is the first of a long series of papers about the Golden Horde, from its conversion to Islam up until the Russian conquest of the khanate of Kazan in 1551.

[397] Cf. for example Darwim (a pseudonym frequently employed by RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din), “Ázimizga 2a1id [About Us],” Mura 1/4 (muharram 26, 1326 [February 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]), 107–110.

[398] 2Abduh made his first appearance as an author in the seventeenth issue of the journal: [Muhammad 2Abduh], “Musulmanlarda salaflar aöarlari yuq (2Allama-yi mamahir Muhammad 2Abduh niˇ ‘al-Islam wa al-nusraniyya’ nam risalasindan tarëuma) [There is no Trace of the Companions among the Muslims (A Translation of the Treaty on ‘Islam and Christianity’ by the Most Famous 2Alim Muhammad 2Abduh)],” translated from Arabic to Tatar by Badr al-Din 2Umrani, Mura 1/17 (ma2ban 18, 1326 [September 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1908]), 527–528.

[399] [Ëamal al-Din al-Afʃani], “Islam dini (Mayl Ëamal al-Din al-Afʃani hazratlarining Radd al-dahriyin nam aöarindan iqtibasan tarëuma idilmimdir) [The Islamic Religion (A Partial Translation of the Refutation of the Materialists by Mayl Ëamal al-Din al-Afʃani)],” translated from the Arabic to the Tatar by Muhammad Hadi b. 2Inan Sa2di, Mura 1/22 (zul-qada 5, 1326 [November, 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]), 701–704. See also 2A[bd-Allàh] Battal, “ ̣arb ma2imatindan [About Life in the West],” Mura 3/13 (raëab 7, 1328 [July 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]), 401–402. In this paper, which is the answer to an article from the Russian journal Musul1manin (“The Muslim”) of Paris with a flattering evocation of the “vie parisienne ,” the author makes critical considerations about a world in which everyday life is not administered by religious laws.

[400] See, for example, Mehmed 2Akif [Ersoy], “Mayl Ëamal al-Din wa Muhammad 2Abduh (Sirat al-mustaqim maëallasindan alindi) [Mayl Ëamal al-Din and Muhammad 2Abduh (taken from the journal Sirat al-mustaqim)],” Mura 3/12 (ëumadi al-alir 20, 1328 [June 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1910]), 370–372.

[401] RF [RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din], “Mamhur adamlar wa ulu∫ hadiöalar: Mayl Ëamal al-Din [Famous Peoples and Great Events: Mayl Ëamal al-Din],” parts 1–9, Mura 10/14 (mawwal 8, 1335 [July 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1917]): 313–316; 10/15 (mawwal 25, 1335 [August 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1917]): 338–341; 10/16 (zul-qada 10, 1335 [August 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1917]): 361–365; 10/17 (zul-qada 27, 1335 [September 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1917]): 386–388 (with a photograph of al-Afghani on the front page); 10/18 (zul-hiëëa 11, 1335 [September 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1917]): 409–413; 10/19 (safar 7, 1336 [November 9 [<verbatim>22</verbatim>], 1917]): 433–436; 10/20 (safar [sic], 1336 [November [sic], 1917]): 457–461; 10/21 (safar 12, 1336 [December 13 [<verbatim>18</verbatim>], 1917]): 481–485; 10/22 (safar 14, 1336 [December 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1917]): 497–499; 10/23–24 (rabi2al-awwal 30, 1336 [December 30, 1917 [January 12, 1918]): 513–517.

[402] See for instance RF [RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din], “Mamhur adamlar wa ulu∫ hadiöalar: 2Abd al-Qadir Ëaza1iri [Famous Peoples and Great Events: 2Abd al-Qadir the Algerian],” parts 1 and 2, Mura 8/22 (muharram 21 [sic], 1333 [November 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1915]; the hiëri date is erroneous): 673–676; 8/23 (safar 7, 1334 [December 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1915]), 706–707.

[403] 2A[bd-Allàh] Battal, “Latunlar wa taraqqi [Women and Progress],” 3/5 (rabi2 al-awwal 3, 1328 [March 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]): 136–139; anonymous paper, “Latunlarni ta2lim (al-Hilaldan) [The Education of Women (from al-Hilal)],” Mura 3/8 (rabi2 al-alir 18, 1328 [April 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1910]): 250, a paper about the al-Jami2a school, an educational institution for young girls in Cairo and other topics.

[404] See RiÁa al-Din b. Falr al-Din, Maktab wa zakat, lazina wa zemstwa yardimi [The School and Its Financing through the Zakat, the Treasury, and the Zemstvo s] (Orenburg: Karimoff, Husaynoff wa mirkasi [sic], n.d.), passim.

[405] M. Hadi (from Cheliabinsk), “Qadr Mas1alasi (÷ilabi mahrinda rus mu2allimi; ustaz wa imam Muhammad 2Abduh HaÁratlarini˘ ‘al-2Urwa al-wuöqa’ da yazilmim maqalasi) [The Question of Destiny (A Russian Teacher in the City of Cheliabinsk; a Paper written by the Master and Imam Muhammad 2Abduh in al-2Urwa al-wuöqa)],” Mura 2/6 (rabi2 al-awwal 6, 1327 [March 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1909]): 166–169. See also the anonymous paper “¸azita wa zurnallar. 3. 2Arabi tilinda (Newspapers and Journals. 3. In the Arabic Language),” Mura 2/11 (ëumadi al-awwal 21, 1327 [June 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1909]): 322–325.

[406] Anonymous notice, “Dar al-kutub al-2arabiyya [The Palace of the Arab Books],” Mura 2/9 (rabi2 al-alir 23, 1327 [May 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1909]): 279. This is an account of the activities of a bookshop with the same name in Cairo, followed by an advertisement for its free catalogue. Another anonymous advertisement for a bookstore which proposed Turkish translations of Arabic books on the history of Islam can be found in another issue, with the address in French (the language of the International Postal Union): “Egypte, Azhar, M. Ahmed Ourmantchieff,” Mura 1/12 (ëumadi al-awwal 29, 1326 [June 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]): 393. In 1901 the bookstore Marq Kutublanasi (Orient Library), owned by Ahmad Ishaqoff in the remote city of Orsk on the fringe of the eastern Urals and northern part of the Qazaq steppe (i.e. very far from the Mediterranean), was selling books, notably madrasa textbooks from Egypt, Beirut, Istanbul, and India at “reasonable prices.” Ishaqoff was proposing to the readers to send his catalogue, entitled Asami al-kutub (Book Titles). Found in the classified advertisements of the Mura 3/2 (muharram 17, 1328 [January 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1910]): III.

[407] See Muhammad Tawfiq Afandi Sidqi, “Qur1an wa 2ilm. Lu∫at, ta1ril, ëu∫rafiya, tibb wa ∫ayrlarga da1ir darslar (Mu2tabar ‘al-Manār’ maëallasindan Muhammad Tawfiq Afandi Sidqi yazilmim maqalalardan iltisar ila tarëuma idilmimdir) (The Qur1an and Science. Lectures on Lexicography, History, Geography, Medicine, etc. [Abridged Translation from a Paper Written by Muhammad Tawfiq Afandi Sidqi in the Famous Journal al-Manār]),” Mura 3/5 (rabi2 al-awwal 3, 1328 [March 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]), 131–132.

[408] Miyan 2Abd al-Awwal al-ˌaffari, “Dinlilar wa dinsizlar (Mayl Muhammad 2Abduh Hazratlariniˇ Tafsirindan bir qadr tasarruf ila muqtabas),” parts 1 and 2, Mura 3/9 (ëumadi al-awwal 5, 1328 [May 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]): 265–267; 3/10 (ëumadi al-awwal 19, 1328 [May 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1910]), 299–301.

[409] Imam wa Mudarris Sarwar al-Din [b. Miftah al-Din] “Tawhid, hayat, islam (Divine Unity, Life, Islam),” parts 1–10, Mura 1/11 (ëumadi al-awwal 15, 1326 [June 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1908]), 349–352; 1/12 (ëumadi al-awwal 29, 1326 [June 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]), 382–384; 1/14 (ëumadi al-alir 29, 1326 [July 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]), 431–433; 1/15 (raëab 17, 1326 [August 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1908]), 482–484; 1/18 (rama/an 3, 1326 [September 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1908]), 567–569; 1/21 (mawwal 20, 1326 [November 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1908]), 671–672; 1/23 (zul-qada 21, 1326 [December 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1908]), 716–717; 2/2 (muharram 5, 1327 [January 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1909]), 37–39; 2/4 (safar 7, 1327 [February 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1909]), 101–102; 2/5 (safar 21, 1327 [March 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1909]), 134–136; 2Abd-Allàh Battal, “Risala at-tawhid (Mayl Muhammad 2Abduh ta1lifi) (The Risala al-tawhid, a Work by Mayl Muhammad 2Abduh),” Mura 2/19 (mawwal 28, 1327 [October 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1909]), 588–591.

[410] See the anonymous paper “2Umumi islam nadwasi (Misrda Tiqmaqda ulan dini ‘al-Manār’ muqtabas) [The Debate on Islam (Summarized from the Religious [Journal] al-Manār published in Egypt)],” Mura 1/3 (muharram 16, 1326 [February 5 [<verbatim>18], 1908]), 74–77.

[1] Hadi, “Bay ham yarli dillar, turkTa yu∫al∫an suzlar [Rich and Poor Languages; Words Absent in Turkic],” Mura 3/7 (rabi2 al-alir 4, 1328 [April 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]), 206–208. On the Urdu translation of 2Abduh’s works, see the anonymous chronicle “Muhammad 2Abduh,” Mura 3/11 (ëumadi al-alir 6, 1328 [June 1 [<verbatim>14</verbatim>], 1910]), 348.

[411] Arif Makuri (Qahirada rusiyali turk talabasi ëam2iyyati iTun ra1is [The Chairman of the Fraternity of the Turkic Students from Russia in Cairo]), “Dini madrasalarimizda 2Arab lisanini˘ ahammiyati wa 2Arab lisaninda dars kitablari [The Significance of the Arabic Language in our Religious Schools and the Textbooks of Arabic Language],” Mura 3/12 (ëumadi al-alir 20, 1328 [June 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1910]), 357–361; for a discussion on this matter, see for example Mulla Mihab al-Din (from Chistopol), “2Arab tili bizga kirak bulami? [Do We Need the Arabic Language?],” Mura 10/14 (mawwal 8, 1335 [July 15 [<verbatim>28</verbatim>], 1917]), 325–325.

* 6. Rationalizing Patriotism Among Muslim Chinese: The impact of the Middle East on the Yuehua journal

Matsumoto Masumi

China has a Muslim population of about 18 million. They are divided into ten national minorities or nationalities. According to official records, they are an important component of the 56 nationalities in China. Sometimes translated into English as “Muslim Chinese,” Sino-Muslims or Hui (Huizus are referred to as “Hui” in this chapter), they are the third most populous nationality in China with a population of 9.8 million according to the 2003 census.

Contrarily to such minorities as the Uyghurs, who are also Muslims, and the Tibetans, who are alleged to have separatist tendencies, the Hui as a whole have tried to remain loyal to the Chinese State and its rulers. Except for a few insubordinate groups, many Hui literati, military leaders, and religious leaders called ahongs (originally alund in Persian) supported the Nationalist Party (Guomindang, abbreviated as GMD) in the Republican Era (1912–1949). Some of them migrated to Taiwan with the GMD. On the other hand, some started to support the Chinese Communist Party (abbreviated as CCP) in the middle of the 1930s. Since 1949 they have supported the People’s Republic. Particularly since the initiation of the Reform and Open Policy, some of them have been promoted to the top cadres of the state. They have worked as decision-makers in the People’s Republic, particularly in the field of policy-making with regards to ethnic minorities. In addition to advocating freedom of religion and the preservation of a plurality of ethnic characters, they have called for increased national sentiment, not only from the Hui but from all people in China, especially from those who are ethnic minorities.

In retrospect, the GMD’s ideology was the Three People’s Principle, which stressed Chinese nationalism rather than the endorsement of various religious and ethnic differences. On the other hand, the CCP, as the follower of Karl Marx, seemed to believe in the evils of religion. Rather than pursuing their own political entity separate from China, why did the Hui choose to support these two parties and political systems whose ideologies seemed to be in contradiction to their belief in Islam?

Patriotism and nationalism are the answers to this question. For these modern ideologies to penetrate into Hui society, advanced ahongs and literati initiated the Chinese Islamic revival movement (sometimes referred as the “Chinese Islamic reform movement” or “Chinese Islamic new cultural movement”) since the late Qing period. The keyword of the movement was aiguo aijiao (“love the fatherland and love Islam”), which identified patriotism as faith toward the religion. Because of this logic, patriotism became one of the most touted virtues for the Hui.

This catchword was broadly accepted in Chinese Hui society during the war against Japan. In order to spread the slogan, methods such as preaching by ahongs and Islamic periodicals were utilized. For example, the Yuehua journal was published from 1929 until 1948. Issuing more than 4,000 copies at its peak, it was the most influential and longest lasting periodical of Hui society in the period before the founding of the People’s Republic in 1949.

This chapter examines how the Hui strove to be patriotic and nationalistic in modern terms, and based on their traditional Islamic understanding as well as their reinterpretation of the Qur‘an and the Hadith. In addition we shall try to argue how the Islamic revival and Islamic reformism in the Middle East influenced Hui society in China, and what the role of Yuehua journal took within this context.

 The Hui in the twentieth century

The Hui are a true minority, with only 0.7% of China’s population of 1.2 billion. Dispersed in every province, every autonomous region, and every prefecture, county and city, there is no region without Hui inhabitants. They are in charge of agriculture and transportation services as well as commercial activities. Some have been successful in gaining high positions as cadres in the CCP. Taking advantage of Muslim networks in China as well as in foreign countries, some have found lucrative jobs after the initiation of the Reform and Open policy.

The Hui’s history in twentieth-century China was, however, affected by the hardships of turbulent times. Like other ordinary Chinese people, Muslims in China faced the collapse of the Qing dynasty, the establishment of the Chinese Republic in 1912, the political, economic, and social confusion caused by the interference of Western powers, and the opposition of the GMD and the CCP. Moreover, they were involved in the turmoil of the Sino-Japanese war, the civil war, and the establishment of the People’s Republic in 1949. Religious suppression during the Cultural Revolution brought the destruction of mosques and the prohibition of religious activities. In other words, as an explicitly minority group, the Hui have had to survive in China and, if necessary, have had to fight to surmount obstacles facing them. In order to adjust the Hui as a group to the new and changing circumstances, ahongs, literati, and local elites strove to reform religion and install both national and ethnic identity in the minds of Muslims. In this chapter we will call these ahongs, literati, and local elite the “Islamic reformers” or the “Islamic revivalists” of China.

We shall first attempt to divide the Hui’s twentieth-century history from the perspective of Islamic reformers:

1 A period of awakening in the late Qing, 1907-1911

2 Adaptation to Republican China, 1912–1937

3 Participation in the Anti-Japanese War, 1937-1945

4 Civil war between the GMD and the CCP, 1946–1 949

5 Adaptation to the People’s Republic and the social reforms, 1949–1958

6 Calamity during the anti-rightist campaign and the Cultural Revolution, 1958–1976

7 The new Islamic revival, 1979-until now.

The first three periods listed here can be considered as the rise and flourishing of the Islamic revival in the Chinese context. The seventh period can be seen as a resumption of another flourishing period for the Islamic revival, due to the promotion of religion and religious culture by the government, and recognition of the Hui’s right to political participation as a nationality. Moreover, in terms of developing improved diplomatic relationship between China and other Islamic countries, one can attest to the importance of domestic Islamic matters in the last twenty years.

Due to space limitations, we will only examine and discuss the former three periods covering four decades. We can assess, however, that the endeavors made by Islamic reformers in these four decades brought a legacy of relatively high prestige for the “Hui nationality” in the People’s Republic.

 The concept of “unity of being” as basis of patriotism—a philosophy for the maintenance of a peaceful society

Concepts of patriotism and nationalism did not exist in pre-modern China. The Hui, however, kept a basic logical concept that was capable of developing into patriotism in the modern period. This concept is the “unity of being.” Muslims emigrating from Central Asia to China during the Mongol period brought this interpretation of Islam from their homeland, where the philosophy of the “unity of being” (wahdat al-wuëud in Arabic) had prevailed since the eleventh century. The Chinese Muslims called laojiao (the Old Sect or Gedimu , qadim in Arabic) inherited this philosophy.[412]

The structure of the unity of being is as follows. All existence and phenomena in this world are outflows from the only ultimate and supreme existence, Allah. Human beings, as the outflow of Allah, have their virtuous deeds allocated to them by Allah. After the completion of virtues, a human being can become a perfect man/woman and return to the origin of the existence, Allah.

Several outstanding philosophers developed a unique understanding of Islam at the end of the Ming and the beginning of the Qing era. Among them, Wang Daiyu , Ma Zhu , and Liu Zhi were the most famous. They attempted to explain the unity of being with Confucian terminology, and with Zhuzi’s terminology in particular, since their spoken language had already become Hanyu after their long residence in China.

We can characterize their philosophy as the appreciation of co-existence in Chinese society under the rule of the Mandate of Heaven. Consequently the philosophy called for a duplicate faith toward Allah and toward the Mandate of Heaven, who was the real ruler of this world. This was called “the theory of double faith.” These philosophers recognized non-Muslim masters, including the Mandate of Heaven, as the outflows of Allah, and considered them to be entrusted as the ruling power of Allah. Completing the philosophy of Islam in China, Liu Zhi stated that if each obeys to the rules of the Mandate of the Heaven, then the preconditions for the mental practice of human completion would exist and social peace would be maintained. Sincere attitudes toward one’s life would lead to the peace of both family and homeland in this world. From there, a person could attain complete human perfection.

According to this logic, Muslims should implement virtues similar to those of Confucians, who were governed by the Mandate of the Heaven. The Hui, as a minority group in Chinese society, were allowed to live in the Chinese Empire because of this doctrine. However, since laojiao was interpreted in Hanyu and according to Confucian terminology, Muslims in Xinjiang whose language was Turkic did not accept laojiao Islam.

Nevertheless, because of Hui uprisings in Yunnan and Shanxi in the nineteenth century and after their subjugation by Qing troops, the Hui were labeled as “insurrectionists.” However, despite suppression of these uprisings by the Qing, they had no other homeland than China. Surviving Hui had to reconstruct their communities and overcome the Han prejudice against them.

 China’s Islamic revival and the Chinese state

 The period of awakening, 1907-1911

We have argued that laojiao belief theorized the concordance of Islam and Confucianism. Adhering to laojiao Islam, ahongs and literati tried to find new methods to accommodate Islamic belief with new and modern trends of thoughts in the late Qing.

Both constitutionalists and revolutionaries argued about the method of introducing modernity in China after the Russo-Japanese War. By then, people in China had been permitted to go abroad if conditions allowed them, and some privileged Hui had the opportunity. Some paid a visit to Mecca and absorbed the new Middle Eastern Islamic interpretation of revivalism. Some visited Japan as students and absorbed the essence of Western modernism. Adhering to the traditional Islamic philosophy harmonious with Confucianism, and influenced by modernizing trends and by the worldwide Islamic revival, “advanced” ahongs and literati in China also initiated an Islamic revival movement in Chinese characters.

What is the role of ahongs and literati in Hui societies? Ahongs are to be responsible for pointing the essence of human life and world order to Muslims in the community. In concrete terms, they teach Muslims how to implement virtuous deeds in this world. Therefore, ahongs receive enormous respect from Muslims in the community. As for their economic aspects, ahongs of laojiao do not possess property. But their living costs, their activities in mosques, as well as their management of jingtangs, [413] Qur1anic schools attached to mosques, are sustained by tianke (zakat) and sadaqah by Muslims in the community. Ordinary Hui children are sent to the jingtang to learn how to live a moral life based on the teachings of the Qur‘an and other writings. Muslims allocate fees for tianke and sadaqah according to their income. Therefore, even in the past, Hui literati and local power holders, who in many cases were landlords or entrepreneurs, were generous contributors of tianke and sadaqah to support the religious activities of the community.

The social and economic status of these literati and local power holders was highly interdependent on Han society, since most of their commercial clients were Han. Items that they dealt with differed in accordance to regional characteristics. For example, they monopolized wool dealing in Tianjin, they were very successful entrepreneurs in jewelry and antique industries in Shanghai,[414] and dealings in fur and items for Chinese medicine was handled by Hui horse traders in Yunnan, who enjoyed a continued and regular relationships with Muslims in Burma and Thailand.[415]

The Islamic revival movement initiated by these ahongs and local elites can thus be seen supporting the fusion of the Han and the Hui. This is due to the Islamic reformists’ belief that neither faith toward Islam nor Hui communities in China could exist without cooperation and concord with the Han majority.

 The Islamic revival initiated by literati

Hui literati in Japan initiated the first concrete movement for Islamic revival. Enthusiasm for studying in Japan grew because of the eradication of the appointment examination for bureaucrats in 1905. Ostensibly more than 10,000 Qing students were studying in Japan at that time. Most of them were sons of local powers and gentry. Among them, thirty-six Hui students organized the Liutong Qingzhen Jiaoyuhui or “Association for Islamic Education in Tokyo” in 1907. Most of them also had membership in the Zhongguo Tongmenghui or Chinese Revolutionary Association. Accordingly, as revolutionaries, these Hui students were convincing supporters of a modern republican state system instead of the old imperial system. With enough Confucian knowledge to be involved in the examination system, and with the Islamic philosophy that they had learned at jingtang, they felt a responsibility for improving their society.

They asserted their need to pursue three directions, that is, the development of nationalism, the reform and promotion of Islam, and the acceptance of modernism, particularly in modern education. These three elements would, they argued, be indispensable to creating favorable conditions essential for the future of not only the Hui ethnic group but for all of China. The reform of Islam, however, was the most important, since “religions have the power to transform society.”[416] In the coming era of the nation-state, these Hui students believed that it was necessary to reform the Islamic doctrine (laojiao) that had until then been understood according to the traditional imperial system. They believed that faith toward the emperor should be replaced by faith toward the new state, and also assured that this could be done if the Qur‘an and Hadith, as well as the writings of Wang Daiyu, Ma Zhu and Liu Zhi, were more carefully and enthusiastically examined.

The Arabic words for “Islam” or “Muslim” had been almost forgotten during the Qing’s long isolation. First identifying themselves as Chinese “Hui” as well as “Muslims,” they also began to perceive themselves as “Chinese” when they studied abroad. Encounters with several Muslims from the Middle East in Tokyo also inspired such ideas. That is to say, they began to set up both a national identity and an ethnic identity. National identity was necessary to build a nation-state. Ethnic identity was, they believed, also necessary to represent ethnic rights within the framework of a nation-state. Furthermore, as successors to the philosophy of the unity of being, they believed that doing three “correct” and “virtuous” acts, such as the step-by-step construction of a strong and wealthy nation-state, the promotion of modernism, and the reformation of Islam within the modern framework of nation-state, was the fulfillment of Allah’s will.

As revolutionaries, Hui students participated in the Revolution of 1911. The three goals that they pursued in the Republican period were consistent with those of the Islamic reformers.

 Islamic revival by ahongs: a period of adaptation to Republican China, 1912-1949

Ahongs were expected to be responsible for the lives of Muslims and the future of the community. Listening to the ahongs’ preaching, people understood the meaning of human life and the truth of Islamic belief. Therefore, in an era of drastic transformation of thoughts, ahongs were expected to adjust the doctrine of Islam to make it compatible with the new era.

Some reputable ahongs who were widely known in Chinese Hui society initiated a new trend of the Islamic revival in China. One of the most prominent and respected ahongs was Wang Kuan (Haorang) Ahong (1848–1919) in Beijing. Witnessing the reality of Islamic revivalist movements in regions of Turkey, Egypt, and Arabia when he visited Mecca and the Middle East in 1906, he decided to reform Islam in China. Upon coming back to China, the Revolution of 1911 had occurred, and Wang Kuan met Sun Yatsen in September 1912, expressing support for the newborn Republican state.

At the very beginning of the Republican era, Wang Kuan was the most influential laojiao ahong in China, and he determined that faith toward the Mandate of the Heaven of the imperial period should be replaced by faith toward the state. He believed that patriotism should be reinterpreted as virtuous behavior that would resolve social contradictions and bring pacification to society.

Wang Kuan and other ahongs at the beginning of the Republican period consistently interpreted patriotism within the traditional framework of the unity of being. They failed, however, to discover a concrete basis for patriotism in the Qur‘an and the Hadith. Muslims generally regarded the contents of the Qur‘an as guidance for daily life. The speeches of the ahongs were strictly based on the Qur‘an and the Hadith. If a basis for the ahong’s command was not found in the Qur‘an or Hadith, Hui people in the community would not follow him, or might even lose their trust in Islam. The lack of basis for patriotism was a weak point in mobilizing the Hui people to participate in nationalist activities.

In the 1920s, several Hui students and ahongs began to be sent to al-Azhar in Egypt, largely due to the efforts of literati and ahongs as well as to the development of transportation. Wang Jingzhai (1879-1949), an ahong from Tianjin, studied there for half a year in 1921. After coming back to China in 1923, he translated the Qur‘an into Hanyu for the first time. Adhering to traditional lao-jiao, but also influenced by modern trends of thought in the reform of the society, he also supported the new republican state and obtained membership in the GMD. Quite in accordance with the literati, he also pursued the reform of Islam in China in light of nationalism and modernism, especially in the field of education.[417]

The Islamic revival movement in China was to be the “glue” of Chinese national integration. This also meant that all Muslims within the legitimate territory of China were to obey the orders of the Chinese central government. As subcontractors of the central government, the Islamic reformers were to assist them. That is to say, the Islamic revival movement aimed at creating a unified Islamic understanding of Hui ethnicity and of the political position of the “Hui” nationality. According to this logic, the “disobedient” Muslims who did not “improve” their religious way of life, theological curriculum, or political stance would be put under the tutelary guidance of the Islamic reformers, otherwise not only their lives but the whole Chinese nation-state would be overcome by the ambitions of outside aggressors.

Terms such as “progressive,” “advanced,” or “reforming” were keywords to characterize Islamic reformers in China. In a social atmosphere that appreciated “progress and evolution” in view of nation-building, they apparently recognized themselves as xianzhi xianjuezhe , or those qualified to enlighten the “backward” peoples of the tutelage period, in accordance with Sun Yatsen’s theory of the three steps of social evolution. The Islamic reformers were determined to play a role as teachers and leaders to instruct “ignorant” Muslims and make them adhere to the Chinese nation.

 The role of the Yuehua journal

We have seen the outline of the roles of Islamic reformers in the development of the Islamic revival movement in China. The movement took place simultaneously in many regions of China. It is interesting to see that there was no substantial center for the movement. Many ahongs and literati in major cities such as Beijing, Tianjin, Jinan, Nanjing, Shanghai, Kunming, Guangzhou, Xi’an, Chengdu, Xining, and Ningxia were mobilized and followed the movement, founding branches of the Chinese Islamic Association for Progress in each city. That is to say that, under the network of the association, Islamic reformers shared the same tendency to have a double identity as a nation and as Hui, and tried to educate themselves to the idea that there were other Muslims in China. Some of them were in charge of publishing periodicals and books on Islam, while some ran modern schools instead of jingtang. Here, we will examine the Chengda Normal School and its bulletin, the Yuehua.

 The Chengda Normal School

In April 1925, “advanced” ahongs, local power holders, and the elite founded a normal school named Chengda Normal School exclusively for Hui youth in Jinan, Shandong. Aiming at the reform of traditional jingtang education, Chengda later developed into the most famous and influential normal school in Hui society.

Combining modern and Islamic education, its curriculum was unique, with an even combination of “teaching-fostering” courses and religious courses. The “teaching-fostering” courses included subjects such as Hanyu, mathematics, history, English, science, music, physical education, and psychology. The religious course, on the other hand, included subjects such as Arabic, Qur1anic studies, Hadith studies, tawhid, and the history of Islam.

When the Jinan incident occurred in 1928, a part of the school was destroyed. It moved to Beiping (at that time the formal name of Beijing) under the financial assistance of Ma Fuxiang , a prominent and wealthy Hui warlord of the Northwest. The concrete educational purpose of the school was as follows. First, rapprochement of the Hui and the Han was to be furthered while the Hui’s national and ethnic identity was to be fostered. Second, the quality of the ahongs should be improved to adapt to the methods of inquiry required by the times. Third, the training of good teachers at modern schools was to be implemented in order to recover the Hui ethnic character. Fourth, the Hui as an ethnic group were to be effective and active in the service of the Chinese State. Finally, mosques under the strong control of ahongs, and with the authority to interpret the doctrine of Islam, were to be put under the command of a public organization enjoying a consensus.[418] That is to say, even though the school was a private school, it worked to foster students that would be effective in nation-building and promote religion.

 The Yuehua —an introduction to international Islamic affairs and to the promotion of nationalism: the first stage, 1929-1930

The Yuehua began to be published in October 1929 in Beiping, every ten days, as a bulletin of the Chengda Normal School. The proposal to publish it was made by progressive literati of the Huabei region, such as Tang Hesan , the principal of the school, Sun Shengwu , Sun Youming , and Zhao Zhenwu . Zhao Zhenwu became the chief editor. When literati discussed the importance of issuing periodicals, Ma Fuxiang agreed to support the plan financially. Claiming that publication was important to promoting Islam in China, Ma continued to donate 100 yuans every month until June 1932, when he was near death. We now ask the question of why he contributed to the development of the Chengda and the Yuehua?

Subordinate to Jiang Jieshi, Ma Fuxiang was a powerful warlord of the Northwest. Believing in laojiao Islam, he was also a pious follower of the unity of being. As personnel responsible for the security of the region, he worried about the frequent turmoil among the Hui, particularly among the menhuan (saintly lineages of the Sufi tradition). Some of them called for rebellion against the Chinese State and rejected the Han's interference. The Islamic reformers were convinced that the turmoil was caused by the ignorance of menhuan Muslims, who only seemed to interpret the doctrine of Islam as jihad against non-Muslims. Most ordinary Muslims in China, and the menhuan in particular, were exceedingly poor and illiterate. Ma recognized that they followed blindly the commands of the ahong of the community, and that the lack of modern knowledge and a correct understanding of Islam was the cause of the prevailing poverty of the Hui and of their backwardness and ignorance. That is why he decided to contribute financially to the Yuehua, expecting to make the journal a confirmed guide for Muslims in difficulty. [419]

The purposes of the journal are drafted in the first edition, and are almost the same as those of the Chengda Normal School:

1 Promotion of Islam in China in accordance with modern trends

2 Introduction of Muslims from the whole world

3 Development of the Huis' knowledge and promotion of their position in China

4 Resolution of the misunderstanding between the Old Sect and the New Sect

5 Development of a national identity among the Hui

6 Promotion of Hui education and improvement of their livelihood.[420]

Almost all the articles in the journal were written in Hanyu and contributed by ahongs, literati, and students of Chengda and other normal schools. The journal's goal was consistent until the suspension of its publication in 1948, although there were minor changes in the contents.

In the first two years, the contents of the Yuehua were limited to relatively narrow fields, reflecting the moderate trends of the Islamic revival in China until 1931. With regard to point 1 in the list, there were few accurate translations or interpretations of the Qur'an and the Hadith. With regard to point 2, contributors translated English books on Islamic affairs written by Westerners, but there were few direct translations from Arabic. Exceptions included Wang Jingzhai Ahong's translation from Arabic and the presentation of Wang Cengshan , who had studied in Istanbul University and witnessed the reality of modernism in Turkey. Information about domestic Hui affairs, on the other hand, was limited to the Hui communities around Beiping.

Although there were few articles based on actual experience, these writers understood the importance of worldwide movements, especially that of the Muslim Brotherhood initiated by Hasan al-Banna in 1928.[421] Articles based on actual experiences were written and translated by Wang Jingzhai Ahong. When Wang studied in Egypt, the Middle East was experiencing the surge of the Islamic revival movement. The three directions of the movement were Islamic revival, modernism, and nationalism.[422] Leaders of the movement had tried to discover foundations for these three vectors in the Qur'an and the Hadith. In particular, a phrase from the Qur'an

—“Why cannot we fight along with the way of Allah? Weren’t we driven out from our home and separated from our children?”[423] —was familiar to scholars of Islamic jurisprudence in Egypt. Wang quoted the interpretation of the given phrase by his professor at al-Azhar as follows:

We all have the responsibility to protect our parents’ country. Once one’s estate is stolen and one is separated from his wife and children, he ought to fight bravely against the rapacious enemy. Without this intention, any prayer has no meaning. One might not feel ashamed to see his homeland perish and his family pass away unless he recognized the importance of this matter.[424]

In addition to the Qur1anic verse cited here, a phrase from an alleged hadith “hubb al-watan min al-iman (love of the watan [patrie, fatherland, homeland] is an article of faith)” was first introduced to China by Wang Jingzhai.

Modern scholars of Islam have pointed out that none of these phrases exist in the real Hadith. The term watan cannot be found in the Qur‘an. This might mean that the term watan had not existed in Arabic at the time of the Prophet Muhammad. However, this doubtful sentence was thought to appear somewhere in the Hadith and was widely known to Muslims in the Middle East early in the nineteenth century.[425] Apparently Wang himself heard the word watan for the first time in Egypt. Annoyed about how to interpret this popular word from the Middle East, he cites a prominent Egyptian religious leader:

Watan in Arabic means the place where you live. Modern scholars of Islamic jurisprudence call watan the land where people’s rights, duties, lives and fortunes are entrusted. That is to say, there is no contradiction between people’s freedom and statehood. In other words, a state cannot do without freedom. The French scholar Molière claimed “there is no state in an era of despotism.” Watan is the place where people possess political rights, like in the ancient Latin term.[426]

The original text, he noted, was found in the journal of the Wafd Party of Egypt. According to the Qur‘anic phrase, and to the popular phrase of the alleged hadith, Wang concluded that loving one’s fatherland or state was one of the virtues that Muslims should strive for.

We can assess the period from 1912 to 1930 as an era focused on promoting rather than moderating nationalism, as well as an Islamic reform movement based on both the theory of the unity of being and the Islamic revival in the Middle East. Even though Japan tried to establish military hegemony in the Northeast, this country did not yet seem to have any intention of becoming aggressive against the whole of China. Therefore, in spite of Wang Jingzhai’s introduction to the foundations of patriotism from the Hadith, the Islamic reformers in China had not yet emphasized the anti-imperialist tendency that characterized the Islamic revival in the Middle East.

 Direct contact with Egypt and the anti-Japanese movement, 1931-1936

The Yuehua ostensibly changed its character after the printing of its third volume in 1931.[427] Not only did its format change from a newspaper style to a magazine style, but so did its contents. More information directly pertaining to Egypt began to appear as Islamic reformers reinforced their orientation and opinions with regards to discussions taking place in Egypt.

The year 1931 was epoch-making for the Islamic revival movement in China. Four students, including Ma Jian (1906-1978), who was later to translate the Qur‘an into Hanyu, were for the first time officially sent from the Shanghai Islamic School to the al-Azhar University in Egypt, from where they began to send articles for the Yuehua. This meant that these students came to play the role of correspondents, notifying people in China of Islamic affairs in the Middle East, as well as of circumstances in the world outside of China. Furthermore, twenty-two overseas periodicals on Islam in various languages, such as English, German, Arabic, Malay, and Turkish, began to be exchanged. Furthermore, the World Islamic Meeting held in Palestine invited Muslim delegates from China (although a variety of reasons prevented them from attending). In other words, compared to the previous two years, information on the whole Islamic world became more tangible and accurate from 1931 onwards.

Moreover, a crisis in the domestic environment allowed the application of this new input on Islamic theory. This was Japan’s occupation of the Northeast. In order to meet the demand of readers who wished to acquire new knowledge in order to overcome the new difficulties, more than four thousand copies of the Yuehua were issued, spreading throughout Hui communities all over China. The following is an outline of the contents of Yuehua since 1931:

1 Commentary of the Qur‘an and the Hadith, tafsir.

2 Translation of Arabic and English books and criticism.

3 Critiques of religious questions in China, of Hui education, Hui organization, economy, current issues, etc.

4 Reevaluation of Hui history in China and discussions of its intermingling with Chinese culture.

5 Research on various mosques and Hui communities in Anhui, Guangxi, Chahar, Suiyuan, Jiangxi, Shandong, Henan, Jiangsu, Shanxi, and Gansu.

6 Introduction of Muslim personalities from the whole world. This entailed an introduction to Islamic revivalist trends and current issues in Egypt, Afghanistan, Turkey, Syria, Algeria, India, Yugoslavia, and Iran.

7 Literature.

These contents are very similar to those of al-Manār (“The Lighthouse”) edited by Rashid Rida in Egypt. There is no evidence that contributors of the Yuehua subscribed to this journal, which was well known to the whole Islamic world. Yet it is likely that they understood the popular editorial styles of Islamic revivalist journals and tried to follow their trends.[428]

The most important changes in volume three (1931) was the presentation of the Qur1anic annotations based on their translation from Arabic. Known as one of the most “advanced” ahongs to support the Chengda Normal School and the Yuehua, Ma Songting Ahong, the leading ahong of Chengda,[429] discussed the reason why the journal had started to publish translations and commentaries of the Qur‘an (tafsir).

The Qur‘an is the source of all the beliefs and doctrines of Islam. Scholars have always extracted the code of the times and the regions from its source and abided to its authority. We have been in China for more than a thousand years. The language and habits have been assimilated. Along with the times, we had to draw adequate activity and codes from the source. Therefore, we wish to reveal the real doctrine of Islam, make ourselves adapt to the current environment and understand the Qur‘an better …. Even though there are several schools and orders of Islam in China, we must not be tangled by prejudice. If we comprehend the true meaning of the Qur‘an, then we will be free from mistakes.”[430]

Some articles began to be translated from Arabic journals published in Egypt. These were Maëmu2 al-rasa’il (“Anthology of Theses”), Irmad (“Guidance”), and al-Fath (“The Victory”) of Cairo, which were traded or sent to China by mail. Articles concerning Egyptian social reforms, particularly in al-Fath, were often translated into Hanyu in volume three (1931) and four (1932) of Yuehua —for example, an article entitled “Why Don’t You Try?,” written by the Egyptian writer Muhibb al-Din al-Khatib and translated from al-Fath. The content was an appeal to Muslims in Egypt to stop smoking, since smoking was only beneficial to foreign powers, which were imperialistic exploiters of the people in Egypt.

The publication of this article in the Yuehua of January 1932 was ostensibly a contribution to the rise of the anti-Japanese movement, which included strikes and demonstrations in the coastal regions of China in the wake of the Mukden Incident of September 18, 1931. The article was intended to offer a methodology of concrete action for confronting the imperialists.

As discussed earlier, the Islamic reformers in China upheld traditional laojiao Islam based on the philosophy of the unity of being. In addition to this psychological structure, the modern era brought with it powerful new influences from the Middle East, and especially from Egypt.

The Qur1anic interpretation by Muhammad ‘Abduh was the basis of the Egyptian reform movement aimed at expelling Western imperialists. ‘Abduh regarded Islam’s early years as its most glorious and ideal era. The delay of scientific progress in the Islamic world, and the subsequent suppression by Western powers was attributed to the oblivion of the pure virtues of the original Islam. Therefore, if each Muslim retrieved these original Islamic virtues, the conditions of their livelihood could improve sufficiently to become equal to those in the Western world and the glorious status of Muslims could be restored.

With the acceptance of outside information, especially from Egypt, the Islamic reformers in China must have been surprised and excited at the concurrence of the goals of their twenty-year movement with the goals pursued by reformers in Egypt. Reformers in China confirmed that the interpretation of Islamic texts in Egypt, made by respected scholars of Islamic jurisprudence whose mother tongue was Arabic, was more orthodox and proper than the old interpretations in China, which had long been isolated from the center of the Islamic world. That is why they were eager to absorb Egyptian thought.

The most important incident that spurred this tendency was the Mukden Incident. Just after this, the Yuehua appealed to the Hui to save the country, declaring that the Hui's spirit against the aggressors was a part of the Chinese nation's spirit and of its appreciation of justice.[431] The Islamic reformers also perceived that anti-aggression struggles should be shared among all Muslims who were suppressed by imperial powers, in complete accordance with the Egyptian reformers.

The Islamic reformers in China also persisted in their efforts to fulfill their responsibility to protect their own watan against aggressors. The alleged Hadith, "The love of watan is an article of faith" became the foundation of the struggle.[432] Proclaiming the Hui an inalienable part of the Chinese nation, the Yuehua became the leading journal of the anti-Japanese movement among the Hui. Needless to say, it regarded Japanese penetration into China as a threat to the whole Chinese nation. Therefore, even if Japan proposed favorable conditions for the Hui to build a Huihuiguo nation-state guaranteeing "the right of national self-determination," they would reject the proposal. They used to declare: "We are Muslims in China, not Muslims in Turkey nor Muslims in Persia. We are not Muslims from Muslim states. We have to demand a status of nationality as an integral part of the Chinese nation."[433]

 The influence of Nūr al-Islām

Because of the strengthened bond with the al-Azhar University, articles in the bulletin of al-Azhar Nūr al-Islām ("Light of Islam") began to be frequently translated into Hanyu and published in the Yuehua starting with volume four (1932). Since most of the articles in Nūr al-Islām were written by professors of al-Azhar, Islamic reformers believed that its Islamic interpretations were a guiding light or authority in resolving various contradictions and antagonisms among Islamic believers in China.

For example, applauding Nūr al-Islām, Yang Sishi wrote that he had already found in the bulletin effective solutions for the conflicts among the schools and Sufi orders in Chinese Islam. The three big problems of Islam in China at that time were whether vocalizing the Qur'an was permissible, whether lutub (words of worship in Arabic) could be translated into other languages, and whether the Qur‘an itself could be translated into foreign languages. Nūr al-Islām proclaimed that vocalizing the Qur‘an was not permitted because its prohibition was evident in Muhammad’s words, that lutub could be spoken in languages other than Arabic, and that translation of the Qur‘an was also not a problem. [434] In order to show the appropriateness of Nūr al-Islām’s Islamic interpretation, Yang Sishi translated an article by its chief editor advocating translation of the Qur‘an.[435]

First published in 1929, Nūr al-Islām was a bulletin of the al-Azhar University, then considered the most prestigious academy for Muslims in the world. In 1932 another five students were dispatched to al-Azhar from the Chengda Normal School, eventually forming a group together with the five who preceded them. In accordance with the decision of the Chinese students in al-Azhar, contributors of the Yuehua had no choice but to give particular esteem to Nūr al-Islām. This meant that not only Yuehua but almost all Islamic reformers in China were put under the strong theoretical influence of al-Azhar.

 The specific impact of the Risālat al-tawḥīd

Similarly, the Yuehua seemed to inherit the spirit of al-Manār. Clear evidence of this was that a picture of a lighthouse began to decorate the front page of the Yuehua starting with Volume 5 (1933). This alteration of design was ostensibly inspired by al-Manār. Furthermore, the tendency to put emphasis on annotation was accelerated in 1933 when ‘Abduh’s Risālat al-tawḥīd, Renzhuxue Dagang (this title was later changed to Huijiao Zhexue when it was published as a book in 1934) began to be translated into Hanyu by Ma Jian and serialized in the Yuehua. Ma Jian explains why he decided to translate this book as follows:

According to the appraisal by Rashid Rida, who is the chief editor of al-Manār and the best disciple of Muhammad ‘Abduh, this book concisely summarizes the points of tawhid and is the most helpful for beginners. When I first saw Professor Shaykh Ibrahim al-Jibali of the Institute for Islamic Philosophy at al-Azhar, I asked him whether or not there was a new book on tawhid. He immediately introduced this book and recommended me to study it by myself. During my free time, I always read it, caught the meaning and made questions and notes to ask Professor al-Jibali once a week …. Because of the Professor's deep knowledge and modesty, I never gave up studying and also benefited in many ways. Taking advantage of summer vacation this year, I translated the book into Hanyu in order to make it useful to people in China.[436]

The serialization of Renzhuxue Dagang continued until Volume 6, Number 34-36 of December 30, 1934. It was expected to help Muslims in China to gain accurate knowledge of tawhid and to confirm their belief in Islam.[437] In addition to Ma Jian's translation of the Risālat al-tawḥīd, Pang Shifian translated the History of Islam or Yisilan Zongjiaoshi by Professor Muhammad Khuzuli of the University of Egypt, originally published in 1920, and which he began to serialize in 1933. The translation of these important books, as well as the arrival of two professors from al-Azhar to the Chengda Normal School, doubtlessly stimulated the Islamic revival in China.

For example, Zhou Zhongren translated from Nūr al-Islām the Qur'anic annotation by Shaykh Ibrahim al-Jibali, who was the very person who had recommended Ma Jian at al-Azhar to translate Muhammad 'Abduh's Risālat al-tawḥīd.[438] This meant that not only Chengda but the whole Islamic revival movement in China was strongly affected by al-Azhar in terms of the interpretation of doctrine, the methodology of education, and the curriculum. At al-Azhar, the contents of education had come to be "pressed more firmly into a Western inspired mold" under the direction of president al-Maraghi after 1933.[439]

Recognized as "messiahs" for reforming Islam in China, there were high expectations for the two professors Sayyid Muhammad Dali and Muhammad Ibrahim Filfila, who came to China after arrangements were made by both King Fu'ad of Egypt and the president of al-Azhar. King Fu'ad expected them to be a cultural bridge between Egypt and China. They taught Arabic, Islamic philosophy, and theology to students at the Chengda Normal School.[440] Doubtlessly, they were expected to strengthen not only the bond between al-Azhar and Chengda, but also diplomatic and trade relations between Egypt and China.

 Systematization of patriotism and belief in Islam

In relation to the accelerated progress of Islamic reforms under Egyptian assistance, the slogan “Love fatherland and love Islam (aiguo aijiao)” was also rearranged. It began to reutilize and advertise the alleged hadith: “The love of watan is an article of faith.” Under the instruction of two professors from al-Azhar, the ahongs, faculty members, and students of Chengda were ostensibly inspired by this hadith, which had already occupied the most important position among Islamic revivalists in Egypt in their promotion of political, economic, social, and religious reforms against Western imperialists. Aiming at scientific and industrial progress, as well as at the promotion of Hui ethnicity as an element for forming a nation, the phrase became a substantial basis for the national progress of China.

At a conference held at the YMCA Beiping in 1933, Ma Songting Ahong, the most important religious leader of Chengda, made the following address:

The Prophet Muhammad said, “hubb al-watan min al-iman” or “the love of fatherland is an article of faith.” In other words, if there is no love of the fatherland, then people will lose faith. Muslims appreciate faith the most. Because of this morality, there is no Muslim who does not accomplish his duties for the state, nation, religion, birthplace and family …. Recently, Muslim countries such as Persia, Afghanistan and Arabia achieved independence and Turkey has recovered its strength and wealth. Moreover, Muslims in Egypt and India have succeeded in their Islamic revival. In China, Muslims have achieved patriotic activities since the Ming and the Qing periods. If you research into historical books, you can understand this fact easily. Recently we have encouraged the harmony between the Hui (Muslims) and the Han for the common benefit of the whole country. What represents the distinctive spirits of Muslims is that, if someone oppresses or slanders us, everybody, even retailers or trainees, will offer resistance. This means that Muslims in China accept love of association and the doctrine of Islam. If each one can show the virtue of loving their own fatherland and religion, then other countries and religions will give up invading China."[441]

Ma Songting identified the Hui as a part of Muslims outside of China. Encouraged to know the reality of the Islamic revival in the world, he was appealing to Christian youths in Beiping, saying that historically patriotic Chinese Muslims had already begun to contribute toward the construction of a strong Chinese state. There was thus the possibility of fostering nationalism and patriotism among the followers of foreign religions, and Ma Songting wanted to emphasize that there was no contradiction between pious belief in religion and patriotic feeling.

The Islamic reformers in China recognized Chinese Muslims neither as a national nor as a territorial entity. Rather, they understood themselves as sharing common boundaries, territorial integrity, and national identity with other ethnic groups or religious groups such as the Han, the Mongols, the Tibetans, and Christians. In this sense, co-existence and mutual understanding with peoples of various backgrounds were indispensable conditions for the nation-building of China.

There was a distinct difference between Egyptian Islamic reformers and Chinese Islamic reformers concerning the concept of watan. The former recognized watan as their state in which the Muslim majority took leadership. Reformers in Egypt even requested that the King expel or contain Christian missions, even though Christians occupied 20% of the whole population.[442] The multiethnic and multi-religious character in their exclusive watan was not so desirable.

The Islamic reformers in China, on the other hand, reinterpreted watan as a Chinese State where the majority was non-Muslim. Identifying themselves as an indispensable and integral part of the Chinese nation, and also identifying Islamic culture as an important element of a multifaceted Chinese culture, the patriotic phrase of the given hadith became widespread among Hui in all of China. The Hadith was recognized as the true words of the Prophet Muhammad and was expected to contribute in persuading some “disobedient” Hui to stop conflicts against the Han. At the same time, it was expected to inform the Han that their Hui counterparts were not enemies but supporters of China. Therefore, extracting a convenient and helpful discourse from Egyptian reformers and mingling it with their original discussions, Islamic reformers in China constructed their own theory on nationalism.[443]

Students dispatched from Chengda to al-Azhar were supposed to be trained in bringing orthodox Islamic interpretation to China. Because Ma Songting Ahong succeeded in drawing scholarships for Chinese students from King Faruq, the successor of King Fu‘ad, another sixteen students were sent from China in 1937. However, when these Chinese students gathered in Egypt, the hot tide of Islamic reform, including al-Manār’s influence, had already dispersed into the whole of the Islamic world and changed its characters according to regional features. In other words, Chinese students were latecomers to the center of the Islamic revival movement, which had reached its peak in the 1920s.

Though there was no direct influence of al-Manār in China because of the time lag, progressive Hui elites and ahongs appreciated and absorbed many aspects of Islamic reform which Muhammad ‘Abduh and Rashid Rida had initiated and promoted. In other words, the Islamic revival movement in China can be evaluated as another fruit of the work by reformers in Egypt. It has been broadly acknowledged that ‘Abduh and Rida’s works exerted a great influence upon Muslims in from the Western Sahara to the Dutch East Indies. These tides also reached the Far East in the 1930s, where the seeds of nationalism and anti-imperialism were sown.

In memory of the late King Fu‘ad, the Fude Library was founded at Chengda in September 1936 and collected Arabic books, mostly donated by King Fu‘ad to Ma Songting A hong. The aim of the library was to make people in China acknowledge the close relationship between the Arabic and Chinese civilizations. They believed that understanding Islamic affairs was a key to protecting China, because Muslims mostly inhabited the frontier regions. Thus, Islam was not only a religious matter but also a highly political one that was intimately related to the fate of the whole Chinese nation.[444] The Islamic reformers reconfirmed that the Chinese nation needed to be an entity that consisted of various ethnicities and histories.

 The Yuehua after Japan’s invasion of China, 1937-1944

The outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War in July 1937 had a great impact on the whole Chinese population. Thriving anti-Japanese feeling among Chinese helped to transform the Islamic reform movement into a more patriotic one. This also meant that it needed more concrete foundations if it were to inspire Muslims in China to participate in anti-Japanese activities. We will now discuss the reaction of the contributors to Yuehua and the changes in its publishing environment.

The publication was suspended for almost ten months from June 1937 until April 1938 because of the confusion caused by Japanese invasion. In order to avoid occupation by the Japanese Army, the publishing house of Yuehua and the Chengda Normal School evacuated to Guilin, homeland of General Bai Chongxi . With a background in laojiao Islam, Bai Chongxi was an influential General of the Nanjing Government. From April of 1938 onwards, from its new headquarters in Guilin on the southern frontier of Guangxi, the Yuehua continued to send the same messages to Muslims in China. This meant that the Nanjing Government approved and assisted the printing and dissemination of new issues of Yuehua. This also meant that the direction thus far pursued by the Islamic reformers corresponded with that of the Nanjing Government under the anti-Japanese National United Front. Subsidies given by the government to Chengda in Guilin, however, were minimal.[445]

The Yuehua’s anti-imperialist campaign stemmed from an accurate analysis of the status quo. In accordance with the severe war conditions, the Yuehua began to praise with increasing frequency the Chinese nation’s glorious past and multicultural character, the unity of the nation, and to call for the establishment of a strong state after the victory over Japan. In order to defeat Japan, they also stressed the promotion of antiwar education as well as a strong defense against Japan’s intrigues aimed at destroying the unity of the Chinese nation by applying the method of “divide and rule.”

The Islamic reformers in China already understood that Japan was pursuing aggression with excuses when it claimed “Mongolians and Muslims have the right to self-determination and the right to establish their own nation-states,” and they set out to reject these arguments.[446] Not only the Yuehua but also other journals such as Huijiao Dazhong in Zhongqing, Qingzhen Zhongbao in Kunming or Tujue in Nanjing were sending almost the same messages. As the most prestigious journal under the Nationalist Government’s authorization and surveillance, the Yuehua took the leadership of the literary anti-Japanese campaign in Hui society.

The Yuehua continued to publish and quote from the Qur‘an and the Hadith in order to explain the Muslims’ concrete justification for participation in a defensive war, and also in order to explain the need to submit to a single national leader, Jiang Jieshi. Translations of articles from the Maëallat al-Azhar (previously Nūr al-Islām) reinforced this tendency.[447] Egypt was also engulfed in the events of the Second World War, and the Qur‘an, the Hadith, and transcriptions of historical wars began to be reinterpreted in accordance with the state of the conflict. Since Muslims both in China and Egypt struggled for the same goal, Islamic theories imported from Egypt were also applicable to the Chinese situation. A “national emergency” was directing Muslims in China to translate the Qur‘an. This was regarded not only as a religious activity, and as one meant to establish an ethnic identity, but also as a national activity.

In addition, the most distinct difference between prewar and postwar days was the appearance of the discourse on martyrdom. The Yuehua began to call for glorious death in the name of the state and against the enemy. The anti-Japanese war began to be regarded by Muslims as a sacred and just war, jihad.[448] Xue Wenbo , a leading teacher of Chengda, wrote a verse entitled “Song of the Hui with an anti-Japanese determination”:

The enemies have made their horses drink water from the Yellow River

The sacred war for national protection has begun

Muslims have a real spirit, feel ashamed to indulge in living

But we feel proud to participate in the battle

Mosques have been burned down to ruins Innocent women and children are shedding blood Alas, in China we fifty million Muslims Are in disgrace

Religion shows us the way of martyrdom

Do we feel reluctant to bleed for justice?

At the defeat of Japan, we yell out and rejoice

Then Muslim men will undress their military uniform.[449]

Martyrdom had until then not been considered to be a glorious act, since ethnic identity as a “Hui” was originally based on the thoughts of Huirus, to which this notion was not familiar. However, the Islamic reformers in China had no choice but to modify this principle in the face of the unprecedented invasion by a foreign power. Since patriotism had begun to occupy the highest position among human virtues, “glorious death for our own state” came to be judged as an act of religious martyrdom in reference to the Qur‘an and the Hadith.[450]

This important transformation from the mere furthering of patriotism to that of national salvation, for which any sacrifice could be made, was brought forth by the political change. The Nationalist government called for a national salvation movement and for spiritual mobilization after 1939. At the same time, the slogan of “love homeland and love Islam” was converted into “save homeland and save Islam” qiuguo qiujiao .[451]

The hadith concept of “love of the fatherland is an article of faith” was stressed over and over again. In order to encourage the Hui to fight against Japanese invaders, this concept was spread to Hui societies throughout China by means of journals, speeches, and radio broadcasts by ahongs and the elite, as well as by travels of the Hui elite to frontier regions for promotional purposes.

“A message to all Muslims in China from the Chinese Islamic Association for National Salvation” was issued in Ramadan, 1940. It clearly spelled out the duties of Muslims in such difficult conditions. After an explanation of the Islamic revival and Muslim nation-building efforts throughout the world, it declared that Muslims in China should not emphasize their own ethnic self-determination but should focus on national self-determination together with other ethnicities in China. It continued:

We have to implement the teaching “the love of the fatherland is an article of faith” by the Prophet Muhammad and to inherit the Hui’s glorious history in China. In addition, let us reinforce our unity and participate in the twice more difficult task of supporting a defensive war and promoting religion …. We hope that ahongs and the elite will initiate a movement of prayer during Ramadan and implement group prayer to support our intimate feeling toward Islam. A sincere unity of Muslims should be developed to contribute power towards the expulsion of Japan.[452]

During the anti-Japanese war, ahongs were not only at the front of the cultural resistance, but also were enthusiastically supporting the resistance movement in the battlefield. Taking advantage of their prestigious status over ordinary Muslims in the community, the ahongs spoke to the people of the necessity to participate in the war, and if need be of the glories of becoming a mahid. Prominent and influential ahongs such as Xin Zongzhen in Hebei and Hu Songshan of the Ikhwani school in Ningxia, mobilized Muslims in the Hui communities. In the end, the difficult and painful war against Japan brought the formation of a double identity as Hui and as member of the Chinese nation.

 The CCP’s policy toward the Hui: a legacy of Islamic reform

In the wake of the historical coalition between the GMD and the CCP in 1937 in the Shan-Gan-Ning Anti-Japanese Base Area, the CCP implemented its own policy toward ethnic minorities, the Hui, and the Mongols in particular. In view of the formation of the Anti-Japanese National United Front, Mao Zedong presented the new line of the CCP in his On the New Phase in 1938 and On New Democracy in 1940. He stated that the CCP should recognize the Hui and other ethnic minorities as integral parts of the Chinese nation, and that China should thus be a unitary state. Until the coalition, however, the CCP advocated introducing a federal system in China, and Mao’s new line was quite contrary to the CCP platform.

Newly recognizing themselves as the only legitimate successors of Sun Yatsen’s nationalism, the CCP declared that the Hui had equal political and economic rights with the Han. At the same time the party guaranteed them freedom of religion, the preservation of their ethnic culture and customs, and support for ethnic and cultural development. Regional autonomy, which for sixty years had been the pillar of the CCP’s policy toward ethnic minorities, was composed of a combination of the nationalist discourse of Sun Yatsen, Marxism-Leninism, and the wishes of ethnic minorities, the Hui in particular. The Hui had a population of about 1, 500 in the base area.

Concerning the wishes of the Hui, we have acknowledged the fact that the ideology of “Hui ethnicity as a part of the Chinese nation” and their claim to equal political rights with the Han were advocated and spread by the Islamic reformers. However the concurrence of the CCP’s minority policy and the Islamic reform movement did not happen by chance. Li Weihan was a topranking Han cadre of the CCP and was responsible for drafting the new policy toward ethnic minorities after 1938. While writing the booklet Huihui Minzu Wenti (“The Hui Question”), he immersed himself for more than two years in books on Islam and journals by the Islamic reformers published in the end of the 1930s. These were Yuehua, Huijiao Dazhong, Huijiao Qingnian Yuebao, and Tujue.

Li asserted that the Hui, as a minzu (nationality) had political rights, educational rights, and other rights equal to those of the Han, while he simultaneously emphasized that the party should eliminate poverty and forced assimilation, as well as fight racial discrimination. He also claimed that the CCP’s minority policy should grant the Hui all of their wishes and follow the “correct” directions of the Islamic revivalist movement.[453] That is to say, the CCP praised and supported the Islamic reformers’ efforts and orientation up to then. In particular, the Islamic reformers’ enthusiastic encouragement of all Muslims in China to participate in the anti-Japanese War as well as their promotion of anti-Japanese education, were applauded. The orientation of the Islamic reformers helped create the blueprint that would help the CCP in formulating its policy for a unified nation-state that would include multiple ethnicities.

The favored status of the Hui as a “nationality” in the People’s Republic can be understood as a reward for their inclusive patriotic attitude toward the Chinese State. The Islamic reformers also considered the CCP’s policy as ideal for their moral existence. A close relationship was thus built between the CCP and the Hui nationality.

However, the CCP and the Islamic reformers intentionally disregarded the possibility that other ethnic groups in China might wish to have their own nation-state disassociated from China. Both the CCP and the Islamic reformers failed to ponder the more dangerous potentialities of national disintegration. The remedy for any such insurgency was military suppression or conciliation. When the CCP recognized that ethnic problems were equivalent to “Hui problems” and that these could be resolved by use of the methodology propounded by the Islamic reformers, it was clear that new ethnic problems would emerge after the victory over Japan and the GMD. It is needless to say that the separatist movements of the Tibetans and the Uyghurs characterized these problems. As long as the CCP and its followers upheld a unitary state system, appeased “disobedient nationalities” by pointing to the example of “obedient nationalities,” and continued to implement national integration through the Islamic reformers’ policies from the republican era, these difficult problems could not be resolved.

 Conclusion

At the beginning of the nation-state era, Islamic reformers consisting of ahongs, literati, and local elites rediscovered and reevaluated the philosophy of the “unity of being” as the core of a new Hui identity. They regarded this new ethnic identity as indispensable for China’s nation-building and implemented the Islamic revival movement in order to coexist with the other ethnicities. They also took responsibility for the new political and social situation, since all of these phenomena were outflows of the one and only absolute existence, Allah. Absorbing and digesting “newer and better” Islamic interpretations from the outside, ahongs were expected to always be responsible for the protection of the material and spiritual lives of Muslims, not only in their own communities but also in the broader Hui community of China. The Hui local elite and power holders, with their Confucian and Islamic backgrounds, also felt the burden of saving, enlightening, and leading “backward” people out of poverty, ignorance, and a situation in which their political rights were not assured. In order to adjust the reality of the world to the doctrine of Islam, they needed to be accountable to the community to which they belonged. The founders of the Chengda Normal School and the publishers of Yuehua were some of the most progressive elements of these Islamic reformers.

Essentially, both ahongs and the local elite displayed a double faith toward Allah and the ruler of this world. Therefore, at the beginning of the nation-state era, it was rather easy for them to produce a new national identity instead of the simple faith toward the Mandate of Heaven. Their nationalistic tendency throughout the twentieth century can be explained by their psychological structure.

They were pioneers in declaring that Chinese culture had a multiple but unified character. They also asserted that ethnic identity and national identity should coexist within one's mind. This concept is still active in the CCP's policy toward ethnic minorities, in which the CCP attempts to educate and persuade ethnic minorities in China to have both an ethnic and a national identity. This assertion has common points with Fei Xiaotong's famous statement which is, at the same time, the People's Republic's official definition of the Chinese nation, namely that "the Chinese nation has a multiple and unified structure."

In order to support and promote the concept of patriotism and nationalism in the 1930s, the Hui appreciated the discussions of Islamic reform movements in Egypt that were taking place at the time. In fact, these discussions had considerable impact on the foundation and development of the Islamic revival movement in China. The Egyptian reformers' works were applied in order to promote nationalism, modernism, and Islamic reform in China. These concepts "imported" from Egypt contributed to making the Islamic reformers in China an established and distinguished mainstream force, not only among Muslims in China but also in terms of the People's Republic's policy toward ethnic minorities.

However, it is very important to point out that the Chinese reformers only extracted some of the essence of the Egyptian reformers' discussions, which they rearranged in a form more suitable to the Chinese situation. In other words, the style of their activities and their moral basis could not be completely free from their traditional philosophy of the unity of being. The concrete basis of patriotism, however, was supplemented by the alleged Hadith identifying faith toward Allah with faith toward watan (fatherland). "Love fatherland and love Islam" was regarded as the most effective moral code for Muslims in China. Its slogans were hung on the wall of mosques, just as the slogan of "hurrah for the emperor" used to be seen in mosques in the Qing era. The slogan was taught in schools for Hui children and preached by ahongs in mosques every Friday. Under the tutelage of the educational system initiated by the Islamic reformers, the Hui's obedience to authority became a religious theory.

We have discussed the policy of regional autonomy adopted by the People's Republic at the request of the Islamic reformers. In addition, we may point out that the discussion of the Islamic reformers with regard to the Chinese nation is very similar to the more recent official discourse about the Chinese nation with a multiple and unified structure. The three directions advocated by the Islamic reformers, nationalism, modernism, and the promotion of Islam have been again carefully upheld since the initiation of the Reform and Open Policy in 1978.

As long as they advocated patriotism as the highest political and moral code, the Hui's political status in the state was guaranteed. If we set aside the Tibetans and Uyghurs, ethnic problems have apparently been minimal during the last two decades, at least in China's provincial districts. It seems that in China ethnic consciousness does not always seem to lead to the ethnic nationalism that brought the tragedies of Yugoslavia or Chechnia. This means that the ethnic identity of various national groups in China, for the most part fuses with the central government's purpose of national integration. There may be objections that such ethnic identity in China is a "pseudo identity" that is manipulated by the government. However, as we sought to prove in this paper, the Islamic reformers' efforts for national integration, at least, cannot be underestimated.

[412] Matsumoto Akiro , "Ba Rengen cho 'Tenpo Seiri Abunchukai' no kenkyu ," Toyoshi kenkyu 58/1 (1999).

[413] Ma Shouqian , "Huizu Yisilanjiao de Jingtang Jiaoyu [Jingtang Islamic Education of the Hui]," in Xibei Huizu yu Yisilanjiao [Northwestern Hui Nationality and Their Islam] (Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe, 1994), 239–242. Also see several papers on Jingtang in Xi1an Yisilan Wenhua Yanjiuhui , ed., Yisilan Wenhua Yanjiu [Islamic Cultural Studies] (Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe, 1998).

[414] Chu Ketong , "Guwan shichang he zhubao yishi—Shanghai Huizu Musilin de Chuantong Hingye [Antique Markets and the Traditional Occupation of Jewerly]," in Zhongguo Isilanjiao Yanjiu Wenji Bianxuezu, ed.,

Zhongguo Isilanjiao Yanjiu Wenji (Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe, 1988), 465–474.

[415] Yang Zhaojun Ma Chaogun , and Ma Weiliang (eds), Yunnan Huizu shi [History of the Hui of Yunnan] (Kunming: Yunnan Minzu Chubanshe, 1989), 201–204.

[416] Cai Dayu , “Liutong Qingzhen Jiaoyuhui xu [Introduction to the Islamic Educational Association in Tokyo],” in Liudong Qinzhen Jiaoyuhui , ed., Xing Hui Pian (Reprint, Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe, 1992), 85.

[417] Wang Jingzhai, “Wushi nian qiuxue zishu [Memoir of My Fifty-Year Study],” in Li Xinghua and Feng Jingyuan, eds, Zhongguo Isilan Jiaoshi Cankao Ziliao Xuanbian (1911–1949) (Yinchuan: 1985), 622–623.

[418] Ma Songting, “Zhongguo Huijiao yu Chengda Shifan Xuexiao [Islam in China and the Chengda Normal School],” Yugong 5/11 (1936).

[419] Jing Jidang “Gu Ma Fuxiang xiansheng xingbang jiaoyu shilüe [The Late Ma Fuxiang’s Promotion of Education],” Yuehua 7/25, 26, 27 (September 30, 1936).

[420] Yuehua 1/1 (November 5, 1929).

[421] Li Tingbi , “Yisilan shisi shiji shidai zhi qingnian [The Muslim Youth in the Fourteenth Islamic Century],” Yuehua 2/6 (February 25, 1930).

[422] Kosugi Yasushi, Gendai Chuto to Isuramu seiji [The Modern Middle East and Islamic Politics] (Tokyo: Showado, 1994), 10–12.

[423] Al-Qur1an (surah 2: 246).

[424] Wang Jingzhai, trans. and interpretation, “Jinshou Huijiao yu Aihu Guojia [Protection of Islam and Love of the Fatherland],” Yuehua 2/3 (January 25, 1930).

[425] C. Ernest Dawn, “Ideological Influences in the Arab Revolt,” The World of Islam: Studies in Honor of Philip K. Hitti (New York: Macmillan, 1959).

[426] Wang, “Jinshou Huijiao yu Aihu Guojia.”

[427] Ma Songting , “Wunian yilai zhi Yuehuabao [The Yuehua Journal in These Five Years],” Yuehua 6/28, 29, 30.

[428] The following is a list of journals or papers traded in exchange for the Yuehua from 1931 until the mid-1930s: al-Fattah (Cairo) seemed to be the earliest journal acquired by the editors of the Yuehua; al-Sath (Cairo), al-Islam 5, 6 (Tunis), Moslemische Revue (Berlin), al-Maban al-salamin, Sırat-ı müstakim 1 (Istanbul), The Islamic Review (London), Pembela Islam (Java), The Mirror of Truth and Guide to Happiness, Mohammad and Christ, The Call of Islam, Back to Qur1an, The Ahamadiyya Movement, al-Huda (Singapore). (From several issues of the fifth volume of Yuehua).

[429] Concerning the bibliography of Ma Songting, see Sai Shengbao, “Aiguo zhuyizhe, Yisilan jingxue jiaoyujia Ma Songting Daahong ,” Huizu Yanjiu 2 (1992).

[430] Ma Songting, “Wunian yilai zhi Yuehua bao.”

[431] Ma Yugui , “Guonan fangyin! Jiaobao suqi! [National Difficulties Will Come Soon! Muslims, Wake Up Soon!],” Yuehua 3/27 (September 25, 1931).

[432] Yisilan Xueyouhui, “Yisilan Xueyouhui kangri xuanyan [Anti-Japanese Declaration by the Muslim Students Association],” Yuehua 3/35 (December 15, 1931).

[433] Xue Wenbo , “Zhongguo Huizu de diwei he bensheng yingyou de renshi [The Status of the Hui Nationality and the Required Consciousness],” Yuehua 4/10, 11, 12 (April 5, 1932).

[434] Yang Sishi , “Duiyu Aiji huiguang yuekan de pingyu [Assessment of Nūr al-Islām],” Yuehua 4/33 (November 25, 1932).

[435] Muhammad Hazar Hoseini, “Zhuanshu Gulan zhi yiyi wei waiguowen [Transfering the Right Meaning of the Translation of the Qur1an into Foreign Languages],” trans. Yang Sishi, Yuehua 5/1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (1993).

[436] Ma Jian, “Renzhuxue dagang,” Yuehua 5/27 (September 25, 1933).

[437] “Bianjishi Tanhua ,” Yuehua 5/30 (October 25, 1933). In addition to the Risālat al-tawḥīd, Ma Jian translated Husayn al-Jisr’s Saʃayiʃ din al-Islam into Chinese and entitled it Huijiao Zhenxiang [The Reality of Islam], under the recommendation of professor Jibali of al-Azhar. The translation was finished in 1937 and published in Zhongqing. Ma Jian also translated a book to solve the question of contradictions between science and religion. Husayn al-Jisr came from Tunisia and was a disciple of Muhammad 2Abduh.

[438] Zhou Zhongren “Gulanjing yijie [Commentary of the Qur1an],” Yuehua 6/34, 35, 36 (December 30, 1934).

[439] J. Jomier, “Al-Azhar,” EI2.

[440] “Felifeile Boshi zai Zhongshan Gongyuan Huanying dahui xishang zhi jiangyan ci [Dr Filfila’s Speech at the Welcome Conference at the Zhongshan Park]” Yuehua 5/25 (September 5, 1933).

[441] Ma Songting, “Huijiao yu rensheng [Islam and Life],” Yuehua 5/35 (December 15, 1933).

[442] Ma Zishi , “Aiji Huijiaotu hujiao yundong [The Egyptian Muslim Movement for the Protection of Islam],” Yuehua 5/26 (September 15, 1933).

[443] To some extent, Islamic reformers in China were inclined to support Muhammad Iqbal of India who insisted on the formation of one Indian nation upon the fusion of both Hindu and Muslims. Information on Iqbal, a prominent leader of the Islamic reform movement in India, was partly transmitted by another of Yuehua’s correspondents Hai Weiliang , who studied at the Lucknow Islamic Institute in India. See Hai Weiliang “Indu zhuming Huijiao shiren Ikeba boshi zhi lunzheng [The Famous Indian Poet Iqbal’s Political Discussions],” Yuehua 5/29 (October 25, 1933).

[444] Ai Yizai “Bannian lai de Beiping Chengda Shifan Xuexiao [The Chengda Normal School in the Last Six Months],” Yugong 7/4 (1936).

[445] Liu Tongsheng , “Chengda Shifan Xuexiao xiaoshi shuyao ,” Huizu Yanjiu 11 (1993): 72.

[446] Mu Fu “Cong Beijing Huijiaohui dao Zhongguo Huijiao Zonglianhehui ,” in Wenshi Ziliao Yanjiuhui, ed., Wenshi Ziliao Xuanbian 32 (Beijing: Beijing Chubanshe, 1987).

[447] (Maëallat al-Azhar 6/9) Yuehua 11/28–30 (1939); (Maëallat al-Azhar 11/7) Yuehua 13/1–3 (1941); (Maëallat al-Azhar 11/7) Yuehua 13/4–9 (1941); (Maëallat al-Azhar special edition 1939) Yuehua 13/10–12 (1941); (Maëallat al-Azhar 11/4) Yuehua 13/28–30 (1941); (Maëallat al-Azhar 6/9) Yuehua 13/28–30 (1941); (Maëallat al-Azhar 6/9) Yuehua 13/28–30 (1941).

[448] Anonymous, “Yuehua Luntan ” Yuehua 10/14, 15, 16 (September 5, 1938).

[449] Xue Wenbo, “Zhongguo Huizu kangzhenge ,” Yuehua 11/18 (September 25, 1939).

[450] Zheng Daoming , “Cong Huijiao zhi zhanzheng quanyi shuodao women de shensheng kangzhan [Interpretation of Our Holy War from the Perspective of Islamic War],” Yuehua 11/4, 5, 6 (February 25, 1939).

[451] “Guilin Tongxiang daxu Huimin Juxing shendan Jinian shengkuang ,” Yuehua 11/10–15 (May 25, 1939).

[452] “Zhongguo Huijiao Qiuguoxiehui gao quanguo Huibao shu [Message from the Chinese Islamic Association for National Salvation to all Muslims in China],”Yuehua 12/28, 29, 30 (October 25, 1940).

[453] Minzu Wenti Yanjiuhui , ed., Huihui Minzu Wenti (Reprint, Beijing: Minzu Chubanshe, 1981), 129.

* 7. The Transmission of Al-Mānar’s Reformism to the Malay-Indonesian World: The case of al-Imām and al-Munīr

Azyumardi Azra

The spread and influence of modern Islamic reformism to the Malay-Indonesian world since the early twentieth century have been recognized by many scholars of Malay-Indonesian Islam. In a general way, scholars have delineated the influence of such reformist scholars or activists as Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, Muhammad ‘Abduh, Rashid Rida, and others in reformist or modernist organizations such as the Sarekat Islam, Muhammadiyah, Persatuan Islam, or Jong Islamieten Bond. Little attention, however, has been paid to the channels of transmission of modernist or reformist ideas from the Middle East, especially Cairo and Mecca, to the Malay-Indonesian world.

There is no doubt that the printed word was the instrumental means responsible for the transmission of modernist or reformist ideas to the Malay-Indonesian world. It is within this context that we can appropriately place the reformist journal al-Mānar, which significantly influenced the course of Islamic reformism in the region. The journal not only directly influenced the spread of Islamic reformism through its own articles, but was most influential in stimulating the publication of similar journals within the Malay-Indonesian world. This chapter is an early attempt to delineate and comprehensively discuss the transmission of Islamic reformism to the Malay-Indonesian world by means of journals, namely by the two indigenous journals al-Imām and al-Munīr.

Regarding the journal al-Mānar itself, a brief note should be made. It is well known that the backbone of al-Mānar was the reformist scholar Muhammad Rashid Rida. Deeply influenced by Afghani and especially by ‘Abduh, his main mentor, Rida published his own magazine, al-Mānar (“The Lighthouse”), which first appeared in 1898 in Cairo as a weekly, and subsequently as a monthly, until his death in 1935. The objectives of al-Mānar were to articulate and disseminate the ideas of reform and preserve the unity of the Muslim umma. It was Rida himself who edited most of the articles that appeared in al-Mānar. Therefore, one can argue that al-Mānar was the personal work of Rida.[454]

 al-Mānar and the Malay-Indonesian world

In her fascinating study of Indonesian students in Cairo, Abaza has correctly argued that, during colonial times, Cairo played an important role as a center for the publication and circulation of journals and magazines. There were a number of magazines and journals published in Cairo that were circulated in the Malay-Indonesian world. In addition to al-Mānar, which is under discussion here, it is also known that the journal al-ʿUrwa al-Wuöqa, a predecessor of al-Mānar, was in circulation in the Malay-Indonesian world.

It is important, however, to point out that Cairo also received a number of magazines and journals published in the Malay-Indonesian world. It seems possible to find in the collection of the Cairo National Library, Dar al-Kutub, Malay-Indonesian magazines and journals such as al-Iqbal (Java), al-Hudā (Singapore), al-Mirʿa al-muhammadiyya (Yogyakarta), al-Talira al-islāmiyya, and al-Irmad (Pekalongan). Considering this, Cairo is seen playing an undeniably crucial role in the mutual transmission of ideas from one region to another. In fact, Cairo was not only the center for the publication of Arabic literature, but also a center for Malay literature as well.[455]

The influence of al-Mānar on the Malay-Indonesian world can hardly be overestimated. Despite Dutch efforts to ban it from entering the Archipelago, it was regularly read in various parts of the region. In fact, it has been suggested that al-Mānar was reasonably well circulated within the Malay-Indonesian world by several means.

The first is smuggling. It appears very likely that al-Mānar was mostly smuggled into Indonesia through certain ports where Dutch supervision was lax. Mukti‘ Ali points out that al-Mānar was smuggled into Indonesia, or more precisely into Java, for instance, via the port of Tuban in East Java, where there was no customs supervision. According to Pijper Bluhm-Warn, the adviser to the Dutch Government for Native and Arab affairs, who was also responsible for supervising the spread of Islamic literature in Indonesia, the Dutch did not censor the shipment of al-Mānar to Ahmad Surkati, founder of the Irshad movement in the archipelago.[456]

The second means by which al-Mānar was brought into Indonesia was by way of certain hajjis who returned after their pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, where the journal was in wide circulation. It is well known that from the early history of Islam in the archipelago, especially from the sixteenth century onwards, the pilgrimage had been an effective means of the transmission of not only Islamic ideas, but also of a large amount of literature from the Middle East to the region. It is therefore not difficult to understand why Snouck Hurgronje, the leading adviser to the Dutch colonial government on Islamic affairs, suggested that the Dutch pay special attention to supervising returning hajjis.[457]

The third means of transmission of al-Mānar was returning students either from Cairo or Mecca and Medina. As Roff shows, the number of Malay-Indonesian students in these places grew significantly in the early 1920s.[458] This increase allowed them to establish organizations and publish their own journals, the most prominent of which was the Seruan Azhar.[459] The Seruan Azhar itself, as we will see later, played an important role in the continued Islamic intellectual discourse in the Malay-Indonesian archipelago.

The fourth means was through certain “appointed” agents. This is clear in the case of Sayyid Muhammad ibn ʿAqil ibn Yahya, one of al-Imām’s leading associates in Singapore. In an obituary to the Sayyid, Rashid Rida mentions that he took the trouble to circulate al-Mānar in Singapore, Java, and the entire Indonesian archipelago.[460]

The spread of al-Mānar was not confined to the Dutch East Indies and the Straits. al-Mānar, and al-Imām, also circulated in the Kota Bharu area of Kelantan. As Nik Hassan makes clear, together with other reformist journals such as Pengasuh (first printed in Kota Bharu in 1918), al-Ihwān (first printed in Pulau Pinang in 1926), and Saudara (first printed in Pulau Pinang in 1928), it played a crucial role in the spread of Kaum Muda ideas in the Kelantan region. All of these journals were among the most important sources of reformist ideas among such ulama as Haji Muhammad Yussof bin

Muhammad, popularly known as Tok Kenali (1868–1933), Haji Wan Musa bin Haji Abdul Samad (1874–1939), and Haji Ahmad Manam (1834–1938).[461]

It is clear that the influence of al-Mānar went beyond journals, magazines, and reformist organizations. al-Mānar even inspired certain writers to write novels containing the reformist ideas that it preached. Shaykh al-Hadi, mentioned earlier, for instance, wrote a novel entitled Farida Lanum that is set in Cairo in late 1894. Despite the fact that the work is fiction, he wished to give some sense of realism and credibility through references to “real people, places, and events.” Thus, for instance, he mentions the names of Cairo streets; he also described the Egyptian ruler, Muhammad ‘Abduh, the journal al-Mānar, and even several Egyptian feminists. As Hooker points out, the specific reference to Muhammad ‘Abduh and the reformist journal al-Mānar in the closing pages of the novel, locate the narrative firmly in the context of reformist Islam.[462]

Another such novel is Hikayat Percintaan Kasih Kemudaan written by Ahmad Kotot (b. 1894), a native Malay. This novel also included the theme of Islamic reformism preached by al-Mānar. Although the novel was written in a Malay setting, it is distinguished by its Islamic reformist underpinnings.

 al-Imām: mouthpiece of reform (1906-1908)

It is doubtless that al-Imām (“The Leader”) was one of the most important channels of the transmission of al-Mānar’s ideas to the Malay-Indonesian world. In his classic study, Roff concludes that, in the first place, al-Imām was a radical departure from standard journals in the field of Malay publications. It was distinguished from its predecessors both by its intellectual stature and intensity of purpose, and by its attempt to formulate a coherent philosophy of action for a society faced with the need for rapid social and economic change. Second, Roff argues that the range and orthodoxy of al-Imām was representative of the incipient movements, which could be seen growing in almost every aspect of Malay life.[463]

The fact that al-Imām was inspired by and modeled on al-Mānar has been agreed upon by many scholars including Roff. It was from the Egyptian reformist movement that the writers and sponsors of al-Imām derived, almost in totality, their reformist ideas. Therefore, like the al-Imām circle in the Minangkabau area, the reformist group in Malaya that was responsible for the publication of al-Imām was known as “kaum al-Mānar”, or the “al-Mānar faction.” An examination of the contents of al-Mānar, as detailed by Adams,[464] makes clear the extent to which al-Imām was modeled upon it; and the Malay journal contains abundant references to and excerpts from al-Mānar.[465]

Thus, it is clear that al-Imām was one of the most important intellectual loci of reformist Muslims in the Malay-Indonesian world. In addition to being known as “kaum al-Mānar, “ as has been pointed out earlier, this reformist group was also popularly known as the “kaum muda, “ the young reformist group, as opposed to the “kaum tua, “ the old traditionalist group. The “kaum muda, “ as one might expect, was inspired and influenced by such reformist Middle Eastern figures as Afghani, ‘Abduh, Rida, and the like, and proposed the renewal of Islam. On the other hand, the “kaum tua” was the proponent of the established and traditional Islam. The reformist tendency represented by the al-Imām group can be seen in the biography of its editors and publishers. These were Shaykh Muhammad Tahir bin Jalaluddin al-Minangkabawi al-Azhari, the first editor, Sayyid Shaykh bin Ahmad al-Hadi, a Melaka-born Malay-Arab who was a frequent and colorful contributor; Haji Abbas bin Muhammad Thaha, a Singapore-born Minangkabau, the second editor, and Shaykh Muhammad Salim al-Kalali, an Acehnese merchant who was director of al-Imām during its first two years.[466]

The most notable figure, not only among the editors of al-Imām, but also among the “kaum muda” was Shaykh Muhammad Tahir bin Jalaluddin al-Minangkabawi al-Azhari, who was born in Kototuo, Bukittinggi in West Sumatra in 1869. His father, Shaikh Muhammad, also called Shaykh Tahir, was a well-known ulama in his area, a son of Shaykh Ahmad Jalaluddin orTuanku Sami, a judge of the Paderi in the Padri Movement in Central Sumatra in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.[467] His father died when he was 2 years old, followed by his mother when he was 8. When he was 12 years old (c. 1881), he was sent to Mecca where he stayed with his well-known cousin, Shaykh Ahmad Khatib al-Minangkabawi. Ahmad Khatib was known not only as a teacher of many Jawi students in the Holy City, but was known as the grand imam of the Shafiʻi madhhab in the Haram.[468]

After studying in Mecca for about fourteen years he went to Cairo to study 2ilm al-falak (astronomy) at al-Azhar. It was during his four-year sojourn in Cairo that he was introduced to the teachings of the celebrated reformist Muhammad ‘Abduh. It is also reported that he formed a close relationship with the most brilliant of Abduh’s students, Muhammad Rashid Rida. It is said that later, in 1898, when Rida founded al-Mānar, Muhammad Tahir contributed articles to its columns. If this is true, then he sent his writings to al-Mānar from Mecca, where he lived and taught from 1897 to 1899. Whatever the case, it is clear that he was profoundly influenced by the reformist ideas voiced in the circle of al-Mānar.

In 1899 Muhammad Tahir returned from Mecca to his homeland in West Sumatra. However, he chose Malaya instead of Sumatra as his home, and on 28 September of that year settled in Kuala Kangsar in the State of Perak, where he married a Malay girl. A year later, he was appointed religious officer by the Sultan of Perak, Idris Murshidil Muʻazzam Shah, and in August 1904 he was commissioned as a member of the council of the chiefs and religious elders of the State of Perak. Although he chose to settle in Perak, Muhammad Tahir frequently traveled to Riau-Lingga and Sumatra.

In 1903 he was invited, together with his close friend Sayyid Shaykh bin Ahmad al-Hadi, to accompany a “mission” to Mecca and Cairo, which included the sons of the Sultan and Raja Muda of Riau. Two years later, in 1905, he went to Singapore, where he initially joined his friends to help organize the pilgrim brokerage on the island, a business in which he had been involved since his latest sojourn in Mecca. It was during his stay in Singapore that he met a number of ulama, wealthy people, and personalities who were knowledgeable, able, and willing to work collectively to publish a journal to be known as al-Imām, beginning in July 1906.[469]

It is important to point out that while serving as the editor in chief of al-Imām, Muhammad Tahir was involved in various other activities. Before and after the First World War he taught in various institutions, the most prominent of which was Madrasa al-Mansur in Penang, which was established by his friend Sayyid Shaykh bin Ahmad al-Hadi. In 1928 he visited his homeland in Sumatra and was immediately arrested by the Dutch authorities for six months on suspicion of being a leftist with Communist leanings in his religious teaching.[470] After a thorough investigation, the Dutch found no evidence supporting their suspicion against him and he was freed. He then returned to Malaysia and settled in Johor until his death in 1957. Muhammad Tahir wrote several books in Arabic and Malay, dealing with religious matters in general and astronomy in particular.

As Roff argues, Muhammad Tahir seems to have combined both the reformist spirit evident among a section of the Jawi community in Mecca in the 1880s and 1890s, and something of the more sophisticated modernism of contemporary religious thought in Cairo. It is also clear that he was profoundly influenced by the Pan-Islamism of Afghani and by the reformist ideas of Abduh, ideas that were current in the al-Mānar circle. Therefore, it is not surprising for him and his friends to fashion al-Imām in the image of al-Mānar.[471]

The second intellectual figure that was closely connected with al-Imām was Haji ʿAbbas bin Mohammad Taha, who succeeded Muhammad Tahir as editor of al-Imām and officially reorganized it in March 1908. Though he was born in Tanjung Pagar, Singapore in 1885, his parents were from the Minangkabau area in West Sumatra. When he was a small boy, he was sent by his parents to Mecca to acquire religious knowledge. On returning to Singapore in 1905 he worked mainly as a teacher. In 1906 he published a book on education and its philosophy entitled Kitab Sempurnaan Pelajaran (the Book of Perfection in Education). When al-Imām ceased its publication in December 1908, he was appointed qadi of the Tanjung Pagar district, where he remained active in the reformist cause, founding and editing the weekly newspaper Neracha (“The Scales”) in 1911, followed by its companion monthly journal Tunas Melayu (“The Malay Seeds”) in 1913. As Roff points out, these two reformist intellectuals were dedicated to the goals elaborated by al-Imām in 1906. Concerned about the religious conflict that erupted between “Kaum Muda” and “Kaum Tua,” Haji ʿAbbas urged the formation of a special association of religious leaders. For that purpose, in 1936 he made an appeal to found the Persekutuan Ulama Kaum Semenanjung (“the pan-Malayan Association of Ulama”). In the same year he was appointed chief qadi of Singapore. He was also in close association with Burhanuddin al-Helmi, a politically orientated young reformist activist, who was also of Minangkabau origin. Together they were involved in the debate against “Kaum Tua,” which inspired Haji Abbas to write a booklet entitled “Risalah Penting pada Masalah Jilatan Anjing di atas Empat Mazhab” (“An Important Booklet on the Case of Being Licked by a Dog According to the Four Madhhabs of the Sunni”).[472]

The next pillar of al-Imām was Sayyid Shaykh bin Ahmad al-Hadi (1862-1934). Born in Malacca, his father Ahmad al-Hadi was of Hadhrami descent, and his mother was Malay. As a boy he attended for some years a well-known madrasa in Kuala Trengganu. When he was 14 years old, his father took him to Pulau Penyengat, Riau, where his father had connections with the royal house. There he was adopted by Raja Ali Kelana bin Raja Ahmad, half brother of the Sultan and also Raja Muda (then heir apparent to the Sultan), and brought up with the royal children.[473]

As a young man, Sayyid Shaykh was put in charge of the rumah wakaf, the hostel in which travelers were accommodated while visiting the court. Here he had the opportunity to be on familiar term with many noteworthy ulama and to further his own religious knowledge and interests through discussions and debates. In the early 1890s he assisted in the formation of the Persekutuan Rushdiyyah, a study club similar to those set up in Singapore at about the same time, and took an active interest in its activities.[474]

His close association with the court circle can be seen from the fact that on more than one occasion he accompanied the sons of the Sultan and Raja Muda on the pilgrimage to Mecca and to Egypt and the Levant, traveling in 1903 with Muhammad Tahir, with whom he had forged a close friendship. It is perhaps because of these visits that he was reported to have studied in Mecca. But, as Roff points out, it is unlikely that Sayyid Shaykh received much formal religious education during these visits. There is no doubt, however, that he became familiar, probably through the influence of Muhammad Tahir, with the ideas current in the Middle Eastern metropolitan centers of Islam at this time.

During this period Sayyid Shaykh had already been living in Singapore; since 1901 to be precise, for that is when he was appointed by his adoptive father, Raja Ali Kelana, initially as agent and then as manager of his brickworks company. In 1906 he took a leading role in the establishment of al-Imām, increasingly becoming a prominent figure in the Malay-Muslim community. Even though he was not an ʿalim of the calibre of Muhammad Tahir, he was very sharp and eminently suited to the polemicist and propagandist role in which he cast himself. In the course of his long and varied career he was known as a shari ʿa lawyer, educator, merchant, and publisher; however, he is today mostly remembered in journalism and literature.

It is important to note in passing that Sayyid Shaykh’s connection with the Riau court and its intellectual circles contributed to al-Imām’s special importance in the Riau region, as argued by Andaya.[475] According to this author, the fidelity with which al-Imām relayed Arabic opinion on a variety of issues assured it a high standing in the Riau court, where it was read by the Sultan himself. The interest of the Penyengat princes in al-Imām was also stimulated because a number of them, notably Raja Hitam and Raja Ali, were active contributors, while they personally knew the editors. In addition to Sayyid Shaykh’s special position mentioned earlier, Muhammad Tahir Jalaluddin traveled several times to the area, giving advice and religious instruction. Thus, Andaya concludes, the relationship between the founders of al-Imām and the Riau court meant that, as Snouck Hurgonje remarked, the journal was a “suitable place for [Raja Ali and his advisers] to publish their desires and grievances.” al-Imām, which subscribed to pan-Islamism, responded accordingly to their grievances, as will be discussed later.

The next pillar of al-Imām was Shaykh Muhammad Salim al-Kalali, who was its first managing director. Though only very little information is available about him, it is known that he was an Acehnese of Hadhrami descent, and that he was a generous merchant residing in Singapore. Despite his epithet of “shaykh,” and although several major articles such as “al-Ummah wa al-watan” are attributed to him,[476] Roff believes that his importance to al-Imām was less as a scholar or writer than as a businessman.[477]

The last figure associated closely with al-Imām was Shaykh Sayyid Muhammad bin ʿAqil. When the management of al-Imām was commercially reorganized in March 1908, resulting in the establishment of the al-Imām Printing Company Ltd., Sayyid Muhammad ʿAqil was chosen and appointed as the Company Director (“mudir”). Little is known about him, although he acquired a certain public fame beyond the Malay-Muslim community when he was put on trial with two others in 1908 for the murder of Sayyid ʿAbd al-Qadir al-Sagoff, another leading Singaporean Hadrami. Though the trial ended inconclusively, Sayyid Muhammad bin ʿAqil was subsequently cleared of all blame when it was discovered that a principal witness for the prosecution had committed systematic perjury. Later, an important study found that he had a strong tendency toward Shiʿism.[478]

What was the content of al-Imām? For the purposes of this paper it is worthy to cite Roff, who has delineated the realm of concern of al-Imām.[479] al-Imām’s first concern was with religion and not directly with social, even less with political change. At the same time, such a tripartite division would have in some measure been foreign to the editors and writers of the journal, who shared the traditional Islamic concept of the undifferentiated umma in which spiritual, social, and political well-being is subsumed under another criteria—the good and profitable life lived according to Divine Law.

With this in mind, it is not surprising to find that the attention of the editors and writers was to turn, in the first place, to the state of Malay society. According to Roff, almost all of the thirty-one issues of the journal contain at least one article, and often more, analyzing the ills of the community. In self criticism and condemnation, al-Imām reveals the backwardness of the Malays, their domination by alien peoples, their laziness, their complacency, their bickering among themselves, and their inability to cooperate for the common good.

In al-Imām's analysis the root cause of the decline of the Muslim peoples from their past glory is that they have ceased, in their ignorance, to follow the commands of God as expressed through the mouth and the life of His Prophet Muhammad. As an instrument for discovering and understanding the Divine Law, man has been gifted with ʿakal (reason), an intelligence it is incumbent upon him to use and to develop. Islam is not, writes al-Imām, as its detractors allege, hostile to knowledge and progress as exemplified by the West. On the contrary, a proper understanding of and submission to the law and spirit of Islam is "our only means of competing successfully with those who now rule and lead us."[480]

Proceeding with its diagnosis, al-Imām goes on to exhort certain groups of people to take the necessary action. It urges the rulers and traditional leaders to form associations to foster education, economic development, and self-awareness. It also urges the ulama to cleanse an Islam that had been adulterated by impurities of customs and belief derived from ʿadat and from other religions. The ulama that transmit the impure Islam should be brought to a sense of their errors and obligations. For this purpose, al-Imām put strong emphasis on the need to return to the Qurʿan and Hadith, and to practice ijtihad (independent reasoning and judgment) rather than taklid buta (blind acceptance of intermediary authority) for their understanding.

al-Imām pays attention not only to socio-religious matters, but also to political issues. One of the pet issues taken up by al-Imām relates to pan-Islamism. This is of course not surprising, since its intellectual genealogy is al-Mānar and al-ʿUrwa al-Wuöqa, both of which are closely related to Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, one of the most important pioneers of pan-Islamism.

Thus, when the issue of the “Caliphate” was brought forward by the Turkish Sultan Abdülhamid, al-Imām also took it up enthusiastically. Right from the very beginning of its existence, al-Imām printed news on Turkey at the same time as news on Japan. Under the heading “Turkey and Japan,” al-Imām discusses the proposed Congress of Religion to be held in Tokyo. It is reported that Sultan Abdülhamid had sent telegrams to the Emperor of Japan and dispatched three special envoys to Japan in order to attend the Congress.[481]

To further the Caliphate cause, al-Imām listed some achievements of Sultan Abdülhamid. According to the journal it is important to inform anxious readers of the latest news on Turkey. al-Imām gave detailed accounts of the capability of a Turkish warship complete with its capacity, arms, and speed “for those who would like to read it.”[482]

Despite this seemingly powerful Turkish army, however, al-Imām reminds the Ottomans to continue their effort to improve their military strength, for the Empire is surrounded by mighty enemies. al-Imām was convinced that only with the modernization of its army could the Ottoman Empire be on par with other European powers. Again, al-Imām expects that the readers are satisfied with its news and accounts of Ottoman military development.[483] al-Imām’s attachment to the Caliphate question appears to have led it to lavishly praise Sultan Abdülhamid. In its reports al-Imām describes the Sultan as a caring ruler whose main concern was rebuilding the Empire’s infrastructure by building schools, railways, and other means of communication. According to al-Imām, the noble efforts of the Sultan were challenged by the formidable West. In facing this challenge, the journal hoped that the Turks would be more resilient and prayed that they would be protected until the end.[484]

It may seem strange that the editors of al-Imām were not aware that the Sultan was the subject of strong criticism in Turkey and the Middle East. al-Imām, in an innocent way, believed that Sultan Abdülhamid was sincere in his efforts to revitalize the old Ottoman Empire. It asserts that there was no other existing Islamic government than that of the Ottoman Empire. al-Imām thus deplored unfavorable reports about the Empire by the Western press, which, it believed, were part of the conspiracy to undermine it.[485] According to Othman, however, when Sultan Abdülhamid was deposed from the throne by the Young Turks in 1908, al-Imām changed its attitude and now shifts its admiration in support of the Young Turks, which it viewed as the patrons of Islam.[486]

As indicated earlier, in connection with the biography of Sayyid Shaykh, al-Imām paid special attention to the destiny of the Riau court suffering under the encroachment of the Dutch. In an editorial published in September 1906, al-Imām pondered the fate of those countries that had lost their independence and preserved nothing else than “a collection of texts and stories.”[487] Furthermore, as Andaya argues, a number of al-Imām’s articles clearly reflected the resentment felt by Riau toward the changes in court protocol introduced by the colonial government, and above all toward the abolition of the Yamtua Muda post.

In 1906 Tengku Osman, the Sultan’s eldest son and Raja Ali’s son-in-law and protégé who had been at school in Cairo during the crisis over the 1905 Treaty, returned. In its November issue, al-Imām published verbatim his speech to the Rushdiyyah Club: “I think, sirs,” he said, “You must all be very worried and sad to see what has recently occurred in our beloved homeland.”[488] al-Imām also published an article by Sayyid Shaykh, which accused foreigners of placing Eastern peoples under slavery, of showing duplicity and disrespect to Eastern rulers, and of closing the doors to knowledge.[489]

How large was the extent of al-Imām’s influence? To answer this question, one may first look at its circulation. Roff admits that, although its subscribers may have been few in number, al-Imām also came into the hands of religious teachers, particularly those in the new style madrasas (modern religious schools). For them al-Imām was an invaluable source in dealing with such diverse and controversial questions such as the validity of certain hadiths, payment for burial prayers, certain practices associated with tarekat such as the Naqshbandiyya, the wearing of European clothing, and interest on loans from savings bank.

Roff concludes that though there is no clear evidence of the size and nature of its audience, there is little doubt that a majority of its readers came from the intellectually and socially more sophisticated elements of the towns, and from those who were religiously educated and had received some introduction to Muslim polemics from their pilgrimage to Mecca.[490]

It is important to note that al-Imām also had representatives (wakil) in many Malay states, and that some of its most cogent contributions came from Malay correspondents in Johor, Perak, and Pahang. Though perhaps the bulk of its readership was within British Malaya, there is no doubt that al-Imām was also in circulation in other parts of the Malay-Indonesian archipelago. In fact, a high proportion of its correspondence came from the Dutch East Indies, particularly Sumatra. It is well known that Shaykh Muhammad Tahir Jalaluddin, the founder of the journal, sent copies to his friends and pupils in Minangkabau. As a result, as Hamka testifies, al-Imām exercised considerable influence on reformist thought and led directly to the establishment of a similar journal in 1911, al-Munīr.[491]

As Daya points out, al-Imām was a source of pride for the Minangkabau Muslims; it was established by one of their best-known ulama, and an intense correspondence linked certain Minangkabau ulama with Shaykh Tahir Jalaluddin. Furthermore the travels of Minangkabau perantau (migrants) who brought al-Imām with them, Daya argues, practically made al-Imām a possession of Minangkabau Malays. There was a good number of agents, subscribers, and correspondents of al-Imām in this area; and a number of articles written by Minangkabau ulama were also published in al-Imām. All of those related with al-Imām in one way or another were collectively called “kaum al-Mānar” (the al-Mānar group). It is therefore not surprising if, when al-Imām ceased its publication, it was lamented by Minangkabau reformist ulama; and this led to the increasing need for publication of their own journal, al-Munīr.[492]

It is clear that the impact of al-Imām was not confined to giving rise to new similar journals in the Malay-Indonesian world. As Roff points out, it is in its impact on the new type of education, embodied by its encouragement of the more ambitious and elaborate new kind of madrasa (religious schools), that the immediate impact of the reformist group may be most clearly seen. al-Imām also encouraged the formulation of a system of education that, ideally, was to take account of the need not only for a purified Islam but for modern secular knowledge as well.[493] Thus, what al-Imām basically proposed was a reformed system of religious education in which, upon a sound basis of doctrinal instruction, Arabic, English, and modern educational subjects would be taught.

al-Imām not only paid much attention to matters regarding education, it also seems to have had specific educational aims. There were at least five of them promoted by al-Imām: first, to convince the Muslim community that knowledge is the first thing enjoined by God in the Holy Qurʿan, and that the Qurʿan contains all knowledge that is necessary for human progress; [494] second, to introduce a new system of education based on the Qur1anic doctrine; [495] third, to establish educational institutions with a sound curriculum and syllabus; [496] fourth, to encourage and assist Muslim youths in advancing their studies abroad; [497] fifth, to urge the rulers, traditional chieftains, and knowledgeable ulama, to take immediate action to enhance the system of Islamic education in the country.[498]

There are also al-Imām's other numerous exhortations on education, ranging from reiteration of the benefits of education, explanations of the different types of education, warning of the danger of ignorance, to suggestions to parents not to allow their children to sleep during daytime. The concern of al-Imām was indeed wide-ranging. Furthermore, al-Imām was interested not only in ideas, but also in the establishment of institutions that would support the spread and maintenance of these ideas. The most important of the institution that al-Imām helped to establish was the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-islāmiyya founded in Singapore in 1908. Run by an Egyptian, ʿUthman Effendi Raffat, this madrasa borrowed much from modernism in Egypt and the West. It was undoubtedly the forerunner of many others organized in similar lines throughout the Malay Peninsula and other parts of the Malay-Indonesian archipelago during the next few years.

 al-Munīr (1911-1916): the Kaum Muda type of reformism

When al-Imām ceased to publish, the Kaum Muda, especially those in Sumatra, must have felt that they had lost an important mouthpiece. They soon sought to publish a new journal that could succeed it. Prominent leaders of Kaum Muda in West Sumatra, who founded the journal al-Munīr (“The Illumination”), finally took the initiative. As Adams correctly points out, if one takes into account its intellectual genealogy, it was only natural that al-Munīr should take over the role of al-Imām in spreading Kaum Muda teachings and opposing all enemies of Islam.[499]

According to Yunus, al-Munīr was the first Islamic journal published in Padang in 1 Rabiʿ II 1329/April 1911. al-Munīr, however, did not last long; it ceased its publication in 1916 because, according to Yunus, its printing press was burned down.[500]

The founder of al-Munīr was Haji ʿAbdullah Ahmad, one of the most important scions of Islamic reformism in the Minangkabau area in the early twentieth century. Before providing his brief biography, it is important to point out that ʿAbdullah Ahmad’s idea to publish a journal similar to al-Imām came to his mind during his visit to Singapore in 1908. It was on this occasion that he learned about questions related to the journal’s publication, management, and editorship. In addition, he also took the opportunity to gain insights from al-Imām’s experience in establishing the Madrasa Iqbal al-islāmiyya.[501] As soon as he returned, he established his well-known school, “Sekolah Diniyyah al-islāmiyyah.”[502] In the case of al-Munīr, however, it was only three years later that he was able to establish the journal.

Most scholars agree that ʿAbdullah Ahmad was the sole pioneer of al-Munīr. Though their statements are different, Hamka, Alfian, and Djaja agree that it was ʿAbdullah Ahmad who took the initiative to publish al-Munīr.[503] Benda, however, asserts that in addition to ʿAbdullah Ahmad, ʿAbdul Karim Amrullah was also an initiator of al-Munīr, although this does not seem to be supported by any sources.[504] In its first issue, ʿAbdul Karim Amrullah is referred to as a contributor from Maninjau. Furthermore, there is not a single writing of his in this first issue; most of the writings were by ʻAbdullah Ahmad.[505] In addition, Hamka, the son of ʿAbdul Karim Amrullah, points out that “his father moved from Maninjau to Padang in early 1912 to help Abdullah Ahmad in his school, since the latter was already very busy with it.”[506]

Born in Padang Panjang in 1878, he came from an ulama family; his father Haji Ahmad was an ulama and a textile trader. After finishing his elementary education, he traveled to Mecca in 1899 where he studied with Shaykh Ahmad Khatib al-Minangkabawi, a leading Jawi ulama in the Holy City at the time. He returned to Indonesia in 1905 and devoted himself to teaching and dakwah activities in Padang Panjang. Here he began to establish himself as an ardent reformist by opposing bida (unwarranted innovation) and khurafat (delusion). Around 1906 he moved to Padang, the capital city of West Sumatra, to succeed his uncle as a teacher. Later he established the Jamaah Adabiyah, the seed of a school that he would later found. With the financial support of Muslim traders he founded the Adabiyah Diniyyah School in 1909.[507]

Abdullah Ahmad made use of the Adabiyah institution as the organization that was responsible for the publication of al-Munīr. As for the Jamaah Adabiyah itself, it consisted mostly of traders who were the backbone of Adabiyah activities, including the publication of al-Munīr.[508] al-Munīr was published fortnightly, using the Malay language with Arabic characters. Most of the issues consisted of sixteen pages. From its very first edition, al-Munīr proclaimed itself as “a journal of Islamic religion, knowledge, and information” (Majalah Islam, Pengetahuan dan Perkhabaran).

What was the mission of al-Munīr? In the first issue, the editors explain the meaning of al-Munīr itself. In the first place, “al-Munīr” means “candle,” or other things that illuminate their environment. Within the context of this meaning, al-Munīr wished to be the candle and light of the Muslim umma in the Dutch East Indies, which were suppressed by the Dutch. In a more detailed manner, the editors of al-Munīr explain the goals of the journal. First, to lead and bring the Muslim umma to progress based on Islamic injunctions; second, to nurture peace among nations and human beings; third, to light the Muslim umma with knowledge and wisdom.[509]

It is important to note that in its explanation of the function of an Islamic journal, al-Munīr highlights that an Islamic journal is like a teacher who gives to its readers guidance in the right path, reminds them of their wrongdoings in the past, consoles those in grief, helps those suffering from misery, awakens them to virtues, and sharpens their reason. As Ali writes, this explanation is reminiscent of al-Imām's ideas, and is a further indication that al-Munīr was eager to continue al-Imām's mission.[510]

The publication of al-Munīr was warmly welcomed by many readers, as shown by the number of letters of congratulation from its readers. For example, a letter from Sayyid Hasyim bin Thahir was sent from Palembang. The letter, in addition to congratulating the editors for their noble efforts, expected them to manage the journal in a wise manner, and to continually provide their readers with balanced information from all segments of Muslim society.[511] However, al-Munīr received not only favorable responses, but also negative reactions when it made mention of an unidentified "trouble maker" (tukang kacau). It is likely that the "trouble maker" was among the Kaum Tua who opposed Kaum Muda as represented by al-Munīr, although the root cause may run deeper. Tamar Djaja argues that there was also criticism of al-Munīr, because some critics believed that preaching by means of a journal was a Western innovation, and adopting the Western way was bida (unwarranted innovation).[512] al-Munīr's spirit of reform can be clearly seen in its insistence on the importance of organization as a vehicle to further the Muslim umma. According to al-Munīr, organization is a means for channeling the spirit of reform, encouraging enterprising, vigor, and enhancing the nobility of knowledge (kemuliaan ilmu). It is a way of cultivating brotherhood of mankind and nations.[513]

Like al-Mānar and al-Imām, al-Munīr was radical in its religious orientation. It published articles on subjects that had hitherto been considered taboo by the Kaum Tua. For instance, the wearing of neckties and hats, and the taking of photographs, which had been considered haram (unlawful, forbidden) by the Kaum Tua, were openly discussed in al-Munīr, which informs its readers that such things had never been forbidden by the Quran and Hadith. al-Munīr also taught that the Friday khutba (sermon before prayers) could be delivered in a language that the congregation could understand. Furthermore, according to al-Munīr, Muslims should not blindly follow (taklid) a specific Islamic legal school, and it insists that the Shafii school of law, which is adhered to by most Indonesian Muslims, is not the only valid interpretation of Islamic legal precepts. Even, the Shafii madhhab can draw upon the three other Sunni legal tradition, that of the Hanafi, Maliki, and Hanbali schools of Islamic legal thought.[514]

 Conclusion

It is hard to be certain which came earlier, reformist magazines and journals or Salafi-oriented organizations. It seems that in the case of Indonesia, the appearance of these reformist journals and magazines took place at almost the same time as the rise of Salafi organizations, such as the Muhammadiyah, Persatuan Islam, and others. The publication of magazines and journals only stimulated the further expansion of Salafi organizations in Indonesia. As a result, Salafi-oriented organizations had strong ideological support, which contributed to their ever-increasing influence in Indonesian Muslim society.

In the case of the Malay Peninsula, on the other hand, the spread of reformist journals and magazines seems to have had only a limited impact on the expansion of Salafi ideas. Even though the publication of al-Imām preceded that of al-Munīr, reformist organizations never struck deep roots in Malay society in general. Islamic reformism was still a long way from gaining momentum in Malay society. This is due to both the domination of states in Islamic institutions and the interpretation of Islam by Malaysian Muslims, who still hold fast to what in Indonesia is called “Islamic traditionalism.” Only in the late 1970s did Islamic reformism begin to get a firmer hold in Malaysia.

[454] Emad Eldin Shahin, “Rashid Rida, Muhammad,” in John L. Esposito, ed., The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World 3 (Oxford: Oxford University, 1995), 412; J. Jomier, EI2, s. v. “al-Manār.”

[455] It initially seems that a certain number of works by early Malay-Indonesian scholars such as al-Raniri, al-Sinkili, al-Makassari, Muhammad Arsyad al-Banjari, and al-Palimbani were printed in Istanbul. Subsequently, however, their works were also printed in Cairo, Mecca, and Medina.

[456] See Jutta Bluhm-Warn, “al-Manār and Ahmad Soorkattie. Links in the Chain of Transmission of Muhammad 2Abduh’s Ideas to the Malay-Speaking World,” in Peter G. Riddell and Tony Street, eds, Islam: Essays on Scripture, Thought and Society (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 296–297.

[457] Azyumardi Azra, The Transmission of Islamic Reformism to Indonesia: Networks of Middle Eastern and Malay-Indonesian Ulama in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (PhD dissertation, Columbia University, 1992).

[458] William Roff, “Indonesian and Malay Students in Cairo in the 1920’s,” Indonesia 9: (1970).

[459] See Mohammad Redzuan Othman, “Call of the Azhar: The Malay Students’ Sojourn in Cairo before World War II,” Sejarah 3 (1994–1995): 95–110.

[460] Bluhm-Warn, “al-Manār and Ahmad Soorkattie,” 297.

[461] Nik Hassan, “Nik Abdul Aziz bin Haji,” in Islam di Kelantan (Kuala Lumpur: Persatuan Sejarah Malaysia, 1983), 16–17, 27.

[462] Virginia Matheson Hooker, “Transmission through Practical Example: Women and Islam in 1920s Malay Fiction,” JMBRAS 67 (2): 96–97; cf. William Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 2nd ed. (Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1967), 82–83.

[463] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism.

[464] Charles C. Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt (London: Oxford University Press, 1933).

[465] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 59.

[466] In the case of the Malay Peninsula, Roff has discussed debates and conflicts that took place among the “kaum muda” and “kaum tua.” See Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 56–90. As for Indonesia’s case, see, among others, Deliar Noer, The Modernist Muslim Movement in Indonesia 1900–1942 (Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1973); Taufik Abdullah, Schools and Politics: The Kaum Muda Movement in Indonesia (1927–1933) (Ithaca, IL: Cornell University, 1971); and Burhanuddin Daya, Gerakan Pembaharuan Pemikiran Islam: Kasus Sumatera Thawalib (Yogyakarta: Tiara Wacana, 1995).

[467] For further accounts of the Padri Movement see, among others, Christine Dobbin, Islamic Revivalism in Changing Peasant Economy: Central Sumatra 1784–1847 (London: Curzon Press, 1983).

[468] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 60–63; Abu Bakar Hamzah, Al-Imam: Its Role in Malay Society 1906–1908 (Kent: University of Kent at Canterbury, 1981; Kuala Lumpur: Pustaka Antara, 1991).

[469] Hamzah, Al-Imam, 124–127; Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 60–61.

[470] At this time West Sumatra was experiencing a rise in Communist unrest.

[471] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 61; Hamzah, Al-Imam, 127.

[472] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 63–64; Hamzah, Al-Imam, 132–137.

[473] Pulau Penyengat already had a reputation as a center of Malay learning, largely due to the literary works of Raja Ali Haji, born Raja Ahmad, and to other members of his family. It was by this time a frequent stop on the itinerary of traveling religious scholars. For further details see Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 44–46; Winstedt, “A History of Malay Literature,” JMBRAS 31 (1958); and S. H. Tan, The Life and Times of Sayyid Shaykh al-Hadi (thesis, History Department, University of Singapore, 1961).

[474] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 63–64; Hamzah, Al-Imam, 137–142. It is important to note that most of the Bugi princes in the area joined this Rushdiyyah Club, and among its prominent leaders was Raja Ali Haji’s own son, Raja Khalid Hassan, better known as Raja Hitam, who militantly opposed the presence of the Dutch in Riau. For further information, see Barbara W. Andaya, “From Rome to Tokyo: The Search for Anti-Colonial Allies by the Rulers of Riau, 1899–1904,” Indonesia 24 (1977): 123–156.

[475] Andaya, “From Rome to Tokyo,” 139–140.

[476] This article was in fact written by a certain Muhammad Murtaji.

[477] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 64; Hamzah, Al-Imam, 120–121.

[478] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 64; Hamzah, Al-Imam, 123–124; Werner Ende, “Schiitische Tendenzen bei sunnitischen Sayyids aus Hadhramaut: Muhammad bin 2Aqil al-Alawi,” Der Islam 50 (1973): 1. For a further account of the case of Sayyid Muhammad bin 2Aqil, see William Roff, “Murder as an Aid to Social History: The Arabs in Singapore in the Early Twentieth Century,” paper delivered at the International Workshop on Arabs in South-East Asia (1870–c.1990), Royal Institute of Linguistics, and Anthropology (KITLV): Leiden, 1997.

[479] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 56–57.

[480] Cited in Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 56.

[481] Al-Imam 1/1 (July 23, 1906); Mohammad Redzuan Othman, “The Malay Perspective and the Ottoman Response,” Sejarah 4 (1996): 97–108. The Caliphate question was of course a big issue in Indonesia. For a further discussion see Martin Van Bruinessen, “Muslims of the Dutch East Indies and the Caliphate Question,” Studia Islamika: Indonesian Journal for Islamic Studies 2/3 (1995): 15–40.

[482] Al-Imam 1/2 (August 21, 1906): 63; Othman, “The Malay Perspective,” 102.

[483] Al-Imam 1/7 (January 16, 1907): 211; Othman, “The Malay Perspective.”

[484] Al-Imam 1/9 (March 16, 1907): 281–284; Othman, “The Malay Perspective.”

[485] Al-Imam 2/5, 7 (November 1907): 101–102; Othman, “The Malay Perspective.”

[486] Othman, “The Malay Perspective,” 103.

[487] Al-Imam 1/3, 19 (September 1906): 77; cf. Andaya, “From Rome to Tokyo,” 140.

[488] Al-Imam 1/5, 17 (November 1906): 77.

[489] Al-Imam 1/6, 18 (December 1906): 170–172.

[490] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 64, 66.

[491] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 66–67; Ajahku Hamka, Riwajat Hidup Dr. Abd. Karim Amrullah dan Perdjuangan Kaum Agama di Sumatera (Djakarta: Widjaja, 1958), 48.

[492] Daya, Gerakan Pembaharuan Pemikiran Islam, 118–119.

[493] Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 66.

[494] al-Imam 2/12 (June 4, 1908): 279; 2/3 (September 9, 1907): 84–89; 1/1 (July 23,1906): 1–6.

[495] al-Imam, 2/11 (May 3, 1908): 338.

[496] al-Imam, 3/3 (August 29, 1908): 104.

[497] al-Imam, 2/10 (April 3, 1908): 356.

[498] al-Imam, 2/3 (September 9, 1907): 84–89; cf. Hamzah, Al-Imam, 57.

[499] Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt [supra n. 11], 140.

[500] Mahmud Yunus, Sejarah Pendidikan Islam di Indonesia (Jakarta: Hidakarya Agung, 1996), 79; Mahmud Yunus, Sejarah Islam di Minangkabau (Jakarta: al-Hidayah, 1971), 48.

[501] Noer, The Modernist Muslim Movement in Indonesia 1900–1942, 39.

[502] Al-Munir 5 (1915): 68; cf. Amir Syahruddin, Pemikiran dan Usaha-usaha Abdullah Ahmad terhadap Pembaharuan Pendidikan Islam (Masters thesis, Post-Graduate Programme, IAIN Syarif Hidayatullah, Jakarta).

[503] Hamka, Riwajat Hidup Dr. Abd. Karim Amrullah dan Perdjuangan Kaum; Alfian, Muhammadiyah: The Political Behavior of a Muslim Modernist Organization under Dutch Colonialism (Yogyakarta: UGM Press, 1989), 108; Tamar Djaja, Pusaka Indonesia: Riwayat Hidup Orang-orang Besar Tanahair, 2 (Jakarta: Bulan Bintang, 1966), 700.

[504] H. J. Benda, “South-East Asian Islam in the Twentieth Century,” in P. M. Holt, A. K. S. Lambton, and B. Lewis eds, The Cambridge History of Islam, 2A (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984),189.

[505] Syamsuri Ali, Al-Munir dan Wacana Pembaharuan Pemikiran Islam 1911–1915 (Master thesis, Post-Graduate Program, IAIN Imam Bonjol, Padang, 1997), 26.

[506] Hamka, Kenang-kenangan Hidup I (Jakarta: Bulan Bintang, 1974), 14.

[507] Noer, The Modernist Muslim Movement in Indonesia 1900–1942, 38–39; Sanusi Latief ed., Riwayat Hidup dan Perjuangan 20 Ulama Besar Sumatera Barat (Padang: Islamic Centre Sumatera Barat, 1981), 107–111.

[508] Al-Munir 1/1 (1911): 1; Noer, The Modernist Muslim Movement in Indonesia.

[509] Al-Munir, 1/1 (1911).

[510] Ali, Al-Munir dan Wacana Pembaharuan Pemikiran Islam 1911–1915, 53.

[511] Al-Munir 1/2 (1911): advertisement page.

[512] Djaja, Pusaka Indonesia: Riwayat Hidup Orang-orang Besar Tanahair 2: 701.

[513] Al-Munir 2/1 (May, 1912).

[514] Yunus, Sejarah Islam di Minangkabau, 47; Adam, Islam and Modernist in Egypt, 140.

* Part II : Intellectuals in Challenge: Situations, discourses, strategies

* 8. The Arabo-Islamic Constitutional Thought at 1907: ‘Abd al-Karim Murad (d. 1926) and his draft constitution for Morocco

Stefan Reichmuth

The period between 1870 and the First World War is generally regarded as the culmination of European imperial hegemony. At the same time it brought about a remarkable chain of constitutional movements and revolutions in distant parts of the world. This included Europe itself where constitutional order underwent dramatic changes, leading in some cases such as Italy and Germany to the establishment of entirely new national states and constitutional monarchies. Even the Russian Empire became a constitutional state in 1905. At the same time substantial steps towards constitutional and representative government were taken in countries as different as Egypt, the Ottoman Empire, Iran, British India, and also Japan and China.[515] Despite an abundance of publications about each country and, even more about the philosophical and legal aspects of constitutionalism, the comparative study of the European and non-European constitutional movements and doctrines of this time does not seem to have found much attention until now.

Whether there are indigenous roots of the constitutional theories and charters that were put forward in the Middle East and North Africa during the course of the nineteenth century is still open to debate. Elie Kedourie, who saw the history of the ruling institution in these regions mainly in terms of Wittfogel's "oriental despotism," did not see much substance or grounding of a constitutional process that coincided with a period of imperial weakness. In his opinion, the "grant" of the constitution by the sovereign ruler to his subjects (such as happened in Tunis, Egypt, and the Ottoman Empire) did not indicate a compromise between state and society.; it was "a parody rather than the analogue of what was obtained in Western Europe."[516] According to Kedourie, constitutionalism under these conditions became "a mere device used by different factions within the official classes to pursue their rivalries."[517]

Autocratic rule, however, has not been the only concept offered for a historical interpretation of Islamic political institutions. In W. Montgomery Watt's analysis of the religio-political struggle of the early Abbasid period between the emerging Shia and Sunna groupings, the Shiites are indeed described as the "autocratic block" which supported the unlimited religious and political authority of the caliph, and which had its roots mainly among the bureaucrats of the empire, many of whom were of Persian extraction. The ahl al-sunna, on the other hand, drew their support largely from what Montgomery Watt has called the “general religious movement” and the emerging “religious institution.” With their demand that the life of the empire should be based on the revealed law, the ahl al-sunna are seen by him as a “constitutional block” which finally came to gain the recognition and support of even the caliphs themselves. For this political antagonism, which found expression in different historical and theological disputes, a parallel to European political thought and controversy is explicitly drawn by this author.[518]

Later periods also saw the emergence of a peculiar type of the Islamic city state in different regions, which was governed by a federation of local communal Muslim groups and headed by an elected qadi or a qadi family holding this office for several generations. This type is represented most aptly by ports or merchant cities like Mogadishu (Maqdishu) in the Somali coast in the fourth/tenth century, or Timbuktu, which flourished since the ninth/fifteenth century at the southern fringe of the Sahara in present-day Mali.[519] Timbuktu in particular is significant for the concept of a semi-corporate community (ëamaa) of scholars headed by a qadi, which can be recognized behind the ruling patriciate of this city which managed to absorb other emerging powerful urban groups well until the nineteenth century.

A closer look at Ottoman political institutions in the classical period also suggests a good deal of consultative and representative mechanisms, some of which were even formally recognized by the sultans. This holds for the Imperial Council (divân-i hümâyun) which included leading administrators, bureaucrats, military commanders and religious scholars under the chairmanship of the Grand Vizier,[520] and even more so for the so-called “Council-on-Foot” (ayak divânı), a special assembly convened by or even forced upon the sultan for the discussion of urgent matters and complaints. Cases of such councils are documented for the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries by Uzunçarvılı.[521] In one of his examples, appeal is made to the caliphal function of the ruler. A well-established and legal pattern of consultation also comes out at the provincial level where local scholars, notables or military groups were sometimes the most powerful elements within the provincial divans.[522] Consultation and representation of local and regional interests were thus restricted to later times of imperial decline but were part and parcel of the established pattern of administration. Two Muslim intellectuals of the later nineteenth century who attempted to justify the constitutional limitation of the power of the ruler, the Tunisian historian Ibn Abi Diyaf (d. 1874) and the Ottoman writer and poet Namık Kemal (d. 1888), even referred to the precedence of the political role of the Janissaries who were said to have given explicit permission by Süleyman the Magnificent to dethrone a trespassing sultan and who thus, as “people in arms,” had for a long time provided an effective constitutional check to the Ottoman executive.[523]

The challenge of European political institutions can be first noticed among Ottoman bureaucrats in the early eighteenth century. Dadi-, a Dalmatian who visited Istanbul at that period, mentions the strong interest of the Ottoman Effendis in the form of government prevailing in Venice, and their idea to convert the imperial divan into a parliamentary council of the Venetian type.[524] Perhaps related to this kind of discussion was an outline of the three systems of government existing in human society—monarchy, aristocracy, democracy—which was presented by the famous Hungarian convert Ibrahim Müteferrika (d. 1745), himself a high-ranking Ottoman bureaucrat,[525] in his treatise Usûlü1l-hikem fî nizâmil-ümem, where he also made far-reaching proposals for military reforms along European lines.[526]

There can be no doubt that the challenge of European hegemony and of European political institutions was crucial for the constitutional and revolutionary movements which emerged outside Europe in the latter part of the nineteenth century. But the interplay of internal and external factors produced quite different results for each of them. As mentioned earlier, constitutions in the Middle East and North Africa in the nineteenth century were formally granted by the ruler—something that had also happened in several European monarchies at different points of time after 1815. Constitutional initiatives like those in Tunisia and Egypt had been initiated by the monarchs who were hoping to enhance both internal support and international recognition for their government by introducing a constitution and some elected consultative or legislative bodies. When increased pressure from the European powers exposed the failure of the local monarchies and, at the same time, made them more and more autocratic, constitutional demands quite often became the rallying point for all those who stood in opposition to the existing order.

Constitutionalists in different countries of North Africa and Asia belonged to those groups of the administrative and urban elite which had been exposed to European forms of education and had very often spent considerable time in Europe itself. Models of French, British, and also Italian political thought and organization can be seen at work in many of their writings and activities.[527] At the same time, most of the constitutional movements rose in states and among social groups with age-old traditions of scribal and scholarly training. Despite their quite different educational outlook, constitutionalists were still connected in many ways to the older educational and scribal institutions. Sometimes they belonged themselves to old scholar or scribe families and still shared some of their interests. Commercial groups had strong connections to both older and younger educational elites. No wonder, then, that the constitutional ideas of the younger generation of intellectuals were shaped for the most part by an unmistakable blend of European and indigenous ideas and patterns of thought. With external pressure and internal opposition rising around 1900, larger segments of the scholarly elite and their students were drawn into the constitutional movements.

Within the Islamic context, the blend of European ideas of constitutional government and nationalism with basic ethical and political concepts derived from Islamic thought can be demonstrated in an exemplary way for the group of the Young Ottoman intellectuals and their successors, the Young Turks.[528] The political and constitutional aims of the latter movement which brought together many different groups in opposition to Sultan Abdülhamid II were strongly supported by Islamic reformists in Syria and Egypt, with Rashid Rida being perhaps the most prominent,[529] and some of the concepts of Islamic thought which had been first developed by the Young Ottomans and were then further transmitted and discussed among their successors have remained highly relevant for political Islam until the present. This is true in particular for the discussion about the sovereignty (Ar. hakimiyya, Ottoman hakimiyyet) of God and that of the People, still central to Islamic political discourse even today. The alliance of intellectuals and Islamic scholars and activists of different ethnic background in opposition to the Ottoman Emperor finally contributed to the restoration of the Ottoman Constitution in 1908.

The most spectacular success of an Islamic constitutional movement, however, can be seen in the Constitutional Revolution in Iran, where the support of large parts of the Islamic scholarly elite was crucial for the establishment of both Majlis and the Constitution in 1906.[530] From the First to the Fifth Majlis, elected members with higher Islamic education made up for a solid proportion of the deputies, at times even providing a clear majority.[531] In Iran as well as in the Ottoman Empire and in Egypt, Islamic scholars and reformists of this period tried to develop an Islamic framework for a constitutional system and to defend it against their opponents who regarded their activities as directed against Islam and who supported the prerogatives of their rulers. At the same period, even the Muslim members in the First and Second Russian Dumas (1906, 1907) included a good number of mullahs and deputies with madrasa education.[532]

The constitutional draft which was written in Morocco at the same period and which shall be discussed here also shows the strong interest of Islamic reformist scholars in local movements of opposition and constitutional reform, which had increased in response to European imperial encroachment. It was a period when Islamic scholars and more Europeanized intellectuals were still political allies in opposition to their governments and remained closely engaged in intellectual debate. This made for specific blends of political expression which can be easily criticized for their inconsistencies and which have, therefore, not been found worthy of much attention. Later periods and crises frequently led to political parting of ways and required much more clear-cut ideological decisions.[533] The earlier blend of concepts nevertheless shows the importance of the Islamic discourse for the national movements of their time, and it is this heritage rather than older patterns of Islamic thought which provided the base for political Islamism in the later part of the twentieth century.

In the case of Morocco, constitutional proposals came up in a period of growing interference of France and Spain into the affairs of the country and of a political and economic crisis that accompanied this. At the international conference held in Algeçiras in 1906 different plans of reform under European control had been set up for Morocco. These plans, while officially recognizing the sovereignty of the sultan and the integrity of the country, for all practical purposes amounted to joint French and Spanish control of its police force, economic resources and financial institutions.[534] In an earlier stage of the crisis, when France had already presented similar proposals, the Moroccan sultan Abd al-Aziz had convened an “Assembly of Notables” (Maëlis al-a2yan, 1904-1905),[535] mainly, as it seems, in order to muster public support against the imminent French interference. Although without much success in the negotiations, the assembly had encouraged some leading scholars in their resistance against both foreign encroachment and against the failing policies of the sultan. Most prominent among them at that time was Muhammad b. Abd al-Kabir al-Kattani, the powerful leader of the Zawiya of the Kattaniyya brotherhood in Fez. The years after 1905 were marked not only by open intervention of foreign powers but also by growing opposition of the religious scholars against the sultan, who was finally deposed and replaced by his brother Abd al-Hafiz. The latter received the bay a of the scholars of Fez in 1908 and was one year later recognized also by the French, after Abd al-Aziz had abdicated himself in July 1908.[536]

There are three extant constitutional proposals for Morocco from this critical period of modern Moroccan history.[537] The first, which was written already in 1324/1906, goes back to a Moroccan from Salé, Ali b. Ahmad Znibar.[538] A second one was published in four editions of the Arabic journal Lisan al-arab in Tangier between 11 October and 1 November 1908.[539] This journal had been founded by the Nammur brothers, two Lebanese emigrants living in Tangier. The circumstances which led to the third draft had been unknown for a long time. The text which directly refers to the Act of Algerçiras (issued on 7 April 1906) was not published until much later, and then without a clear indication of its author.[540] It was only in the early 1980s, when the Moroccan historian Muhammad al-Mannuni obtained another manuscript of this text from a bookseller in Fez, that the text could be ascribed with fair certainty to Abd al-Karim Murad, a visiting scholar and traveler from Tripoli (Lebanon) who refers to himself as the author in a note at the end of the manuscript.[541]

Up to the present day Abd al-Karim Murad (also called in some sources al-Muradi) has remained a hardly known figure in the transnational Islamic networks of the early twentieth century.[542] Information about his life and activities which covered Morocco and the French and British colonies and protectorates of West Africa can be drawn from some of his Moroccan contemporaries,[543] French colonial intelligence for the Afrique Occidentale Française,[544] and some writings of Islamic scholars in Nigeria where Murad settled and finally died.[545] Al-Mannuni calls him “the Envoy of the East to the West” (mabuö al-marq ilal-ʃarb),[546] which would seem to refer, however, to intellectual mediatorship rather than to any clear-cut political task.

Abd al-Karim b. Sayyid Umar b. Mustafa b. Shaykh Murad belonged to a prominent Sayyid family from Tripoli. He was born around 1860. His early education still remains obscure. His strong interest in both Islamic disciplines and “modern” subjects (al-ulum al-diniyya wal-waqtiyya, as he called them) which comes out later in his own educational activities would suggest an influence of the most famous scholar of Tripoli of the late nineteenth century, Husayn al-Jisr (1845-1909) and his school experiment, al-Madrasa al-Wataniyya (1879-1882).[547] This would link him further to his contemporary Rashid Rida (1865–1935) who also came from the Tripoli area and had been a student of this school.

Abd al-Karim Murad spent some time as teacher in Medina before he went to West and North Africa (the nisba al-Madani which appears at the end of the draft would seem to be related to this stay in Medina). He apparently spent several years as itinerant trader of Arabic books and as Islamic teacher in different parts of West Africa like Sierra Leone, Ivory Coast and southern Nigeria. Already at this early stage he is said to have assisted local Islamic communities in the foundation of Arabic schools and Islamic societies. Coming to Fez in 1324/1906,[548] he stayed in Fez in the Zawiya of the Kattaniyya, writing as a correspondent for the Cairo newspaper al-Muayyad which was well known for its Islamic orientation. He dedicated a grammatical commentary to the Moroccan Sultan Abd al-Aziz, propagating—without success—the establishment of a modernized school for Moroccan children which was to be called al-Maqasid al-Aziziyya. This name easily evokes the model of the famous Ëam2iyyat al-Maqasid al-Layriyya and its schools in Beirut.[549] His own teaching activities are said to have included Quranic recitation (taëwid), but also geography, astronomy, arithmetic and even history and politics. His circle became an important place for conversation, political discussion and lectures. Two prominent scholars for whom constitutional inclinations are also mentioned elsewhere, the qadis Abd al-Hafiz al-Fasi and al-Mahdi al-Fasi (d. both 1383/1963–1964), had been among his students.[550] Among his writings mentioned by Brockelmann [551] for the Qarawiyyin Library in Fez is another treatise called al-Siyasa, which further illustrates his political interests.

Murad left Morocco in 1908 and traveled back to West Africa where his presence is attested, in French intelligence reports from December 1908–1911, in French West Africa (Senegal, Ivory Coast, Dahomey), with contacts to prominent Sufi leaders like Ahmadu Bamba and Malik Sy in Senegal, being engaged in the trade of Arabic books and negotiating the publication of Arabic texts written by local West African scholars [552]. The French authorities remained suspicious of him and expelled him to Morocco in 1912. He was not to stay in the new French Protectorate, either. From 1913–1914 onwards he could be found again in British West Africa, teaching in Sierra Leone and Lagos, finally settling in Kano where he died in 1926 or, according to another source, in 1928.[553] In Kano again, one of the key figures of the expanding Tijaniyya brotherhood, Muhammad Salga (d. 1939), was among his students.[554] In 1922 Murad had gone to Europe and visited the Amir Shakib Arslan in Lausanne, providing him with information about Islam and the Muslims in Nigeria.[555] He thus can be seen in touch with prominent figures of Middle Eastern and Islamic politics until the end of his life.

By his educational background and activities, Abd al-Karim Murad strongly resembles other Salafi scholars of Syro-Lebanese origin like Rashid Rida who had clear constitutional inclinations and in this respect felt strongly encouraged by the spectacular Japanese victory over Russia and by the Iranian constitutional revolution. The text of the draft constitution fully fits into this outlook. As it explicitly mentions the new Iranian monarch Muhammad Ali Shah whose accession to the throne was on 8 January 1907, it was probably written not long after that, because there is no hint to the tension between the Shah and the parliament which intensified from May 1907 onwards.[556] Equally, any impact of the troubles in Morocco which led to the French occupation of Wujda on 29 March 1907 [557] and of Casablanca and its surroundings in May, is absent from the text. On the other hand, an anonymous report about the Moroccan crisis of 1905, published in Rida’s journal al-Mānar,[558] might perhaps already be considered as originating from Murad’s pen, as it shows the same interest in educational reforms and in the establishment of modernized schools with Arabic as the language of instruction, which is otherwise known for our author. This would mean that he was in Morocco already in that year.

The introduction of the draft [559] praises the people of the Maghrib for their outstanding virtues in the fields of ethnic unity (ittihad al-ëins), religious steadfastness (al-tamassuk bil-din) and love for the Sultan (hubb al-sultan). These virtues are regarded by the author as a firm base for future progress and sovereignty, as shown by the Japanese and Iranian examples. The ruler is nevertheless reminded that he has nowadays to give priority to the interest of the common people (al-amma) if he wants to keep dignity and respect for himself and his country. His own greatness depends on them. He has to enlighten his subjects, to educate and to encourage their industrial production and their inventions. Training in all those crafts which are necessary for human welfare is in itself a collective duty (fard kifaya) in Islam. The appeal to commercial interests aiming at a strong and autonomous national economy is typical also for other constitutional movements in the Islamic countries of that time, as for example in Iran where the Majlis was determined to prevent foreign loans and to regain control of the customs which had been in foreign hands.[560]

Both the Japanese and the Iranian rulers have transformed their absolute monarchy into constitutional rule and have overcome their decadence. The Japanese soon became famous for their schools, and their army even defeated China and Russia. Iran used its parliament to enhance just and fair administration by deriving a general law code from the divine Sharia. For Morocco there is an urgent need for similar reforms after the Algeçiras Conference and the growing interference of foreign powers in the country which is being met with increasing rejection and fear by the people. All the subjects of the sultan desire reforms to be introduced by legal means under control of the Moroccan government. They agree to keep the treaties with the foreigners and to carry out the decisions of the conference, but in such a way as they will be equally acceptable to the people and to the foreign powers, and in accordance with the Sharia. It would seem that to achieve this would have been quite an uphill task.

The first proposed plan of the author [561] is the introduction of a parliamentary system. In order to retain independence and autonomy vis-à-vis the foreign powers, a parliament (called by him sometimes Maëlis al-milla, sometimes Maëlis al-umma) should be established, which is to deliberate all matters “in such a way as to find God’s pleasure and the acceptance of the foreigners.” It will increase legitimacy in their eyes, as they regard a parliament as sacrosanct in its decisions and respect the laws issued by it. In European countries laws are based on reason and experience, in their own case, however, they have to be derived from the principles of the Sharia, as is done in Iran. This gives the ruler a much better position in his negotiations with the foreign powers. The author thus refers to the earlier strategy of Muslim rulers like those of Tunisia and Egypt who had hoped to gain both internal support and external recognition by constitutional changes. Needless to say, their experiences had not been too encouraging, as they had not been able to stop their financial crises and to prevent the occupation of their countries. At this stage, however, the pressure of popular opposition at home had become a far more powerful argument. Reference to the Divine Law quite conceivably could serve to make legislation sacrosanct and inviolable.

The literary background of the author’s thought comes out in his version of the famous “Circle of Equity,” a classical concept of Arabo-Islamic as well as Ottoman political thought which he adapted from two versions of this cycle in Ibn Khaldun’s Muqaddima.[562] The starting point of Murad’s cycle is the dignity of the subject (2izz al-mamluk) which is achieved only through the Sharia, which again is only safeguarded by power (mulk). The power of men is based on wealth (mal), achieved only by cultivation (2imara).[563] Cultivation, however, depends on justice, only to be attained by a reform of the officials (bi-islah al-ummal), which needs upright viziers (istiqamat al-wuzara) and, on top of all, a king who himself cares for the well-being of his subjects (tafaqqud al-malik ahwal al-ra2iyya bi-nafsihi). Some telling deviations from Ibn Khaldun’s text can be noted here: Ibn Khaldun’s starting point is royal dignity, 2izz al-mulk, linked to the Sharia, which is replaced here by the dignity of the subject, 2izz al-mamluk. Equally, a sentence at the end which stresses the necessary power (iqtidar) of the ruler to discipline [564] his people—so that he may rule them, not they him—has been simply cut off by our author. Both changes clearly shift the focus away from the king and provide a direct link between the Sharia and the people. Murad’s cycle starts with the king’s subjects and ends with them, referring to the Sharia as a source of their personal and public standing. The indicated role of the king is to look after his subjects rather than to master them.

Both military and financial institutions have to be strengthened if foreign intervention is to be brought to an end. The second plan [565] calls for the establishment of a standing army (2askar ëarrar) which would be self-supporting, to consist of armed citizens who were to undergo daily military training—a particularly bold proposal in the context of Moroccan politics, given the delicate balance of power between the Makhzan and the regional tribal groups which was more or less falling into pieces in the period in question. A third plan [566] was intended to generate a solid stock of internal public income (mal dalili). It included an elaborate outline of a basic reform of the pious foundations in order to generate the necessary funds for education, welfare and public investment. It concentrated supervision of the foundations and of the institutions of education, health and public welfare in the hands of a Council of the five leading ulama officials on top of a highly hierarchic body of administration. This would have left the religious institution with a degree of power and influence far beyond even that of the Ottoman veyhülislam and his centralized hierarchy in the last period of the Empire.[567]

By referring to the recommendation of consultation (mura) in the Quran (3: 159 wa-mawirhum fil-amri; Q. 42: 38 wa-amruhum mura baynahum), Abd al-Karim Murad uses the common-stock argument for consultative government in an Islamic state.[568] Rashid Rida, too, had a lot to say about mura in his al-Mānar during these eventful years.[569] Murad proposes the establishment of two Chambers of Parliament: a “National Assembly” (Maëlis al-umma/Maëlis al-milla) whose member are to be elected for five years by each tribe and each town, and an “Upper House” (al-Maëlis al-a2là) with members appointed from the royal family, the administration and the National Assembly. The deputies should not only be literate but also versed in the most common commentary of Malikite fiqh, Khalil’s al-Multasar. This shows the framework of religious and legal scholarship which the author had in mind for the political elite of the country and which also comes out in other points.

Majority decisions in parliament are to be based on each deputy’s understanding of the Quran, the Sunna and the interest of the country (maslahat al-bilad). Maslaha, too, was an important issue for Islamic reformism of the time: Rashid Rida even regarded it as the most important criterion in the worldly affairs of the Islamic community.[570]

Affairs to be decided by the Majlis include the following [571] : international treaties, control and budgets of ministers and governors, introduction and collection of taxes. All taxes which are in contradiction to the Divine Law are to be abolished. Decisions are further to be made about government expenditures, about military training of the citizens, supervision of the government officials and appeals and complaints of the citizens to the parliament. Regular reports on all government activities would be demanded and discussed. This would have given the parliament full control over both administration and judiciary.

The proposed codification of Law and the compilation of a Law Code [572] explicitly refers to the model of the Ottoman Maëallat al-ahkam al-adliyya (Mecelle, issued 1869-1878).[573] Based on the regulations of the Maliki madhhab, it should be compiled by a committee of eight ulama. They should write it in simple language, easy to understand for everybody. Like all other matters of concern it should be discussed by both Houses and after decision issued by royal decree. International treaties approved by the parliament should equally be added as appendix to the Law Code. All jurisdiction would have to follow this Code which would be open only to amendment by the Majlis itself. This approach to legislation is in remarkable contrast to the pattern of Islamic jurisdiction still prevailing in Morocco at that period. It would have restricted the qadis to those legal opinions which happened to have been fixed by the Law Code! This was actually to happen later in the legislation of most Islamic countries.

Of particular interest is the suggestion of a new Police Law which is to be issued in accordance with the Sharia and with the interest of the country, after thorough study of those of the Ottoman Empire, Egypt, Tunisia and Iran. [574] A Police School is to be established for the training of a qualified police corps whose members are knowledgeable enough to interact successfully with the French and Spanish officers acting under the Algeçiras Act. Appeal against police action is also to the Majlis. This reform was clearly designed to counter the French and Spanish control over the Moroccan police force which had just been established.

As the author saw it, the ruler would derive an increase of his glory and of God's pleasure with him if he introduced constitutional rule. It would further add significantly to the dignity and accountability of his administration. Growing wealth and prosperity would result for his country, and he would gain further recognition of neighbouring Islamic states, which was hoped to strengthen their support in times of need. It was even promised that the loyalty of those tribes outside of the control of the Makhzan would be strengthened, due to good governance and to the general respect for the Sharia which no Muslim could deny. This was to be the cornerstone of the new constitutional régime.

It is very easy to criticize this draft for its political naivety and its limited familiarity with Moroccan institutions, points which have already been raised by Abdallah Laroui.[575] The powers and responsibilities of the ruler himself, and the question of his liability to parliamentary control are not even mentioned. The problem of the regional balance of power in the country was hardly given attention. A general obedience to Islamic Law was simply taken for granted, once a central representative body was established. This Islamic design of a constitutional system for Morocco somehow gives the impression of a utopian experiment to be applied in an archaic and retarded country.[576]

The author's confidence in the Sharia as a source of dignity and a firm baseline for public consensus and political institution-building nevertheless reflects an important strand of Islamic political thought of the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, which perhaps could most aptly be described as "Sharia patriotism."[577] This attitude comes out already in the political thought of the Young Ottomans, especially with Namık Kemal who had even identified the Sharia with the concept of Natural Law which he had found in Rousseau and which he had tried to adapt for his purposes.[578] Recourse to the Sharia as a major source of legitimacy, for both ruler and state, had dominated official life in the days of the caliph-sultan Abdülhamid II.[579] It also loomed large in the heated discussions of the newly established Ottoman parliament since 1908, with Westernists and Islamists in fierce contest, and Turkist nationalism gradually emerging in between.[580] After all, this was a period when Islamic scholars had entered the political arena on a large scale, in Iran as elsewhere. For all its deficiencies the text shows the opening of the scholars' discourse towards the current affairs of the Muslims, even of those far beyond their own communities. As this draft constitution was published later by the prominent Moroccan politician Allal al-Fasi, it provided an important link between the older reformism which was rooted in the Middle Eastern Salafiyya, and the Islamic strand of Moroccan nationalism which developed in Morocco since the 1930s.[581]

 Acknowledgments

This article greatly profited from discussion following the presentation of the paper at the conference. I am particularly grateful to Yann Richard for his suggestions concerning the dating of the constitutional draft presented here.

[515] See for a useful, though somewhat outdated bibliography concerning constitutional developments in Europe and elsewhere in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Abdul-Hadi Hairi, Shi2ism and Constitutionalism in Iran: A Study of the Role Played by the Persian Residents in Iraq in Iranian Politics (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977), 249ff.; see further Klaus Fröhlich, The Emergence of Russian Constitutionalism: 1900–1904. The Relationship between Social Mobilization and Political Group Formation in Pre-Revolutionary Russia (The Hague: Nijhoff, 1981); Andrew James Nathan, Peking Politics, 1918–1923: Factionalism and the Failure of Constitutionalism (Berkeley, CA, Los Angeles, London: University of California, 1976); Theodore McNelly, The Origins of Japan's Democratic Constitution (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2000). For a short overview of the constitutional developments and revolutions in the Middle East and North Africa in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, see B. Lewis and A. K. S. Lambton, "Dustur", EI2, 2: 638–657; J. Landau, "Madjlis", EI2, 5: 1033–1043; C. Findley, "Madjlis al-Shura", EI2, 5: 1082–1086.

[516] Elie Kedourie, “The Fate of Constitutionalism in the Middle East”, in Arabic Political Memoirs and Other Studies (London: Frank Cass, 1974): 1–27, here 1ff.

[517] Ibid., 26. He only excepts Lebanon, where various social interests found representation in the political setup, from this assessment.

[518] For the whole issue, William Montgomery Watt, Islamic Political Thought: The Basic Concepts (Edinburgh: University Press, 1987 [1st publication 1968]), 82–89, 140 n. 11 with further reference. See also his “The Significance of the Early Stages of Immamite Shi2ism,” in Early Islam: Collected Articles (Edinburgh: University Press, 1990), 166.

[519] See E. Cerulli and G. S. P. Freeman-Grenville, “Maüdishu”, EI2, 6: 128ff.; Elias N. Saad, Social History of Timbuktu. The Role of Muslim Scholars and Notables, 1400–1900 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983), 120 ff. et passim.

[520] See for example, Stanford J. Shaw, History of the Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey, 1. Empire of the Gazis: The Rise and Decline of the Ottoman Empire (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991 [1st publication 1976]), 118 ff.; Robert Mantran, ed., Histoire de l1Empire ottoman (Paris: Fayard, 1989), 184–189.

[521] Ismail Hakkı Uzunçarvılı, Osmanlı Devletinin Saray Tevkilâtı (Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu Basımevi, 1988 [1st publication 1945]), 225–229.

[522] For example, Mantran, ed., Histoire, 350; for Egypt, Ibrahim El-Mouelhy, Etude documentaire: Organisation et fonctionnement des institutions ottomanes en Egypte (1517–1917) (s.l.: Imprimerie de la Société turque d1histoire), 8 ff.

[523] H. Talloen, “La structure du pouvoir souverain selon l1historien tunisien Ibn 1Abi Diyaf (1802–1874),” in Mélanges d1islamologie dédiés à la mémoire de A. Abel par ses collègues, ses élèves et ses amis (Brussels: Publications du Centre pour l1étude des problèmes du monde musulman contemporain, 1974), 2: 391–399; Verif Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideals (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1962), 310. See also Godfrey Goodwin, The Janissaries (London: Saqi Books, 1997), 232, for the rather peculiar and hot-heated form of “Janissary democracy” which bequeathed “a curious tradition of popular leadership” to Middle-Eastern societies.

[524] Nicolae Jorga, Geschichte des Osmanisches Reiches (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1990 [1st publication Gotha, 1908–1913]), 4: 370 ff.

[525] See on him esp. Niyazi Berkes, The Development of Secularism in Turkey (London: Hurst, 1998 [1st publication: McGill University Press, 1964]), 36–46; Niyazi Berkes, “Ibrahim Müteferriüa,” EI2, 3: 996 ff.; Stefan Reichmuth, “Islamic Reformist Discourse in the Tulip Period (1718–1730): Ibrahim Müteferriqa and His Arguments on Printing,” in Ekmeleddin Ihsanoælu, ed., International Congress on Learning and Education in the Ottoman World, Istanbul, 12–15 April 1999. Proceedings (Istanbul, 2001): 149–161.

[526] Ibrahim Müteferrika, Usülü1l-Hikem fî Nizâmi1l-Ümem, ed. Adil Ven (Ankara: Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı, 1995), 130 ff.

[527] For the influence of Italian poets, political writers and activists like Alfieri, Pellico and Garibaldi on Young Ottoman and Arab intellectuals, see Mardin, Young Ottoman Thought, 20 ff.; Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987 [1st publication: 1962]), 271. As Italian nationalists also had to put up with a particularly strong religious heritage with universal implications, their aims and strategies were of great interest to the Arab and Ottoman intellectuals of that period.

[528] For the Young Ottomans and their ideology, mainly Mardin, Young Ottoman Thought, passim; Mümtazer Türköne, Siyasî Ideoloji Olarak Islamcılıæın Doæuvu (Istanbul: Iletivim Yayıncılık, 1991); Hüseyin Çelik, Ali Suavî ve Dönemi (Istanbul: Iletivim Yayıncılık, 1994). For the Young Turks and their alliance with the Syrian Salafiyya, see especially Hasan Kayalı, Arabs and Young Turks: Ottomanism, Arabism and Islamism in the Ottoman Empire, 1908–1918 (Berkeley, CA, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press, 1997).

[529] For Rashid Rida, his cooperation with the Young Turks and his interest in and support for the constitutional developments in Iran and Istanbul, see the different articles and reports in the volumes of al-Manār 9–12 (1324/1906–1327/1909–1910); also Kayalı, Arabs and Young Turks, 46. For his justification of constitutionalism by referring to the obligatory al-amr bi1l-ma2ruf wa1l-nahi 2an al-munkar, see Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000), 510 f.

[530] For the Iranian Constitutional Revolution of 1906–1907, see Edward G. Browne, The Persian Revolution, 1905–1909 (London: Frank Cass, 1966 [1st publication: Cambridge, 1910]); Hairi, Shi2ism and Constitutionalism; Ervand Abrahamian, Iran between Two Revolutions (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982).

[531] David Menashri, Education and the Making of Modern Iran (Ithaca, NY, London: Cornell University Press, 1992), 274 ff., table 22.

[532] First Duma: 6/25; Second Duma: 6/36; see the table in Dilyara Usmanova, ‘The Activity of the Muslim Fraction of the State Duma and Its Significance for the Formation of a Political Culture among the Muslim Peoples of Russia (1906–1917)’, in Anke von Kügelgen, Michael Kemper, and Allen J. Frank, eds, Muslim Culture in Russia and Central Asia from the 18th to the Early 20th Centuries, 2: Inter-Regional and Inter-Ethnic Relations (Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1998): 417–455, here 441–449.

[533] This process has been described in detail for the Ottoman Empire before, during, and after the First World War by Berkes, Secularism, chapters 11–17.

[534] For a comprehensive overview of the events and developments between 1904 and 1921, see for example, Roger Le Tourneau, Histoire du Maroc moderne (Aix-en- Provence: Publications de l1Université de Provence, 1992), 110–142; Abdallah Laroui, Les origines sociales et culturelles du nationalisme marocain (1830–1912) (Paris: Maspero, 1977), 371 414.

[535] Le Tourneau, Histoire, 118 ff.; Laroui, Origines, 374 ff.; Ralf Elger, Zentralismus und Autonomie: Gelehrte und Staat in Morokko, 1900–1931 (Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1994), 74 ff.

[536] See for these events: Le Tourneau, Histoire, 121–125; Elger, Zentralismus, 79–90, 101 ff.

[537] See Jacques Cagne, Nation et nationalisme au Maroc: Aux racines de la nation marocaine (Rabat: Dar Nachr al Maarifa, 1988), 471–495, 501–543; Laroui, Origines, 374–382, 403–405; Elger, Zentralismus, 88 ff.; Franz Kogelmann, Islamische fromme Stiftungen und Staat: Der Wandel in den Beziehungen zwischen einer religiösen Institution und dem marokkanischen Staat seit dem 19. Jahrhundert bis 1937 (Würzburg: Ergon Verlag, 2000), 121 ff.

[538] Arabic text in Muhammad al-Mannuni, Madahir yaqzat al-Ma∫rib al-hadiö (al-Dar al-Bayda [Casablanca]: al-Ëam2iyya al-ma∫ribiyya li1l-ta1lif wa1l-namr, 1405/1988), 2: 407–421, facsimile of the first page 407. French abstract and translation in Cagne, Nation et nationalisme, 471–479, 501–510.

[539] See for this: Laroui, Origines, 403 ff.; Cagne, Nation et nationalisme, 485–495; Le Tourneau, Histoire, 124 f.

[540] First published by the famous Moroccan politician Muhammad 2Allal al-Fasi in his book Hufriyyat 2an al-haraka al-dusturiyya fi al-Maʃrib qabla1l-himaya (Rabat: Matba2a al-Risala); French summary and partial translation in Cagne, Nation et nationalisme, 479–484, 511–522.

[541] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 405 ff. (about the author and his activities in Morocco), full text of the draft pp. 422–445, facsimile of the last page of the manuscript containing the end of the text (in Maghribi handwriting) and a final gloss (in Oriental handwriting, presumably by the author himself): qalahu1l-2abd al-faqir & 2Abd al-Karim Murad al-Tarabulusi al-Madani &. A vague hint to that author by 2Allal al-Fasi himself in Hufriyyat, 8, is mentioned already by Cagne, Nation et nationalisme, 479 n. 206.

[542] A first attempt at a reconstruction of his career has been undertaken by Stefan Reichmuth and J. O. Hunwick, “Traces of a Forgotten Lebanese. Notes and Inquiries about 2Abd al-Karim Murad/al-Muradi (d. 1926/8) and His Activities in North and West Africa,” Sudanic Africa, forthcoming.

[543] Gathered by al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 311 ff.

[544] Ms. Fonds ancien AOF, Aix-en-Provence.

[545] Especially two books by Adam 2Abd-Allàh al-Iluri (d. 1992): al-Islam fi Nayëariyya (1st ed., Cairo: 2Abd al-Hamid al-Hanafi, 1369/1949–1950), 43 ff. (with photograph); Nasim al-saba fi albar al-islam wa 2ulama bilad Yuruba (2nd ed., Cairo: Maktabat al-adab, 1987), 175, 178 ff., 191, 195 ff.

[546] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 311 ff.

[547] On Husayn al-Jisr, his writings and activities, Johannes Ebert, Religion und Reform in der arabischen Provinz. Husain al-Jisr at-Tarabulusi (1845– 1909): Ein islamischer Gelehrter zwischen Tradition und Reform (Frankfurt/M. Bern, New York, Paris: Peter Lang, 1991).

[548] Year given by his contemporary, Muhammad 2Abd al-Hayy al-Kattani, cf. al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 311.

[549] Cf. Albert Hourani, “Djam2iyya,” Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2nd ed., 2: 429.

[550] Cf. Elger, Zentralismus und Autonomie, 88. 2Abd al-Hafiz was the uncle of the prominent Moroccan politician 2Allal al-Fasi, see Laroui, Origines, 378; he might thus be considered as a possible source for the transmission of the draft to his nephew. For the collaboration of his circle with the Nammur brothers in Tangier mentioned earlier, see 380, n. 29.

[551] Carl Brockelmann, Geschichte der Arabischen Literatur (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1937–1949), Supplement 2: 1017.

[552] See note 31.

[553] 1926: Adam al-Iluri, al-Islam fi Nayëiriyya wa1l-mayl 2Uöman b. Fudiyu al-Fulani (3rd ed., s.l., 1398/1978), 152. 1347/1928: al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 312.

[554] John O. Hunwick, ed., Arabic Literature of Africa, 2: The Writings of Central Sudanic Africa (Leiden, New York, Köln: E. J. Brill, 1995), 261.

[555] Makib Arslan, Hadir al-2alam al-islami (Cairo: al-Matba2a al-salafiyya wa-maktabatuha, 1343/1924–1925), 322.

[556] Both Muzaffar al-Din Shah who had signed the Constitution on 30 December 1906, shortly before his death, and his successor Muhammad 2Ali Shah are mentioned in the text, al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 425. For the dates, see for example, “Dustur,” EI2, 2: 651 ff.

[557] Le Tourneau, Histoire, 119 ff.

[558] Al-Manār 8 (1323/1905), 158 ff.

[559] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 422–426.

[560] See for example, “Dustur,” EI2, 2: 652.

[561] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 426–431.

[562] Ibid., 427. An abbreviated fusion of the first part of the first version (the Mobedan’s speech to the Sassanian emperor Bahram) with the end of the second version (a speech of Khusraw Anushirwan), both quoted from al-Mas2udi in Ibn Laldun, Kitab al-2ibar wa-diwan al-mubtada11 wa1l-labar (Beirut: Dar al-kitab al-lubnani, Maktabat almadrasa, 1983), 1: 64 ff.; Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah. An Introduction to History, trans. Franz Rosenthal (New York: Pantheon Books, 1958), 1: 80. For the “Circle of Equity” and its use by Ottoman writers see Lewis V. Thomas, A Study of Naima (New York: New York University Press, 1972), 78; Norman Izkowitz, “Men and Ideas in the Eighteenth Century Ottoman Empire,” in Thomas Naff and Roger Owen, eds, Studies in Eighteenth Century Islamic History (Carbondale, IL, Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press—London, Amsterdam: Feffer & Simons, 1977), 23 ff.

[563] For 2imara, a notion practically identical with 2umran, the central term in Ibn Khaldun’s theory of civilization, see F. Rosenthal in Ibn Khaldun, Muqaddimah 1: lxxvi ff., 80 n. 80. 2Umran is often translated as “civilization,” a connotation which might come in here also for 2imara.

[564] The Arabic word used by Ibn Khaldun (1: 65) here is ta1dib.

[565] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 432 ff.

[566] Ibid., 435–443.

[567] For the aspirations of the Sheykhü1l-Islamate after 1908 to reform the madrasa system and to regain control of the Ottoman educational and legal institution, see Berkes, Secularism, 413 ff.

[568] For mura in the context of contemporary Islamic political thought see especially Roswitha Badry, Die zeitgenössische Diskussion um den islamischen Beratungsgedanken (shura) unter dem besonderen Aspekt ideengeschichtlicher Kontinuitäten und Diskontinuitäten (Stuttgart: Steiner, 1998); Gudrun Krämer, Gottes Staat als Republik: Reflexionen zeitgenössischer Muslime zu Islam, Menschenrechten und Demokratie (Baden-Baden: Nomosn, 1999).

[569] See for example, al-Manār 9 (1324/1906), 553 ff.; 10 (1325/1907), 68, 281 ff.; 12 (1327/1909–1910), 606–611.

[570] For example, al-Manār 12 (1327/1909–1910), 606–611.

[571] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 428 ff.

[572] Ibid.

[573] See C. V. Findley, “Medjelle,” EI2, 6: 971 ff., with further literature.

[574] Al-Mannuni, Madahir, 2: 429.

[575] Laroui, Origines, 378 ff.; see also Kogelmann, Islamische fromme Stiftungen, 98 ff.

[576] Quite harsh views of Morocco were expressed by Rashid Rida himself, al-Manār 1 (1315–1316/1897–1898), 272 ff.; further 9 (1324/1906), 156 ff., and especially 10 (1325/1907), 554–557, where he qualifies the European supremacy in Morocco as a necessary victory of Order against Chaos. In comparison with the Moroccans, the Christians as bearers of a higher civilization even have to be regarded as righteous (salihun). For Rida, this victory of Knowledge and Order over Ignorance and Corruption follows Divine Providence as expressed in the Qur1an. Long-standing Middle Eastern prejudices against Maghrib seem to come out in full here.

[577] In adaptation of the German term Verfassungspatriotismus (constitutional patriotism) which was coined by Jürgen Habermas and which had a considerable impact on the constitutional debate in Germany after reunification.

[578] See Mardin, Young Ottoman Thought, 292 ff.

[579] See for this Berkes, Secularism, 253–270; Selim Deringil, The Well-Protected Domains: Ideology and the Legitimation of Power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909 (London, New York: I. B. Tauris, 1999), 44–67.

[580] See the exemplary account of this development given by Berkes, Secularism, 337–366.

[581] For this so-called “Neo-Salafiyya,” of which 2Allal al-Fasi was a leading figure, see E. J. Rosenthal, Islam in the Modern National State (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965), 154, 158, 325; 2Allal al-Fasi, The Independence Movements in Arab North Africa (New York, 1970), 113 ff.;

2Allal al-Fasi, Hadiö al-Maʃrib f i1l-Mamriq (Cairo: al-Matba2a al-2alamiyya, 1956), 23; 2Abd al-Razzaq al-Dawway, ‘2Allal al-Fasi ka-namudhaë li1l-fikr al-salaf i al-ëadid f i1l-Maʃrib’, in Fi1l-intalliëansiya f i1l-Maʃrib al-2arabi (Beirut, 1984), 105–118. I owe these references to Thomas Kerkloh MA, Dortmund.

* 9. Constructing Transnational Islam: The East–West network of Shakib Arslan

Raja Adal

The interwar period saw the division of the greater part of the world into a colonized East and a colonizing West, and within the East into partly overlapping Arab and Islamic worlds. The East, the West, the Arab world, the Islamic world, each had its human networks. At the same time, the very concepts of an Arab world and of an Islamic world competed with local nationalisms, with Westernization, and with each other. As a literary figure belonging to the cultural milieus of Beirut, Cairo, and Damascus, and as the Arab amir al bayan, “the prince of eloquence,” Shakib Arslan was strongly connected to the Arab world. As a former student of Muhammad Abduh, a close friend of Rashid Rida, and an important contributor to the journal al-Mānar, he was a spokesman for the Islamic revival. As a resident of Switzerland, the publisher of the journal La Nation Arabe, and a perpetual anticolonial activist, he was a regular figure at anticolonial congresses and in Paris, Berlin, and Rome.

During the entire interwar period, Shakib Arslan’s position at the crossroad of various regions and worldviews gave him influence throughout an extensive region that stretched from the Arabian Gulf states and the Arab East, through Western and Eastern Europe, and to the Maghreb. At the same time, Arslan was “arguably the most widely read Arab writer of the interwar period, “ [582] and the Egyptian press diffused his lifetime production of more than 2,000 articles and 20 volumes throughout the Arab and Islamic world. In French, his journal La Nation Arabe allowed him to reach Arab students with a Western education, non-Arab Muslims who did not know Arabic, Western policy makers, and anti-colonial activists, introducing concepts of the Arab world and the Islamic revival to new audiences.

This chapter traces the members of Arslan’s transnational network, looks into the manner that it was constructed, and ultimately asks for its raisons dêtre, for the reasons that drove it into being. It does so through a systematic analysis of the thousands of proper names that appear throughout the 2, 437 pages and 38 volumes of La Nation Arabe. This approach made it possible to unearth pertinent passages scattered throughout the text and overlooked by previous studies of Shakib Arslan, which have only made cursory use of the journal.[583] More importantly, systematic indexing allowed the text itself to provide the key figures which were the pillars of Arslan’s transnational network, and upon which the framework of this article is based.[584]

Its structure is based upon a spatial division of Shakib Arslan’s network into regions. After a brief introduction on Arslan himself, it begins with his connections to the highest echelons of the Ottoman state at the time of the dissolution of the Empire, and with the networks and plans of the exiled community in the first few years of the interwar period. The second section returns to the links geographically closest to Arslan’s birthplace in the mountains of Lebanon, to the land that lay between those mountains and Istanbul, namely to the intellectual milieu of Damascus and Beirut. From the last days of the First World War and until 1937 Shakib Arslan was an exiled nationalist leader, and it is testimony to the intellectual influence that he exercised from afar if after a twenty-year absence he received a hero’s welcome in Beirut and Damascus. The third part is about Europe, where Arslan published La Nation Arabe, collaborated with the leadership of European anticolonial movements, organized the European Muslim Congress, and strove to maintain ties between Eastern Europe and the other centers of the Islamic world.

A fourth section describes how, to the largely independent Arab and Muslim states of Ibn Saud in the Hijaz and Nejd, of Imam Yahya in Yemen, and of Faisal in Iraq, Arslan offered his services for council and, when necessary, mediation, engaging in the difficult task of drawing the three monarchs toward greater Arab unity. While the situation in the Arab East was complex and highly politicized, fraught with the rivalry of the Husaynis and Nashashibis in Palestine, with that of the independent kingdoms of the Hijaz-Nejd, Yemen, and Iraq, and with the aggressive factionalism of the Syrian independence movement, the Maghreb provided a welcome respite. A fifth section deals with how Arslan came to be known as the protector, strategist, and mastermind of the Maghreb's independence movements, mobilizing the Islamic world for such causes as the repeal of the Berber Dahir. This, in turn, gave the leaders of North African independence movements studying in Paris a new sense of pan-Arab and pan-Islamic consciousness. The sixth section concerns Arslan's close links with the intellectual world of Cairo, which printed Arslan's works and diffused them throughout the Arab world. Yet it so happens that, as the country where Abduh and Rida lived, Arslan's Egyptian network becomes most relevant when studied in the context of the Islamic revival and irrespective of geographic location, and so the last section will be about "the Manarists."

Shakib Arslan was born to one of two families that have traditionally assumed the leadership of Mount Lebanon's Druze community, a heterodox sect of Ismaili Islam. It is unknown when and how he entered the mainstream of Sunni Islam, later to become one of its chief publicizers, but at the age of 16 he was strongly influenced by classes taught at the Madrasat al-Sultaniyya by Muhammad Abduh, who was exiled in Beirut. For his whole life, he remained a follower of Abduh's Islamic reformist movement and a member of Abduh's political and literary circles.

Druze on his father's side and by inheritance, Arslan's mother, as well as his wife, were Circassian, a Muslim minority group from the Caucasus. It is revealing of Arslan's Ottoman background that, although an emblematic figure of inter-war pan-Arabism and pan-Islam, he was originally born a member of a heretic sect not considered Islamic by the majority of Sunnis, was ethnically half non-Arab, and eventually married a foreign immigrant of non-Arab origin. Although his wife Salima had lived in the region of Salt in north Jordan since her childhood, she testifies to only knowing Turkish at the time of their marriage.[585]

Arslan received a modern education, first at an American protestant school, then at the Maronite Christian Madrasat al-Hikma (also known by its French appellation La Sagesse), and finally at the Ottoman Madrasat al-Sultaniyya. In the course of his education he learned French, Ottoman Turkish, some English, and quickly distinguished himself as a singularly gifted writer of Arabic. For the rest of his life, and to this day, the Arab world knows him as “amir al-bayan, “ the “prince of eloquence.” This title is significant in two ways. When the two words are taken separately the second refers to his literary genius, while the first makes reference to his title of Amir, a responsibility he first came to assume at the age of 17, when his father died and he became governor of the Shuf Mountains in south central Lebanon. Although Arslan would eventually leave the confines of Lebanese Mountain politics, throughout his life he would remain a prodigious writer and a natural political leader.

While Arslan published extensively in Arabic, the one journal that he edited himself was in French. Printed in the vicinity of Geneva and mostly edited with his colleague Ihsan al-Jabiri, La Nation Arabe appeared from 1930 to 1938 in thirty-eight volumes.[586] It is interesting to compare La Nation Arabe and al-Mānar, in that Arslan and Rida shared an exceptionally close friendship and were proponents of very similar visions of the Islamic revival movement, both belonging to the school of Muhammad Abduh. Many of the articles that Arslan wrote for La Nation Arabe he rewrote in Arabic and addressed them to al-Mānar’s readers after making slight changes to accommodate the different readership. Although published in French and Arabic respectively, and addressed to different, although overlapping, audiences, the two journals can often be seen sharing the same source. al-Mānar operated in the context of Islam as a contemporary religion while La Nation Arabe was a “political, literary, economic, and social journal” operating in the contemporary world approached from an Islamic perspective. In other respects, Arslan differed from Rashid Rida. Their difference is illustrated by the one time the two friends were at odds. It was in 1915, at a time when Arab nationalists, including Rida, were earnestly beginning to oppose the Ottoman state. Arslan, as a member of the Ottoman parliament, and more importantly as one raised in the context of its multi-ethnic, multi-lingual cosmopolitanism, could not imagine Arabs separated from Turks embarking alone upon their political destiny. Deceivingly entitled La Nation Arabe, Arslan’s journal dealt as much with the Arab world as with the non-Arab regions of the Islamic world.

 The Ottoman world, its loss, and the endeavor to restore it

Born in nineteenth-century Mount Lebanon and schooled in an Ottoman civil service school, Shakib Arslan’s adoption of the reformist Islamic themes taught by Muhammad Abduh in Beirut only strengthened his attachment to a multi-ethnic Ottoman Empire, seat of the Caliphate and barrier against foreign encroachment. His enthusiasm for the empire is perhaps most clearly expressed by the Ottoman campaign of 1911–1912 to preserve Cyrenaica against Italian conquest. Arslan, a Druze Amir and former mutasarrif (provincial governor) of Mount Lebanon rushed to the front, spending eight months fighting with the regular Ottoman troops. The battle was lost and the empire continued shrinking, but it was there that Arslan met the young Turkish officers from the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), who would come to seize power in 1913 and draw Arslan into the innermost circles of Ottoman rule.

Among them was Enver Pava, who along with Talat Pava and Cemal Pava was member of the triumvirate that held power in Istanbul from 1913 until the end of the First World War.[587] The friendship that bound Arslan, an Arab Ottoman Amir and writer, to Enver Pava, a Turkish Ottoman general of lower class origins, deserves closer examination. On the ideological plane, the CUP is seen by revisionist historians such as Hasan Kayali not as the logical precursor of Turkish nationalism, but only as an advocate of secular Ottoman nationalism, which the party adopted in 1908 only to abandon at the end of the Balkan wars in 1913. With the Balkan possessions lost, and the Ottoman Empire reduced to predominantly Muslim subjects, there occurred what Kayali describes as an “Islamist reinterpretation of Ottomanism.” As a result “the Unionists came to rely on religion in their quest for centralization and social harmony much as their nemesis Abdulhamid had.”[588]

The friendship and partnership between Enver Pava and Shakib Arslan, however, begun in 1911 and continued until the former’s death eleven years later, transcending the CUP “conversion” to Islamist politics, and the exile of both Enver and Arslan. It would be an easy answer to say that both Enver and Arslan had a vested interest in the Ottoman state and thus fought for its preservation, and subsequently for its restoration. In terms of military ventures, both can be seen engaging in lost causes, which, if not outright romantic, had very little chances of success. The conditions of Enver Pava’s death in the mountains of Eastern Bukhara are described by Arslan in La Nation Arabe:

Enver Pava, to whom I had explained all of the [hidden] intentions of Bolsheviks when they invited him to settle in Moscow by promising him wonders, soon realized that the Bolsheviks were using him to threaten the English and that, in reality, they detested him no less than they detested the English. It is then that he secretly went, disguised as a peasant, to Bukhara and chased the Russians out of this kingdom which they had subjugated and ruined. Since the fight was not equal, Enver could not hold more than one year, and died as a martyr in a battle in which, with 300 fighters he held his own against 12,000 Russian soldiers.[589]

On the political stage, Arslan and Enver Pava would closely cooperate in the years of exile after 1917. In the meantime, after his election to the Ottoman parliament in 1913, Arslan had the much less enviable position of being one of the leading Arab Ottoman figures in Damascus during Cemal Pava’s reign of terror. Later accused of collaboration during Cemal’s suppression of Arab nationalist movements, Arslan insisted that in his position as representative to the Ottoman parliament, it was his responsibility to struggle to alleviate the deportations, executions, and food shortages by negotiating with Cemal Pava. He claims to have done this in frequent meetings with the latter, and to have had recourse to the other two members of the Ottoman triumvirate, Talat Pava and Enver Pava, to attempt to alleviate the famine that hit Syria and Lebanon.[590]

As for Kemal Pava, the future Atatürk, whom Arslan first met when he was chief of staff of Enver’s army, they met again at the Café Maskot in Berlin in the late summer of 1917, on the day that British troops were entering Jerusalem. Expressing his anguish at the fate of Jerusalem and Palestine, Arslan confessed to his companion his fears about the tragic situation of Islam. Kemal Pava, who would one day become the father of the secularist Turkish nation-state, is said to have told Arslan:

We shall take it [Jerusalem] back, we shall take it back … inshaallah [God willing], we shall take it back; and if I say “inshaallah” it is as a good Muslim that I say it, because I am Muslim before all else; but it is certain that we shall take it back.[591]

Before becoming a secularist Turkish nationalist, and in the presence of Arslan, Kemal Pava spoke very much like his fellow Ottoman companions, although perhaps with a more consciously expressed profession of faith.

In the immediate aftermath of the war and with the Ottoman Empire occupied, Arslan exiled himself in Berlin, along with the CUP leadership, which included Enver and Talat. In those immediate postwar years, as Allied ambitions in the former Ottoman lands became clearer, with the Balfour declaration that promised a Jewish homeland in Palestine, with the violent end brought by the French to Faisal’s independent kingdom in Syria, and before the commercial agreements of March 1921 between the Soviets and Britain had been signed, a coalition of Arabs and Turks under the banner of Islam and allied to the Soviet Union did not appear to be a completely improbable scenario. It is in this context that Enver Pava founded the Islamic International (or Islamintern) as an extension of the CUP. Based in Moscow, Enver envisaged a decentralized organization consisting of regional cells spanning the entire Islamic world, each with its own strategy but operating within a general framework and with an overarching goal: the freedom and self-government of Islamic lands.[592]

The long cold voyage to Moscow was not easy for the Arab and Turkish exiles who accepted the invitation. Arslan had previously been in contact with the Soviet Politburo member Zinovev in Saint Moritz in order to communicate a message from King Faisal, and met him again, along with Trotsky, in Moscow during the third general conference of the Komintern.[593] The commemorative photograph of the Islamic International Conference members shows an out of place and depressed group of Arabs and Turks, for demoralization must have been all the more complete after Talat’s assassination earlier that year in Berlin. Shakib Arslan wrote Enver that the loss of Talat represented “not only a loss for the CUP, not only a loss for the Turkish people, but a loss for the whole Islamic world."[594] Enver's death a year later marked the end of Arslan's hopes for a restoration of the empire.

While the CUP's political position changed with circumstances, adapting the ideologies of Ottomanism, Islamism, and Turkish nationalism to the various conditions existing during their rise to power and subsequent downfall, a common underlying cultural background can be seen in the personal relationship between Arslan and Enver Pava. As Kayali points out, "the Ottoman state—'sick man' though it may have been—actually had more resilience in its last decade than historians generally credit it with."[595] Not only the state, but what may be called an "Ottoman culture" seems to also have embodied the ideals of men such as Shakib Arslan and Enver Pava, and its resilience may very well have survived the demise of the empire and, as shall later be seen, its legacy found heirs in future generations.

 Syria

Shakib Arslan's relationship with Syria during the interwar period, from 1917 to 1937, was that of an exile. Yet to former Ottomans like Arslan, Syria meant greater Syria and included not only the French mandates of Syria and Lebanon but also the British mandate of Palestine. It was accepted, however, that the political conditions created by the colonial powers were unavoidable, at least in the short term. The "Syrian Congress," which met in 1921 in Geneva to petition the League of Nations Permanent Mandates Commission, changed its name to "Syrian-Palestinian Congress" upon the request of the Palestinian delegates who contended that, their region being under British mandate, their agenda might also have to differ.[596] Shakib Arslan himself quickly realized that bargaining included compromise, and in his discussions with de Jouvenel accepted the idea of a plebiscite to determine whether Tripoli and the other regions added to Lebanon in 1920 would join a Syrian or a Lebanese independent state.[597]

Shakib Arslan's official position was that of head of the three member permanent delegation of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress to the League of Nations in Geneva. Although the Congress's first meeting in 1921 was unsuccessful in obtaining the League of Nations' interference in British and French mandatory policy, the idea of a permanent delegation to represent the Syrian issue to the League gained renewed urgency in the summer of 1925, when the Syrian revolt broke out. The revolt, and its violent suppression, coincided with Abd al-Karim's revolt in the Rif Mountains of Morocco, and for an instant it seemed as if France's colonial empire had been fragilized. It is in this context that Arslan moved to Switzerland to express the aspirations of the Syrian and Palestinian indepen-dentists to the League of Nations Permanent Mandates Commission and to the European world.

The delegation had three members. In addition to Shakib Arslan, there was Ihsan al-Jabiri, Arslan's partner from 1925 until his return to Syria in 1937 to become governor of the district of Latakia. Jabiri was an Arab Ottoman from a prominent family of Aleppo, who had once served as municipal leader. Educated in Istanbul and with a higher law degree from Paris, Jabiri was an aristocratic member of his world, who held several positions in the high Ottoman bureaucracy before becoming Chamberlain of King Faisal during the latter's short reign. He was, in Arslan's words, "our colleague and companion of arms in the patriotic struggle that we have together pursued in Europe, since the Syrian-Palestinian Congress held in Geneva in 1921, and until the completion of the Franco-Syrian treaty in 1937."[598]

The third member of the delegation was Sulayman Kinan, a Maronite from Mount Lebanon who had been a representative in the twelve member Lebanese Administrative Council, which from 1861 to 1919 was the governing body of Mount Lebanon. In 1920 it declared the independence of Lebanon in opposition to the French Mandate, and in 1921 Kinan was a delegate to the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, submitting a request to the League of Nations for Lebanese independence within its pre-1920 frontiers.[599] In later years, Kinan was replaced by Riyad al-Sulh, whose father Riza al-Sulh was interior minister in Faisal's cabinet at the time of the imposition of the French mandate in 1920.[600] A member of Beirut's Sunni merchant bourgeoisie, Riyad al-Sulh was to become the independent Lebanese Republic's first prime minister in 1943.

Beyond the immediate associates of Shakib Arslan in Geneva, there were of course the great alliances and rivalries that characterized the fractious Syrian independence movement. Within this landscape, Arslan can be clearly positioned as the close friend, ally, and advisor of three major actors, Rashid Rida, Hajj Amin al-Husayni, and his younger brother Adil Arslan; and as the antagonist of two others, Michel Lutfallah and especially Abd al-Rahman Shahbandar.

Although vice-president of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, one of its active participants, and a lifelong ally of Arslan, the Syrian nationalist aspect of Rashid Rida has often found itself overshadowed by his position in the Islamic revivalist movement. Yet Rida's writings in al-Mānar bear the stamp of his ideas on Syrian unity, and of the Islamic content of his Arab and Syrian nationalism. Unlike Arslan, Rida was involved in the Arab Nationalist movement before and during the First World War, and this was the only time when the two friends were at odds. Yet with the war ended, Arslan lost the Ottoman state, which he had defended to the very end, and Rida realized that the Arab revolt had resulted not in independence but in European colonization. During Arslan's difficult period of transition from Ottomanism to Arabism, it was Rida who, in Cleveland's words, "played the major role in reintegrating Arslan with the Arab leaders who had been alienated by his wartime policies [in support of the Ottoman empire]."[601] Thus was Arslan elected Secretary of the Syrian-Palestinian congress, later to become its prime animator.

On the whole, Khoury is justified in stating that Palestinian delegates to the congress were wary of Syrian elements who adopted an increasingly narrow territorial form of nationalism focusing on a smaller Syria, compromising on the issue of Zionism, and attached to the Hashemites, who were suspect in Palestinian eyes.[602] However, while this view was applicable to the Lutfallah and Shahbandar faction within the congress, the situation was different in the case of Arslan and Rida. Indeed, Khoury notes that although both Jabiri and Arslan were exiled, they were looked upon admiringly by the younger group of ultra-nationalist Istiqlalists as leaders of exemplary integrity, who were not reluctant to confront the controversy over Palestine.[603] La Nation Arabe, the delegation's journal published by Arslan, dealt extensively with the Palestinian issue, regularly reproducing the numerous resolutions sent by the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, which by the 1930s was dominated by Arslan and his allies, to the League of Nations. As the years advance it propeled the issue to the forefront of all others, attributing to it crisis proportions. In its 8 years of publication, the journal devoted 11% of its articles including one special issue to the Palestinian question, and regularly published reports of Zionist congresses in Europe and lists of European politicians and publications with their stance upon the issue, while calling for Arabs and Muslims to unite.

In that section of the Arab world referred to as Palestine, Arslan was closely allied to Hajj Amin al-Husayni, Mufti of Jerusalem, and President of the Supreme Muslim Council of Palestine. The Mufti of Jerusalem held a traditional role in a traditional Arab-Muslim world, that suddenly found itself faced with powerful international pressures. The rapid succession of events beginning with the First World War and the Arab revolt, the end of the Ottoman Empire and the coming of the British, the sudden separation from other parts of Syria and the alarming increase in Jewish immigration, entailed a drastically new brand of political action. For assistance in such matters, from the 1920s until the end of the Second World War, the Mufti turned to Arslan. By 1935, Arslan had written to the Mufti more than 100 letters, and in the next 10 years it is probable that Arslan's stream of letters and advice increased.[604] In 1936, when David Ben Gurion, one of the leaders of the Zionist Executive and the future first Prime Minister of Israel, sought to make an agreement with Arab leaders, it was Shakib Arslan and Ihsan al-Jabiri whom he visited in the former's home in Geneva. Ben Gurion had been in contact with an Arab interlocutor, Musa Alami, who told him that the main leader with decisive power in Palestine was the Mufti, and that the Mufti paid attention to the views of the Istiqlalist leaders outside of "Palestine," and especially to those of Arslan and Jabiri: "It was Musa Alami's opinion that I [Ben Gurion] should first of all meet Jabri and Arslan. He would write to them about his talk with the Mufti. The Mufti attached much weight to their opinion, and they to his."[605]

Arslan and the Mufti both vigorously opposed British and French colonization in the Arab and Islamic world. In an attempt to gain leverage against the British and French, they set about finding European allies willing to oppose British and French hegemony, and in Europe the counterweights to Britain and France were Italy and Germany. In Palestine, the Husayni faction was the political adversary of the Nashashibi faction, which was allied with the British administration. In 1935, Syrian journals close to the Nashashibis published a letter from Arslan to the Mufti meant to discredit the latter. The letter outlined a plan by Arslan for making Italian propaganda in the Arab world, and although it was eventually widely accepted to be a fake, it created a storm of controversy and involved Arslan in the fierce atmosphere of Jerusalem politics. The ideological positions and practical alliance between Arslan and the Mufti were common knowledge, and compromising either of them had repercussions on the other. During the Second World War, both Arslan and the Mufti found themselves on the side of Germany and Italy, the Mufti spending several years in Berlin and Arslan advising him on what policies to pursue.[606]

The third significant relationship of Shakib Arslan was, not surprisingly, his brother Adil. One of the leading young Istiqlalists, Adil Arslan was close both ideologically and politically to his older brother Shakib. His presence further cemented the alliance within the Syrian-Palestinian Congress between the young pan-Arab Istiqlalists and Shakib Arslan. In fact, Adil Arslan and the Istiqlalists, Shakib Arslan, Rashid Rida, and Hajj Amin al-Husayni formed a closely-knit block within the Syrian-Palestinian Congress. During the Syrian revolt, toward the end of 1925, young Istiqlalists created with Hajj Amin al-Husayni a special finance committee in Jerusalem. Istiqlalist leaders such as Shukri al-Quwwatli, who opposed the Hashemites, were amenable to receive aid from Ibn Saud, and they also began to channel other funds toward the Jerusalem Committee rather than to the Cairo Executive of the Syrian-Palestinian congress. This was a challenge to Michel Lutfallah, President of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, who owed his position to his funding of congress activities. The situation reached a crisis when in October 1927 Shakib Arslan resigned from the Executive of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, pushing Rashid Rida and the Istiqlalist wing of the executive in Cairo and Jerusalem to take the leadership by ousting Lutfallah. The latter formed his own executive committee, and by December there were two antagonistic Syrian-Palestinian Congress committees. Opposing what has at times been called the “Istiqlalist faction,” the “Rida-Istiqlalist faction,” or the “Rida-Arslan faction,” was Michel Lutfallah’s ally Abd al-Rahman Shahbandar, an Arab nationalist from before the First World War who became one of the rebel chiefs during the Syrian revolt and an exiled independentist afterwards.[607] The rift between Shahbandar and Shakib Arslan mirrored the one dividing many of the Syrian nationalists, and it would never heal.

The reasons for the schism within the Syrian-Palestinian Congress may appear surprising when one considers that its members were all fighting a difficult battle against the French and British for Syrian-Palestinian independence. Yet the similarity stops there, and deep ideological rifts separated each party's vision of the society, of the future, and of the best way to achieve it. In a perceptive passage, Khoury elaborates:

The Arslan-Istiqlali branch of the movement was avowedly pan-Arabist, anti-Hashemite, and opposed to cooperating with the British. It stood for the complete liberation of all Arab peoples and territories from foreign rule and the establishment of a unitary Arab state …. Shahbandar's People's Party and the dominant faction on the Syrian-Palestine Congress Executive [until 1927] were close to the Hashemites and willing to cooperate with the British to accomplish their more limited goal, the establishment of an independent Syrian state. On the question of Lebanon, the Lutfallah-Shahbandar faction, under the influence of Michel Lutfallah, appeared willing to accept a Greater Lebanon.[608]

In the 1921 meeting of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, the lines separating these two parties were already drawn, and in later years ideological rifts would combine with personal antagonisms to usher a split of the congress.

During the Syrian revolt of 1925–1926, the competition between the two factions was fierce, but still left a certain amount of cooperation for their common cause. For a moment there appeared the possibility that a treaty could grant Syria a limited independence while securing France's strategic and economic interests.[609] The unpopular French commissioner Maurice Sarrail was replaced by the relatively liberal de Jouvenel. The new commissioner telegraphed Shakib Arslan in Geneva, inviting him for talks in Paris. In a first meeting in November 1925, Arslan's moderation impressed de Jouvenel. Khoury writes that some members of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress headquartered in Cairo, namely Lutfallah and Shahbandar, were irritated by Arslan's success in securing access to a high-ranking French official. Upon their meeting de Jouvenel in Cairo, they took a hard line of no compromise which alienated the High Commissioner, who buried the accords. This was not, however, the end of the story, for Arslan's journal La Nation Arabe reveals that there was a subsequent meeting with de Jouvenel the following July in Paris, in which Arslan, his associate Jabiri, as well as Lutfallah participated in three working sessions, "during which several conditions [of the agreement] were defined."[610] Arslan believes that it was the influence exercised by the Maronite Lebanese Shukri Ghanem on the head of the Poincaré government, and French officials rather than factionalism within the Syrian-Palestinian congress, that made the accord fail. According to Arslan, de Jouvenel reported to Poincaré that "we thought it possible to speak with the Syrian nationalists to see if there was the possibility of an agreement," to which Poincaré is said to have answered, "[to speak] with the enemies of France."[611] Shortly afterwards, de Jouvenel was replaced by Ponsot as High Commissioner of Syria.[612]

Ten years later, in 1936, when the Syrian delegation led by Hashem al-Atasi, leader of the National Bloc and soon to be president of the Syrian Republic, went to Paris to sign the treaty with France, al-Atasi, Sadallah al-Jabiri, and Riyad al-Sulh made several trips to Geneva to consult with Arslan. The French were also careful to gain his consent to the treaty, and the French vice-minister of foreign affairs, Viénot, met Arslan for lunch in Geneva. Afterwards, Viénot wrote to the French High Commissioner in Syria Martel that Arslan's influence, both inside of Syria, where he constituted a counterweight to Shahbandar's opposition to the treaty, and in the Arab world, made him a "factor which we cannot ignore."[613] Cleveland further notes that "Arslan's support could not guarantee the treaty's passage in the Syrian chamber but his opposition could sabotage it."[614] On the contrary Shahbandar's opposition to the treaty did not prove fatal, and it is a testimony to Arslan's network inside and outside Syria that, as an exile who had not personally participated in Syrian politics for two decades, he still represented an inescapable linchpin in any agreement between France and Syria.

It is argued by Cleveland that Arslan used his position as representative of the congress in Geneva to air his personal views, using La Nation Arabe as his "personal mouthpiece."[615] Yet once the schism in the congress was finalized in 1927, one can observe an uninterrupted stream of correspondence and perpetual consultations between Shakib Arslan, Rashid Rida, Hajj Amin al-Husayni, and Adil Arslan. After the pro-Hachemite and secularist wing was separated from the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, the Arslan-Rida-Husayni alliance within the congress was united in both its goals and ideology. Whether the Lutfallah-Shahbandar branch of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress exhibited a similar unity would require a separate study, yet in light of the remarkable homogeneity shown by the Arslan-Rida-Husayni alliance within the congress we may need to revise our image of a fractionalized Syrian exile community, divided along not only ideological but also regional and personal interests.

 Europe

If Arslan’s literary and political career flourished under the Ottoman Empire, it is for the second career that he began at the age of 56 in Europe that he is most often remembered. Arslan most probably owes his encyclopedia definition, “perhaps the most prominent activist for Muslim political causes between the world wars,” to his 20 years as an anticolonial, pan-Arab, and Islamic activist in interwar Europe.[616] Kramer also sees Arslan as one of the two principal spokesmen of the Arabs in the West, along with George Antonius, writing that “between them, these two prolific polemicists repackaged the Arab argument in terms intelligible to foreign audiences, and some of their texts resonate to this day.”[617]

Arslan enjoyed a complex relationship with Europe. It was the seat of the imperial powers which he fought, yet with his first forays into diplomacy he began his lifelong quest to find a European power that could help Arabs and Muslims achieve freedom and modernization. When Arslan first went to Europe in 1889, Tunis had already been occupied by France in 1881 and Egyptian independence thwarted by British troops in 1882. The initial enthusiasm of such writers such as Tahtawi and Khayr al-Din toward a benevolent and friendly Europe had long passed.[618] For Arslan, writes Cleveland, “Europe represented an imperial threat, not an admirable culture.”[619] While it is clear that, since Arslan’s earliest days, Europe already embodied the colonizer, scattered evidence exists of his affection for a Europe other than the one which he daily confronted in his anticolonial struggle. In the guest book of the Goethe Museum in Berlin is scribbled a forgotten poem, written in honor of Goethe during Arslan’s first visit to Germany on October 10, 1917:

I bowed the head of my muse before his gate

Before his doorstep how many have lay prostrate

Although he is not of my community nor my kin

The community of man in literature is one

(For if a common genealogy we do not share Between us literature holds the place of the father) [620]

In his anticolonial campaign waged in Europe, Arslan was a natural ally of European anticolonial movements, and essentially of the French left. If the support of a part of the British left wing for Zionism might have caused an obstacle to a rapprochement with British socialists, it was with the French socialists and radical socialists that Arslan had the most affinity. In the course of defending causes in the Arab East and North Africa, Arslan attended socialist and anti-imperialist congresses in Berne in 1919, Genoa in 1922, and Brussels in 1927, and, despite his vocal aversion to Communism, the tenth Anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution in Moscow in 1927. Demonstratin g his sympathetic but skeptical stance vis-à-vis socialism, he would tell the French socialist leader Marcel Cachin in 1919: “we have doubts, even about you; statesmen of the left, once in power, become dreadfully imperialist.” Yet in the case of Cachin, nineteen years later Arslan could still express his continued esteem and sympathy.[621] Most prominent among the French friends of Arslan is Jean Longuet, grandson of Karl Marx and vice-president of the foreign affairs commission in the French chamber of deputies. In Longuet’s obituary Arslan would reiterate the same theme of truthfulness in the fight against imperialism: “Jean Longuet did not joke about socialist principles … he advocated a truthful socialism without seeking personal profit, but also without exaltation and without subversive activities.” At the news of both the deaths of Longuet and Pierre Renaudel, another French socialist, Arslan writes of feeling a “true emptiness” at the loss of “real friends.”[622]

Arslan’s relationship with Germany was entirely different. He developed links not with the left, but with the Foreign Service officers and academics whose careers could be traced back to Wilhelmian Germany, and to Kaiser Wilhelm II himself. One of the earlier contacts of Arslan with Germany was in 1898, when the Kaiser declared in Damascus that Germany was the protector of 300 million Muslims throughout the world. Standing by his side was Arslan, who had been appointed by Sultan Abdülhamid II as the Kaiser’s escort in the city.[623] In 1934, Arslan went to see the deposed Kaiser in Doorn,[624] and in the March-April 1935 issue of La Nation Arabe he would engage in a thirteen page defense of the former Kaiser against charges of having initiated the First World War, at the end of which Arslan asks the same question as his reader: “Why have we taken the trouble, we who are not Germans, of defending the ex-emperor of Germany against these ignominious lies?” To this question, Arslan gives a double reply. First, it is in the name of truth and of resistance against the hegemony of the Allies, who wish to throw the responsibility of the war on Germany and its emperor. The Ottoman Empire’s alliance with Germany and subsequent partition at the hands of the allies make Arslan understandably sympathetic toward such resistance. Second is the Kaiser’s approach toward Islam:

This man has, for his whole career, shown an unshakable impartiality with regard to Muslims. He was the only sovereign of Christian Europe—despite his attachment to his religion and despite being himself head of the Lutheran Church—who could see Islam as a good religion that could inspire consideration and respect.[625]

Arslan goes even further, attributing half of the popularity of Germany in the Islamic world to the political policies of Wilhelm II, the other half being attributed to the simple fact that Germany, having no colonies, attracted less complaints from Muslims.

As a member of the Ottoman parliament’s Foreign Affairs Committee, Arslan had opportunities to interact with the empire’s wartime ally, Germany. He was, for example, the intermediary between the Grand Vizier of the Ottoman Empire Said Halim and the German ambassador to Istanbul Wangenheim when relations between both were strained.[626] He had barely returned to Istanbul from his first visit to Germany in 1917 when Enver Pava sent him back to Berlin to negotiate certain problems between the Empire and Germany regarding the Caucasus and the Russian fleet in the Black Sea.[627] With the war ended, Arslan was again in Germany, as president of the Oriental Club, and his relationship with its intelligentsia and leadership continued throughout the interwar period. In an article on the Arab language, Arslan recounts the long evening he spent in 1930 at the home of Hindenburg, President of Germany's Weimar Republic, discussing such questions as the abundance of words in Arabic that mean "sadness," and the scarcity of those that mean "happiness."[628]

The German governing elite and German orientalists of the interwar period continued to treat Arslan not only as a notable politician who commanded respect for his knowledge of and influence upon the Arab world, but as a living literary prodigy. The journal of the German Society for Islamic Studies carried at least nine book reviews, collections of open letters, translations of articles, or news briefs about Shakib Arslan between 1915 and 1938. This included a 93-page article, 1 part of a 3 part series on contemporary Arabic literature, containing a 13-page biography based on a personal interview of Arslan and 80 pages of translation of some of his works.[629] The editor of the journal and chairman of the German Society of Islamic Studies was Professor Georg Kampffmeyer, who lectured on Arslan's literary works in his seminars on oriental languages in Berlin and regarded him as a living example of the renaissance of Arabic literature.[630] In a review of Arslan's extensive commentary on the Arabic translation of Lothrop Stoddard's The New World of Islam, Kampffmeyer describes it as a "source of highest importance in the study of the contemporary history of the Orient … from the pen of such an admirable Oriental as the Emir Shakib Arslan." The work itself illustrates:

The attitude which the Emir, and doubtlessly a significant portion of the contemporary Arab Orient, is taking towards the contemporary world, [an attitude] which is decisive in determining their approach to the present and the future of Islam, in other words for the self-perception of Islam and for its religious and nationalist attitudes, especially that of the Arab Orient with regards to the European incursion.[631]

In this short passage, Kampffmeyer seems to be pointing to the growing Salafi movement and the influence which it would exert upon the Islamic world.

Among Arslan's European associates and friends one figure stands out, that of "the famed orientalist and friend of the Orient, our friend for forty years, the German baron Max von Oppenheim."[632] It is characteristic for Arslan to use the traditional figure forty when referring to his closest friends. In many ways, the intellectual pursuits and political involvement of Shakib Arslan and Max Freiherr von Oppenheim ran parallel. A German foreign service officer at the turn of the century, von Oppenheim resigned in 1910 to pursue an interest in archeology and the excavation of the Hittite city of Tell Halal that he had discovered. A world authority on the Hittites, von Oppenheim also seems to have had a deep knowledge of and wide connections in the Arab world, and in times of crisis was called upon to return to the Foreign Ministry. Melka writes that it is von Oppenheim who, as a young Foreign Office official under Kaiser Wilhelm II, inspired the previously mentioned Damascus speech of 1898, in which the Kaiser styled himself as the protector of Muslims. It is unknown when and how Arslan and von Oppenheim first met, but it must have been during those last years of the nineteenth century, when both were young high-ranking representatives of their respective governments, each with his talent, Arslan in literature and von Oppenheim in archeology. Until their death in 1946 they remained in frequent correspondence, and it seems that while von Oppenheim was Arslan's primary link to the official policy-making circles of the German Foreign Office, Arslan was von Oppenheim's primary Arab advisor on Middle Eastern and Islamic affairs.[633]

Von Oppenheim exhibited a lifelong interest in allying Germany to the Islamic world, and like Arslan, his model was the Ottoman-Wilhelmian alliance before the First World War. Also similar to Arslan, von Oppenheim drew grand plans for expelling the French and British from the Middle East and for building an alliance with Ibn Saud. It is interesting that the proposals made to the German Foreign Office in the fall of 1940 by the Mufti Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Prime Minister of Iraq Ali al-Gaylani were similar to those made by von Oppenheim. Melka writes that "the similarity may have been accidental, but even in the absence of correspondence with Arslan for this period the writer is inclined to believe that he, and possibly also von Hentig and Grobba, in some way inspired the major lines of von Oppenheim’s memorandum.”[634] Melka’s conclusions are all the more plausible when seen from the perspective of Arslan, for at this time he is said to have written Husayni a constant stream of letters advising him on what course to take, and in September and October 1939 went to Berlin, where he met von Oppenheim.[635] While it is understandable to see Arslan bent on pushing Germany into a declaration of intentions vis-à-vis the Muslim world and an active support of anticolonialism, von Oppenheim’s reasons for favoring such an alliance are less clear. They may have stemmed from an academic interest in the Arab world and the memory of the Ottoman-Wilhelmian alliance. Von Oppenheim, Arslan, and Husayni were, however, unable to tip Germany into an Islamic alliance. For one, von Oppenheim’s influence seemed to show signs of decline. His well-known Jewish ancestry, although apparently overlooked by the Nazi leadership in view of his services to the state, was coupled with an aristocratic background.[636] Similar to Arslan, his career and vision was rooted in the Ottoman-Wilhelmian politico-cultural alliance and this did not fit well with the new ultra-nationalist racial ideologies.

If Arslan’s relations with the French state were strained and antagonistic, and if his relations with the German state rested on relations with the Foreign Office and its career bureaucrats, those with Italy were almost solely based on the one person who held power in the state. Arslan probably knew Benito Mussolini since 1922, when the latter was still editor of Popolo dItalia, and wrote fiery articles defending the Arab cause. Their first meeting must have been during the congress of the League of Oppressed Nations held in Genoa in 1921. At that time, Arslan, who was president of the Oriental Club in Berlin and secretary of the Genoa congress expressed the gratitude of the delegates for the liberal manner in which they had been allowed to conduct their activities in Italy.[637] Thereafter Arslan would always refer to “our friend Mussolini” or “our old friend Mussolini,” even when engaging in the fiercest attacks against the Duce’s policy in Libya.

Arslan was close to Ahmad al-Sharif al-Sanusi, head of the Sanusiyya tariqa, which was at the heart of the resistance movement in Libya, and his attacks against Italy were virulent. Yet criticizing Mussolini’s policies, Arslan adopts the tone of an advisor: “We can assure our old friend Mister Mussolini that all of this will serve him in nothing …”[638] At other times, he would chide: “…

but our friend Mussolini needs conquests, and the gods are thirsty.”[639] For his campaign against the Italians, Arslan would even receive a thankful note from Umar al-Mukhtar, the military leader of the Libyan resistance, whom he knew since 1911 when they had fought with the Ottoman troops in an attempt to defend Tripolitania. A few months before his capture and execution by the Italians, Mukhtar wrote to Arslan:

They are excusable, those who cannot believe all of what is said and written about the Italian atrocities, because it is actually difficult to believe that in the world there are men who behave in this unbelievable manner, but it is unfortunately only too real.[640]

From 1930 to 1933 at least twelve virulent criticisms of Italian policies appeared in La Nation Arabe, similar to the ones aimed against France and later Great Britain. They were in line with Arslan’s uncompromising anticolonial stance. During the year 1933, the articles in La Nation Arabe were critical of Italy, but began pointing toward specific policies which it could take to improve the situation of Arabs in its colonies. The Arab press reported that Mussolini wished to meet Arslan, but that the latter refused until the inhabitants of the Green Mountain in Libya had been repatriated. This condition was fulfilled, and in January 1934 La Nation Arabe printed the first positive article about Italy. This was followed by Arslan’s trip to Rome during which he met Mussolini twice, as well as the Marquis Theodoli, president of the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. At the 1935 Muslim Congress of Europe, the Italian orientalist Laura Vagliera was the only non-Muslim allowed to attend and present a paper in Arabic on “What Europe thinks of Islam.” Arslan himself read a letter from a Libyan correspondent who wrote that great strides had been taken, although much remained to be done in Italian administered Libya.[641]

Arslan explains the process which brought him to negotiate with Italy in the following manner:

When we cried out in condemnation against the unbelievable acts which General Graziani had committed, Mussolini sought to have a conversation with us and sent us an envoy to find out what should be done to repair these wrongs. We answered that before anything else, the Arabs should be reintegrated into their homes. He did it and saved them from a certain death … also upon our request, three to four hundred Arabs condemned to twenty to thirty years of prison term were amnestied. On our request also, the properties which are called “waqf “… were restituted to the Muslims …. Muslim education … was restored in all state schools …. We asked for the prohibition of all Christian religious propaganda among Muslims. … Mussolini himself told us that it was absolutely forbidden and that he would never tolerate such propaganda ….[642]

Although criticized for reaching a settlement with Italy, Arslan knew that he needed allies in Europe, and of the three colonial powers, France, Britain, and Italy, Mussolini was most sensitive to the good and bad press that appeared about Italy in the Muslim world, making him susceptible to negotiations. On the Syrian question, his attitude always seemed “correct and even well-meaning” to Arslan.[643] Mussolini’s Italy gave an independentist leader like Arslan a rare occasion to influence the official policy of a colonial power, and if Arslan’s grander political schemes of a general Italian-German alliance with the Arab world against the British and French did not materialize before the outbreak of the European war, he in the meantime caused a flurry of secret service reports and considerable worry to French authorities.

Not one to equate the Islamic world with the Arab world, Arslan’s Islamic network stretched within Europe. Although there seems little evidence that the nationals of European states who were Muslim engaged in widespread anticolonial campaigns, La Nation Arabe mentions several of both immigrant and European background. Much more numerous were the Muslim communities from Eastern Europe. They had been subjects of the Ottoman Empire, and during the first Balkan War of 1912 Arslan had coordinated the activities of the Red Crescent, an Egyptian benevolent society, to assist Muslim refugees in the Balkans. In the Ottoman parliament, Arslan had not only been an intermediary with Germany, but had also been on the committee responsible for managing the strained relations with Russia.[644] Finally, a more personal detail is that Arslan’s mother and his wife Salima were from the Caucasus. It may thus not be so surprising if Arslan, in his new role as pan-Islamic activist in Geneva, came to devote time to the Eastern European Islamic world.

La Nation Arabe carried regular articles, and even polemics, regarding Eastern European Islam. Between 1932 and 1936, eight articles about Islam in Bulgaria, Rumania, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Hungary appeared under the pen of Smail Dzemalovi-, including one well-known polemic between him and André Girard, law professor at the University of Paris, about the condition of Muslims in Bulgaria.[645] What is interesting is not only that such articles had an academic value, but that they brought to Europe controversies that raged in the Bulgarian, Turkish, and Arabic press, thus contesting the monopoly that European academics and Christian missionaries exercised on the representation of these regions.[646]

Although the information that we have about Arslan's trip to Eastern Europe is disparate and incomplete, in the vastly unexplored field of Eastern European Islam we can locate flashes of Arslan's passage in the region. In 1931 Arslan would make a quick visit to Yugoslavia, and a longer one in December 1933 and January 1934, "to spend Ramadan with my Yugoslavian friends." He would then continue to Belgrade, then Budapest, where he was a guest of the former Hungarian Minister of Justice Stefan Barscy and members of the Association of Gül Baba, a group dedicated to the construction of a mosque near the tomb of a fifteenth-century dervish saint in Budapest. Throughout the interwar period Arslan seems to have had regular contact with Hungarian Muslims and with Huszein Hilmi Durics, who came to be recognized as their Mufti in 1934–1936. In the 1930s he would continue writing letters and making occasional visits, encouraging Hungarian Muslims to continue their attempts to build a mosque at Gül Baba and assuring them that they enjoyed the support of the Muslim world, with which he appears to have been their primary link.[647]

The small Muslim community in Budapest consisted of no more than a few hundred Bosnian immigrant workers of humble origins. It had remained unknown in the Muslim world and was largely isolated, writes Popovic, until the early 1930s when Arslan was almost single handedly responsible for the publicity it began receiving in the Arab and Muslim press:

The situation changed suddenly in 1932, and from that date on we can find a series of notices concerning Hungarian Islam. It must be stressed, however, that on the ground nothing had changed, and that it was nothing other than a campaign begun by the Emir Shakib Arslan, who, while preparing the European Muslim Congress of Geneva (in 1933?) [sic], had sought to strengthen the position of this isolated Muslim community of Central Europe.[648]

In this way, Arslan was developing the links of Eastern European Muslims with the Arab East and the greater Muslim world. One of the central events in the development of this trans-regional Islamic consciousness would be the European Congress of Muslims, which Arslan presided in Geneva in September 1935.

The congress was strictly European, in that it brought together about 60 to 70 delegates, all of whom were residents of Europe. If we look at the Permanent Committee that was established after the congress, it consisted of Geneva's prominent Muslims, with Arslan and Jabiri from Syria, Ali al-Ghayati,Abd al-Baqi al-Umari, Zaki Ali, and Mahmud Salim al-Arafati from Egypt, and a former Iranian prime minister Tabatabai. The council of delegates, on the contrary, included the leaders of Muslim communities from all of Europe, with Iqbal Ali Shah from England, Omar Stewart Rankin from Scotland, Messali Hadj from France, H. v. M. Aly Mohri-Eddine from Switzerland, Mohammad-Aly van Beetem from Holland, Ghassam Zade from Austria, Bernard Barbiellini Amidei from Italy, Huszein Hilmi Durics from Hungary, Jakub Szynkiewicz from Poland, and Dervis Korkut from Yugoslavia. These delegates included an approximately even number of European nationals and of immigrants from Muslim countries. The language of this multinational grouping was officially Arabic, the language of Islam, although delegates also expressed themselves in Turkish, English, German, and French, the latter being most commonly used.[649]

A European Muslim Congress being a unique occurrence, it is not surprising if most speeches concerned local issues. Popular topics included the construction of mosques, the education of children, the rights of Muslims in European countries, and the way in which Muslim communities, most of them religious minorities within their respective states, were treated by their governments. Yet these local issues were Islamic issues, and as such acquired universal relevance. The congress thus asked for contributions from the whole Muslim world to help build a mosque in Warsaw, while individual members expressed the hope of eventually building mosques in Budapest, Amsterdam, and Geneva. Telegrams and press releases in the name of the congress acknowledged the Yugoslav and Polish governments for the favorable treatment of their Muslim populations. The Palestinian question and the holy city of Jerusalem were similarly considered not as political but as religious issues concerning all Muslims, and the congress sent telegrams to all concerned parties. For Western Europe and its nascent Islamic community, the gathering was an early and still limited show of solidarity. For Eastern Europe, the congress was part of ongoing efforts by Arslan, Hajj Amin al-Husayni, and others, to maintain and revive its links with the wider Muslim world in the aftermath of the end of the Ottoman Empire.

Several prominent figures from Eastern Europe were in attendance at the congress. One of the most respected was Jakub Szynkewicz, a Pole of Tatar origin, who had earned a doctoral degree with a dissertation on “Rabghuzi’s Syntax” in Berlin and was in close relationship with Georg Kampffmeyer, chairman of the German Society for Islamic Studies, which Szynkewicz had helped found. He was highly regarded by members of German academia, and the society’s journal Die Welt des Islams described the qualities most appreciated by his German hosts:

Without doubt, Dr. Jakub Szynkiewicz is one of the most capable Muslims in Europe, highly gifted in organization, of great capabilities, a man, who with his powerful and pure Islamic strength of character combines reason and an extraordinary spiritual culture.[650]

In 1925 Szynkewicz was elected by the Pan-Polish Muslim Congress Mufti of Poland, a position which he used to create links between Poland’s Muslim community and the rest of the Islamic world.[651] He was, for example, active in the society of Muslim youths in Cairo, and later succeeded in obtaining a grant of land from the Polish government to construct a mosque in Warsaw. Szynkewicz was a member of the Oriental Club in Berlin when Arslan was its president, and later visited Arslan in the winter of 1934-1935.

[652] Having attended the Muslim Congress in Cairo in 1926, he headed a Polish delegation to the European Muslim Congress.

The largest delegation at the congress was the 7-member Yugoslav delegation, with its members giving 5 of the 19 speeches. Dervim Korkut, museum curator and editor of a journal in Belgrade, presented the history of Yugoslav Muslims, Vejsil Alisan, president of the Council of Ulama of Uskub, spoke of religious educational organization in Southern Yugoslavia, Dzemaludin #aumevi-, former president of the Council of Ulama and a statistician, gave details, and Abdul Hamid Huramovi-, president of the Muslim Association and member of the Oriental Institute of Warsaw, did not speak about Yugoslavia but about Islam in Poland. The Yugoslav delegation was thus not only large but also vocal. Its head was the widely acknowledged leader of the Balkan Muslim world, Salim Mufti-, Mufti of Sarajevo since 1914, president of the Council of Ulama and head of the Bosnian delegation to the Jerusalem congress four years earlier. He was the one to make the first address after Arslan’s introduction and a minute of silence in remembrance of Rashid Rida. In an obituary Arslan would describe him as “one of the most eminent notables not only of the Balkans, but of the whole Islamic world.”[653]

Outstanding questions about the congress remain. One is tempted to ask why it was a European Muslim congress, while all previous congresses were universal in that they were open to all Muslims irrespective of geographic origin. Whatever its reason, this appellation may highlight that Europe was a region possessing its own internal logic. Arslan was conversant in its language, but also had deep and unquestionable roots in Arab culture and in the Islamic revivalist movement. To those in Europe he represented the link to that wider Islamic world in the Arab East. To those in the Arab East, his role was to provide a link in the other direction.

 The independent Arab states

While most of the Arab world lay under the dominion of foreign mandatory powers, the kingdoms of the Arab East provided an arena where an Arab and Islamic culture was relatively free to develop. Had Arslan accepted Ibn Saud’s offer to bring his family to the Saudi capital and become a high official in his administration,[654] or had he been present and active in local politics in Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, or elsewhere, his perspective on specific social, economic, or cultural policies might have developed. As an international activist based in Geneva, his strategy was to transcend dynastic divisions and apply the ideal of an Arab and Islamic community to the relations between Faisal’s kingdom in Iraq, Ibn Saud’s kingdom in the Hijaz and Nejd, and Imam Yahya’s kingdom in the Yemen. Other regions of the Arab, it was believed, would join this community as their independence progressed.

Although Arslan had supported the Ottoman Empire in the face of Sharif Husayn of Mecca until 1918, he supported Husayn’s son, Faisal, in his efforts to unite Iraq and Syria under his throne. Before becoming king of Iraq, Faisal had, for a few short years, enjoyed the position of king of Syria before the French mandate was imposed in 1920. These few years, however, remained in the imagination of nationalists and Istiqlalists such as Adil Arslan, Shakib’s brother, and Ihsan al-Jabiri, his associate in Geneva, as a golden time when Syria had been ruled by an Arab monarch with its nationalist intelligentsia charting the future. Although he became king of Iraq, the memory of Faisal remained in the mind of many Syrian nationalists, and the prime obstacle to his claim for the throne of Syria seemed to be the French mandate.

Much more immediately achievable were Arslan’s plans to build a united Arab state. These were outlined in a series of articles, and lobbied for in the course of several trips and negotiations that sought to create “an alliance of the three independent Arab states” as a first step to Arab unity.[655] The central point of contention was the personal rivalry between Ibn Saud, King of the Hijaz and Nejd, and Faisal of Iraq, whose father the Sharif Husayn of Mecca, had been expelled from the Hijaz by Ibn Saud. In 1929, Arslan made a highly publicized pilgrimage to Mecca, where he spent the summer as the personal guest of Ibn Saud in the latter’s summer residence in Taef. From there he worked on improving relations between Ibn Saud and his neighbors to the North and South. Although little is known about the specific discussions of that summer, the most pressing need seems to have been the creation of trust between the two foes. Arslan takes credit for conceiving the project with King Faisal at Antibes in Southern France in early 1930,[656] which resulted in the signing of a treaty of friendship on February 22, 1930.

More than a loose treaty, however, Arslan had hoped for a true alliance, military and otherwise, between the two Arab states. On the morning of Faisal's death, September 7, 1933, Arslan had a one-and-one-half hour meeting with the Iraqi monarch, most of which was spent discussing plans for strengthening the pan-Arab alliance with Ibn Saud. According to Arslan, Faisal seems to have been so enthused by the idea that he is said to have told him: "I may be the personal adversary of Ibn Saud, but for the good of the Arabs I must be his brother. Actually, without Ibn Saud the center of the Arabic peninsula would have fallen in anarchy. Had Ibn Saud not been there, we would have had to create him." Two years after Faisal's death, the project of a more thorough alliance was realized between the successor to the throne of Iraq, Ghazi, and Ibn Saud, later to be joined by Imam Yahya of Yemen. Arslan calculated that the alliance of these 3 nations created a bloc of 18 million subjects, which would rise to 40 million once Syria-Palestine and Egypt participated.[657]

If the ambitions of Ibn Saud had been successfully accommodated with those of Faisal and his successor, the relations between Ibn Saud's and his Southern neighbor, Imam Yahya of the much smaller state of the Yemen, only became more belligerent. Already in 1929, during his pilgrimage to Mecca, Arslan had discussed the contentious issue of the province of Asir, on which both monarchs laid claims. The matter came to a confrontation in 1934, when armies of about fifty thousand men from each side clashed. The war between two of a handful of independent Arab or Islamic monarchs was understandably a grave threat to pan-Arab and pan-Islamic solidarity.

Shortly after the beginning of the conflict, the permanent bureau of the Islamic Congress in Jerusalem under the leadership of Hajj Amin al-Husayni named a four-man delegation to arbitrate between both sovereigns. The committee consisted of Amin al-Husayni himself, Muhammad Ali, a former minister in the Egyptian government, Hashim al-Atasi, the acknowledged leader of Syria's independence movement, and Shakib Arslan. The arbiters were eventually successful in tempering Ibn Saud's military ardor, but for Arslan, even in the midst of the fiercest fighting, Arabs could be seen engaging in nothing other than a family feud, "for the Arab nation is the Arab Nation, always forming a single bloc, sharing the same feelings and traditions. This unity of customs and of feelings surpasses all other considerations for the Arabs.”[658] It is in the light of such words and actions that Arslan’s postwar reputation as a hero of Arab nationalism can be understood.

In 1929, most probably in a rhetorical flourish, Ibn Saud nominated Arslan as his “ambassador in Europe.”[659] Arslan acted, however, less like an ambassador than like a senior counselor. As previously mentioned, his personal loyalty was to the Arab and Islamic cause, and he entertained brotherly relations with each monarch as long as they served that cause. Yet to his last days, he not only arbitrated between the monarchs of the Arab Peninsula, but advised these formerly Bedouin tribal leaders, ignorant as they were of modern European politics and of how to maneuver in the international arena. In Arslan’s last days, during the Second World War, he sent information bulletins with detailed information about the international situation and the progress of the war to Ibn Saud and in Imam Yahya.[660] With his Saudi passport, and enjoying a high statute with Ibn Saud, at least until the mid-1930s, Arslan could have gone to live with his family in the Hijaz as the monarch’s advisor and honorary guest. Yet something must have kept him in Switzerland where he was under the eye of the secret service of half a dozen nations, homesick, and perpetually in debt. It may have been the appreciation that distance allowed the Arab “prince of eloquence” to look at the branches of the Arab and Islamic world from aloof, granting him a unique role at the forefront of what he saw as the road to its reunification.

 The Maghreb

Most often understood as a pan-Arab leader coming from the Eastern centers of the Arab world, Arslan’s appearances in the history of the Maghreb are limited to a few scattered paragraphs describing the unique attraction that he exerted upon nationalist movements of the region. The most complete account of his influence upon the Maghreb remains Cleveland’s general chapter on his mentorship of the young North African nationalists. Yet specific studies, such as Merad’s analysis of the Algerian Islamic reformist journal al-Mihab, or Halstead’s interviews with Moroccan nationalists in the late 1950s and early 1960s, give an important insight into Arslan’s role, and into how he was perceived by the Moroccan nationalist elite. The analysis of La Nation Arabe, combined with a knowledge of Arslan’s networks in the Muslim, Arab, and European world, reveal a surprising role for Arslan. Throughout the interwar era, he shaped the doctrines and strategies of nationalist students in Paris, of the ulama from each region, and of Islamic revivalist thinkers in the Maghreb.[661]

Morocco’s nascent nationalist movement consisted of highly educated young men, often from prestigious families, who were marginalized by the overwhelming influence of the French protectorate and the general apathy of the Moroccan public. The catalyst that allowed them to ignite Moroccan nationalism was the promulgation of the Berber Dahir on May 16, 1931.[662] The Berber Dahir is significant in that Berbers, who had been Islamized in the early days of Islam, and were thus placed under the jurisdiction of Islamic law and liable to Islamic courts, were now placed under the jurisdiction of French courts and Berber tribunals that applied a revived traditional Berber law antecedent to Islam. To Muslims throughout the world, it seemed that France was seeking to de-Islamize the Berbers as a first step to their Christianization. These fears were fanned by the increased presence of French missionaries in rural areas of Morocco, and by the prohibition for Moroccans from the “Arab regions” of going to the “Berber regions” without a special permit, which prevented Muslim clerics in the cities from maintaining contact with the Berbers. While some saw in this a policy of de-Islamization, others saw it as another application of the colonial policy of “divide and rule.”

The Berber Dahir had three consequences. The first is the ya latif (“O God!”) incantations, usually recited in mosques at times of great calamity. Previously reserved for such disasters as plagues of locusts, the ya latif was for the first time harnessed by the nationalists for political action. Beginning in the great mosque of Rabat on a Friday after the communal prayer, the ya latif incantations spread throughout Morocco, a powerful means for the nationalist elite to impart to the masses its sense of crisis at the breaking of the union uniting Berbers and Arabs under the banner of Islam. Second, as a result of the widespread ya latif incantations and the protests that accompanied them, the young Moroccan Sultan agreed to receive a delegation to discuss the grievances of the population. The future Muhammad V of Morocco was young, educated completely under the protectorate, and did not yet have the will or the power to oppose the French administration. This first meeting with the nationalists, however, was a first step to what years later become an alliance crucial to both the independence movement and the Moroccan monarchy.

Yet the slow rise in the political consciousness of the Moroccan masses and of the Sultan would only bear fruit in later years. The immediate pressure exerted on the French came from the third measure, the international campaign. A storm of protest from the Arab and Islamic world caused committees in defense of Moroccan Muslims to spring up from Java to Berlin, an economic boycott to be enacted against French goods in India, and a petition by the ulama of al-Azhar asking the Egyptian King Fuad to personally intervene before the French government.[663] International organisms found themselves submerged by telegrams of protests and, in the words of Julien, Shakib Arslan “integrated Muslim Morocco into Islamic ritual by making all of the faithful participate in the trials of their Maghrebi brothers.”[664]

Arslan denounced the Dahir in a dozen articles in La Nation Arabe and wrote in the Arabic press, mostly in the Egyptian journal al-Fath. In successive analyses of French policy in Morocco, Arslan compared the Ottoman Empire’s religious policy, which allowed each religious minority to be ruled by its own laws, with the attempt by republican France to separate the Berbers from the Arabs under the pretext that they had different ethnic customs.[665] Arslan was not only active in publicizing the issue in the press, but was central in drawing the resolution sent by the Islamic Congress held in Jerusalem in 1931 to the League of Nations. Arslan provided the link between the congress members, and namely its president Hajj Amin al-Husayni, and Makki Nasiri, the young Moroccan nationalist who drew up the resolution with Arslan and Jabiri in Geneva. Approved by the Congress, the resolution was signed by its president and forwarded to the League of Nations.[666] In the end the protest about the Berber Dahir attained much more dramatic proportions outside of Morocco than inside, where French authorities maintained a relative calm. The prime reason, writes Le Tourneau, was Arslan:

This incomparable conductor sparked throughout the entire Muslim world a concert of protests against French politics in Morocco, a frenzy that was in marked contrast with the calm that was reigning inside of the country. Because of Shakib Arslan, Morocco was at the forefront of Islamic events. [667]

The results had both immediate and more long-term repercussions. In immediate terms, the international protests contributed to placing the Islamic world and the anticlerical European left squarely against the Berber Dahir, leading to its replacement in 1934.[668] Indirectly, however, the Berber Dahir awakened a new consciousness among Moroccan and North African nationalists. A few years later, on October 4, 1937, Arslan was second vice-president of the Bludan Congress against Zionist immigration to Palestine, when throughout Morocco's cities protests were organized to mark Morocco's solidarity with the Palestinian cause.[669] Before 1930, such a mass demonstration of Arab and Islamic unity between inhabitants of the Northwest tip of Africa and those around Damascus and Jerusalem would have been almost unimaginable. No one more than Arslan could claim credit for sowing the seeds of a transnational consciousness, manifested as it was in the protest against the Berber Dahir.

Arslan's active involvement in Moroccan politics can be dated to 1930. At that time, the pages of La Nation Arabe announced that Arslan would make an academic visit to the Iberian peninsula to prepare a work on the history of Muslim Spain.[670] In addition to its scholarly purposes, however, the trip constituted an occasion to travel to Morocco and meet some of its most prominent young nationalists, future leaders of the independence period and the postcolonial era. Arslan first stopped in Paris, where he was met at the train station by Allal al-Fasi and Balafrej, described by Halstead as the two highest ranking members of the Moroccan nationalist movement.[671] Although both were students in Paris at this time, Fasi came from a prominent family of Fez and had received a traditional education at the Qarawiyin University, while Ahmad Balafrej was from Rabat and had received a completely Western education at French elite schools. Both young students, who were to lead Morocco to independence in 1956, are known to have visited Arslan in Geneva. Yet Balafrej, the future founder of the Moroccan Istiqlal Party, stands out as one of the dearest "spiritual sons" of the Amir. Halstead remarks that despite having been so thoroughly gallicized in French schools, Balafrej is said to have been "more profoundly affected politically by Arslan than by his formal education."[672] Arslan did not limit his relationships to politics or even to the intellectual life of his young followers. In response to an interrogation from the Swiss police, and asked why he sent Balafrej 500 Swiss Francs whenever he could afford it, Arslan answered that “I came to his aid because I consider him a little like my son.”[673] Of Arslan’s “spiritual sons,” many came from the Maghreb.

Arslan could only stay for a few days in Paris, and soon left for Madrid and Southern Spain. After completing their examinations, Fasi and Balafrej joined him there, and all three of them visited the convent at Escorial to examine Arabic documents relating to the period of Islamic rule in Spain.[674] From there Arslan proceeded to Tangier, where he was quickly notified of a decree expelling him from the French zone, and pursued his journey to Tetouan, a neighboring city under Spanish control. In Tetouan he spent four days at the house of Abd al-Salam Bennuna, an acknowledged leader, former Minister of the Makhzen, and founder and director of an indigenous electrical company and free school.[675] Arslan had been in contact with Bennuna long before meeting him, for both must have been members of the same Islamic reformist networks in the Arab world. After 1931 and before his death in 193 5, Bennuna went to see Arslan once, stopping in Geneva on his return from Berlin.[676] During his stay in Tetouan, receptions welcomed Arslan as a prominent literary figure from the Arab East whose reputation and writings had long preceded his arrival. His presence not only flattered the Moroccans, but helped bridge the gaps separating the heterogeneous independence movements in Tetouan, Rabat, Fez, and throughout Morocco.

Both in Geneva and when he went to Paris, Arslan entertained numerous North African visitors and students, keeping the French secret service busy. Arslan even took one of the Moroccan nationalist leaders, Mohamed al-Ouezzani, as his private secretary in Geneva from September 1932 until the summer of 1933.[677] In 1936, the Spanish civil war between General Franco’s insurgents and the Republican loyalists provided a splendid opportunity to play off one faction against another. Arslan traveled to Madrid where he was joined by Ouezzani and Umar Abd al-Jalil to offer help against Franco in return for the independence of Northern Morocco.[678]

While the campaign against the Berber Dahir found expression in the pages of La Nation Arabe, al-Fath of Cairo and other journals, by the 1930s Arslan was highly experienced in political activism on the European scene, had extensive networks in Europe, the Arab world, and the Islamic world, and was probably the most prolific Arab writer of his age, with a regular stream of articles appearing in the Arab press. All of this brought undeniable benefit to young Moroccans seeking an Arab-Islamic identity and an anticolonial strategy. When Ouezzani engaged in a conflict with Fassi and Balafrej, Arslan admonished his “spiritual sons” to exhibit moderation and unity, and when circumstances required it, Arslan became a father figure, financially assisting his protégés, despite his own precarious financial position.

In addition to the Islamic reformists, Arslan seems to have enjoyed the respect of some in the younger and largely secular generation. With the French socialists in power and the Franco-Syrian Treaty placing Syria on the road to independence in 1937, Arslan traveled to a hero’s welcome in Paris. A special banquet was given in his honor by the Moroccan nationalist movement, and on this occasion the secular leader of Tunisia’s independence movement, the future President of Tunisia Habib Bourguiba, devoted an entire issue of his nationalist journal L Action tunisienne to Arslan.[679]

However, the most spectacular and oft-cited example of Arslan’s influence over the young nationalists is the “conversion” of Messali al-Hajj during his stay in Geneva. The young and radical leader of Algerian workers in France was the founder of the Étoile Nord-Africaine, which was a close and faithful ally of the French Communist party. The French court having condemned him to yet another term in prison, Messali al-Hajj found refuge before Arslan in Geneva, where he stayed for half a year in 1936. It is difficult to know what privately occurred during those few months, but when Messali al-Hajj reappeared in Paris, he had traded his militant Communist stance advocating Algerian independence for an equally adamant Arab nationalist and Islamic approach to the problem. In 1933, Messali’s party the Étoile Nord-Africaine published in its French language journal El Ouma a new political program declaring its “fraternity in the unity of Islam,” but without abandoning its adamant nationalist and proletarian stand.9 [680] Messali’s Islamic allegiance had superseded his Communist allegiance, resulting in mutual accusations and a break with the Communist party.[681] Joining himself to the Algerian ulama, to Tunisia’s New Destour Party, and to the Action Marocaine party of the Moroccan reformers, writes Julien, Messali “rallied to the solid, prudent and skillful program defended by the leaders of the Maghreb parties with spiritual allegiance to Shakib Arslan. The revolutionary had given way to the Muslim.”[682]

Throughout the Maghreb, Arslan is known to have been in contact with leading Islamic reformers. In Libya Arslan entertained an intimate friendship with Sidi Ahmad al-Sharif al-Sanusi, leader of the Sanusiyya tariqa and of the resistance against Italian colonization: “For 20 years, our correspondence did not cease for more than two months at most, not to mention the time that we lived together in Mersin [Southern Turkey].” Arslan was, however, more than a counselor to independence movements, for in studying the contents of the Algerian reformist journal al-Mihab, Ali Merad engages in an unprecedented appraisal of Arslan’s influence within the circle of Ibn Badis’ Algerian Islamic reformist movement:

The Emir Shakib Arslan exercised such intellectual seduction and moral and political influence on the [editorial] team of Mihab that it is impossible to analyze the cultural doctrine of the Algerian reformists without taking into account the thought of the Emir. Since he settled down in Switzerland (Geneva-Lausanne), in the aftermath of the First World War, and especially since he began to publish La Nation Arabe, Shakib Arslan became not only a master, but a true oracle to the Algerian elite of Arab culture. Mentor for some, director of conscience for others, counselor whose advice was received with humble gratitude, orator whose language made sensitive souls fall into ecstasy, writer whose fluid and pure prose was a delectation for all lovers of the beauty of the classical tongue, Shakib Arslan was all of this at the same time, and even more. [683]

Perhaps more so than most other figures of his time, Shakib Arslan’s Arab, Ottoman, and European culture allowed him to exercise a varied and multifaceted influence upon those who knew him.

La Nations Arabe was not only read in Paris, but despite its proscription in all French mandates and colonies, it continued to be smuggled into Morocco, where it was known to a relatively wide audience of nationalists.[684] Yet with regard to the Maghreb, it is difficult to characterize Arslan as a pan-Arab, for he was ideologically much less so than many others.[685] He advocated an Eastern Arab nation that included Egypt, and encouraged the countries of the Maghreb to cooperate and establish as many links as possible, both among themselves and with the rest of the Arab and Islamic world. Yet for tactical reasons, and partly because he feared that in his time it might lead to a new form of intra-Arab colonialism, Arslan did not favor an Arab nation that would extend from the Gulf to Morocco. For such a moderate stance, Arslan was the subject of virulent attacks by such pan-Arabs as Sulayman Baruni.[686] Although outside of the concern of this paper, it may be said that Arslan's identity lay more in a cultural form of Arabism than with pan-Arabism, and most of all in the Islamic revivalist movement. To young students from the Maghreb, he offered a modern and Islamic doctrine capable of adapting their complex relationship with modern West, which they both absorbed and rejected, and their awakening Arab and Islamic identity.

 The Manarists

Although this chapter has thus far adopted a regional division of Arslan's network, this section will refer not to a region but to a school of thought. While the Islamic reformer Rashid Rida certainly had a role in Syrian nationalism, his main role was neither in Syria nor in Egypt but within the world of al-Mānar and of the ideas that it propagated in the Islamic world. Similarly, while Muhammad Abduh, Muhammad Ali Taher, and Ahmad Shawqi were all Egyptians, they addressed themselves to the whole Islamic world and to all Arabic readers. Most restless of all was Afghani, and it is to him that Arslan is most often compared.

The process which would bring Arslan out of Lebanese mountain society began when he was sixteen and met Muhammad Abduh, who in 1886 was lecturing in Beirut. Rashid Rida met Arslan in Abduh's classes and, in the words of Arslan, "the links of friendship that have united us for forty years were caused by our having the same leader."[687] A few years later, in 1890, Arslan was introduced to Abduh's circle in Cairo, to Sad Zaghlul, Ali Yusuf, and the literary and political elite of Egyptian society. For Arslan, who was known as a close associate of Rida and a frequent contributor to al-Mānar, it is more than probable that after Abduh's death, the network of al-Mānar continued to provide Arslan with links throughout the Islamic world.

On his way back from a trip to Paris in 1889, Arslan stopped in Istanbul and met Afghani.[688] Upon Afghani and Abduh's teachings, and in association with Rida, he was to strike the ideological roots that anchored his fluid and geographically diffuse network. Contemporary observers agree that it is Arslan's perpetual adherence to a cause that provided him with the unflinching continuity that ran through his painfully long exile, his strategic alliances with European powers that often bordered on intrigue, and his network that included rulers of the Ottoman Empire and Arab nationalists, antagonistic Arab kings, and links with Communist, Fascist and capitalist states.[689]

Except at one time in their life, during Rida's days in the Ottoman Decentralization Committee which competed with the Ottoman state, evidence shows Rida and Arslan in frequent consultation regarding both political philosophy and strategy. Before leaving his country to engage on his expatriate existence in Egypt, next to Abduh and as editor of the journal al-Mānar, Arslan was one of two people that Rida turned to for advice.[690] Yet once both were exiled, Arslan was more often than not barred from spending time in Egypt and their chances to meet were rare. They occasionally did, such as during the meeting of the Syrian-Palestinian delegation in Geneva in 1921, and the short time Arslan was able to spend in Rida's house during his one-day special permission to land in Egypt in 1929, but such chances were fleeting and often took place under conditions of tight security surrounding Arslan.[691] After Rida's death in 1935, Arslan promised a commemorative work based on their close collaboration, most of it by correspondence:

Having had the same master, having been bonded together for 40 years, having had a continuous correspondence without any secrets left untold, we have promised, in our memorial writings on our very dear and illustrious friend, a special work on him, which will be entitled The Sayyid Rashid Rida or a Fraternity of Forty Years. The Arab press has already noted this promise, which we will strive to carry out as faithfully as we have carried out our promise concerning our other friend Ahmad Shawqi, the greatest contemporary Arab poet.[692]

Arslan’s commemorative work for Ahmad Shawqi was written in 1932 and entitled Shawqi, or a Friendship of Forty Years. Shawqi and Arslan first met as young poets in the student district of Paris in 1889. Arslan had already engaged in a political career that would lead him to abandon literature, and Shawqi was at the beginning of a literary career that would make him one of the most famed Arab poets of the century.[693] Arslan’s relationship with Shawqi was literary, and it highlights Arslan not as a politically involved activist, but as amir al-bayan, a literary phenomenon of his age, who was much read and appreciated:

Shawqi is a living dead whose body alone is absent from us but whose soul and spirit, in communion with millions upon millions of souls, will remain eternally as long as there will remain on this planet something called “the Arab language.”[694]

Arslan claims to have chosen the title of Shawqi’s first diwan of poetry, “We have parted physically but remain united in mind and heart,” which makes for an accurate description of Arslan’s exiled existence and his relationship with his closest friends.[695]

 Conclusion

In eschewing a geographical division of Arslan’s network when describing the “Manarists” there lies the possibility for an alternative approach. Arslan’s network can be seen as operating on three ideological planes, linking the intellectual currents of Arabism, Islamism, and anticolonialism. The anticolonial network brought together those colonized who were unhappy with their fate, anticolonial activists in colonial countries, and non-colonial countries. Within its framework can be placed all independentist movements, Arslan’s links with the anticolonial left in colonial countries, and the state institution in non-colonial or semi-colonial countries.

This included Mussolini in Italy, which had few colonies in the Arab and Muslim world, and Germany, which had none. Although French socialists might have cringed at the thought of being lumped with the Fascist regimes, from the perspective of Arslan, they all served the anticolonial cause.

The second network can be referred to as that of Arabism. It regrouped all Arabic speakers, yet did not call for their political union. Arslan's foreseeable goal was to unite the three independent states of Ibn Saud in the Hijaz and Nejd, Imam Yahya in the Yemen, and King Faisal in Iraq. This initial union was later to be joined by the states in geographic Syria and by Egypt, creating a larger Eastern Arab state. There is no evidence to show that union with the Maghreb was thought to be feasible or even desirable. Often using the term "the Arab nation," namely as the title of his French language journal, Arslan has frequently been labeled an Arab nationalist. Yet Arslan's Arab nation drew from Arslan's multifaceted and complex existence, blending into his anticolonial network for strategic reasons, and striking its deepest roots in the Islamic network.

The network of Islamic revivalism clearly concerned all Muslims, but was centered upon the Islamic revivalist movements of each region. Arslan's response was not specifically directed toward the redefinition of Islam or the adaptation of Islamic legal codes to contemporary conditions. This was left to those with a more traditional Islamic education. Arslan, the product of a French, American, and Ottoman civil education, had a different role to play. Muslim students and professionals in Europe, and the newly educated elites inside the Muslim world, were yearning for a worldview that did not see the Islamic religion as flowing counter to the modern world. Europe was important in that for all Muslim students or workers who went there, it provided a stage where the Islamic worldview and Western modernity came in contact. Arslan's network helped Islamic reformists who had little knowledge of Europe to deal with the complexities of European politics, while reassuring nationalist leaders such as Balafrej or Messali al-Hajj that Islam could be a contemporary force in both the personal and public sphere.

It thus contributed to creating links to outside worlds, outside of geographic regions but also outside of the cognitive categories of East and West, Islam and Christianity, and tradition and modernity. It opened its members unto the new opportunities of a wider, interrelated, and contemporary world.

Arslan’s network served multiple purposes with regards to the Islamic and non-Islamic world, the Arab and non-Arab world, and the struggle against colonialism. It was there, and it was used to link people belonging to different networks together. It impressed upon many a new form of Arab and Islamic consciousness, it had an impact on the history of the region, and it proclaimed the principles of the Islamic revival and the political existence of Arabs. Yet we must consider the possibility that Arslan’s network did not fulfill a solely instrumentalist function. The address made by Salim Mufti- at the European Muslim Congress points in a different direction. Mufti- states that Bosnian Muslims “remain in a perfect communion of thought and feeling with all of their coreligionists in the Orient as well as the Occident, and in good fortune as well as in plight.”[696] This points to the possibility that the creation of a global umma was in itself a goal of Shakib Arslan, independently from any good that may be derived from it. The construction of Shakib Arslan’s network, to the extent that it was principally an Islamic network, was not only justified by its impact upon the Islamic world, but by its very existence.

[582] William L. Cleveland, Islam Against the West: Shakib Arslan and the Campaign for Islamic Nationalism (Austin, TX: University of Texas, 1985), xxi.

[583] These include Juliette Bessis, “Chékib Arslan et les mouvements nationalistes au Maghreb,” Revue historique 526 (1978): 467–489; Cleveland, Islam Against the West, passim ; Axel Havemann, “Between Ottoman Loyalty and Arab ‘Independence’: Muhammad Kurd 2Ali, Æiræi Zaydan, and Makib Arslan,” Quaderni di Studi Arabi 5–6 (1987–1988): 347–356; Martin Kramer, Arab Awakening and Islamic Revival: The Politics of Ideas in the Middle East (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1996); and Marie-Renée Mouton, “Le congrès syrio-palestinien de Genève (1921),” Relations internationales 19 (Fall 1979): 313–328.

[584] For the index of proper names and journal titles in La Nation Arabe, see Raja Adal, La Nation Arabe: Contents and Index (Tokyo: Islamic Area Studies, 2002).

[585] From Sharabasi's interview with Salima Arslan in 1954. Ahmad Marabasi, Amir al-bayan Makib Arslan (Cairo: Dar al-kitab al-2arabi, 1963), 125–126.

[586] Reprint, La Nation Arabe (England: Archive Editions, 1988).

[587] Chekib Arslan, "A propos de l1Éthiopie: La situation des Musulmans de ce pays. Document écrasant," La Nation Arabe 6/12–13 (September–November 1936): 691–692.

[588] Hasan Kayali, Arabs and Young Turks: Ottomanism, Arabism, and Islamism in the Ottoman Empire, 1908–1918 (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1997), 116–143, 211.

[589] Chekib Arslan, "Sur le Bolchevisme: L1Éternelle légende de l1influence bolcheviste sur le réveil national du monde musulman," La Nation Arabe 3/10–12 (October–December 1932): 29–30. Translation mine.

[590] Chekib Arslan, "La mort du Patriarche maronite," La Nation Arabe 2/10–11 (November–December): 53–54.

[591] Chekib Arslan, "La mort de Kémal Ataturk," La Nation Arabe 8/20–21 (September–December 1938): 1081. Translation mine.

[592] Yamauchi Masayuki, Nattoku shinakatta otoko: Enveru Pasha, Chu To kara Chuo Ajia he [Enver Pasha, the Unsatisfied Man: from the Middle East to Central Asia] (Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1999), 69, 284–288.

[593] Ibid., 69, 292.

[594] Letter from Shakib Arslan to Enver Pava, March 11, 1921, cited in Yamauchi, Nattoku shinakatta otoko 326.

[595] Kayali, Arabs and Young Turks, 3.

[596] Mouton, “Le congrès syro-palestinien de Genève (1921),” 321, 322.

[597] Philip S. Khoury, Syria and the French Mandate: The Politics of Arab Nationalism, 1920–1945 (London: I. B. Tauris, 1987), 231.

[598] Chekib Arslan, “La « Nation Arabe » privée pour le moment de la collaboration de notre cher collègue M. Djabri,” La Nation Arabe 8/16–17 (January–April 1938): 910.

[599] Mouton, “Le congrès syrio-palestinien de Genève (1921),” 315 n. 7.

[600] Ihsan el-Djabri, “La Syrie du 8 mars au 26 juillet 1920,” La Nation Arabe 1 [2] (April 1930): 82 n. 1. It was not Riyad al-Sulh himself, as writes Mouton, but his father Riza who was minister of the Interior in Faisal’s cabinet.

[601] Cleveland, Islam Against the West, 49.

[602] Khoury, Syria and the French Mandate, 222.

[603] Ibid., 222, 227.

[604] Chekib Arslan, “L’Armée Rouge: instrument de la Révolution Mondiale. Le monde civilisé en danger,” La Nation Arabe 5/4 (March–April 1935): 281.

[605] David Ben Gurion, My Talks with Arab Leaders, ed. Misha Louvish, trans. Aryeh Rubinstein and Misha Louvish (New York: The Third Press, 1973 [1967]), 28, 33. The meeting is described by al-Jabiri in Ihsan el-Djabri, La Nation Arabe (November–December, 1934): 144–146; and by Ben Gurion in his My Talks with Arab Leaders, 35–40.

[606] Kramer, Arab Awakening and Islamic Revival, 109.

[607] Khoury, Syria and the French Mandate, 227–240.

[608] Ibid., 240.

[609] Arslan writes that the 1925–1926 treaty draft differed almost in nothing other than details from the Franco-Syrian treaty signed in October 1936. Chekib Arslan, “Le traité franco-syrien,” La Nation Arabe 6/12–13 (September–November 1936): 642.

[610] Ibid., 642–643.

[611] Chekib Arslan, “Il y a, paraît-il, un comité franco-musulman.: Toujours l1Afrique du Nord,” La Nation Arabe 5/2 (November–December 1934): 133–134.

[612] In “Factionalism among Syrian nationalists during the French mandate,” Khoury depends on an unpublished manuscript by Edmond Rabbath, a student in Paris at the time of the Arslan-de Jouvenel meeting. This document describes the November 1925 meeting, during which Arslan’s moderation successfully impressed the French High Commissioner de Jouvenel, who asked for more time to work out an accord. Although Khoury does not mention the second meeting in 1926, La Nation Arabe sheds light on its three working sessions, and on Arslan’s conclusion as to why the talks failed. Chekib Arslan, “Le traité franco-syrien,” 641–648; and by the same author, “Le départ de M. Ponsot,” La Nation Arabe 4/7–9 (July–September 1933): 37–38. Arslan’s version of events is partly confirmed by the French socialist Robert-Jean Longuet’s article in Clarté of March 1938, reproduced in Robert-Jean Longuet, “A propos de la Syrie,” La Nation Arabe 8/16–17 (January– pril 1938): 891–897; by E. Lévi-Provençal, “L1Émir Shakib Arslan,” Cahiers de l1Orient contemporain 9–10 (1st and 2nd trimesters, 1947), 5–19; and by Meir Zamir in his The Formation of Modern Lebanon (Ithaca, IL: Cornell University Press, 1985), 198.

[613] Bureau politique, Etat-major, theatre d1operations de l1Afrique du Nord, Contribution à l1étude de l1activité politique de l1émir Chekib Arslan, 29H35 (Aix-en-Provence, 1940), 28–29. Despite his conciliatory tone regarding the treaty, Arslan seems to have had serious reservations, both about drawing the frontiers of Greater Lebanon without a plebiscite and about abandoning Iskanderun to Turkey. See Chekib Arslan, “Le traité franco-syrien,” 645; and by the same author, “L1ennemi de la France que je suis?” La Nation Arabe 8/16–17 (January–April, 1938): 801–802.

[614] Cleveland, Islam Against the West, 86.

[615] Ibid., 69.

[616] “Arslan, Shakib,” in Reeva S. Simon, Philip Mattar, and Richard W. Bulliet, eds, Encyclopedia of the Modern Middle East (New York: Macmillan, 1996), 37–39. The same definition appears in David Commins, Historical Dictionary of Syria (Lanham, MD: Scarecrow, 1996), 37–39.

[617] Kramer, Arab Awakening and Islamic Revival, 7.

[618] Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age: 1798–1939 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983): 67–95.

[619] Cleveland, Islam Against the West, 11.

[620] Translation from Arabic is mine.

[621] Chekib Arslan, “L1ennemi de la France que je suis?:” 809.

[622] Chekib Arslan, “La mort de l1orientaliste italien Nalino,” La Nation Arabe 8/20–21 (September–December 1938): 1192–1193.

[623] R. L. Melka, “Max Freiherr von Oppenheim: Sixty Years of Scholarsip and Political Intrigue in the Middle East,” Middle Eastern Studies 1973/1: 81.

[624] Ministère Public Fédéral Suisse, “Procès-verbal d1audition,” Doc. C10.7 E 4320 (B) 1984/29 vol. 13 (Geneva, October 6, 1938), 3.

[625] Chekib Arslan, “Qu1est-ce que vous voulez qu1un homme d1Etat français dise de Guillaume II ?,” La Nation Arabe 5/4 (March–April 1935): 249. Translation mine.

[626] Ibid., 254.

[627] Widmer, “Emir Shakib Arslan,” Die Welt des Islams 19 (1937): 7.

[628] Chekib Arslan, “La grammaire arabe est la grammaire la plus classique et la plus parfaite,” La Nation Arabe 5/3 (January–February 1935): 194.

[629] Widmer, “Emir Shakib Arslan.” For Arslan’s reaction to Widmer’s article see Chekib Arslan, “Notre dette de reconnaissance à l1honorable Pasteur M. Widmer, de Berne,” La Nation Arabe 8/16–17 (January–April 1938): 898.

[630] Widmer, “Emir Shakib Arslan,” 3–4.

[631] Georg Kampffmeyer, review of Hadir al-2alam al-islami, by Lothrop Stoddard and annotated by Shakib Arslan, Die Welt des Islams 15 (1933): 117–119. Translation mine.

[632] Chekib Arslan, “Les Hittites ne sont pas turcs et les Turcs ne sont pas hittites,” La Nation Arabe 7/14–15 (January–April 1937): 780.

[633] Melka, “Max Freiherr von Oppenheim,” 81–93.

[634] Ibid., 86.

[635] Bureau Politique, “Contribution à l1étude de l1activité politique de l1émir Chekib Arslan,” 47.

[636] Melka, “Max Freiherr von Oppenheim.”

[637] British Foreign Office, “Letter from R. Graham of the British Embassy in Rome to the Earl of Balfour,” June 5, 1922, in A. L. P. Burdett, ed., Arab Dissident Movements, volume 2: 1905–1920 (England: Archive Editions, 1996), 101.

[638] Chekib Arslan, “Les atrocités italiennes fascistes en Tripolitaine,” La Nation Arabe 2/10–11 (November–December 1931): 47.

[639] Chekib Arslan, “Pour supprimer le nomadisme, il n1est pas nécessaire de déposséder la population,” La Nation Arabe 3/3–4 (March–April 1932): 50.

[640] Chekib Arslan, “Omar Moukhtar,” La Nation Arabe 2/8–9 (September–October 1931): 5–6. Translation mine. 60 “Urkunden: Der Muslimische Kongreß von Europa,” Die Welt des Islams 17/3–4 (1935): 101.

[641] Chekib Arslan, “Le problème éthopien,” La Nation Arabe 6/8–9 (January–April 1936): 514–515. Translation mine.

[642] Chekib Arslan, “Le conflit italo-éthiopien et les arabes [sic]: Les musulmans d1Abysinie,” La Nation Arabe 5/5 (May–June 1935): 309–310.

[643] Chekib Arslan, “Qu1est-ce que vous voulez qu1un homme d1Etat français dise de Guillaume II ?,” La Nation Arabe 5/4 (March–April 1935): 253.

[644] The polemic begins with a short introduction by Arslan in Chekib Arslan, “La vérité sur la situation des Musulmans en Bulgarie,” La Nation Arabe 3/10–12 (October–December 1932): 10–12; this is followed by the argument of Dzemalovi- in Smail Aga Djemalovitch, “Les Musulmans en Bulgarie,” La Nation Arabe 3/10–12 (October– December 1932): 12–20; the answer by Girard can be found in André Girard, “La situation des Musulmans en Bulgarie,” La Nation Arabe 4/1–3 (January–March 1933): 39–46; finally comes a counter-reply by Dzemalovi- in Smail Aga Dchemalovitch, “Les musulmans en Bulgarie,” La Nation Arabe 4/4–6 (April–June 1933): 38–44.

[645] Among European journals, other than La Nation Arabe, and the reports of Christian missionaries, Popovic mentions Oriente Moderno, which tracked information appearing in the Turkish and Arab press. For further information on the controversy between Dzemalovi- and Girard, see Alexandre Popovic, L1Islam balkanique: Les musulmans du sud-est européen dans la période post-ottomane (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1986), 82–85.

[646] Bureau Politique, “Contribution à l1étude de l1activité politique de l1émir Chekib Arslan,” 18. György Lederer, “Sur l1islam à Budapest,” in Stéphane A. Dudoignon and Catherine Servan-Schreiber, eds, La transmission du savoir dans le monde musulman péripherique (Istanbul: Isis, forthcoming), 469.

[647] Popovic, L1Islam balkanique, 191.

[648] Chekib Arslan, “Le Congrès Musulman d1Europe,” La Nation Arabe 6/10–11 (October–November 1935): 417–424.

[649] “Urkunden: Der Muslimische Kongreß von Europa,” 104. Translation mine.

[650] I. Takacs, “Szynkiewicz, Jakub,” in Marc Gaborieau, Nicole Grandin, Pierre Labrousse, and Alexandre Popovic, eds, Dictionnaire biographique des savants et grandes figures du monde musulman périphérique, du XIXe siècle a nos jours, 1 (Paris: CNRS -EHESS, 1992): 55.

[651] Chekib Arslan, “Une mosquée à Varsovie,” La Nation Arabe 5/5 (May–June 1935): 334.

[652] Chekib Arslan, “Pertes très douloureuses,” La Nation Arabe 8/18–19 (May–August 1938): 1028; by the same author, “Le Congrès Musulman d1Europe,” La Nation Arabe 5/7 (October–November 1935): 418–424. Alexandre Popovic, “Mufti-, Salim,” in Marc Gaborieau et al., eds, Dictionnaire biographique, 2: 67.

[653] “Ada’ al-amir shakib li-faridat al-haëë,” al-Manār 30/2 (July 8, 1929): 160.

[654] Chekib Arslan, “L1Alliance des trois pays arabes indépendants: L1Etat Seoudite, le Yemen et l1Irak,” La Nation Arabe 6/8–9 (January–April 1936): 469.

[655] Ibid.

[656] Ibid., 470–471.

[657] Chekib Arslan, “La paix fraternelle entre les deux souverains arabes,” La Nation Arabe 5/1 (September–October 1934): 40–47.

[658] “Ada1 al-amir shakib li-faridat al-haëë,” 159.

[659] These bulletins were intercepted by the British services, who transferred them on to the French. Bureau Politique, “Contribution à l1étude de l1activité politique de l1émir Chekib Arslan,” 51.

[660] See John P. Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation: The Origins and Rise of Moroccan Nationalism, 1912–1944 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, 1967); Ali Merad, Le réformisme musulman en Algérie de 1925 à 1940. Essai d1histoire religieuse et sociale (Paris: Mouton & Co, 1967).

[661] A copy of the Dahir may be found in Halstead, 276–277.

[662] Ibid., 184–186.

[663] Charles-André Julien, L1Afrique du Nord en marche: Nationalismes musulmans et souveraineté française (Paris: René Julliard, 1972), 133.

[664] See the first article by Arslan on the Berber Dahir published in two parts as “Tribunaux Berbères,” La Nation Arabe 1/6–7 (August–September 1930): 22–28 and [665] La Nation Arabe 1/8 (October 1930): 5–7.

[666] For the nationalist response to the Berber Dahir see Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation, 181–186. For a translation of the text of the resolution, see Chekib Arslan, “Résolution concernant la désislamisation des Berbères,” La Nation Arabe 3/5–6 (May–June 1932): 33–34.

[667] Roger Le Tourneau, Evolution politique de l1Afrique du Nord musulmane, 1920–1961 (Paris: Armand Colin, 1962), 185. Translation mine.

[668] For Arslan’s comments on the new Dahir, see Chekib Arslan, “Et le fameux Dahir berbère?” La Nation Arabe 5/4 (September–October 1934): 63–66.

[669] Julien, L1Afrique du Nord en marche, 151.

[670] For two articles on the history of Arabs in Spain and Southern France, see Chekib Arslan, “A la recherche des vestiges de la civilisation arabe en Espagne,” La Nation Arabe 1/5 (July 1930): 193–200; and “A la recherche des vestiges arabes en Espagne et dans le Midi de la France,” La Nation Arabe 2/3 (Mars 1931): 19–31.

[671] Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation, 165.

[672] Ibid., 129. From Halstead’s interviews with 2Umar 2Abd al-Jalil, Mahdi Bennuna, and Muhammad al-Fasi in 1959.

[673] Ministere Public Federal Suisse, “Procès-verbal d1audition,” Doc. C10.7 E 4320 (B) 1984/29 vol. 13 (Geneva, October 14, 1938), 2.

[674] Bureau Politique, “Contribution à l1étude de l1activité politique de l1émir Chekib Arslan,” 13.

[675] Chekib Arslan, “Une Campagne de mensonge,” La Nation Arabe 2/ 8–9 (September–October 1931): 36.

[676] Chekib Arslan, “Une perte très douloureuse: la mort de Hadje Abdessalam Bennouna,” La Nation Arabe 5/3 (January–February 1935): 209–210.

[677] Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation, 129. From Halstead’s interview with Mohamed Hassan al-Ouezzani in 1959.

[678] Ibid., 238. From Halstead’s interview with Ahmed Mekouar in 1963.

[679] Ibid., 486; for the special issue devoted to Arslan, see Habib Bourguiba, “Un veteran de la lutte anti-coloniale: l1Emir Chekib Arslan,” L1Action tunisienne, June 3, 1937.

[680] Julien, L1Afrique du Nord en marche, 108.

[681] Le Tourneau, Évolution politique, 327.

[682] Julien, 109; for Arslan’s opinion on Messali al-Haj, see Chekib Arslan, La Nation Arabe (January–April, 1937): 782–784.

[683] Merad, Le réformisme musulman en Algérie, 365. Translation mine.

[684] Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation, 127. Halstead’s conclusion comes from personal interviews with Messaoud Chiguer, Ibrahim al-Kattani, Mohammed Lyazidi, and Mohamed Hassan al-Ouezzani in 1959.

[685] Cleveland’s work is the first to portray Arslan as an Islamic revivalist as much as an Arab nationalist. Le Tourneau characterizes Arslan as an “apostle of nationalism,” and Halstead writes of Arslan as a” ‘secular’ Arab nationalist.” Le Tourneau, Evolution Politique, 71; Halstead, Rebirth of a Nation, 127.

[686] For the controversy between Arslan and Baruni, see Merad, Le réformisme musulman en Algérie, 370. Arslan also advocated a more limited form of Arab union in the pages of La Nation Arabe. For example, see Chekib Arslan, “Ils prennent leurs désirs pour des réalités: dissertation d1un Général français sur le Panislamisme et le Panarabisme,” La Nation Arabe 8/18–19 (May–August 1938): 925–946.

[687] Chekib Arslan, “La disparition d1une des plus grandes figures de l1Islam Rachid Ridha,” La Nation Arabe 5/7 (October–November 1935): 448.

[688] Luörub Studard, Hadir al- 2alam al-islami, trans. 2Aëaë Nuwayhid, comp. Shakib Arslan, 4 vols. (Beirut: Dar al-fikr 1971), 1–2: 298. This is the Arabic translation of Lothrop Stoddard’s The New World of Islam (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1922). It is so extensively annotated by Shakib Arslan that it became several times the size of the English original, and one of Arslan’s major works.

[689] See Cleveland, Islam Against the West ; Kramer, Arab Awakening and Islamic Revival.

[690] Chekib Arslan, “La disparition d1une des plus grandes figures de l1Islam Rachid Ridha,” La Nation Arabe 5/7 (October–November 1935): 448. The other was 2Abd al-Qadir Kabbani, a notable from Beirut.

[691] Arslan’s permission to stop in Egypt was only obtained after a special intervention before Hafiz Afifi, the Egyptian foreign minister and friend of Arslan from before his move to Europe. “Ada1 al-amir Makib li-faridat al-haëë,” 157. On Arslan’s exclusion from Egypt, Cleveland explains that “King Fu1ad was not anxious to ease the passage of a notorious associate of 2Abbas Hilmi to the state of Ibn Saud.” Cleveland, Islam Against the West, 73.

[692] Chekib Arslan, “La disparition d1une des plus grandes figures de l1Islam Rachid Ridha,” 450. Translation mine.

[693] Chekib Arslan, “Le plus grand deuil des lettres arabes contemporaines,” La Nation Arabe 3/7–9 (July–September 1932): 51–52.

[694] Ibid., 52. Translation mine.

[695] Ibid.

[696] Chekib Arslan, “Le Congrès Musulman d1Europe,” La Nation Arabe 5/7 (October–November 1935): 418.

* 10. Muslim Intellectuals in Bosnia-Herzegovina in the Twentieth Century: Continuities and changes

Alexandre Popovic

To speak about the general situation of Muslim intellectuals in the Balkans and in the whole South Eastern European area, we must start, at the beginning, with some very global considerations, like the following four points, but, of course this list can be easily developed.

1 We can observe in these regions many groups of Muslims, as far as their “ethnicity” and their spoken language are concerned: there are Muslims of Albanian origin, Turkish origin, Greek origin, and also various groups of Muslims of Slavic origin (Bulgarians, Serbs, Macedonians, Croatians, those of Bosnia-Herzegovina (B.-H.) etc.), and finally some smaller groups, composed of Muslims of Gypsy origin, Wallachian origin, Circassian origin, etc.

2 However, the personal trajectories and the intellectual development of these various peoples were, to a large extent, influenced at the same time by the possibilities (or by the lack of possibilities) offered by the country where they lived (Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Hungary, Romania, and former Yugoslavia), according to the local attitudes and to the local atmosphere toward the different groups of the Muslim communities existing in each of these countries, and toward Islam in general.

3 This situation must be observed also in relation with various periods, because the behavior was not the same throughout the twentieth century, and was depending, of course, on numerous internal and external factors, political or of another nature.

4 Finally, the last—and the most important point—is evidently the personal degree of religiosity of the members composing this community, where it is possible to observe, globally, on one side—the more or less secularized groups of people, who are considering themselves only as being “of Muslim origin,” but not “Muslims” at all, and even, some times, totally atheistic groups; and on the other side—more or less religious Muslim groups, who are composed of two main subgroups: the religious people in their private way of life; and the religious people “in a professional way” (let us say, active, or very active members of the Muslim religious community).

Let us see now, after this preliminary remarks, and very quickly, what we can say, about one of these particular “ethnic” groups, more precisely about the Muslims of B.-H., during three successive periods of the twentieth century (1878–1945; 1945–1990; and since 1990).

 First period: 1878-1945

We can observe in B.-H. at the end of the Ottoman period (1878), like in many other parts of the worlds of Islam, the presence of two main groups of Muslim intellectuals: on one side—the qadîm-s (or “qadîmists,” which are “Conservatives,” or “Traditionalists”), claiming the necessity of a return to the “purely Islamic sources,” that is, those of the very first times of Islam; and, on the other side— the jadîd-s (or “jadîdists,” which are “Modernists,” or even better “Renovators”), claiming the necessity of some reforms (according to the development of the modern world).[697]

However, very soon after the end of the Ottoman era, and for different reasons, the situation became more and more difficult. The main problem was, of course, the indispensable necessity for the Muslims of B.-H. to create their own “nationality”—vis-à-vis the two other populations of the “new homeland”: the Serbs of B.-H. (who were Christian Orthodox), and the Croatians of the B.-H. (who were Christian Catholics); and, for the first time, after 1878—within the “Austro-Hungarian Empire”; for the second time, after 1918—in the framework of the “State of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenians” (a new State which became in 1929 “the State of the Southern Slavs,” that is “Yugoslavia”); and for the third time, after 1941, during the Second World War—within the fascist “Independent Croatian State.”

The second problem was the necessity to articulate this new “nationality” of the Muslims of B.-H. with the world of Islamic umma in general (which meant on one hand with the worlds of Islam, and on the other hand—and much more precisely—with the Ottoman world). In the case of the Ottoman world, the problem was not only the question of the relationship of this identity with the Ottoman Empire, but also when they had to live together in the past, with a special attention (of course) to the past of B.-H. and its particularities, during the very long centuries of Ottoman power (1463–1878).

It was, in reality, a very hard task, which split in the next decades the “qadîmist” and the “jadîdist” groups in some new fractions (thanks also to the irruption of some new possibilities in the domain of the “Western,” or more exactly the European modern education); and that, especially after the end of the First World War, and the creation of the “South-Slav Kingdom” (December 1918)—which introduced some additional complexities. In particular, in this new State some other groups of Muslim populations existed (Turks, Albanians, and some other, much smaller groups), having their proper vision of the Ottoman past and heritage, which may have not been corresponding (and some times were not corresponding at all) with those of the Muslims of B.-H.

In this way, it is clearly possible to observe during this period, in each of the two mentioned groups of Muslim intellectuals of B.-H.—at least—two main fractions, and sometimes three, or more:

In the “qadîmist” group, there was on one side the fraction of the “Pures and Hards” (who were called by their adversaries “the Obtuses,” or “the Dumbs,” or “the Hopelessly narrow-minded”) [698] ; and on the other side, some “Semi-reformists,” who had studied, generally for some years, in Istanbul or in Cairo (at al-Azhar, indeed) as, for example, the two very important figures of the Bosnian Muslim Community at that time, the Reis ul-ulema Dzemaludin #aumevi- (1870-1938),[699] and the famous theologian Mehmed Handzi- (1906-1944).[700]

In the “jadîdist” group, it was also possible to observe two main subgroups:

First—the fraction of the, let us say “a little bit more moderate religious Muslim intellectuals,” who had sometimes studied (most of them just for some years) in Vienna, in Budapest, or in Zagreb, as had done the renowned poet, politician, historian as well as historian of local Ottoman literature, Savfet-beg Bamagi-(1870–1934),[701] the Arabist (specialist of the Quran and tafsir) Mukrija Alagi-(1881–1936),[702] and the very prolific writer on Islamic topics (but, for different reasons, hated by the ulama of B.-H.) Osman Nuri Hadzi- (1869–1939).[703]

Second—the fraction of completely secularized “Yugoslav intellectuals of Bosnian-Herzegovinian Muslim origin,” without any ties with the local Muslim religious community, like the most important Yugoslav orientalist of that time, professor at the University of Belgrade, and founder in 1926 of the first chair of Oriental studies in Yugoslavia, Fehim Bajraktarevi- (1889–1970); [704] the specialist of Islamic law and professor at the Belgrade Faculty of Law, Mehmed Begovi-(1904–1990); [705] and the Director of the famous “State Medrese King Alexander” of Skopje, Ahmed Mehmedbami- (1877–1942).[706] To this same fraction also belonged a very great number of many other Yugoslav intellectuals (doctors, engineers, teachers, professors, politicians, artists, sportsmen, etc.), which considered themselves only “of Bosnian (or of Herzegovinian) Muslim origin,” and having little to do (or absolutely nothing to do) with this religious origin, to such a point that it would be really a nonsense to try to include them here, into the different categories of “Muslim intellectuals.” It would be better to put them in the category of something like: “Bosnian (or Herzegovinian) intellectuals,” but within this case one other difficulty exists, because all the Serbian and Croatian non-Muslim intellectuals of Bosnia-Herzegovina are, of course, also “Bosnian (or Herzegovinian) intellectuals.”

Finally, between these two extreme fractions of the “new jadîdists,” it is necessary to make a room for some well-known Muslim personalities, who are in reality somewhere in the middle, between these two last groups, as for example: the very important member of the High Direction of the Muslim Community, Hasan Rebac (1890-1953); [707] the politician and Minister in the Royal Government, Mehmed Spaho (1883–1939); [708] the famous scholar (belonging to one of the most important Naqshbandi families of Bosnia), specialist of Persian language and literature, and professor at the University of Sarajevo, Ma-ir Sikiri- (1893–1966); [709] and a well known self-taught historian, Hamdija Kremevljakovi- (1888–1959).[710]

But, what is particularly necessary to understand is the importance of the political situation of the B.-H. Muslim community, in the intricate general political game existing during these first three post-Ottoman period (and afterwards also, of course, as we shall see in the next pages): the Austro-Hungarian period (1878–1918),[711] the Period of the Yugoslavian Kingdom (1918–1941),[712] and that of the Croatian Fascist regime during the Second World War (1941–1944/45).[713] The authorities of these different regimes, the leaders of some groups opposing these regimes, or the leaders of opponent political parties tried to attract the Muslim population of B.-H. to their own camps. From these actions resulted the creation of some new groups of Muslim intellectuals in B.-H., like some pro-Serbian, or pro-Croatian, or pro-Ottoman (or, after the fall of the Ottoman Empire, pro-Turkish) groups and subgroups, about which we have a very rich historical material, thanks to some archives, to the different Muslim newspapers of that time, and even to some extremely important books and articles (where it is possible to find the names of the principal personalities, with some details of their biographies).

A similar process occurred in the case of three modern ideologies, in the development of which a certain number of Muslim intellectuals of B.-H. were — more or less—implicated, according to their personal engagement. Here, on the one hand I would like to speak about “two general ideologies,” which were common to the Muslim and to the non-Muslim populations: that is Communism and Fascism. Both had their own groups and groupings (in which it is possible to follow the individual, or the collective trajectories of some Muslim intellectuals of B.-H., thanks especially to the newspapers and the periodical press, but also to some archive documents, and to a large number of publications, concerning particularly Communist groups). On the other hand, one very specific group of Muslim intellectuals appeared in B.-H.: the famous Pan-Islamistic group called “Mladi muslimani” (Young Muslims) founded in Sarajevo, Mostar, and Zagreb in March 1941, about which there are several important publications by Xavier Bougarel.[714] (In the next part of this chapter, will be quoted some important names of B.-H. Muslim intellectuals, belonging to each of these last three groups.)

 Second period: 1945-1990

The general situation of each of these groups and their fractions became much more difficult when the Communist Party of Yugoslavia took power in the country, at the end of the Second World War in 1944–1945, and kept it during forty-five years, establishing the “Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia” under the highly dictatorial regime of Josip Broz-Tito, and his different and successive camarillas.[715]

It was, of course, one of the numerous variants of the “Eastern Socialist Republics,” but with some particularities, owing to some special conditions. Two main factors, one internal, the other external, must be kept in mind if we want to understand the general situation of each of the different groups of B.-H. Muslim intellectuals at that time. First: the very special status of the Muslim population of B.-H., which until 1968 had no proper “nationality,” within the extremely intricate puzzle of different “nations” and “nationalities” in Yugoslavia. Second: the fantastic opportunity for the Muslims of B.-H. given by Tito’s decision at the Bandoeng Conference of the “Non-Engaged” bloc of countries in 1955 (a movement that became some time later the “Non-Aligned” bloc, with a clear dominance of Islamic countries), to try and play the leading roles in this bloc (with Nasser and Nehru), by using the card of the Muslim Community of Yugoslavia, especially with the most educated part of this community, that is that of B.-H.[716]

From this moment onwards, a new era began for all groups and subgroups of Muslim intellectuals of B.-H., for about forty years. A large spectrum of political, social, and religious possibilities was created, which was absolutely unimaginable before, but, of course, under some specific conditions. These conditions were, above all, the obligation to insist very strongly on the importance of the social aspects in Islam (much more than on the religious one), and, on the other hand, the necessity to insist on the great importance of one of the extremely popular phantasms of that time, which was “Arab Socialism.”

In the complex game played by the principal actors of that time, two main groups of Muslim intellectuals of B.-H. can be observed: the religious one, and the secular one, but it is necessary to divide each of them in several subgroups:

Within the religious group—the first subgroup was that of the “domesticated high official leaders” of the “Muslim Religious Community,” who were chosen after lengthy deliberations and verifications in secret meetings, by the Yugoslav Communist authorities. The principal task of these men was to claim officially their (false) attachment to the Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia and to its ideology, to serve the interest of the State and the different populations of Yugoslavia, as well as that of the Muslim Religious Community, etc. At the top of this group stood the Head of this Religious Community, the Reis ul-ulema, Sulejman Kemura (1908–1975), who is called today “the Red Reis”; [717] after him came his closest collaborators (“the religious and cultural ‘referents’“—who were kinds of religious and political commissars of the Muslim Community during the Communist regime)—as were, for example, Husein Djozo (1912–1982),[718] Abdurahman Huki- (1921–1990),[719] Ahmed Smajlovi- (1938–1988),[720] and some others.

Behind this first subgroup, and more or less linked to it (but at some distance), a much larger subgroup existed: that of the “domesticated Muslim religious actors,” composed of the small fry: senior executive members of the Muslim Religious Community, directors of the Muslim newspapers and publications, journalists, etc. Generally speaking, these men used to share in common three main particularities: (a) they were of humble rural origin; (b) after finishing their first studies in the Gazi Husrev-beg Medrese in Sarajevo, and thanks to different kinds of grants and scholarships offered by some Arabic countries, they had studied some years Islamic theology and “Islamic sciences” in various places (in Egypt, Libya, Iraq, or in some of the Arab States of the Gulf area); and (c) they were affiliated, at one time or another, to certain important personalities of the first subgroup, or to certain (religious or/and political) Muslim pressure groups in B.-H. Their number was relatively high, but only very few of them (as the above mentioned Ahmed Smajlovi-, for example), had had the opportunity to become “first-class leaders” of the Muslim Religious Community of B.-H., or of the Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia.

The third subgroup of religious Muslim intellectuals of B.-H., during this period, was composed of personalities who had been (or had been considered) clearly in opposition to the Communist regime. A lot of names should be mentioned in this category of people, as that of the learned Qadiri shaykh Fejzulah Hadzibajri- (1913–1990); [721] those of the well-known Muslim religious writers and historians of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian Islamic community: Muhamed Hadzijahi- (1918–1986); [722] Mahmud Tralji- (b. 1918); [723] Kasim Hadzi-(1917–1990); [724] Hivzija Hasandedi- (b. 1915); [725] Alija Nametak (1906–1987),[726] etc.; or that of the specialist of Oriental manuscripts Kasim Dobra3a (1910–1979); [727] without forgetting the most famous personality of all this category of Muslim religious opponents, the former President of B.-H., Alija Izetbegovi3 (1925–2003).[728] Nevertheless, let us remember that some of the Muslim opponents to the Communist regime have been, at the time of the Second World War, active members of the above mentioned Pan-Islamistic group of the “Young Muslims” or collaborated more or less actively with the Croatian Fascist authorities, and spent therefore after 1945 some years in prison, while others were condemned to death and executed.

As far as the group of secular Muslim intellectuals of B.-H. (which was composed of the politicians, scholars, engineers, doctors, professors, teachers, artists, etc.) is concerned, during this period one can observe some similarities with the situation of the different religious subgroups mentioned earlier, but we need to distinguish—at least—four subgroups, if we want to understand the extreme complexities of their position.

The first subgroup was formed by the principal Muslim Communist political leaders, like Dzemal Bijedi- (1917–1977),[729] and Hamdija Pozderac (1924–1989).[730] Their main preoccupation was, of course, the most important political problem of the Muslim population of these two regions at that time, that is, the eventuality of the creation, and of the official recognition by the authorities of the Yugoslav State (and by the Central Committee of the Yugoslav Communist Party) of a very bizarre “Muslim nation” within the Federal Republic of B.-H., which had been effectively proclaimed in 1967.[731]

The second subgroup of secular Muslim intellectuals was composed of some “official Muslim Marxists,” close to (and working for) the Yugoslav Communist authorities, but with very tight links with a Muslim Religious Community of B.-H. Among them we can mention here the “First-class secular Muslim politician” (and principal representative of the ideology of “ethnic Muslims of B.-H.”) Atif Purivatra (b. 1928); [732] the Marxist philosopher and enfant terrible of the secular Muslim intelligentsia, Muhamed Filipovi- (b. 1929),[733] who was excluded several times from (and re-integrated into) the Yugoslav Communist Party, but played (and is playing still today) multiple roles in the various (and often opposite) political, religious, and nationalist Muslim groups and coteries. We can also mention in this subgroup another very well-known “Marxist philosopher of the Sarajevo circle,” Fuad Muhi- (1941–1991),[734] et al.

The third subgroup of secular Muslim intellectuals in B.-H. between 1945 and 1990 was composed of the numerous Communist (or at least leftist, and sometimes allegedly leftist) scholars such as the historians: Hamdija Kapidzi-(1904–1974),[735] Enver Redzi- (b. 1915),[736] Avdo Su-eska (b. 1927),[737] and Hasan Sumi- (1937–1991); [738] the historians of literature Muhsin Rizvi-(b. 1930),[739] and Alija Isakovi-(1932–1997); [740] the sociologist of religious problems Esad _imi- (b. 1931),[741] and many others.

Finally, the fourth subgroup of secular Muslim intellectuals during this period was that of the many opponents to the Yugoslav Communist regime who pretended not to be one of them, such as the historians of the Ottoman period Hamid Hadzibegi- (1898–1988),[742] Alija Bejti- (1920–1981),[743]

Hazim Mabanovi-(1916–1971),[744] Adem Handzi- (1916–1998); [745] the epigraphist Mehmed Mujezinovi- (1913–1981),[746] and many others.

 Third period: 1990-2000

The end of the “Communist era” was followed by the civil war of 1992–1995 in B.-H. (the Muslims speak generally of “genocide”). These events introduced several new complexities in the relationship between the different groups and coteries of Muslim intellectuals which existed before. They unified, or divided and subdivided along new schemes and diagrams. New alliances and new schisms appeared with new religious, nationalistic, and ideological mixtures. This obliged the Muslims, once again, to re-interpret the recent and remote past of B.-H., as well as the role played in this past by different local personalities (whose biographies were remodelled, according to the needs of the time).

Moreover, this difficult aggiornamento was extremely complicated by the strong implications of some external Muslim or non-Muslim “Great Powers,” from the East and the West (such as Iran, or the different Arabic and other Muslim states, organizations and ideological groups), on one side, and by the multiple pressures and actions coming from the “Western” side, that is, from the USA, NATO, EU, etc.).

Of course, we cannot examine here, even very quickly, the intricacies of this extremely unsteady new situation. Let us describe summarily its principal contours. There are now four main groups of “Muslim intellectuals”: two religious, and two secular.

First, there is a “religious-political group,” with well-known personalities such as the former President of B.-H. Alija Izetbegovi-, his sometimes “First Minister,” sometimes “First Opponent” Haris Silajdzi- (b. 1945) [747], and behind them several other personalities with very precarious careers.

Second, the “religious-theological group of scholars” in which at least three “first-class personalities” can be mentioned: the new Reis ul-ulema Mustafa Ceri- (b. 1952); [748] the specialist of Qur1ranic studies Enes Kari- (b. 1958); [749] and one of the best specialists of Islamic law, Fikret Kar3i- (b. 1955).[750]

As for the two secular groups: we have on one side, the very numerous group of “secular Muslim politicians,” such as the “eternal chameleon” Muhamed Filipovi- and many others; and on the other side, the group of the “old- style/new-look scholars,” such as the historian Mustafa Imamovi- (b. 1941); [751] Amir Ljubovi-(b. 1945),[752] a specialist of the Ottoman Muslim literature of B.-H. written in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish languages, and some others.

Let us add to the enumeration of all these groups and subgroups, one very special group: that of the Muslim intellectuals who left the country and lived in the early twentieth century, or are living today, outside their homeland, such as the learned mufti of Mostar and teacher at the University of Istanbul, Ali Fehmi Dzabi- (1853–1 918); [753] the well-known historian and professor of Ankara University, Muhamed Tayyib Oki- (1902–1977); [754] the librarian and prolific historian of the Bosnian cultural life, living in Austria, Smail Bali- (b. 1920); [755] the founder of the “Boshnakian Institute” in Zurich and politician Adil Zulfikarpami- (b. 1921); [756] the specialist of medieval Arabic philosophy, living in Paris, Tarik Haveri- (b. 1955); the Ottomanist living in the USA Nenad Filipovi- (b. 1962), and many others.

 Some concluding remarks

This is a very long period and an extremely intricate set of individual and collective trajectories. Therefore, let us say just some words in connection with some of the main themes of our conference: situations, discourses, strategies, continuities, changes.

The complexity of the situations is clearly the result of several constraints. The nature of these constraints may be of different orders: religious, nationalist, economic, social, political, ideological, and so on, but more often it is, in fact, a sort of mixture of all of them.

Moreover, all the discourses of the Muslim intellectuals of B.-H., in each of these different periods of the long twentieth century (even those of the completely secularized groups) were obviously (and still are) strongly influenced by unavoidable requirements, and at first by the “general line” imposed by the political authorities of the state, in connection with the inextricable game of relationship between the neighbouring non-Muslim groups of population (each of them having, of course, its own vision of the past, and its own hopes for the future, which are evidently in complete opposition with those of Muslim groups).

As far as the strategies used by the Muslim intellectuals are concerned, they were extremely changing (as we have seen in the preceding pages). Nevertheless, it is clear that, during each period and according to new circumstances (speaking only about the groups of the religious Muslim intellectuals of B.-H.), there were always two main trends: continuity on the one side, and change on the other side. Both should serve the principal goal of the “Muslim population” of the two regions, that is to say the absolute necessity to make of this “religious community” (which is, however, composed to a large extent of more or less secularized people) a “nation.” This “nation” should have a specific name and should be guided by a kind of “Islamic” ideology. Nevertheless, it should assemble together, at the same time and under the same banner, the religious (and the very religious), as well as the secular (and the very secular) part of the population of B.-H. And, as it is often the case with minority groups, we can observe the same process going on: it consists in grabbing all the possible advantages offered by the political situation of the time, and when new authorities arrive, to dissociate the Muslim community from the previous ideology, position and the activities of their former official leaders, presenting them as (more or less horrible) traitors of the Muslim community. This, in order to fit into a new deal, thanks to some subterfuges coming from the stock of the “eternal Islamic values.”

In the field of change, we must examine very carefully some particularly “neuralgic” points, such as: the new theories and the new interpretations concerning the phenomenon of Islamization (or the “conversion to Islam,” or the “expansion of Islam”); the image of the “Turks,” and of all the Ottoman past, either rejected or rehabilitated; the reassessment of the ancient and present relations with the neighboring non-Muslim populations, as well as the relations with other Muslim communities of the Balkans, and the rest of the Islamic umma; and in a word, what we could call the “invention of the past.”

In this short essay, the names of around fifty—among the most representative Muslim intellectuals of B.-H. in the twentieth century—have been mentioned. They represent a sample of about 5–10% of the names which ought to appear in a serious study on the subject. The aim of this chapter was not to elaborate a kind of “Who’s who?,” but to describe the main trends which appeared within this society in the course of a long and eventful period. Those who have written and still write about it are generally of two kinds. On one side, those who write the “holy story” of one or another group, without criticizing the data given by their informants. On the other side, those who select some names in only one group, according to their own point of view or ideology, in order to give a picture, which is supposed to be a general one. (In this way, some authors are describing the “European Islam” in B.-H.!) Except a few cases, even in former Yugoslavia, the problem has always been that the non-Muslims (and the Muslims themselves) have never had a precise idea on the subject. The main reason is that the biographical data, in encyclopedias or elsewhere, have always been “arranged.”

To conclude, I must draw very strongly the reader’s attention to one crucial point: if one wish to study seriously this subject, it is absolutely essential to examine in detail the very rich local Muslim press (newspapers and periodicals) which exists since the last third of the nineteenth century—since these questions are there less often altered or falsified (or at less “taboo-ized”) than in a great number of books and articles.

[697] We know more than thirty authors and activists belonging to these two groups. For each we would have to present their biographies and their points of view about these topics. But this cannot be done here, of course.

[698] It would not be appropriate of course to mention here the names of persons belonging to this category, or to be too harsh on them. These men had their ideas and have done what they believed they had to do.

[699] For the biography of Dzemaludin #aumevi- (1870–1938) and his works, see: Anonymous, Ko je ko u Jugoslaviji (Beograd Zagreb, 1928): 25; O. Hadzi-, Narodna Enciklopedija (Zagreb, 1929), s. v. (4: 937, of the Cyrillic edition); M. Handzi-, Novi Behar (Sarajevo) 11/20 (1937–1938): 309–312; M. Sikiri-, Novi Behar (Sarajevo) 11/20 (1937–1938): 314–316; A. Balagija, Les musulmans yougoslaves (Algiers, 1940): 116–119; M.Hadzijahi-, Hrvatska Enciklopedija (Zagreb, 1944), 4: 207–208; H. Mabanovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Zagreb, 1956), 2: 546; Anonymous, Glasnik Vrhovnog Islamskog Starjeminstva (Sarajevo, henceforth: GVIS), 27 (1964): 470–475; M. Tralji-, Takvim 1971 (Sarajevo, 1970): 92–97; A. Purivatra, Jugoslavenska Muslimanska Organizacija u politi3kom zivotu Kraljevine Srba Hrvata i Slovenaca (henceforth: JMO) (Sarajevo, 1974): see Index, 639; Anonyme, GVIS (Sarajevo) 1983/1–2: 371; A. Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij (Zürich: Bomnja3ki Institut, 1994), see: Index, 298; M. Djilas and N. Ga-e, Bomnjak Adil Zulfikarpami- (Zürich, Bomnja3ki Institut, 1994): 38, 40; M. Filandra, Bomnja3ka politika u xx. stolje-u (Sarajevo, 1998): 59 (and passim, see: Index, 402).

[700] For the biography of Mehmed Handzi- (1906–1944) and his publications, see: H. Kremevljakovi-, Kalendar Narodna Uzdanica za 1945 godinu (Sarajevo, 1944), 24–31; El-Hidaje, 8 (Sarajevo), 1944–1945 (see all the whole issue); R. Y. Ebied and M. J. L. Young, EI 2, Supplément 5–6 (Leiden, 1982), s. v., 354 (of the French Edition); Anonymous, GVIS 1983/1–2: 374; A. Popovic, “Handpi- Mehmed” in M. Gaborieau, N. Grandin, P. Labrousse, and A. Popovic, eds, Dictionnaire biographique des savants et grandes figures du monde musulman périphérique, du XIX e siècle à nos jours (Paris: CNRS-EHESS, 1992), 1: 52 (henceforth: Dict. Biogr.); A. Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij (see: Index, 300); Filandra, Bomnja3ka : 161 (and passim, see: Index, 404).

[701] For the details of the life, political activities, and principal writings of Savfet-beg Bamagi- (1870–1934), see: H. Kremevljakovi-, Znameniti i zasluzni Hrvati (Zagreb, 1925): 20; O. Hadzi-, Narodna Enciklopedija (Zagreb, 1926), 1, s. v. (p. 136 of the Cyrillic edition); E. Mulabdi-, Novi Behar (Sarajevo) 19–21 (1933–1934), see the whole issue; I. A. Mili-evi-, Glasnik Zemaljskog Muzeja (Sarajevo, henceforth: GZM), 46 (1934): 5–9; F. Bajraktarevi-, Prilozi za orijentalnu filologiju (Sarajevo, henceforth: POF), 2 (1951 [1952]): 315; N. Filipovi-, in “Odzakluk timar &,” POF, 5. (1954–1955): 252–253; M. Sikiri-, ibid.: 321–322 (note 1); H. Mabanovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, s. v. (Zagreb, 1955), 1.: 384; Anonymous, GVIS 27(1964): 152–155; M. Tralji-, Takvim 1971 (Sarajevo, 1970): 88–92; M. Rizvi-, ≈ivot 20/1–2 (January–February 1971): 6–17; M. K., Preporod 2/14 (1.4.1971): 7; A. Purivatra, JMO : Index, 638; A. Kadribegovi-, GVIS 1984/4: 473–495; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, Index: 29; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., Index: 233; Filandra, Bomnja3ka politika, 22 (and passim, see: Index, 401).

[702] For the biography and writings of Mukrija Alagi- (1881–1936), see: A. Nametak, Hrvatska Enciklopedija, s. v. (Zagreb, 1941), 1: 168–169; Anonymous, Preporod 2/10 (1.2.1971): 7; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 369; Popovic, Dict. biogr., 1: 51 (with some additional references).

[703] For the biography and writings of Osman Nuri Hadzi- (1869–1939), see: M. Krasovi-, in Znameniti i zasluzni Hrvati (Zagreb, 1925): 102; D. Panti-, Narodna Enciklopedija, s. v. (Zagreb, 1929), 3: 782–783 (Cyrillic edition); I. Kecmanovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, s. v. (Zagreb, 1958), 3: 650; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, see Index, 300; Filandra, Bomnja3ka politika : 22, 271, 302.

[704] For the biography and works of Fehim Bajraktarevi- (1889–1970), see: H. Kremevljakovi-, Hrvatska Enciklopedija, s. v. (Zagreb, 1941), 2.: 105; H. Mabanovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, s. v. (Zagreb, 1955), 1: 286–287; M. Djukanovi-, Anali Filolomkog Fakulteta (Belgrade) 10 (1970): 1–7; K. Amkovi-, Anali Filolomkog Fakulteta (Belgrade) 10 (1970): 9–28; M. Hadzijahi-, Anali Gazi Husrev-begove biblioteke (Sarajevo, henceforth: AGHBB) 1 (1972): 132–134; A. Popovic, Journal Asiatique 260/1–2 (1972): 178–185; I. Eren, Güney-Doæu Avrupa Aravtırmaları Dergisi (Istanbul) 2–3: 181–216.

[705] For the biography and publications of Mehmed Begovi- (1904–1990), see: B. Nikolajevi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, s. v. (Zagreb, 1955), 1: 409; J. Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 216–217; I. Dzananovi-, Glasnik Rijaseta Islamskog Starjeminstva (Sarajevo, henceforh: GRIS), 1990/5: 167–171.

[706] For the biography and work of Ahmed Mehmedbami- (1877–1942), see: M. Memi-, Velika Medresa i njeni u3enici u revolucionarnom pokretu (Skopje: Fonografika, 1984), see Index, 290.

[707] For the biography and publications of Hasan Rebac (1890–1953), see: Anonymous, Ko je ko u Jugoslaviji (Belgrade-Zagreb, 1928): 128; F. Slipi3evi-, Preporod 3 [130] and 4 [131] (1.2.1976): 13, (15.2.1976): 13 (series of articles, interrupted—without any explanation—after the second issue, but published before in: Sloboda (Mostar) 32–38 (11.8.1975–22.9.1975); M. Memi-, Velika Medresa i njeni u3enici u revolucionarnom pokretu (see Index: 291); Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., 132; Filandra, Bomnja3ka politika : 200.

[708] For the biography and publications of Mehmed Spaho (1883–1939), see: Anonymous, Ko je ko u Jugoslaviji (Belgrade-Zagreb, 1928), 136–137; O. Hadzi-, Narodna Enciklopedija (Zagreb, 1929), 4.: 286–287 (Cyr. ed.); Anonymous, Glasnik Islamske Vjerske Zajednice (Sarajevo, henceforth: GIVZ) 7/8 (1939): 305–311; Balagija, Les musulmans yougoslaves : 134–135; A. Purivatra, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Zagreb, 1968), 7.: 498; Purivatra, JMO, passim ; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : 306; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., Index: 237; Filandra, Bomnja3ka politika : 79 (and passim, see: Index, 410).

[709] For the biography and publications of Ma-ir Sikiri- (1893–1966), see: Anonymous, GVIS 29 (1966): 604–606; S. Grozdani-, Radovi Filozofskog Fakulteta u Sarajevu, 4, Sarajevo, 1966–1967: 413–415; Anonymous, GVIS 1967/11–12: 545–548; Anonymous, Preporod 2/25 (15.9.1971): 14; M. Tralji-, Takvim 1977 (Sarajevo, 1976): 222–227; I. Morina, Tan (Primtina) 539 (1980): 8; Anonymous, GVIS 1983/1–2: 377–378; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, Index, 305.

[710] For the biography and publications of Hamdija Kremsvljakovi- (1888–1959), see: B. Vodnik, Narodna Enciklopedija (Zagreb, 1927), 2: 449 (Cyr. ed.); M. Tralji- et al., Novi Behar (Sarajevo) 13/1–6 (15.9.1939): several articles; E. Rossi, Oriente Moderno 23 (1943): 125–129; H. Kapidzi-, Godimnjak Drumtva Istori3ara Bosne i Hercegovine (Sarajevo), 10 (1959): 419–424; Nametak, GVIS (1959/10–12): 497–503; A. Babi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Zagreb, 1962), 5.: 393; M. Tralji-, Takvim 1970 (Sarajevo, 1969): 128–133; Anonymous, Preporod 2/22 (1.8.1971): 6; Anonymous, Takvim 1979 (Sarajevo, 1978): 349–353; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, Index, 302; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., 14; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 167, 170, 302, 377.

[711] See R. J. Donia, Islam under the Double Eagle: the Muslims of Bosnia and Hercegovina, 1878–1914 (Boulder, CO: Columbia University Press, 1981); F. Hauptmann, Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Herrschaft in Bosnien und der Hercegovina 1878–1918, Wirtschaftspolitik und Wirtschaftsentwicklung (Graz: Institut für Geschichte, 1983); A. Popovic, L1Islam balkanique. Les musulmans du sud-est\ européen dans la période post-ottomane (Berlin: Wiesbaden, 1986): 269–291; A. Babuna, Die nationale Entwicklung der bosnischen Muslime. Mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der österreichisch-ungarischen Periode (Frankfurt a. Main: Europäischer Verlag der Wissenschaften, 1996); Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 9–54.

[712] See Popovic, L1Islam balkanique : 311–336; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 55–152.

[713] Popovic, L1Islam balkanique : 336–342; E. Redzic, Muslimansko automamtvo i 13 SS divizija (Sarajevo, 1987); A. Popovic, “La presse des musulmans des Balkans au cours de la Seconde Guerre mondiale (1941–1944/45),” Etudes balkaniques. Cahiers Pierre Belon 4 (1997): 199–211 (in part. 211–221); Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 155–195.

[714] Z. Klju3anin, Mladi Muslimani (Sarajevo, 1991); S. Trhulj, Mladi Muslimani (Zagreb, 1992); X. Bougarel, “Un courant panislamiste en Bosnie-Herzégovine,” in G. Kepel, ed., Exils et royaumes. Les appartenances au monde arabo-musulman aujourd1hui (Paris, 1994): 275–299; X. Bougarel, “From Young Muslims to the Party of Democratic Action: the Emergence of a Pan-Islamist Trend in Bosnia-Herzegovina,” Islamic Studies 36/2–3 (1997): 533–549; and his doctoral thesis Islam et politique en Bosnie Herzégovine: le Parti de l1Action Démocratique (Paris: Institut d1Etudes Politiques, 1999), 2 vols.

[715] A. Popovic, “La politique titiste envers les religions et ses conséquences,” in M. Bozdemir, ed., Islam et laïcité. Approches globales et régionales (Paris, 1996): 97–103; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 197–344.

[716] A. Popovic, Les musulmans yougoslaves (1945–1989). Médiateurs et metaphors (Lausanne, 1990).

[717] For the biography of Sulejman Kemura (1908–1975), see the very numerous obituaries published in the Yugoslav Muslim press in 1975 and after this date; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 375; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, several passages, see Index, 302, and 283–288; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., 83.

[718] For the biography and publications of Husein Djozo (1912–1982), see: Anonymous, Preporod 11 [283] (1.6.1982): 9–11; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 372–373; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 349 (and passim, see Index, 403); and very numerous articles in the Yugoslav Muslim press, especially in the period 1958–1979. 23 For the biography of Abdurahman Huki- (1921–1990), see: Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 375; A. Kadribegovi-, Preporod 13 [476] (1.7.1990): 16; A. Kadribegovi- GRIS (1990/3): 113–115; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : Index, 301.

[719] For the biography and publications of Ahmed Smajlovi- (1938–1988), see: Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 378; Anonymous, Preporod, 17 [433] (1.9.1988): 14; Anonymous, GVIS (1988/4): 468–469; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 410.

[720] For the biography and publications of Fejzulah Hadzibajri- (1913–1990), see: Anonymous, GVIS (1982/1): 60–62; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 373; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 234–235; Anonymous, Mebi Arus 1985 (Sarajevo, 1985): 67–74; D. Tanaskovi-, Politika (23.1.1990); Z. Faji-, Preporod 10 [474] (15.5.1990): 17; Anonymous, Islamska Misao (Sarajevo), 137 (May 1990): 49–51; E. Durmimevi-, GRIS (1990/3): 116–118; A. Gami, Mebi Arus 1990, Sarajevo, 1990: 39–45; M. Tralji-, AGHBB (Sarajevo), 15–16 (1990): 287–291. ALEXANDRE POPOVIC

[721] For the biography and publications of Muhamed Hadzijahi- (1918–1986), see: A. Purivatra, JMO, Index, 642; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 237–238; M. Tralji-, AGHBB 13–14 (1987): 251–256; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 206 (and passim, see: Index, 404).

[722] For the biography and publications of Mahmud Tralji- (b. 1918), see: Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 270; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : 307; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 411; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka (Sarajevo, 2000): 402.

[723] For the biography and publications of Kasim Hadzi- (1917–1990), see: M. Mahmutovi-, Preporod 15 [239] (1.8.1980): 14–15; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 373; M. Mahmutovi-, Preporod 24 [487] (15.12.1990): 15; M. Omerdi-, GRIS 1990/6: 109–112 (biography), and 1991/1: 108–132 (bibliography).

[724] For the biography and publications of Hivzija Hasandedi- (b. 1915), see: Anonymous, Preporod 15 [190] (1–15.8.1978): 10–11; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 374; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 246–250; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 182.

[725] For the biography and publications of Alija Nametak (1906–1987), see: Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 377; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 256; M. Tralji-, AGHBB 15–16 (1990): 293–299; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, Introduction, 7–10; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 160, 299, 302.

[726] For the biography and some of the publications of Kasim Dobra3a (1910–1979), see: V. Monteil, ed., Annuaire du monde musulman, 4th ed. (Paris, 1954): 410; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 372; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : Index, 299; Filandra, Bomnjaka politika : Index, 403.

[727] For the biography and publications of Alija Izetbegovi- (1925–2003), see: Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z., Index, 235; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 375 (see also Index, 405); Bougarel, Islam et politique, passim ; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 210.

[728] For some details on the biography of Dzemal Bijedi- (1917–1977), see: T. Vujasinovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Zagreb, 1955), 1: 558; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : 279; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 401.

[729] For some details on the biography of Hamdija Pozderac (1924–1989) and some of his publications, see: Zbornik radova 1961–1976 (Sarajevo: Univerzitet u Sarajevu, Fakultet Politi3kih Nauka, 1976): 365; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 219; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 309 (see also Index, 409).

[730] See some details in Popovic, L1Islam balkanique : 344–346.

[731] For the biography and publications of Atif Purivatra (b. 1928), see: Zbornik radova 1961–1976 : 366–367; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 116; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 323 (see also Index, 409); Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 331–332.

[732] For the biography and publications of Muhamed Filipovi- (b. 1929), see: Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : Index, 234; M. Sokolija, Tunjo. Velik turban pod njim hodze nema (London, 1995); Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 258 (see also Index, 404).

[733] For the biography and publications of Fuad Muhi- (1941–1991), see: Filandra, Bomnjaka politika : 269, 282, 302, 356.

[734] For the biography and publications of Hamdija Kapidzi- (1904–1974), see: I. Kecmanovi-, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Zagreb, 1962), 5: 190; Anonymous, Radovi Filozofskog Fakulteta u Sarajevu (Sarajevo) 4 (1966–1967): 405–409; M. Ekme3i-, Univerzitet danas (Belgrade) 1–2 (1974): 53–54; S. Bali-, Südost-Forschungen (München) 33 (1974): 321–323; Purivatra, JMO, Index, 644; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij, Index, 301.

[735] For the biography and publications of Enver Redzi- (b. 1915), see: Purivatra, JMO : Index, 650; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 409; E. Redzi-, Bosna i Hercegovina u drugom svjetskom ratu (Sarajevo, 1998): 481; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 338.

[736] For the biography and publications of Avdo Su-eska (b. 1927), see: Purivatra, JMO : Index, 651; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 263–267; E. Stanek, POF (Sarajevo) 46 (1996 [1997]): 175–185; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 235 (see also Index, 410); Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 370; A. Ljubovi- and L. Gazi-, eds, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu 1950–2000 (Sarajevo: Orijentalni Institut, 2000): 125–126.

[737] For the biography and publications of Hasan Sumi- (1937–1991), see: Anonymous, Zbornik Radova 1961–1976 : 382–383; M. Rizvi-, GRIS (1991/5): 651–653; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 236, 266, 378.

[738] For the biography and publications of Muhsin Rizvi- (b. 1930), see: Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 260; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 297 (see also Index, 409).

[739] For the biography and publications of Alija Isakovi- (1932–1997), see: Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 116; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 271 (see also Index, 405); Knjizevnik i mislilac Alija Isakovi-, Sarajevo, 1998.

[740] For the biography and publications of Esad _imi- (b. 1931), see: Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 218–219; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 402; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 100.

[741] For the biography and publications of Hamid Hadzibegi- (1898–1988), see: Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 373; Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 235–236; K. Hadzi-, Preporod 8 [424] (15.4.1988): 14; Ljubovi- and Gazi-, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu : 99–100.

[742] For the biography and publications of Alija Bejti- (1920–1981), see: Anonymous, POF 31 (1981): 7–9; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : 259–260; Ljubovi- and Gazi-, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu : 117–118.

[743] For the biography and publications of Hazim Mabanovi- (1916–1971), see: A. Su-eska, POF 18–19 (1968–1969 [1973]): 5–7; Z. Bostandzi-, Politika (26.3.1971); Fil., Preporod 2/14 (1.4.1971): 7; S. Bali-, Südost Forschungen, 30 (1971): 300–304; M. Hadzijahi-, AGHBB 1 (1972): 136–138; S. A. Ali-, POF 22–23 (1972–1973 [1976]): 7–10; B. Nurudinovi-, POF : 11 32; Anonymous, GVIS (1983/1–2): 378; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : Index, 306; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : Index, 410; Ljubovi- and Gazi-, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu : 110–113.

[744] For the biography and publications of Adem Handzi- (1916–1998), see: Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 244–246; A. Ali3i-, POF 47–48 (1997–1998): 9–15; M. Bav3i-, POF : 191–199; Ljubovi- and Gazi-, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu : 113–115.

[745] For the biography and publications of Mehmed Mujezinovi- (1913–1981), see: Anonymous, Preporod 14–15 [165–166] (15.7.–15.8.1977): 10–11; K. Hadzi-, Preporod 11 [259] (1.6.1981): 26; M. Tralji-, Mebi Arus 1981 (Sarajevo, 1981): 34–38; Anonymous, GVIS 1983/1–2: 376–377; Anonymous, AGHBB 9–10 (1983): 327–333; Anonymous, Mebi Arus 1990 (Sarajevo, 1990): 6; Nametak, Sarajevski nekrologij : 254–255.

[746] For the biography and publications of Haris Silajdzi- (b. 1945), see: Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 384–385; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 357.

[747] For the biography of Mustafa Ceri- (b. 1952), see: Anonymous, Preporod 388 (15.10.1986): 2; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 146; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 83–84.

[748] For the biography and publications of Enes Kari- (b. 1958), see: Anonymous, GVIS 1983/1–2: 375; N. #an3ar, Preporod 447 (1.4.1989): 2; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 229–230; X. Bougarel, “Trois définitions de l’islam en Bosnie- Herzégovine,” in M. Gaborieau and A. Popovic, eds, Islam et politique dans le monde (ex-) communiste (Archives de Sciences Sociales des Religions, 46e année, nº 115, juillet–septembre, Paris, 2001): 183–201.

[749] For the biography and publications of Fikret Kar3i- (b. 1955), see: Anonymous, GVIS 1983/1–2: 375; Anonymous, Preporod 14 [454] (15.7.1989): 12; Bougarel, “La diversité de l1islam bosniaque,” passim.

[750] For the biography and publications of Mustafa Imamovi- (b. 1941), see: M. Imamovi-, Historija Bomnjaka (Sarajevo, 1998): 2; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 264 (see also Index, 405); Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 207.

[751] For the biography and bibliography of Amir Ljubovi- (b. 1945), see: Mami-, Turcica 16 (1984): 252–253; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 263; Ljubovi- and Gazi-, Orijentalni Institut u Sarajevu : 143–144.

[752] For the biography and publications of Ali Fehmi Dzabi- (1853–1918), see: I. H. Mehinagi-, GVIS 7/1–3 (1956): 22–30; B. Djurdjev, EI 2, s. v. (Leiden, 1965), 2: 698–699 (of the French edition); I. H. Mehinagi-, AGHBB 2–3 (1974): 81–96; S. Bali-, [753] Biographisches Lexikon zur Geschichte Südosteuropas (München, 1974), 1: 451–453; A. Nametak, AGHBB 4 (1976): 187 199; Donia, Islam under the Double Eagle, Index, 234; Popovic, Dict. biogr., 1: 51; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 36.

[754] For the biography and publications of Muhamed Tayyib Oki- (1902–1977), see: A. Ljubovi-, POF 25 (1975 [1977]): 9–11; H. M-d., Preporod 8 [159] (15–30.4.1977): 5; K. Hadzi-, GVIS (1977/3): 365–370; S. Bali-, Südost Forschungen 36 (1977): 235–239; Prof. M. Tayyib Okiç Armaæanı (Ankara, 1978); S. Bali-, Islam Tetkikleri Enstitüsü Dergisi 7/1–2: 330–336; I. Morina, Tan, 548 (12.4.1980): 6; M. Tralji-, AGHBB 7–8 (1982): 275–277; Nametak, Sar. nekr. : 70–72.

[755] For the biography and publications of Smail Bali- (b. 1920), see: F. H. Eterovich, ed., Croatia. Land, People, Culture, 2 vols. (Toronto:

University of Toronto Press, 1964–1970), 2: 512–513; Anonymous, Der Donau Raum (Wien) 20/1–2 (1975): 128; H. Hajdarevi-, Preporod 24 [487] (15.12.1990): 10–11; Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak A. Z. : 130–131; Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 361, 365, 370; Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 54.

[756] For the biography of Adil Zulfikarpami- (b. 1921), see: Djilas and Ga-e, Bomnjak, Adil Zulfikarpami- (Zürich: Bomnja3ki Institut, 1994). Filandra, Bomnja-ka politika : 361 (see also Index, 412); Anonymous, in Ko je ko u Bomnjaka : 421. MUSLIM INTELLECTUALS IN BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

* 11. From Social Development to Religious Knowledge: Transformation of the Ismaʿilis in Northern Pakistan

Nejima Susumu

For the Ismaʿilis, the twentieth century will be regarded as a time of social and religious revival. After a long period of time since the fall of Alamut in 1256, Ismaʿilis have come back to the center stage of the worlds of Islam. This time, it is through NGO activities in the field of social and cultural development, not through armed political struggle. Various self-help programs to build schools, manage health care service, and preserve architecture of the past under the Aga Khan Development Network (AKDN) have been demonstrating the Ismaʿilis' abilities to tackle social problems. It shall be made clear that the AKDN is non-denominational, involving thousands of non-Ismaʿilis in its activities. Still, Aga Khan is the honorific title of the Ismaʿili Imam, and the AKDN is, as its name suggests, under the general control of the Imamat (office of Imam). Most of the AKDN activities are found in areas where Ismaʿilis are predominant. In the Ismaʿili communities the NGO activities exist as an integral part of community life along with the religious organizations (for a detailed description of Ismaʿili community life, see Nejima 2002).

The AKDN is following and promoting this trend, and this Muslim minority community with a living and hereditary Imam actually has become predominant in the field of social development. As a consequence, the Imamat has acquired more religious authority, and the Jama at (Ismaʿili community) has become a better defined and more autonomous community. This is particularly true in Northern Pakistan (the Northern Areas and Chitral District). In this mountainous region, the AKDN has successfully undertaken many “model cases.” The Aga Khan Rural Support Programme (AKRSP) has innovated a model for participation of the rural poor (Khan and Khan 1992), and organized more than 70,000 members, or over 70% of rural households, in the first decade (AKRSP 1993). Later on, the Government of Pakistan officially acknowledged the model and adopted it in all the provinces of the country. In 1997 the Aga Khan Education Service (AKES) operates 177 schools (usually known as Diamond Jubilee (DJ) schools) with 850 teachers. The number of students, girls and boys, exceeds 20,000. The Aga Khan Health Service (AKHS) provides service, especially for mother and child health care, with 38 medical units. It has trained more than 700 volunteers as community health workers and trained birth attendants. The renovation of the Baltit Fort (Hunza Valley) by the Aga Khan Trust for Culture has been praised by President Leghari as “an excellent role model for the restoration of many historical structures in Pakistan” (The Ismaili Pakistan 1997/42).[757] In the 1990s the concept of social development—the local community’s active participation in their own health care, primary education, sanitation, and other basic human needs in collaboration with NGOs—has become important. It has become mainstream practice.

With anthropological data from villages in Northern Pakistan, we would like to delineate the features of the contemporary Ismaʿili community. The AKDN provides permanent occupations for hundreds of educated youth that otherwise may find no place in the rural economy. They come back to villages as DJ school teachers, AKHS local officers, or Lady Health Visitors. While they get income from the NGOs, they take the initiative to participate in other volunteer activities at the same time. For example, a DJ teacher may record the accounts for the Village Organization, a vehicle for rural development initiated by the AKRSP. Or he may reconcile disputes in the Arbitrary Panel, and collect zakat (tithe) as a member of Local Council (LC). Besides, the Ismaʿilis have now started studying their own religious texts, namely those of Nasir Khusraw. Having professional religious scholars in their own community is a step toward joining mainstream Islam, and it also enables them to contribute to the reconstruction of Islamic civilization through NGO activities. Therefore we believe that the locale clearly demonstrates the transformation taking place among the Ismaʿilis as a whole.

 The Ismaʿilis in the early twentieth century

 Northern and Southern Pakistan

The followers of Aga Khan, the Ismaʿilis are distributed across the Indian Subcontinent, the Middle East, Central Asia, and East Africa. They live in North American cities and in Europe as well. The Imamat has its center in Eiglemont, near Paris. Today, Pakistan is the largest homeland for the Ismaʿilis: about half a million of them live in this country, whence in the 1980s they were estimated around 400,000 (Kreutzmann 1989: 149). The Pakistani Ismaʿilis are categorized into two groups, ethnically and linguistically quite different. One is that of the Khoja, known as a Karachi-based business community. The Khojas lead a reputed business network and have been a driving force in the modernization of the Jama at (Ismaʿili community), and their history is well-documented (cf. Bocock 1971; Clark 1976, 1978; Masselos 1978; Nanji 1974, 1978, 1983; Papanek 1962; Rattansi 1987; Walji 1974).

In 1845, Aga Khan I arrived in India from Persia, namely to the Khoja community. It was the starting point of the new history of the community. Here, as Gellner points out, the Ismaʿili Imam was given the financial and social means for doing something quite different (Gellner 1981: 108). It was Aga Khan III who started “something quite different” on a full-scale. During his long reign (1885–1957), while cultivating friendship with Western elites, the Imam promoted the modernization of the Khoja community. Profound changes took place in the Khoja community. The jama2at-khana, a center of prayer and assembly now features many kinds of organizations. A council system has been established for administration and arbitration. The Ismaʿilia Association deals with religious affairs. Cooperative banks channel loans to the individual merchants. The Education Board provides schools, and so on. Offices have been filled with eager volunteers (the Imam officially nominates them). Aga Khan III was issuing farmans (royal decrees) and exercising general control over all the organizations. Thus a modern Jamaat was formed with the volunteer works motivated not only by economic profit, but also by spiritual fulfillment.

The other group, much less studied as the Ismaʿilis, is located in the northern corner of Pakistan. This is a border region between Central Asia and South Asia within the high mountains of the Karakorum-Hindukush. They are distributed throughout the numerous valleys, speaking various languages: Khowar, Shina, Burushaski, Wakhi, and so on. Life is mainly based on an agro-pastoral economy, with ever-increasing emphasis on off-farm income (on the rapid socio-economic changes in Northern Pakistan, see Stellrecht 1998; Stellrecht and Bohle 1998; Stellrecht and Winiger 1997).

 Mountain farmers

Historically speaking, there were many principalities ruled by local rulers (called mir, mehtar, or raja) in the North until the 1970s. Besides the local political system, there was a religious hierarchy in the Ismaʿili community (pir, khalifa, and murid). Pirs (elders, masters) used to have a deep influence among the Ismaʿilis, which is expressed through a ritual of personal obedience (Holzwarth 1994: 39–40). A British administrator, John Biddulph, residing in Gilgit in the 1870s, wrote as follows (in the text, “Maulai” means “Ismaili,” “Kunjoot” refers to “Hunza”):

The countries inhabited by the Maulais are roughly divided among a number of Pirs, who are treated by their disciples with extraordinary respect. The office is hereditary, and Maulai families transfer their spiritual obedience from father to son. For instance, Shah Abdul Rahim of Zebak, who is honoured and respected as being next in rank to Aga Khan himself, has disciples in Sirikol, Kunjoot, Zebak, Yassin, and Badakhshan, but other Pirs have also disciples in those places. The respect paid to the Pirs by their disciples is unbounded; if they ask for a son or a daughter of any house, no refusal is dreamed of. One of them once said to me: “If I ordered a father to kill his own son, he dare not refuse.” Whenever they move about, they maintained out of their superfluities, and they live entirely on the offerings of their disciples. Presents of horses, cattle, clothes, fruits, wheat, etc., are continually being made, and the best of everything a Maulai possesses is given to his Pir. A portion of these offerings is converted into coin and sent yearly to Aga Khan, and agents travel yearly from those remote parts to Bombay solely for the purpose of conveying these contributions to him.

(Biddulph 1880: 119)

At the turn of the twentieth century, Aga Khan III had consolidated his authority in Bombay. Still, the pirs in this remote area maintained autonomous religious authority. Pirs might not have sent all the offerings to the Imam, and kept some portion for themselves or redistributed it within the local community. Disposal of the offerings was left to the pirs’ discretion (Holzwarth 1994: 41; see also Keshavjee 1981 and Shahrani 1979 for similar situations in Iran and Afghanistan respectively).

 Reforms from the center

Reforms among the Khojas were not easily emulated among the Ismaʿilis of the hinterlands such as Northern Pakistan. As mountain farmers with a subsistence economy, they did not have the capital of which the Khojas could dispose. But the region was also changing in its own way. Toward the turn of the century, the British tightened their control on the principalities of Chitral, Hunza, Ghizr, etc. It was the time of the Great Game between the Russian and the British Empires. This situation eventually had crucial impacts on the Ismaʿilis. As the newly created international borders came under increasing tension, pirs in the Pamirs faced difficulties in communicating with followers in British territory. At the same time, thanks to the British administration, which improved the transportation system from Srinagar to Gilgit, the Imam obtained a way to convey his message—and extend his control—more directly and efficiently to his followers in this mountain region. From that time onwards, most pirs disappear from the stage of local religious history (see Hunzaʿi 1991). Instead, the mir of Hunza, the sole Ismaʿili ruler in the region, came to the fore as the agent of the Imam. Mir Muhammad Nazim Khan was granted an audience with the Imam in 1903 in Delhi (Müller-Stellrecht 1979: 56-57). One of his sons went as far as Zanzibar to do homage to Aga Khan III (Müller-Stellrecht 1979: 375). Beforehand, pirs had monopolized the communication with the Imam.

Aga Khan III introduced reforms to the mountainous region under the “Pax Britanica.” In 1922 and 1923, the Imam sent delegations to the various Ismaʿili communities. Important steps taken at that time were the construction of jamaʿat-khanas and the introduction of money orders for sending tithes (Müller-Stellrecht 1979: 218–220). The Imam nominated mukhi and kamria to be in charge of the management of each jamaʿat-khana (Kreutzmann 1989: 154-165, follows the development in Hunza from that time onwards). In 1946 Aga Khan III instructed the followers to build the first DJ schools (Felmy 1997: ch. 5; Hunzai 1991: 56-60). Since the British had established one or two primary schools in each principality, a few literate youths were available. They were to be appointed as the first DJ teachers.

 The Pir as a modernizer

In the following sections we would like to investigate the changes taking place among the Ismaʿilis using anthropological approaches. Our fieldwork was done between 1993 and 1995 in the villages of the upper Ghizr. First, we examined the early stage of school education in Ghizr through the life history of a pir family. The informant’s life exemplifies the transformation of the Ismaʿilis at that time.[758]

Our pir, hereafter mentioned as Pir Sahib as called in his locality, was born in 1929 in Yarkand (Xinjiang). Pir Sahib claims that his family is originally from Badakhshan, and that an Imam has nominated his ancestor as a pir and gave him the title of khwaja. King Taj Moghol was also from the Khwaja, says Pir Sahib (Taj Moghol is a legendary king of Badakhshan, who is said to have conquered the Chitral and Gilgit in the fourteenth century CE: see Dani 1989: ch.6).

Pir Sahib’s grandfather lived in Wakhan [759] and used to visit Aga Khan in Bombay every year to deliver zakat and to get religious instructions. In June, when the snow of the Baroghil Pass melted, he used to cross the pass between the Wakhan and Ghizr. Then he used to join another pir in Mastuj and to visit Bombay in the latter’s company. The family moved to Yarkand in c. 1908. Pir Sahib says thatpirs at that time used to move as they liked. Wakhan is a narrow valley similar to that of Ghizr, so his father was happy to settle in the town, Pir Sahib suggests. They lived among the Ismaʿilis and spoke Persian. After twenty-five years, Yarkand was drawn into harsh conflicts and, in 1933, the family had to leave the land. Pir Sahib remembers the forty days’journey through the mountain path, spent on the back of a donkey. They moved to Mastuj, relying on another pir family there. In 1946, they came to the upper Ghizr and finally settled there. They were received with the respect of the Ismaʿilis. The raja also exempted them from tax and corvée out of respect. Pir Sahib says that his father visited neighboring villages. However, there were not so many pirs active in the area, and their activities were not institutionalized. Religious education was limited among the pir families, and to some extent in those of khalifas. At the age of 17, in 1946, Pir Sahib began to study at the Gupis Primary School, an educative institution established by the British. He recollects:

There was a school in Gupis, Yasin, Gulapur and in another village respectively. Admission was easily available since people were not eager to study. The population was small and people were busy with cultivation.

They had many livestock as well. About 30 students were studying in the school. Many of them were teenage boys like me. At that time, people did not appreciate that girls go to school, so that there was no single girl in the class. At school we used to learn Urdu and Persian languages, the geography of the Gilgit region, and mathematics. There was no class of Islam.

(Dani 1989: 413)

This was a turning point in Pir Sahib’s life. He became a DJ teacher after studying only three years in the primary school. Pir Sahib remembers the first days of the DJ school:

We started the classes in a small room attached to the jama2at-khana. There was just one blackboard in it. About thirty five boys were coming from the surrounding villages. Sunni boys joined from the beginning. The course was for six years and there was no tuition fee. There were classes of Urdu language, mathematics, social science, and Islam. At that time, the only middle school was in Gilgit. Very few students could reach that place. We had English class after the 5th grade, at least until 1992. In the present DJ school, English language is taught from the beginning. Since I had never studied English at school, I learnt it by myself. I picked up words with dictionary, one by one. But then it was Urdu that we needed: we were eager to write letters, fill application forms, or talk to officers from Pakistan. Through the 1950s English was not that much required. The DJ school was originally intended only for boys.[760] It became mixt in the course of time, but parents did not agree to send their daughters to school. If a girl came, she seldom attended the classes until graduation.[761]

While coming from a traditional family, Pir Sahib became one of the forerunners of modernization. The role he played was quite important and decisive for the transformation of an illiterate farmers’ society.

 A new collective leadership

In 1960 Aga Khan IV visited Northern Pakistan for the first time in Ismaʿili history (Hunzai 1991: 70-74; Kreutzmann 1989: 157). The Harvard-graduate Imam was impressed with his followers’ dedication. Since then, much attention has been paid to Northern Pakistan. The abolition of the principalities and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s brought about further crucial changes in Northern Pakistan. The Ismaʿili community had produced many young literates by the 1980s and the collective leadership of the younger generation has emerged. The appearance of waʿizs (lecturers) clearly demonstrates this tendency, since waʿiz progressively took the place of thepirs in the field of religious instruction.

 The waʿiz

Our waʿiz was born in 1962 in a village in upper Ghizr, two years after the first visit of Aga Khan IV. He is from an ordinary farmer’s family. He has studied at DJ primary and middle school, and at the Government highschool. In 1980, he has advanced to the Government College in Gilgit. The same year, the Gilgit branch of the Shiʿa Imami Ismaʿili Tariqa and the Religious Education Board for Pakistan (hereafter ITREB) started a training project for waʿizs. He applied for it, and then studied hard for four years. From 9:00 to 13:00, he was at College and studied Islamic history, Islamic studies, the history of Pakistan, Persian and English languages. The medium for education was Urdu, except for English class. From 14:30 to 17:30, he was being trained in the ITREB. The subjects were Arabic and Persian languages, Islamic history, Islamic philosophy, Islamic literature, Hadith, Greek philosophy, and logic. Arabic and Persian languages were being taught in these respective languages. In addition, there was an English class. Two PhD holders were lecturing systematically to the trainees. In 1984 he finished the training course and college. Since then he works as a waʿiz. Riding on his motorbike, the waʿiz goes from village to village. The waʿiz is a local channel of the religious information from the higher rank and the Imam’s English farman. To perform his duty, he has to use several languages. In the ITREB, the flow of information and reporting is communicated through English as well as through Urdu language. In the villages, the waʿiz uses local languages such as Khowar and Shina: he must explain and comment on the words of the Imam in local languages, so that every follower can understand them. The waʿiz also holds religious classes called YAR in jamaʿat-khanas. [762] In the classes the waʿiz gives a plain explanation of the Imamat, the Qurʿan, Islamic history, and the principles of Ismaʿilism.

On the one hand, the waʿiz upholds the religious tradition of Badakhshani Ismaʿilis. He learns Persian in the training and esteems Nasir Khusraw very highly. However, this does not mean that the waʿiz follows thepir’s old style directly: his learning and teaching style come as a consequence of the systematization of the religious knowledge within Ismaʿili organizations.

 The children of Aga Khan

Moreover, the waʿiz is not alone. He is among those young leaders working in the Ismaʿili Council system, Arbitration Panel, Tariqa Board, and others. (These religious organizations are not NGOs open to everyone, but basically only for the socio-religious affairs within the Ismaʿili community.) The young leaders have much in common. They are born in dispensaries of the AKHS, study at DJ school, and proceed to College with scholarships from the AKES. In Gilgit, they may stay in the Shah Karim al-Husayni Hostel named after the present Imam. They come back to villages as DJ teachers, AKHS local officers, or Lady Health Visitors. The tendency is widespread in the upper Ghizr, Hunza and elsewhere. In other words, they are products of the AKDN in social development. Now they are men of influence in their own villages. We now examine their socio-religious activities.[763]

* The Local Council

The most important organization at the local level is the Council system. Twenty-five LC and five Regional Councils (RC), under the Federal Council (FC) in Karachi, stretch over all the Ismaʿili villages in the Northern Areas. In the villages, every jamaʿat-khana is under a certain LC. In Ghizr, there are 4 LCs: Gupis, Pingal, Phandar, and Gologh Muli. In the Yasin Valley, there are also 4 LCs. These 8 LCs are under Gupis Regional Council. The members of the RC is made of experienced volunteers. The RC gives instructions to the less experienced members of LC, or deals with issues that cannot be handled at the LC level. The RC members are so qualified that they can theoretically discuss the regional problems with the Imam. The FC is located in Karachi and its members are mainly composed of the Khojas. Keeping communication with the Imam, the FC decides the direction of the Pakistani Ismaʿilis.

The Imam’s instructions come to the villagers through the Council system. The Council also collects the zakat and delivers it to the Imam. In principle the zakat is made of 10% of the income, paid in cash, but due to the less stable economic situation, it is set slightly lower compared to the Khojas. The Ismaʿilis emphasize that the zakat is meaningfully used for the development of villages. The problems in the villages are moved out through the Council system, and the Imam decides how to tackle them. Until then, the collected zakat is kept in a bank in Karachi. Eventually it comes back to the villages for various expenditure. People claim that the zakat has never been squandered on the whims of the Imam.

* The Panel

“His Highness the Prince Agha Khan Shiʿa Imami Ismaʿili Masalti-o-Salisi Panel” is a spin-off organization out of the Council system. It is specialized in conducting mediation and arbitration. Its trademark is a crown that symbolizes the Imamat. The Panel is basically an arbitration body for solving troubles and disputes within the Ismaʿili community. The Government of Pakistan officially acknowledges it. Therefore, the Panel can deal with injury and murder as well as marriage and business troubles. To obtain essential knowledge of the Pakistani laws, members are trained in Gilgit. There are upper Panels in Gilgit and Karachi, and the latter has among its members professionals with a judicial background. With problems concerning land and water, local Sunnis can be concerned since they live together in most villages in Ghizr. If they agree, the Panel offers a table for negotiation. Sometimes a civil judge in Gupis sends cases to the Panel, but the reverse does not happen. It is claimed that the advantages of the Panel are that it is “free, fast and just.” In the Panel, one does not have to submit any particular paper. He or she can discuss the matter fully in his/her mother tongue. On the contrary, the government judicial system has a very poor reputation. People have to attend trials repeatedly. Since it may take years until judgment, the cost of attending these formalities in remote places is regarded as too expensive. There are always rumors of bribery in and around Government offices.

Regardless of one’s tenet, people call it jirga and are ready to accept its proposal when one is concerned. The jirga is a judicial system that used to be based on the authority of the raja (and later, of the British Political Agent). “The raja’s rule was tyranny, but we could solve the matter very quickly at that time.” “We used to solve the case at once.” “We did not take bribes.” The elders who once were jirga members unanimously claim this to be true. These claims also imply criticism of the present Government. Here, there is a base for wider acceptance of the Panel or new jirga, which is under the authority of the Imamat.

* The Ismaili Tariqa and the Religious Education Board

The ITREB deals with religious education and publications. Tariqa (Ar. tariqa) originally means “path” of an ascetic practice. It also refers to such or such specific mystic order. Through this word, it is the Ismaʿili attitude of putting significance on the inner (batin) meaning of the Qurʿan that is understood. The organization is called the “Ismaʿilia Association,” as well. Its headquarters are again in Karachi and take charge of religious education and information as a whole. The ITREB publishes various journals and books, mainly for the Ismaʿili audience. At the local level, the main task of the Board is religious education of children. Boys and girls of more than 5 years old attend 2-hour classes to learn the recitation of the Qurʿan. Children also study the history of the Imams. As already mentioned, the wa2iz holds YAR classes for adults.

 Nasir Khusraw as an intellectual root

In the previous sections, we have seen how the leadership within the Ismaʿili community has been transformed in Northern Pakistan. These new leaders are produced and supported by various NGO activities. Though the AKDN is nonde-nominational, in the Ismaʿili life NGOs and religious organizations complement each other. Then, what are the implications for religious studies? This question is not easy to answer, since most Ismaʿilis hesitate to talk about religion with non-Ismaʿilis. Nonetheless, some important steps have been taken, and it is possible for outsiders to make some observations. Therefore in this section we will try to deal with this issue despite our still much limited information sources.[764] Within religious studies, the focus is put on the Fatimid Ismaʿili philosopher and missionary Nasir Khusraw (1004-after 1072 CE). Of course, Nasir Khusraw has been known for more than a century in the West, where first attempts of study and translation of his work have been made as early as c. 1880 (Schimmel 1993: 1). Here it is important to emphasize that the tradition of the well-known Fatimid philosopher is deeply rooted in Northern Pakistan.

Nasir Khusraw was born in Balkh (in the North of modern Afghanistan) and is famous for his journey to Mecca and Cairo. Later, he resided in Yumgan, a remote mountainous region of Badakhshan. Yumgan is not far from Chitral and the Ismaʿilis in Northern Pakistan revere Nasir Khusraw as their first missionary from Badakhshan. The “Isma2ili Mission in the Northern Areas: A Historical Review” begins with a mention of Nasir Khusraw as the first to have propagated the Ismaʿili doctrine to the region (Hunzaʿi 1991), where many local folk tales narrate Nasir Khusraw’s miracles (cf. Schomberg 1938). Another piece of evidence to demonstrate Nasir Khusraw’s significance in the North is a ritual called chiragh-i rawshan, a lamp-lighting ceremony attributed to Nasir Khusraw and performed on the third day after a death. The chiragh-i rawshan is performed to console and give a message about the dead’s life in the other world; it invites the living ones to focus on the mystical presence of the Imam, who is identified with a spiritual lamp. Thus, through folk tales and traditional ritual, Nasir Khusraw has long been known and familiar among the Ismaʿilis as a great saint.

His writings can be divided into three categories: a prose memoir of his travels, poetry, and philosophical books (Hunsberger 2000: 114). Yet works of his such as the Safar-nama, Diwan, Waëh-i din and others have not been widely accessible to the faithful until very recently, and in the past only a small number of people used to be familiar with his philosophy. This is not strange when considering that the community was largely based on agro-pastoralism and had only very scanty means for reproducing the scholarly class from generation to generation. Now, thanks to widespread education, many young persons with scientific and technical MAs and BAs are eager to acquire by themselves a higher religious knowledge. When they turn to religious studies, Nasir Khusraw is always a focal point.

Nasir Khusraw studies have been developed mainly in the Hunza Valley, where social development is most advanced among Northern Ismaʿilis. It is Allama Nasir Hunzaʿi (Allama Nasir al-Din Nasir Hunzaʿi) who started serious study on Nasir Khusraw. Nasir Hunzaʿi was born in 1917 in Hunza. Being a member of a khalifa family, he must have been closer to religious learning, although in general, circumstances in Hunza were then far from ideal for education. He was able to attend school for only one year, and acquired knowledge mainly by himself. Later, when he was in Xinjiang to propagate Ismaʿilism, he was arrested. While in prison, he experienced a spiritual awakening. So far, the prolific thinker has published more than 150 books and pamphlets, which made him be known under the title of Allama, or greater scholar.

Beside translating the Waëh-i din and other works of Nasir Khusraw into Urdu, Nasir Hunzaʿi has written several articles about this great figure. One of these articles, “Pir Nasir Khusraw, A Universe of Knowledge,” has been published in the Tazkira-yi Sayyidna Pir Nasir Lusraw (Iqbal et al. 1992). This is the record of two Ismaili conferences on Nasir Khusraw held in Chitral (October 1989) and Gilgit (November 1990). Beside Nasir Hunzaʿi’s, it includes more than twenty articles. Topics are extremely broad and cover various aspects of Nasir Khusraw’s life, works, and influence in Central Asia. The book is epoch-making, since the articles were mainly written by the educated young generation for their fellow readers. Another important work of Nasir Hunzaʿi is his Chiragh-i Rawshan (1993), the first written interpretation (ta wil) of the ritual, exploring its various esoteric significations.

Allama Nasir Hunzaʿi has established several private institutions and taught many students. Originally installed in 1961 in Hunza, the Danishgah-i Khanah-i Hikmat has been relocated in Karachi since 1977, and become a locus of religious studies. The Allamah Research Institute Foundation, or Idara-i ARIF, has been established by his students in Canada. Nasir Hunzaʿi's works include as well poetry in Burushaski, the vernacular tongue of Hunza. The BRA, or Burushaski Research Academy, specializes in the study of the language, and Nasir Hunzai is also known locally as Baba-e Burushaski (Father of Burushaski). There are thousands of young Ismaʿilis from the North studying and working in Karachi. Nasir Hunzaʿi's circle attracts students from this population (there are students from Afghanistan too). Among his students, colleagues, and ex-colleagues, one can mention the following figures.

Ghulam Abbas Hunzaʿi has written his Master thesis (McGill University) on the concept of pleasure in the philosophy of Nasir Khusraw. He has worked with the ITREB, and is presently working with the AKHS. Shahnaz Hunzaʿi has had a unique career: she is one of the Khoja women married to Hunza, and masters the local Burushaski language. She is the author of a thesis on the concept of qiyamat (resurrection of the Last Day) in Nasir Khusraw's thought at the Institute of Ismaʿili Studies (IIS, London), in which she has translated a few chapters of the Lwan al-ilwan into English. Azizullah Najeeb, one of the editors of the Tazkira, has completed his Doctoral Degree on Nasir Khusraw from Hamdard University in Karachi. He was working as a waʿiz when the Gilgit branch of the Ismaʿilia Association was first established. Fida Ali Isar Hunzaʿi is the author of Ismaʿili Mission in the Northern Areas; he has also translated selected poems of the Diwan in Urdu, and it is published from ITREB (Hunzaʿi 1998–1999).

But these intellectual movements are not limited to Northern Pakistan or Karachi, and are in fact resonating with the center. We can see it through the example of another student of Nasir Hunzaʿi's—Faqir Muhammad Hunzai (sic), a Research Associate at the IIS. He has been translating the 'Allama's works from Urdu into English in collaboration with his wife, who is from the East African Khoja community. He undertook his post-graduate studies at Karachi University, where he was studying philosophy, Arabic, and Persian language and literature. The holder of a PhD from McGill University (Islamic Studies), he is active at the IIS and his works include The Shimmering Light. An Anthology of Ismaʿili Poetry (1996), which collects nineteen poems from the Diwan, and Nasir Khusraw: Knowledge and Liberation (1998), a new edition and English translation of the Gumayim wa rahayim.

Thus the local intellectual movement originating from the Northern Pakistan appears closely linked with the center or the IIS. The Institute of Ismaʿili Studies has been established in 1977 with the object of promoting Islamic scholarship and learning in general, and Ismaʿilism in particular. The IIS offers a graduate program in Islamic Studies and Humanities, which attracts students from Ismaʿili communities around the world. Since the mid-1990s, the Institute has vigorously published academic books and research papers on Ismaʿilism, especially that of the Fatimid period. In one of the IIS publications, Heinz Halm writes: “under the Fatimids and through their efforts, Cairo became one of the centres of Islamic culture and art, and a focus of a scholarship and science” (Halm 1997: xiv). For the Ismaʿilis who have achieved social, cultural, and economic uplift through NGO activities, the Fatimid golden age is associated with their own efforts to reconstruct Islamic civilization under the Imamat. It is quite understandable that, in such an overall framework, Nasir Khusraw is highly esteemed in the center as well as in the North.

 Conclusion

 The change in authority transmission

In the Ismaʿili community in Northern Pakistan, the forms and features of leadership have changed considerably. Within a century, especially in the last fifty years, they have gradually established a collective leadership. “Now we don’t have much to do” says Pir Sahib, relaxing in his porch, listening to a Persian program on the radio. “The institutes do it.” Religious tradition is revived by the activities of the ITREB. Furthermore, researchers in the IIS in London are eager to edit the classical texts. Local waʿizs may follow this academic trend.

Religious organizations as well as NGOs offer leadership to the educated youth regardless of their origin. They can go up the hierarchy of the religious organizations, from Local to Regional offices. Beside the Imam’s encouragement, respect and prestige within the community are the rewards for one’s volunteer work. The young generation shares the following features as local leaders under the present Imamat.

1 They personify the equality of the followers.

2 With higher education, they are fluent in reading and writing English, as well as Urdu.

3 They are in charge of managing organizations based on their merits, not by holy ancestry.

4 Reflecting their own transformation, they have started to produce religious knowledge directly related to the Great Tradition, or the texts of Nasir Khusraw, who was formerly known only through miracles and rituals.

The new leaders make a good combination with the Imam. As the supreme leader of the AKDN, Aga Khan IV is well known in the development circles: he makes speeches in UN conferences, or holds international conferences in partnership with the World Bank. For this Imam, those who talk about high hopes for the AKRSP’s grassroots program are the best counterpart. Local pirs with traditional ritual and holy ancestry are not able to follow in the Imam’s footsteps.

The change of leaders at the local level reflects not only the internal changes of Northern Pakistan. The way these changes were institutionalized demonstrates but also the direction of self-reform in the Ismaʿili community as a whole. The holy ancestry except that of the Imam has been denied, and collective leadership has become an organizational principle. Thanks to religious and NGO activities, the northern Jama at of the mountain farmers and the southern Jama at of the Khojas have become one with regard to institutionalization.

 An emerging civil society and identity

The change in the modes of acquisition and transmission of literacy has been intermingling and strengthening the tendency of self-help among the Ismaʿilis. It has made the Ismaʿili community more egalitarian and autonomous. If it does not oppose the state, in Pakistan as well as in Tajikistan, it does virtually replace the local administration in various fields. Among the Ismaʿili religious organizations, persistence in voluntarism is a most visible feature. At the same time, volunteers are being nominated to their offices by the Imam himself. This appointment is a source of honor and prestige that excites the Ismaʿilis' efforts. Through the volunteer works, the Ismaʿilis nurture their personal relationship with the Imam. Thus institutionalized voluntarism has an aspect of large-scale expression of spiritual dedication to the Imam. The consequence is the construction of an autonomous space, which can be termed "civil society" in the contemporary world. It is interesting enough that the century-old office of Imamat is the founding stone of the new civil society.

Being a minority in Pakistan, the Ismaʿili version of the revival movement has its own subtlety too. The AKDN's nondenominational attitude, inviting non-Ismaʿilis as well as Ismaʿilis for development has created an image of openness to both the Imamat and the Jamaat. "Participation for development" has, at the same time, produced a particular meaning within the Ismaʿili community. Since the NGOs' activities are well coordinated with the religious organizations in the community, they have contributed to the creation of a new identity among Ismaʿilis. It also means the creation of a boundary between Ismaʿilis and non-Ismaʿilis. This boundary strengthens their identity, often by tacitly contrasting themselves with the others. This factor can be exclusionary and may cause negative social results. Higher religious studies, though still embryonic, are interesting in this regard. Through studying Nasir Khusraw and the Fatimid Golden Age, the Northern Ismaʿilis will be able to widen and deepen their religio-cultural identity. In other words, Nasir Khusraw can be a passport to the Great Tradition for Northern Ismaʿilis. By invigorating religious studies, the latter will be able to identify themselves in their own community in the North, in the Pakistani Ismaʿili community, and in the world of Islam in general.

 Note

[757] The data mentioned here was kindly given from the offices of AKES and AKHS.

[758] The narratives given here are paraphrased to be compact by the author.

[759] There are “Khuja families” in Wakhan. See Shahrani 1979: 56.

[760] Nowadays AKES’s main task is education for girls.

[761] Interview conducted by the author in May 5, 1995.

[762] YAR stands for Youth and Elder Religious Course. Yar means “friend” in Urdu.

[763] The Isma2ilis are not eager to offer the information about their socio-religious activities. From time to time, however, some of them kindly gave me some information.

[764] I highly owe 2Allama Nasir Hunza2i and Shahnaz Hunza2i for the information. I would like to express special acknowledgment to them.

Aga Khan Rural Support Programme [AKRSP], 1993, Tenth Annual Review (Gilgit: Aga Khan Rural Support Programme).

Biddulph, J., 1880, Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh [reprint, Graz: Akademische Druck-u. Verlagsanstalt, 1977].

Bocock, R. J., 1971, “The Ismailis in Tanzania: A Weberian Analysis,” British Journal of Sociology 22/4 : 365–380.

Clark, P. B., 1976, “The Ismailis: A Study of Community,” British Journal of Sociology 27/4 : 484–494.

Clark, P. B., 1978, “The Ismaili: sect in London: Religious Institutions and Social Change,” Religion, 8 : 68–84.

Dani, A. H., 1989, History of Northern Areas of Pakistan (Islamabad: National Institute of Historical and Cultural Research).

Felmy, S., 1997, The Voice of the Nightingale: A Personal Account of the Wakhi Culture in Hunza (Karachi: Oxford University Press).

Gellner, E., 1981, Muslim Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).

Halm, H., 1997, The Fatimids and Their Traditions of Learning (London: I. B. Tauris) [IIS].

Holzworth, W., 1994, Die Ismailiten in Nordpakistan: Zur Entwicklung einer Religiosen Minderheit im Kontext Neuer au enbeziehungen (Berlin: Das Arabische Buch).

Hunsberger, A. C., 2000, Nasir Khusraw, The Ruby of Badakhshan: A Portrait of the Persian Poet, Traveller and Philosopher (London: I. B.Tauris) [IIS].

Hunzai, F. M., 1996, The Shimmering Light. An Anthology of Ismaili Poetry (London: I. B. Tauris) [IIS].

Hunzai, F. M., 1998, Nasir Khusraw: Knowledge and Liberation (London: I. B. Tauris) [IIS].

Hunzai, A. N. H., 1993, Chiragh-i Rawshan, trans. by Faqir Muhammad Hunzai and Rasida Noormohamed-Hunzai (Karachi: Khanah-i Hikmat Idarah-i 2Arif).

Hunzai, F. A. I., 1991, Mumali 2Ilaqaëat men Isma2ili Da2wat: Ek Ta1rili Ëa1za (Karachi: Shia Imami Ismaili Tariqa and Religious Education Board bara2e Pakistan (in Urdu)).

Hunzai, F. A. I., 1998–1999, Kalam-i Pir Nasir Lusraw (7 vols) (Karachi: Shia Imami Ismaili Tariqa and Religious Education Board bara2e Pakistan (in Urdu)).

Iqbal, S. M., Naëib, 2A., Lan, M. B., and Laki, Ë. A., 1992, TaΩkira-yi Sayyidna Pir Nasir Lusraw (Karachi: Shia Imami Ismaili Tariqa and Religious Education Board barae Pakistan (in Urdu)).

The Ismaili Pakistan 1997/1.

Keshavjee, R. H., 1981, The Quest for Gnosis and the Call of History: Modernization among the Ismailis of Iran (PhD thesis, Harvard University).

Khan, M. S., and Khan, S. S., 1992, Rural Change in the Third World: Pakistan and the Aga Khan Rural Support Program (New York: Greenwood Press).

Kreutzmann, H., 1989, Hunza: Ländliche Entwicklung im Karakorum (Berlin: Dietrich Reimer Verlag).

Masselos, J. C., 1978, “The Khojas of Bombay: The Defining of Formal Membership Criteria during the Nineteenth Century,” in I.Ahmad, ed., Caste and Social Stratification among the Muslims in India (New Delhi: Manohar): 97–116.

Müller-Stellrecht, I., 1979, Materialen zur Ethnographie von Dardistan (Pakistan). Aus den Nachgelassenen Aufzeichnungen von D. L. R. Lorimer. Teil I. Hunza (Graz: Akademische Druck-u. Verlagsanstalt).

Nanji, A., 1974, “Modernization and Change in the Nizari Ismaili Community in East Africa: A Perspective,” Journal of Religion of Africa 6 :123–139.

Nanji, A., 1978, The Nizari Ismaili Tradition in the Indo-Pakistan Subcontinet (New York: Caravan Books).

Nanji, A., 1983, “The Nizari Ismaili Muslim Community in North America: Background and Development,” in E. H.Waugh, B. Abu-Laban, B. Qureshi, eds, The Muslim Community in North America (Alberta: The University of Alberta Press): 149–164.

Nejima, S., 2002, Islam and Development. The Transformation of the Ismaili Community in Karakorum (Kyoto: Nakanishiya Shuppan) [in Japanese].

Papanek, H., 1962, Leadership and Social Change in the Khoja Ismaili Community (PhD thesis, Harvard University).

Rattansi, D., 1987, Islamization and the Khojah Ismaili Community in Pakistan (PhD thesis, McGill University).

Schimmel, A., 1993, Make a Shield from Wisdom. Selected Verses from Nasir-i Khusraw’s Divan (London: Kegan Paul International) [IIS].

Schomberg, R. C. F., 1938, Kafirs and Glaciers. Travels in Chitral (London: Martin Hopkins).

Shahrani, M. N. M., 1979, The Kirghiz and Wakhi of Afghanistan. Adaptation to Closed Frontiers (Seattle, WA: University of Washington Press).

Stellrecht, I., ed., 1998, The Past in Present. Horizons of Remembering in the Pakistani Himalaya (Köln: Rüdiger Köppe Verlag).

Stellrecht, I. and Bohle, H., eds, 1998, Transformation of Social and Economic Relationship in Northern Pakistan (Köln: Rüdiger Köppe Verlag).

Stellrecht, I. and Winiger, M., eds, 1997, Perspectives on History and Change in the Karakorum, Hindukush, and Himalaya (Köln: Rüdiger Köppe Verlag).

Walji, S. R., 1974, A History of the Ismaili Community in Tanzania (PhD thesis, University of Wisconsin).

[IIS] means the title is published in association with the Institute of Ismaili Studies.

* 12. Islam on the Wings of Nationalism: The case of Muslim intellectuals in Republican China

Françoise Aubin

Unceasing convulsions, chaos and troubles have shaken China, as it is well known, during the first half of the twentieth century: the Boxer rebellion in 1900, the overthrow of the Qing dynasty at the turn of 1912, the xenophobic anti-Christian (more precisely anti-Protestant) outburst in 1925, the breaking of a tactical alliance between Guomindang [765] and Communists in 1927, the rapid militarization of the politics and so on.[766] While intellectuals were contending without end about the significance of the past, the throwing out of their so-called ossified spiritual legacy, the invention of a new way of life and thought, their political commitment, there were other groups of intellectuals who unostentatiously and unnoticed were conducting their own revolution, on the fringe of the main currents, especially in the coastal big cities. These intellectuals were Chinese believers in Islam.[767]

 How Muslim intellectuals reacted to the surrounding turmoil

 With cultural associations

The basis of their social activity was the creation of numerous cultural associations, whose program focused on the modernization and the expansion of popular religious education, on the improvement of higher religious formation, on the promotion of Islamic culture, and whose leaders were often the imams in charge of the cult (zhangjiao), usually called in China the ahongs. [768] Associations had too the merit of being a remedy for the dispersion of local communities, each of them congregated round a mosque, without links between one another. And, doing so, the activists were convinced that they put into practice their love of the Chinese motherland and their wish to help it, although without taking political stand, they say. But, from the names chosen for these associations and for the schools they supported, it is obvious that a very important point then was at stake: the identity of the Chinese Muslims, that is Muslims whose everyday and literary language is Chinese. Did they constitute a religious or an ethnic minority? That is a problem which was new at the turn of the twentieth century and during the following decades, linked with the diffusion of Western ideas (often thanks to a Japanese intermediary) about religion, ethnicity, nationality and citizenship.

Actually there are several Chinese expressions for rendering the concept of Islam and Muslim according to the point of view of the speaker, and each of them appears somehow in one or another designation of these associations. The traditional wording of self-designation was to be a follower of “the Religion of the Pure and the True” or of “the Pure and True Religion”, Qingzhenjiao , a statement still very appreciated at the turn of the twenty-first century for it stresses the believers’ purity as a special marker of their superiority. They could also be called Mumin , “the Mu[slim] people,” an abbreviation of the word now currently in use, Mu-si-lin .[769] During the first half of the twentieth century they were more and more often named—and they called themselves more and more often—members of the Huijiao “the religion of the Hui,” or Huimin , “the Hui people,” it being understood that Hui had then the mean ing of the world-wide Islam,[770] an equivalent of the word now common, Yi-si-lan , Chinese transliteration of “Islam.” They also frequently called themselves the Hui Hanzi ,, “the Muslim Han.” Later on, history has decided: under the People’s Republic, the Chinese Muslims have been registered as a specific “nationality” or minzu, , as the Huizu .[771] In the following list I shall draw from the main cultural associations created during the first decades of the twentieth century; I shall translate their names as closely as possible to their original meaning, unfortunately at the expense of elegance, because such names were not chosen at random, and each of the words forming them bore in itself the weight of an emotionally heavy tradition.

Since the very beginning, the appearance of associations of their own is unmistakably a reply the Muslim modernists gave to the pervasive atmosphere surrounding them. Indeed the earliest association just followed, at the end of the Qing dynasty, the official reform of the educational system, culminating in September 1905 in the abolition of the thousand year old civil service examinations and of the Confucian schooling. It was founded in 1906 (Guangxu 32) [772] at Zhenjiang (Jiangsu),[773] under the appellation of the “General Association for the Religious Education of the Muslim People (Mumin) of Eastern Asia” (Dongya Mumin jiaoyu zonghui). Its initiator, Tong Cong ,[774] was a local Muslim in his forties, having recently graduated in the Confucianist system, so a man well integrated in the surrounding society. The interesting point is that he was then in touch with a group of thirty-six young Muslim Chinese sent for studying in Tokyo, because Japan was, after its victory over Russia in 1905, the favorite place where one could be introduced into modernity.[775] These young men in their turn founded in 1907, on the model drawn by Tong Cong, an “Association for the Pure and True [i.e. Muslim] Education of the Students in To[kyo]/or in the East”—with a play on the word dong “East,” and the first syllable of Tokyo, ‘the Eastern Capital’ (Liudong Qingzhen jiaoyu hui). And then, so important was, in the Chinese tradition, the correct naming of any enterprise, that Tong Cong, at these students’ instigation, changed the name of his society to “General Association for the Pure and True Education of East Asia” (Dongya Qingzhen jiaoyu zonghui), a formulation which stressed at the same time the religious and the Chinese characters of his program. The aim of Tong Cong’s association was the promotion of a good Muslim education, so many Muslim notables backed him. He had actually opened in 1905 one of the first “modernized” Islamic schools in China—if not the first one—, a “School of Muslim sources” (Muyuan xuetang), fit out with a printing house for presenting his pedagogical ideas in a journal “To develop us” (the Yiwobao). As early as in 1908, he called in the school a meeting of his supporters and encouraged the creation of branches of his association everywhere. But this still remained a provincial venture.

Merchants of Shanghai, during the troubles accompanying the fall of the impe rial dynasty in the last weeks of 1911, constituted for protecting citizens a militia directed by a future journalist, Sha Shanyu ,[776] and they were proclaiming to be adepts of the “Pure and True” using the name itself chosen for their group, Qingzhen shangtuan [Militia of Merchants of the Pure and True].[777] The need for a common local organization of the believers was then strongly felt. For example, shortly before the overthrow of the dynasty, in 1910, a group of Muslim merchants and students of Shanghai elected (through a genuine vote, toupiao , with ballot papers) a marine officer as a general administrator with two assistants, to make up for the lack of a central authority heading their community; and they came to the office of the representative of the throne, the head of the xian , begging for an official registration: this has been immortalized by an inscrip tion on stone.[778] Shortly after the beginning of the new era in 1912, Muslim intellectuals of the major centers of coastal China felt more and more the acute need for associations promoting Islamic (Hui) culture and education. Pekingese launched in this very year 1912 a progressive movement with the long-lasting “Society for the Advance of the Hui Religion of China” (Zhongguo Huijiao jujin hui or al-Ëam2iyyat al-taqaddum al-islamiyya al-siniyya),[779] which has been the first nationwide association of the believers, endowed with subsidiary associations (fenhui) in each province, and, since 1934, sub sidiary groups in the mosques too. Very fine scholars were among its members, such as the ahong Ma Songting [780] and its first director, the ahong Wang Haoran.[781] The principle for naming this association, which was to be fol- lowed by several others, was to use the word Huijiao, meaning Islam as a whole, and to add the specification of Zhongguo, “China.” The movement extended to Shanghai later. In the full burst of xenophobic man ifestations and of large strikes in 1925, appeared, in the foreground of Muslim revival, Ha Decheng. [782] He was both a religious personality—an ahong at a Shanghai mosque—, and since 1913 one of the managers of an international commercial society, whose benefits were earmarked to finance the schooling of future ahong and to buy Islamic books overseas. In 1925, back to Shanghai after several years spent abroad, he was struck by the still low level of religious teach ing. In order to remedy to this situation, he gathered ten or so co-religionists of Shanghai, among others Sha Shanyu, a teacher and journalist,[783] and Wu Tegong a journalist; [784] and on the 25th of June he created with them a specifically nonpolitical “Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China” (Zhongguo Huijiao xuehui , or al-Ëam2iyyat al-2ilmiyya al-islamiyya al-siniyya).[785] Its aim was the promotion of religious education, of the collective good, of friendship with foreign co-religionists; the practical actions were the creation of an Islamic school, of an Arabic school and of elementary schools, of a library, the diffusion of foreign Muslim scholarship, the translation of the Qurʿan, the publication of handbooks, of a journal, and so on. Such it remained, till the Japanese took over Shanghai, the most efficient society in the field of Muslim scholarship.

Some years later, in October 1929, still in Shanghai, some distinguished Muslim personalities, who were not professionals of religion, initiated a “Guild of the Hui Religion of China” (Zhongguo Huijiao gonghui).[786] Its main leaders were again Sha Shanyu, Wu Tegong and Da Pusheng, [787] an elderly man who had graduated some years before at the Cairo University of al-Azhar and who was to play a prominent part in the relation of the Muslim community with the Guomindang and the Communist governments. The aim of this association was to help the country and to plan the public good; the means to reach it was the formation of ahongs of the highest grade, the construction of numerous schools, hospitals and libraries, and the introduction of a technical training. However, the association could not carry it off, a failure due to a lack of organization, of talented helpers, and to some inner resistance, which shows that the task was not easy.

Two years after this one, in 1931, another scholarly society was created by young Muslims, in Nanking this time: the “Learned Society of the Youth for the Hui Religion of China” (Zhongguo Huijiao qingnian xuehui), whose program was to meet together on a friendly footing, to study in a scholarly way, and finally to help the society as a whole, the means of action being meet ings of young people, vocational orientation of the youth, various publications, contribution to an improvement of believers’ life. A new step was passed, which showed that young Muslims had begun to feel concerned by the political atmos phere, especially in Nanking, then the capital of the Guomindang government: they have added to their program a study of Sun Yatsen’s “Triple Demism” or Three People Principles (Sanmin zhuyi) to check if it did not contradict Islam. They complemented their association in 1936 by an “Association for Scientific Research of the Hui People” (Huimin xueshu yanjiu hui) [788] which was aimed at realizing specific scholarly studies.

By that time, in 1934 a “Cultural Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China” (Zhongguo Huijiao wenhua xiehui) [789] was launched at Shanghai. One of its founding members was Fu Tongxian,[790] a modernist and the future author of a history of Chinese Islam which remains our best source of information for the evolution of Islam in the Republican era. The objective of the group was to upgrade the level of Chinese Islam, felt as too low, its tools being publication of new researches or of old classical studies in the field of Chinese Islam. The list of Muslim associations with a purely cultural aim, which started in the late twenties and early thirties, could be expanded with provincial initia tives too. We may quote, for example, a “Society for the diffusion of Chinese Islam” (Zhongguo Yi-si-lan budao hui),[791] introduced in 1933 into Taiyuan, the capital city of Shanxi, whose program was to spread broadly the Muslim doctrine, through a translation of the Qurʿan, various publi cations and news about the Religion in the local newspaper, the Daily of Taiyuan (Taiyuan ribao). This time the name of the association showed it referred not just to Hui religion but Islam (Yi-si-lan) itself.

In the thirties, the Islamic associations were beginning to feel the weight of politics, as testified by the Nanking students’ concern for the official ideology of the Guomindang as conveyed by Sun Yatsen’s program. A new stage was passed when Muslim military personalities of Western China, while becoming warlords, were heartily supporting a revival of Islamic culture in its sinicized and confu- cianized version and adhered to Muslim cultural associations of the coastal regions. It was in May 1933, when Ma Hongkui ,[792] just appointed governor of Ningxia, at the door of Tibet, entered into the administrative committee (weiyuan) of a new “Society for the Promotion of Education of the Hui People” (Huimin jiaoyu cujin hui),[793] and served in this capacity till 1948. The program was a straight education for everybody. But a new preoc cupation was added to the usual promise of establishing a lot of good schools: to push forward Chinese Islam to the western part of the country by proselytizing in border regions and applying to the government for bringing together Uighurs and Muslim Han and giving them a common education. The name of another associ ation, started once more in the capital Nanking in 1934, the “Confederation of the Hui religion in China” (Zhonghua Huijiao zonghui),[794] indicated a certain display of support for the government, as the term Zhonghua has been selected by Sun Yatsen, and after him by the Guomindang, for referring to China, instead of the usual Zhongguo. One of its subsidiary association (fenhui), the one settled in Western China, in Lanzhou the capital of Gansu, was led by military and political figures belonging to the circle of warlords, Ma Lin ,[795] his nephew Ma Buqing ,[796] Ma Hongbin , [797] the nephew of the famous Ma Fuxiang ,[798] and a cousin of Ma Hongkui—himself Ma Fuxiang’s son.

The starting point of a general mobilization of believers for a political move was the shock of the so-called Marco Polo Bridge Incident, on 7 July 1937, the day Japan began to invade China. In the following months, a political personality of Tianjin, who was busy promoting a Muslim lobby inside the Guomindang, Shi Zizhou ,[799] and an influential ahong of the same town, Wang Jingzhai ,[800] initiated a “Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Resistance to Japan and the Salvation of the Country” (Zhongguo Huimin kangri jiuguo xiehui —with the term “Hui People” and no longer the “Hui Religion”). At about the same time, the higher Muslim member of the Guomindang government, the General Bai Chongxi , [801] wishing to unite the efforts of the cohort of Muslim voluntary associations, with Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi)’s support, invited the most influential Muslim personalities of the hour to meet at Wuchang (one of the three cities forming Wuhan in Central China) [802] where the government had withdrawn after the fall of Nanking.

So he gathered the so-called “Four Great Ahongs” (si da ahong), Wang Jingzhai (who was then 66 years old), Da Pusheng [803] (63 years), Ha Decheng [804] (49 years), Ma Songting [805] (42 years), and activists of the education, as Tang Kesan — of Shandong. [806] After discussion, these men, at Bai Chongxi’s instigation and with Chiang Kai-shek’s approval, founded a “Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country” (Zhongguo Huimin jiuguo xiehui , later called, as we will see, “Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country”),[807] which, under General Bai Chongxi, Tang Kesan and Shi Zizhou’s joint leadership, began to make itself known at the beginning of 1938 and held its first general meeting in May 1938. Among the overabundant boards of trustees (thirty-two persons), were present the representatives of Muslim military power of the West, the cousins Ma Hongkui and Ma Hongbin, the brothers Ma Bufang and Ma Buqing; and among the eight “observers” (jianshi) Da Pusheng and Wang Jingzhai. Inner depart ments (bu) were set up for organization, propaganda, investigation; and com mittees (weiyuanhui) were formed for dealing with specific questions such as education, youth, training, relief, and so on.[808] The aims of the association were: enlistment of Muslim citizens, especially youth, side by side with unbe lievers, in the struggle against the invader, purge of “running dogs” of the enemy, and help to co-religionists who had fallen into misfortune, particularly in regions lost to the conquerors. During the summer of 1938, under threat of the progress of the front, the headquarters of the association moved to Chongqing , in Sichuan, shortly before the government and the intellectuals of the whole coun try.[809] There, in the cramped and boiling world of the wartime capital, Muslim intellectuals met with as never before the leaders of literature and scholarship, who in their turn became interested in Islam.

During that epoch, which saw in the country more than ever a blossoming of various kinds of associations among intellectuals of all convictions, an “Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion” (Huijiao wenhua yanjiu hui was established, at the beginning of 1939, chaired by the General Bai, co-chaired by Tang Kesan, and counting among its members famous scholars or writers such as Guo Moruo (better known as Kuo Mo-jo) and Lao She, sitting alongside Muslim intellectuals, totally 123 persons. The discussion about the meaning and limits of the concepts “Hui People/Hui Religion” (Huimin/Huijiao) was then fierce. So that finally, at Bai Chongxi’s suggestion, the name of the main association was changed into “Association of the Hui Religion (Huijiao instead of Huimin) of China for the Salvation of the Country,” to show that it concerned all the adherents to Islam, even recent converts [810] and not only members of what was more and more considered as a special ethnic group (it seems that Muslims from Xinjiang were not included in the scope of the project).

In the emergency of the age, an association like this was bound to encounter a great success, opening subsidiary associations (fenhui) in the provinces— even in Hong Kong, in Tibet and, curiously enough, in Yan‘an under the leader ship of the Communist Party—, branches (zhihui) in the xian, sections (quhui) in the market towns, each of them subordinate to the local mosque.

It launched periodicals too, which reached a large audience; it created other derived associations, one “for the Youth” (Yi-si-lan qingnian hui) in February 1940, another “for the Study of Questions of the World of Islam” (Yi-si- lan shijie wenti yanjiu hui or “for the Study of Questions of the Northwest” (Xibei wenti yanjiu hui) both in April 1943.

The assessment of its activity is diversified. Within the scope of its vast cultural and religious influence, it worked for organizing a company of Hui singers who had to popularize anti-Japanese songs; it asked the great writer Lao She to write a play about the common front of Hui and Han facing the enemy: the result was “The Acme of the Nation” (Guojia chishang), performed for the first time in Chongqing in Spring 1940. The patriotic awareness of Muslim citizens has been stirred up by the ahongs’ sermons and collective prayers made through its impetus. Moreover, it led to the enrolment of volunteers to fight the enemy, in all sixty-one detachments. It succeeded in creating a kind of anti-Japanese pro-Chinese lobby in Muslim countries, from Egypt and the Near-East till South and Southeast Asia, paving the way for the role the future official Islamic association of the People’s Republic would play as a link between the Chinese government and the Gulf countries. In 1946, the headquarters of the association followed the government to Nanking under Tang Kesan’s leadership; and in May 1948, an assembly of delegates of all the branches installed everywhere since 1938, announced as a new program a return to specifically cultural and religious concerns. But 1949 was already the year of the withdrawal to Taiwan, where the association kept up its program.[811]

 With educational institutions

In harmony with a motto popular in China since the late Qing, “Save the Country by Education” (jiaoyu jiuguo),[812] every Muslim cultural association and its supporters advocated, as main practical action, the establishment of primary schools everywhere, and afterwards, as far as possible, of secondary schools. The aim was twofold: to increase the network of schooling in order to reach all the sons from believers’ families—and, with the passing of years, the girls too; and to introduce a so-called “New Style of Education” (xinshi jiaoyu).

But here was concealed a crucial question: what exactly was the content of this new-style education, especially at its beginning, before it became rather well theorized in the late twenties and the thirties? Its main ground appears to be a reaction of repulsion against the traditional system of mosque instruction, named the “Scriptural Hall education” (jingtang jiaoyu) [813] —which was in fact a madrasa system, that is a form of higher education, while the common new-style schools were at a primary or a secondary level. This standpoint of denial of the past was well in the line of rejection that the surrounding cultured society inflicted on the immemorial system of thought, Confucianism. It was also in the line of the traditional attitude of the Chinese ulama, who from century to century were overwhelmed with the feeling of an alleged decay of their religion, due to its distance from its origins in space and time, and who were convinced that a correct religious education was the absolute remedy for all the evils of the time. Anyway the introduction of the system of the “Scriptural Hall education” at the end of the sixteenth century had been celebrated as the most significant innovation in the history of Chinese Islam. Three centuries later, this system was repudiated and, in order to replace it, the Muslim elite had to face a much more complex agenda than the ordinary anti-Confucian modernists. It was still agreed that the education of the youth would remain under the tutelage of mosques: it is a fact that, so far as I am aware, new schools regularly settled within the mosque precincts, often in a special structure built on the backyard of the edifice. But the stake was the content of the teaching, a hard bone of contention between various Muslim allegiances during the first decades of the twentieth century.

The first part of the program of renovation concerned, of course, the teaching of Arabic and of religious matters (there was no more question of Persian, which had been, in its written form, more or less mastered by ahongs, and which would remain till the post-Maoist period the literary written language of female ahongs).[814] The first initiators of the modernist movement brought back from their trips to Mecca, Egypt, Turkey, India, in the early twentieth century, new teaching materials in Arabic, and, in the thirties even Western studies in islamology. In addition, on the model of public education in the country, the method of making the children drone by heart an incomprehensible classical text (in the case in point the Qurʿan in Arabic) was given up. The first question to solve was how should Arabic be taught and pronounced by the schoolboys? In the late Qing, the elementary schools appended to mosques used manuals in which Qurʿanic extracts were transcribed by Chinese characters sounding, in the standard Northern reading, roughly as the corresponding Arabic phonemes; and the believers remained all their lives accustomed to recite Surats from the Sacred Book according to such a distorted way: for example the mahada, “la ilaha illa’llah,” used to become in the mouth of a traditional Chinese Muslim “la-yi-la-ho yin-lang-la-ho.” Reformers were adamant: Chinese transcription of Arabic phoneme was an evil to get rid of, and Arabic should be pronounced as correctly as possible. However, grassroots ahongs in charge of teaching in mosques not affiliated to a modernist trend continued being content with the traditional way of reading.

The next problem to resolve was the language in which to give the classes: Arabic or Chinese? At its beginning during the last years of the nineteenth century, the Ikhwani movement in China (there called Yi-hei-wa-ni), inspired by the Wahhabi reformism, pleaded for a complete arabization of the teaching as well of the practice of religion, and for an utter prohibition of any Chinese and Sufi influence.[815] But very soon, already by the second generation of leaders of the movement, Islam as taught by the Ikhwani adepts, though it remained anti-Sufi, became more than ever a Chinese religion; and it was so well integrated into the social and political surroundings that it was since the mid-twenties a staunch supporter of every constituted military or civil power, that of the Muslim warlords of the Northwest as much as that of the Guomindang and later, paradoxically, that of the Communist Party.[816] The fundamentalism which remained firmly entrenched in an Arabian orthodoxy and in the refusal of political and social commitment was then the prerogative of the last wave of Muslim reformism reaching China, the Salafiyya movement, which has been endowed with its own personality since 1937 and has been really active since the founding of the People’s Republic in 1949.[817] So, in the twenties, when the move towards inner modernization of Islam was well set on its way, particularly endorsed by the advocates of the Ikhwan, one wish was nearly general among cultivated Muslim: it was that their children, who will graduate from new schools, be perfectly proficient in written, colloquial and literary Chinese, and in Chinese classics. The third side of their pedagogical program was to follow the full curriculum of the official schools, first not to be outdone by them—and later, in the thirties, because the Nationalist government has made it more or less compulsory for religious schools—, that is to have the children study arithmetic, geography, history, science, modern Chinese literature, often English too, and to practise physical education, handicrafts, music and so on; without forgetting the most important parts of the teaching, Arabic and religion, a very heavy program indeed. The final goal of these efforts was to give perfect citizens to the motherland, the underlying idea being that a good Muslim was intrinsically a perfect citizen.

The very first new-styled Muslim school appeared, so far as I am aware, already in 1898, and it would not have been by sheer chance that this happened in Hunan (in Southern central China), as this province has been at the forefront of the short-lived reforms of the last years of the nineteenth century—reformist spirit of the Muslim elite ought not to be dissociated from the reformist spirit at work in the surrounding society. It must be noted that this first reformed school, organized at the initiative of the mosque of Changde (in the North of the province), received sons of unbelievers as well as of believers; [818] as did Tong Cong in the new-style school he started to manage in 1905 (one year before initiating the first Muslim cultural association of modern times), the Muyuan xuetang (the "Teaching Hall of the Source of the Mu[slim]"—xuetang being the old generic name for school, before the new word xuexiao was introduced from Japan).[819] Of the many schools opened between 1898 and 1937,[820] some have rapidly disappeared due to the scarcity of financial means, to a bad organization, to a lack of suitable management, and to the scarcity of qualified teachers. Many were destroyed during the war. But some were reconstructed and have survived till the Communist time, and even till today, as for example the Muyan school of Tong Cong, which has recovered its original name of "Muyuan" in 1984. The schools which have left the most lasting memory are the "Sino-Arabic Schools" (Zhong-A xuexiao), that is, schools teaching Chinese language and literature (zhongwen) and Arabic language (awen), in Western China under the tutelage of adherents to the Ikhwan, as the Mingde ("Luminous Virtue," a fundamental Neo-Confucian concept) School of Kunming, , the capital city of Yunnan.[821]

The formation of both religious and teaching professionals at a good level has early become a deep concern for the activists. In 1907, the ahongs Wang Haoran and Da Pusheng initiated a "Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion" (Huijiao shifan xuetang) [822] at the famous Peking mosque of Ox Street (Niujie libaisi) for spreading knowledge of Qurʿanic studies in Arabic and the history of Chinese literature, according to a genuine Islamo-Chinese design. This first normal school is still respected for the broad influence it had at this time, but it collapsed rather fast.

Later on, some normal schools were established in the 1920s and 1930s. The one, which has had the most far-reaching impact and which is celebrated by pres ent-day Muslims like a kind of founding icon of modern Chinese Muslim iden tity, is the Chengda Normal School (Chengda shifan xuexiao),[823] opened during the most bustling year of the Republic, on April 1925, at Jinan , the capital of Shandong, for “Perfecting [Virtue] and Manifesting [Talent],” cheng[de] da[cai] , as was suggested by its name. Its main initiator was a young man of 30 years, Ma Songting [824] ahong of a mosque in the town, who was the head of studies, while the director of the school was Tang Kesan [825] who partly financed the institution. At that time, it was a limited experiment, as the first enrolment was only often students. Soon the unpleasant political events of May 1928 in the town led to its closure. However, in spring 1929 help came from a side which, seen from afar, would seem quite unexpected: from a Muslim general, native of Ningxia, in Western China, a weighty arbiter in the conflicts opposing Chiang Kaishek to Northern warlords, Ma Fuxiang,[826] in fact a fine connoisseur of Confucianism, a warm supporter of a sinicized version of Islam as of a mod ernized Muslim education, and a sympathizer of the new trend of the Ikhwani movement. He struck up a friendship with Tang Kesan as an approval of his endeavor, and therefore handled the Chengda case as his own affair: he pushed for reopening the school at Beiping (Peking) which became prosperous thanks to his money and to his personal involvement.

In 1932, Ma Songting traveled to Egypt and other Islamic countries, to find out how pedagogy should be organized. With the backing of the Egyptian king Fuʿad, he invited two Egyptian scholars to take in hand the teaching at Chengda. He also brought home a collection of Arabic books, given by the king and by the director of al-Azhar; so that he could undertake the establishment of a large Muslim library which he called the “Fuʿad Library” (Fude [827] tushuguan), sup- ported in 1936 by some leading personalities of the cultural national world, such as Cai Yuanpei , Chen Yuan, , Gu Jiegang . On the eve of the Japanese invasion, Muslim elites had definitely enlarged to include non-Muslims in the circle of their sympathizers, at least in Peking. In 1937, the Chengda School was evacuated to Guilin , in Southern China. In 1945, when re-established at Peking, it was merged with another pedagogical school, first promoted in Ningxia by Ma Fuxiang’s son, Ma Hongkui,[828] also a military and political leader of North Western China—Ma Fuxiang having died in 1932. The new school took the name of “High Institute of the Hui People” (Huimin xueyuan), a name which it kept till its end, in 1958, under Communist rule.

Still another normal school was created in Eastern China in 1928, the “Normal Islamic School of Shanghai” (Shanghai Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao),[829] which was successful thanks to Ma Fuxiang’s financial support, once more, and was directed by Da Pusheng and Ha Decheng. Closed in 1937, it came to life again in Western China, in Gansu, under Da Pusheng’s leadership, as the “Normal Islamic School of Pingliang” (Pingliang Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao).[830] Another normal school of the pre-war time in Eastern China was installed in Northern Hebei, not very far from Peking: the “Normal Islamic School of Wanxian” (Wanxian Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao).[831] Opened in 1929, its curriculum has a modern tone, as subjects of the official program were taught along with Arabic grammar and Quranic theology; but it still taught traditional classical literature and written Chinese language, so disparaged by the young iconoclasts, heirs of the May Fourth movement. The school was short-lived, as it had closed in 1935, due to financial strain. The so-called “Sino-Arabic University” (Zhong-A daxue), founded in Ningxia by the warlord Ma Hongbin [832] in 1932, became in 1936, after various transformations, the “Yunting Provincial Normal School” (Shengli Yunting shifan xuexiao)— Yunting being the courtesy name of the Ma Fuxiang,[833] and this school, the first Muslim normal school functioning with a provincial allocation of money, followed the official program of four years with the addition of a compulsory Arabic course.[834] The ambitious educational programs, partly in Arabic, partly in Chinese, partly about modern topics, foreseen by the Muslim reformists since the last decades of the nineteenth century, have seen, in spite of many upheavals, interesting steps forward, the effects of which have made themselves felt even into the Communist period. However, it was obvious too that the movement which they implied could not reach all the places in such a broad land as China.

 With the printed word

The activists, being aware of the difficulty of keeping in touch with the remote parts of the country, were willing to make use of the printed word in order to overcome the obstacles of distance and dispersal of their local communities, and to spread their ideas and programmes widely. They were particularly eager to exploit the new opportunities offered by the modern press, which had appeared in late Qing China first in foreign concessions of the treaty ports, and then slowly in the hinterland.[835] A total of 133 Muslim periodicals has been registered between 1904 and 1949 [836] : more precisely 8 from 1904 to 1919, 22 from 1920 to 1929, 52 from 1930 to 1937, 49 from 1938 to 1949, the average being 1 new title every 2 years till the May Fourth movement of 1919, 3 every year for the decade finishing in 1929, and then about 5 every year till the Communists took control, with sizes going from a few to 80 pages. Statistics breaking down the figures according to places and turnover of publication show the leading role of coastal large towns and the instability of the press: 36 periodicals or so were launched in Peking, Tianjin and around, but 23 were already dead in 1937; 29 or so appeared in Shanghai, Nanking and around, but 10 were dead before 1937. In the South-Eastern province ofYunnan, the movement got a good footing too, but the political situation disturbed it rapidly: 6 journals were founded from 1915 till 1937, but they had already suspended their publication at the time of the general war; only one resumed in 1938. These total figures may seem not very significant by comparison with the publishing activity of modernist circles of China but, put in correlation with the small number of Muslim intellectuals actively participating in the modernist move, it is not bad at all.

The very first Muslim periodical publication had a title symptomatic of the interests of its founders: “The Journal of Correct Teaching and Love of the Country” (Zhengzong aiguo bao),[837] initiated already in 1904 in Peking and aimed at a popular Muslim readership, as it was written in spoken language; as was the next journal, born in the capital too, in 1906, the Zhuyuan baihua bao [The Journal of the Garden of Bamboos (in baihua, the colloquial language)].[838] The one which has most struck contemporary observers started in December 1908: it was the Xing Hui pian [A Leaf for Awakening the Hui], due to the thirty-six Muslim students who had created in Tokyo, in 1907, the “Association for the Pure and True [=Muslim] Education of the Students in To[kyo],” quoted earlier.[839] The pamphlet was not for sale but for a free distribution, and, as the students soon returned to their motherland, it did not go beyond the first issue (or issues?).

Finally, the most durable and influential journal was the Yuehua [Moonlight] whose publishing house was established by the warlord Ma Fuxiang and others, in November 1929, in the precinct of the new Chengda School at Peking.[840] As a result of the war, the journal was compelled to close and to move several times (with the Chengda School at Guilin in 1937, then at Chongqing, followed by a break from 1942 till 1946), nevertheless, when finally it closed in 1948, it had released a total of 418 issues in 18 volumes, with a circulation amounting to 3,000, and up to 4,000 copies in the most favorable year, 1931 [841] —a notable figure by comparison with other Chinese Muslim publications of the time. It accepted articles in the old literary style as well as in the more fashionable colloquial language. It had the distinctive feature of turning its attention to social subjects, at least according to its initial program, which included in addition to religious subjects, such as modernization of Muslim doctrines and news from the Muslim world abroad, the improvement of the social status and standard of living of Muslims families. In tune with the times, patriotism was celebrated; and, a rare occurrence among the adepts of the Ikhwani movement of the capital, it stressed a reconciliation between and with the different Sufi allegiances. While after 1936 the program proposed mainly the diffusion of news: religious news from the field and from abroad, snatches of Muslim history.[842] Books and booklets aimed, like the periodical press, at educating the believers and their most favorite topic was a minute description of correct ritual attitudes.[843] As formerly, in the imperial times, they were produced by printing houses appended to large mosques, the main one being the Ox Street mosque of Peking. When the first generation of young scholars produced by the reformed Muslim normal schools returned from their study trip to Egypt—a must in the 1930s— a literature of translations from Arabic became widespread, as well as some translations of European islamology, mainly thanks to the Yunnanese Ma Jian .[844] The activists’ most constant worry was to give to their co-religionists a reliable translation of the Qurʿan, initially in the form of serials in periodicals. Here, once again there was the problem of choosing the adequate language for translation (the Protestants have had to face the same dilemma when releasing new parts of the Bible in Chinese): whether to use the classical literary language, the wenyan ? Then at which level, a high or a low one (both were possible)? Or the colloquial language, the baihua, which had been turned into the new literary language by the May Fourth movement in 1919? The choice was obviously a matter of personal sensibility, determined by the age of the translator. Ha Decheng, born in 1888, worked hard, till his last days in 1943, on a translation in wenyan, while his disciple Ma Jian, younger by 18 years, although helping him faithfully, was preparing by himself a baihua version (which was to appear posthumously as a book in 1981 only).[845] The oddest editorial activity of the Muslim modernists was the multiple reprints and new editions they carried out, always in the printing houses of the mosques, of the masterpieces of their own literary tradition.[846] It is well known that some gifted ulama have produced, since the mid-seventeenth century, works which later shaped the spirit of every generation of cultivated Chinese Muslims.

These books display a fascinating use of Confucian terminology and reasoning for expounding Islamic theology, Qur1anic tenets and Sufi mysticism (without any affiliation to a particular brotherhood). Strangely enough, they have enjoyed batches of reprints, often with the same lithographic boards kept in mosques, or of new editions, at every time of crucial national crisis. The most striking example is the “Philosophy of Islam” (Tianfang xingli) that one of the favorite ulama of the past, Liu Zhi , had composed in the early eighteenth century: since its first known edition in 1760, 17 new editions or reprints are attested,[847] 6 were released during the great turmoil of Muslim uprisings in mid-nineteenth century; while in the modernist crisis of the twenties and thirties, in spite of the condemnation of the old method of the “Scriptural Hall education,” seven more editions were thrown on the market—and sometimes even on the general market through standard edition houses, not only for the Muslim audience of mosques. Nevertheless, the book was at that time largely out of date, owing to its literary style and to its Sufi content, while the modernist Islamic trend leaned towards an Ikhwani tendency. Even stranger is the personality of some sponsors. The general Ma Fuxiang financed between 1921 and 1931 the edition of almost all the most celebrated works of Chinese classical Islam from the seventeenth till nineteenth century, adding his own prefaces, often in his beautiful calligraphy.[848] Still stranger is the fact that these editions of the Republican time, with prefaces by Ma Fuxiang for example, were once more reprinted in post-Maoist China, sometimes in different kinds of editions, cheap or luxurious, whilst “translations” in colloquial language were undertaken. These classical works, using Confucianist terms, are a sort of symbol of the greatness of Chinese Muslim identity through the centuries.

 Who were the intellectual modernizers of Islam?

It is rewarding to ask this question, because it helps to clear up the position of ahongs or imams in the Chinese Muslim society. It is certain that common ahongs are grouped together and receive negative judgments: they were those who delivered poor education to the children, those who were against any reform, those who came into conflict with local modernists, those who tried to wreck any new project. Such testimonies are numerous, though often veiled and diffuse. It is obvious too that the common ahong was not a highly respected personality, for his presence at the head of a mosque and his livelihood there were dependent on the committee of elders of the mosque: he was in the position of some high level employee. The prestige came only to ahongs with special talents and knowledge, who were, for this, invited to teach at a large mosque. We may suspect that more than once the source of their fame was their double expertise, in Qurʿanic studies as well as in Chinese classics, as has been the case for almost all the personalities met in the present story. We will now dwell upon men who have been considered as the main actors in the modernization of Chinese Islam, whether they were outside the field, as were politicians of various beliefs, or constituted the nucleus of the regeneration of Islamic education. The important point is that all these men have been recently, during the 1990s, the subject of many biographical notes, articles or books, even if they had chosen the Guomindang’s side in the forties and had then migrated to Taiwan. If they have pertained to what we may call the hard core of religious activists, they are celebrated as venerated founding fathers of modern Chinese Islam.

 The outer circle of modernists

The most conspicuous helpers of the modernist Muslim movement have been some Muslim generals, at the margin of warlordism before throwing in their lot with Chiang Kaishek and holding high positions in his government.

Bai Chongxi (1893–1966),[849] a native of the Southern province of Guangxi, received a traditional primary education in the Chinese classics, and then a modern schooling (in his biographies, there is no question of his Islamic education). He was a member of the so-called “Guangxi Clique,“[850] which accepted the authority of the Nationalist government at the end of 1936 only; in 1946, he was appointed minister of War. Defeated by the Communists, he finally fled to Taiwan in 1949 (his life has been the theme of a novel published in Mainland China, in his native province of Guangxi in 1988).[851] His support and leadership of the “Association for the Hui People/Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country” was a warfare device in view of mobilizing his co-religionists in support of the Nationalist government in war and it had a definitely political orientation.

The two Generals Ma of Western China were born in Linxia (ancient Hezhou), a stronghold of Islam where every denomination and trend has had a footing, on the boundary between Gansu and Qinghai (or Kökönor); they are known as sympathizers of the Ikhwani movement. The elder brother was Ma Buqing (1901-?),[852] who received his primary education in the Chinese classics. The younger was Ma Bufang (1902 or 1903–1975),[853] whose education was religious, preparing him to become an ahong. Both boys, however, chose a military career, which turned for Ma Bufang to be largely political and adminis trative: he was acting governor of Qinghai in 1936, with his uncle Ma Lin (1876–1945) [854] as titular head of the provincial government, and then nominal governor in 1938, and in 1943 member of the Guomindang’s Central Executive Committee. He went to Egypt in the early 1950s, was Nationalist ambassador to Saudia Arabia in 1961 and ended his days in Islamic countries. His administra tion was reputed to be one of the most efficient and modern in China at that time—authoritarian but benevolent. He used to pay a special attention to basic education for all children and young people in his province, of any ethnic or reli gious origin, supporting the schools financially as well as administratively. As a part of his educational program, he began to develop after the war a special Muslim system of schooling: in 1944, the Ruiwei Elementary School (Ruiwei xiaoxue),[855] with a military training, intended especially for his son and other young boys of his family, which afterwards expanded; a pedagogical school; [856] a Arabic-Chinese school for girls (Beiguan A-Zhong nüxiao ; in 1945); [857] the Kunlun Secondary School (Kunlun zhongxue ; in 1946); [858] the Fanghui Kindergarten for young children from 4 to 6 (Fanghui youzhiyuan [859]

Among Muslim generals who are counted as warlords, the most interesting is Ma Fuxiang (1876–1932),[860] a really fascinating figure. The top specialist of Chinese Islam in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Jonathan N. Lipman has already recounted his political career: first a loyal officer of the Qing dynasty, then an almost independent leader in Ningxia, propelled in the last 1920s into the national political arena. He was born in the deepest Muslim China, like the two generals Ma, near Lingxia (or Hezhou), to a father who chose in 1872 to side with the governmental army at the end of the bloody Muslim uprisings of the Tongzhi era in 1862-1873; he then received the typical education of a distinguished young Muslim, half Confucianist, half Qur1anic, which was representative of Muslim intellectuality in the first half of the twentieth century. He has left delicious snatches of his way of thinking about morality in letters, for example to Tang Kesan, in prefaces and post-faces to the numerous editions of Han kitab (i.e. Confuciano-Muslim books) he backed financially, and also in his own collection of exhortations to his sons and nephews.[861] His cultural activity beneficial to his co-religionists was multifarious, as we have noticed. From 1915 on, in Ningxia, a province of North Western China with a notable Muslim population, he founded a pedagogical secondary school, about sixty primary schools, where Qurʿanic studies were taught together with Chinese classical literature and colloquial Chinese, history, geography, arithmetic, sciences, physical education, hygiene—subjects still revolutionary at that early time; interestingly, as there was a Mongolian public too, Mongolian language in addition to Arabic. He strongly supported the rebirth of the Chengda Normal School in Peking and the other higher Muslim schools, kicked off the successful periodical Yuehua, granted stipends to gifted young men for studying in China or at al-Azhar. After his death in August 1932, his son Ma Hongkui (1892 or 1893–1970) [862] carried on with his father’s action, although in a less flamboyant style. The message delivered about both loyalty and service to the country through improvement of education fitted perfectly well with the ideas of cultivated believers.

An example of an early and deep engagement in politics comes from a young man educated in the new Muslim system, Su Baoqiao (1895–1962).[863] A Hunanese as was Mao Zedong, he was also of about the same age (Mao was born in 1893). Su entered in 1905 into a mosque school of Changsha which one year later became a new-styled primary school named Jiejin [litt. “Advance together”], under the impulse of a pioneer of the new Muslim education, Ma Linyi (known too as Ma Zhenwu, 1864–1938),[864] just returned from a three year study period (1903–1905) in Japan and was filled with Sun Yatsen’s revolutionary ideas. In 1908, Ma Linyi joined Wang Haoran in Peking and participated actively there in the adventure of the beginning of the modernization of Islam. Later, he took advantage of his good positions in the national educational system to help the development of new-style mosque schools: he is credited with the birth of some hundreds of them and was the author of two influential books, the most ancient reflection about modern schooling (Xinjiaoyu xue , “Schools with the New Education”) and a presentation of Islam (Yi-si-lan-jiao gailun , “A Summary of Islam”).

As for Su Baoqiao, after his first religious education and a pedagogical secondary one, he began commercial studies, still at Changsha, when in 1919 the national and xenophobic turmoil known under the generic term of the “May Fourth Movement” broke out. Then 24 years old, he appeared as one of the local agitators, along with Mao Zedong. From that time onwards, he kept collaborating with both Mao brothers—with Mao Zedong indeed, but even more with Mao Zemin (when Mao Zemin was executed in Xinjiang/Sinkiang in 1943, he said “I am finished”). In the early twenties, he managed the library which the young Communist Party had opened in Changsha in order to spread its propaganda and he himself joined the Party in 1926. However he remained a right Muslim, devoted to the propagation of a new mosque education; after the founding of the People’s Republic, he held several actual and honorary functions, especially in the field of cultural promotion of the “Hui people.” Till the late 1950s, Party and Islam were not at all exclusive one from the other.

Another example of collaboration, although beginning much later, between a Muslim activist and the Communist regime is that of Da Pusheng (1874–1965),[865] descendant of a Persian who had come to China under the Mongolian dynasty in the thirteenth century. A native from the region of Nanking (from Liuhe in Jiangsu), he followed a traditional mosque education which enabled him to master Arabic as well as Persian, and then pursued his education in 1894 at Peking, at the Ox Street mosque, under the guidance of a future modernist, Wang Haoran. How the master taught at that early time, we don't know. In 1896, Da Pusheng "wore the clothing [or the robe]" (chuanyi), the usual term to mean that somebody become an ahong, recognized as a specialist of religion. And indeed, in 1905, he was invited to lead the prayers at the Ox Street mosque. Two years later, when Wang Haoran came back from an overseas trip and founded a new pedagogical school at this same mosque, he collaborated in this innovative work. At the beginning of the Republic in 1912, he followed his friend Ma Linyi in North-Western China and, in Gansu, holding a position in the official educational system, he promoted Muslim schooling too. In the early twenties, he was invited by a group of Muslim merchants of Shanghai to represent their interests in India. There he learned Urdu and English, opened his eyes to the outside world and probably also to Indian versions of Islam. After his return to China in 1925, he joined Muslim modernists of Shanghai. His knowledge of languages turned him after 1937 as a perfect messenger of the Nationalist government for pleading the cause of the invaded nation to the Indian subcontinent, Egypt and other countries. Apparently forgotten during the first years of the People's Republic, the old man—he was 78 years old in 1952—was suddenly discovered as an ideal representative of Islam under Communist rule. Honours piled up on his shoulders and he became a sort of precious showcase presented to the Afro-Asian world under the label of the freedom of religion. He died one year before the Cultural Revolution. He is styled, at least now in the post-Maoist literature, as one of the "Four Great Ahongs, " a near institutional term to mark the main designers of modern Chinese Islam, though he seems to have held a secondary role, becoming a symbol only after the Communist take over—because of this I prefer to classify him among the outer circle of activists.

In this outer circle were also men who had not received a special religious training but who dedicated a part of their active life to the promotion of a modern Muslim education, more as organizers, fund-raisers and administrators than as religious teachers. Among them a notable personality was Tang Kesan, native of Shandong (active between 1925 and 1946),[866] who, apart from administrative charges in the government, was involved very closely in the creation of the Chengda Normal School after 1925 and of the Friendly Association of the Hui People for the Salvation of the Country after 1938. There is also the Shanghai man, Sha Shanyu (1879-1968),[867] who was proud of his Arab ancestor who allegedly had come as an astronomer to the Ming court. After having acquired a double training, as a child in classical Chinese and as a grown-up in English, he took up the headship of a militia constituted by Muslim merchants of Shanghai at the fall of the Qing dynasty, and then he entered into the world of journalism in 1914. Yet after 1909 he was fully associated to several enterprises for the modernization of Islam, as trustee of schools in Shanghai, as one of the founding members of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China in 1925, as sponsor of the school Dunhua of Shanghai after the war, and so on. Despite the fact that he had retired on the arrival of the Communists, he was invited in 1954, at the age of 74, to contribute to the compilation of documents about Islam in Shanghai. Wu Tegong (?-1963),[868] journalist like Sha Shanyu at the Shenbao — a journal of Shanghai, the most ancient of China—had been his close collaborator in some scholarly ventures in the Islamic field, such as the redaction, printing and diffusion of the monthly periodical of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion in China. Both friends had worked with Ha Decheng and Ma Jian on their translations of the Qurʿan. We must note that Wu Tegong, who adopted the pen-name of “The Virtue of the Way” (daode), championed the point of view of a pure traditional scholar and was prone to resort to the most elegant style of classical Chinese in his proposals for translations, notwithstanding that Ma Jian had finally opted for a version in modern colloquial language.

Now who were the supporters of all the modernist enterprises of the great Muslim teachers of the Republican time, who gave their money, their time, their expertise, and whose names are only known in the best cases? As money was the sinews of the success and as merchants appear sometimes in the course of the story, we may infer that at least some sympathizers were traders and businessmen, some were journalists, while some others were certainly teachers and specialists of religion.

 The inner circle

This is the group of men whose entire raison d’être was the fulfillment of a modern Islamic education in the reach of every young believer, preparing him to a fruitful life of compliant citizen and of pious worshipper. Among the first ones, were two genuine pioneers, breaking new ground. Tong Cong (1864–1923),[869] who graduated in the official system as Bachelor (xiucai) in 1904, was only active in his province of Jiangsu and, perheps for this reason, seems now to be somewhat forgotten. The notable point in his case is the role that co-religionists who studied in the Japan of Meiji time exerted on him.

In contrast, the ahong Wang Haoran (also called Wang Kuan, 1848–1919),[870] of Peking, has been respected since the twenties as the genuine founder of a modern Islamic curriculum. His father was an alim too. The great experience of his life, fraught with far-reaching consequences, was his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1905, and a return trip through Turkey and Egypt, which enabled him to see an evolution in Islamic countries that he did not suspect. Back in Peking in 1907, he launched a revolutionary cultural movement with the creation, at the Ox Street mosque, of a Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion, which included Chinese culture in its curriculum: this experiment was short-lived due to financial inadequacies, but it stood out in the mentalities. Wang Haojan was the initiator of primary new-styled mosque schools too and, at the very beginning of the Republic in 1912, of a popular Society for the Advance of the Hui Religion in China, created certainly with an underlying patriotic aim, though non-political in its program.

The hard core of activists is constituted by three ahongs belonging to the group called the “Four Great Ahongs” (Da Pusheng being the fourth one). The oldest one was Wang Jingzhai (also known as Wang Wenqing, 1871 or 1879-1949),[871] a native from Tianjin who all his life kept the strong accent characteristic of his Eastern province. Besides his religious training for becoming an ahong, which made him proficient in Arabic and Persian, he studied alone classical Chinese and a diversified Qur1anic literature. As a hai-li-fan (i.e. lalifa, in China the helper of an ahong) and since 1905 an ahong invited to teach in a mosque of Peking, his fame began to increase. His psychological evolution was marked by the influence of a journalist of Peking, Ding Baochen ,[872] an ardent defender of the colloquial Chinese language in literature, a man who would later adhere to the Communist Party and die for this cause. In 1921, rich sponsors like Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi financed his pilgrimage to Mecca and a visit to leading places of Islamic learning—Istanbul, al-Azhar and others. In 1924, he brought back to China a collection of six hundred Western books dealing mainly with Islamic and Arabic studies, an unprecedented step at that time. Till his last days, his main activity was concentrated on translations from Arabic, on the compilation of a Chinese-Arabic dictionary and, first and most important of all, on attempts to translate the Qurʿan: after his first translation into the classical language, he made another one in colloquial language which was greatly praised by his coreligionists. In 1927, due to a disagreement about the quality and level required for rendering the Sacred Book into Chinese, he expounded his views on the subject: for example, he criticized the position of Yang Zhongming, who in his own translation of the Qurʿan (which would be destroyed during the war) had chosen to follow the obscure style of the sutras, considering that Buddhism is the dominant religion of China. Wang Jingzhai opposed this, just as he opposed the idea of taking Protestant translations of the Bible as models. For him, the style ought to be clear and comprehensible to everybody. Though an austere man—in his room the only book was a Qurʿan—, he did not keep aloof from politics when this appeared necessary. Thus he was among the first to initiate a Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country in 1937, and to be a consultant of the Nationalist government in wartime.

The case of Yang Zhongming (1870–1 952),[873] just quoted, is interesting too, because, when he was a young man following the regular religious curricu lum which led to his becoming a professional ahong, he studied Chinese classics by himself so well that, at the age of 19, he was able to pass the examination of Bachelor (xiucai), an occurrence which, rare among the Muslims, was even more extraordinary on the part of an ahong. At the age of twenty-nine (in 1898), he wrote “The Essential Content of the Four Religions” (Sijiao yaogua), that is of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity and Islam. He was throughout his life an activist urging the modernization of the teaching of Islamic studies at, among other places, the Chengda Normal School and in his writings, so that now he is considered an important “historical figure.” Ha Decheng (1888–1943),[874] from Shanghai, one of the “Four Great Ahongs, “ was, like the ahong Yang Zhongming, an enlightened ulama who was educated in both Qur1anic and classical Chinese studies. His pilgrimage in 1913 provoked his rejection of the traditional Chinese mosque teaching. As said earlier, he engaged in commercial activities abroad, in a Muslim commercial society of course, and in countries with a majority of Muslims, mainly India, Ceylon, and Egypt (he could speak Arabic, Urdu and English): this enabled him to import religious books from these countries and from Turkey. Back in Shanghai in 1925, his name was henceforth linked to every endeavor of Islamic modernization in Shanghai and of help to his co-religionists.

The last so-called “Great Ahong” was Ma Songting (1895–1992),[875] from Peking who already belonged to the generation formed according to the new system of education; he was trained at the Ox Street mosque after Wang Haoran and Da Pusheng initiated a Sino-Arabic curriculum there, and from 1925 on, his name was linked to the experiment of the Chengda Normal School. His exploratory trip to Egypt in 1932–1933 has already been mentioned here; it was followed by another in 1935–1936, from which resulted the foundation of a specialized library. In the fifties, he was one of those recognized Muslim intellectuals who were given functions and titles in the official Muslim association and who were representative of the “minorities” of the People’s Republic. He taught Arabic at Peking University until he was dismissed during the Cultural Revolution; afterwards rehabilitated, he died at a very advanced age, venerated as one of the most glorious cases of the progressive Islam of the past.

Many other figures should be mentioned. One who cannot be overlooked is typical and important on several grounds: Ma Jian (1906–1978),[876] a Yunnanese from a small Muslim town sadly known for having been a martyr town during the Cultural Revolution, Shadian , in the far South Eastern China, almost on the Vietnamese boundary, a town which for long was perceived as a center of vivid Muslim intellectual life. It was possible for Ma Jian to take advantage in 1922 of the new Sino-Arabic schooling, at a secondary school which was recently opened in a mosque of the provincial capital, Kunming . After his graduation, he taught in 1926–1927 in a primary Sino-Arabic school of Shadian. But he could not help feeling disappointed with the turn taken by the Muslim new-styled education: this inner view gives us a useful balance about the alleged tremendous success of the reform. So he went to the North-West of the country, in the homeland of brotherhoods, to be in 1927-1928 the disciple of the second generation leader of the anti-Sufi Ikhwan, Hu Songshan (1880-1956). This man had then recently (in 1925) returned from a pilgrimage to Mecca, where he was deeply hurt by the prejudices he encountered, merely because he was a Chinese. In consequence, he became convinced of the duty of any good Muslim to help China enforce its national and international stature. With this aim in mind, he transformed the Ikhwani teaching, which had been introduced into North-Western China in the last decade of the nineteenth century as an anti-Sufi and anti-Chinese undertaking, into a pro-Chinese and modernist movement.[877] This move adopted by Hu Songshan gives the main clue for understanding the modernization of Chinese Islam in the first half of the twentieth century and its apparently easy adaptation to the Communist rule.

The Muslim warlords of Western China, Ma Fuxiang, Ma Bufang and others, were full supporters of Hu Songshan’s theories; the Four Great Ahongs and other main Muslim intellectuals of the coastal China also were his adepts. They concentrated on the pedagogical and cultural work, sure of bringing in that way their contribution to the motherland’s greatness; and they placed their trust in the current government. When finally the Communist Party obtained the power after years of trouble, they rejoiced, as did many other patriots of the country, at the restoration of the national pride; and they were eager to collaborate to the reconstruction in doing what they have always done: to write books and articles, and to teach Arabic.

Ma Jian’s case is exemplary in this respect. After his education in the Ikhwani convictions, he spent three years, in 1929-1931, in the new Normal Islamic School of Shanghai,[878] thanks to a stipend which may have been provided by Ma Fuxiang; and then eight years at al-Azhar, in 1932–1939, with Yunnanese financial help. There he began to act as an intermediary between Arabic modernism (incidentally modernism was not so much at work at al-Azhar itself, to Chinese students’ great disappointment) and the Confucianist culture. Thus his first translation into Arabic was the Confucian Analects, the Lunyu .[879] In wartime China and afterwards under the Communist rule, he remained without respite a hard worker, writing translation after translation in a clear colloquial Chinese. After 1949, he kept his position of professor at Peking University, and he was also a eulogist of the regime, with some honorary political positions. His role as official interpreter for Arabic in international relations spared him the worst of the Cultural Revolution; but he still bitterly suffered and lost a great part of the manuscripts of his works. Less compliant Muslim intellectuals lost their life during the Cultural revolution, as did Chen Keli (1924-executed in 1970), [880] an Ikhwani militant, who had been a student of Wang Jingzhai, Ma Songting and Ma Jian himself, and a very prolific translator.

 Conclusion

A wide range of figures involved in the propagation and teaching of Islam, from the late Qing to the beginning of the Communist era, has been met in the course of this short survey. Other names have been left aside for the fruit of their action has been of a different kind. So it has been for leaders of Sufi brotherhoods, notably the head of a Jahriyya menhuan (a sub-branch of the Naqshbandiyya), Ma Yuanzhang (1853–1920) [881] who too cultivated Chinese classical litera ture along with religious endeavours; or for the leader of a Sino-Islamic collective movement, the Xidaotang .[882] Muslim literate women could have been mentioned, so also collaborators to the Japanese occupying forces. Let us leave these questions for a later publication.

Despite the variety of particular cases, the whole story has a consistent background. All the intellectuals who have been here mentioned strongly believed in the power of a correct education as a royal way of entering into the modern and happy world of the future. All of them, at a certain time in their life, as a child or as a teenager or as an adult, received a double education, Arabic and Qurʿanic on the one side, Chinese on the other. Of course, local colloquial Chinese was for everybody the everyday language, as all of them were undivided sinophones. Their spoken language was only, for an inner intercommunication, interspersed with some special words generally of a Persian origin, like a kind of domestic slang. What they called an education in Chinese language meant, first, the command of the script for reading and writing; second, the regular use of the Chinese language, not only of the Arabic one, for explaining orally and in writing religious questions. The third part of an educational Chinese program was the mastery of the Chinese Confucian classics, of the Chinese classical literature, and, since the 1930s or later, of the colloquial Chinese as a form of modern literary language. The unavoidable modernization of thought and techniques meant for the Muslim intellectuals not a complete rejection of the past, but the comprehension of the Chinese literary language, which remained for them the classical written language, the wenyan, which lasted very much longer than for the commonalty of Chinese intellectuals. For this very reason, the masterpieces of the great Chinese ulama of the last three centuries, Confucian and Sufi though, far from being obsolete, remained or became—it depended on the reader's personality—favorite readings. Thus Muslim activists of the Republican times, particularly those who pursued their career under the Communist rule, have been the transmitters to their heirs of the post-Maoist times of the so-called Han kitab: these Islamic books written in Chinese since the mid-seventeenth century are definitely among the most enduring constituent of the Muslim intellectuals' feeling of identity, that is the very expression of their "Chineseness" with the necessary point of otherness.

Another way of voicing their Chineseness was their assertion that they loved their motherland and that they contributed in every possible way to its prestige in peacetime and to its integrity in wartime. It is significant that during the war the Japanese occupying forces, in spite of their propaganda and of their financial outlay for the young generation, could not create a separatist movement among the Chinese Muslims as they succeeded doing so among the Mongols of Eastern Inner Mongolia.[883] Now that the concepts of citizenship [884] and of a Han homoge neous ethnic group (or "nationality," minzu) are questions which have come to the foreground in the field of sociological studies on modern China, it is urgent to take account of the Chinese Muslims' experience in the Republican context. In 1925 for example, they could still contend that "Hui is the name of a religion, it is not the name of a race, Hui yi mingjiao, fei yi ming zu ye ,"; [885] and that to quote in a single list "Hui, Meng, Zang, Miao "—as was officially done under the Guomindang rule—is exact for the Mongols (Meng), the Tibetans (Zang), the Miao, but not at all for the Muslims. Are the Buddhists named a "Fomin "[Buddhist people] though Buddhism came from India? Are the Christians called a "Jidumin "[Christian people, Jidu being the Protestant appellation of Christianity], though Christianity came from Europe and America? Islam, as Christianity is a world religion,[886] but in the 1930s already, the Muslims themselves began to admit that they were a distinctive people, a Huimin, as shown in the names they chose for their associations. Specialists of this problem such as Jonathan N. Lipman, Dru Gladney, Matsumoto Masumi suspect that the crystallization of the idea of a Han nationality is indissolubly linked to the assertion of a Hui nationality, Huimin, becoming in the Communist times a Huizu —a term which implies a criterion of genealogical descent. As Jonathan N. Lipman puts it: “We may ask how the presence of the Muslim as a familiar other has contributed to the formation of Chinese majority identity. How does Sino-Muslim history challenge the hegemonic narrative of monolithic, culturally homogeneous China? What modifications to our notions of Confucianism, of symbolic exchange must we make if some neo-Confucians are also Muslims?”[887] The last question seeks to know from which side the Muslim activists received the impulse towards modernization in the way they took it. It is unthinkable to single out one influence to the exclusion of others. Potential applicants are the Japanese Meiji peaceful revolution, then the Chinese iconoclast atmosphere, and also anti-colonial and anti-Western feelings in India, Egypt, Turkey, and the revolutionary spirit widely held: all these trends were certainly combined. But a hidden hand from a Tatar Jadidist origin has little chance of being discovered in coastal China which was turned towards sea route, nor in Yunnan which was oriented towards the traffic through a Burmese route, unlike Sufi Brotherhoods which were concentrated in North Western China and were sensitive to Inner Asia’s fragrance, but not to modernism. In the career of a typical Muslim intellectual of the twentieth century the great event was the opportunity of travel overseas, or at least, if unable to do better, of direct contact with travellers. Also, the best occasion for a discovery of the outside world was the pilgrimage to Mecca, usually followed, on the way back, by more or less lengthy stops in various Muslim countries.

In the course of the twentieth century more than ever, Sino-Islam was an integral part of the worlds of Islam as well as of Chinese culture. From an intellectual point of view, its literary tradition till nowadays goes back to the mid-seventeenth century without any real severance, through the mediation of the Republican times.

 Acknowledgments

I wish to express my deepest gratitude to Prof. Donald D. Leslie who kindly, cleverly and speedily polished my English. It goes without saying that any remaining inaccuracies in the facts or in the style are my own.

 Note

[765] The system of transcription followed for the Chinese is the now official pinyin, which, inter alia, renders ts’ with a c, hs with an x.

[766] For an overall picture of the situation during this period see for example, The Cambridge History of China, 11, Late Ch’ing, 1800-1911, Part 2, 1980; 12, Republican China, 1912-1949, Part 1, 1983; 13, Republican China, 1912-1949, Part 2 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); Marie-Claire Bergère, Lucien Bianco, and Jürgen Domes, eds, La Chine au xxe siècle, d1une révolution à 1autre, 1895-1949, 1, 1st ed. (Paris: Fayard, 1989), 3rd ed. (Paris: Armand Colin, 2000); Arthur Waldron, From War to Nationalism: China s Turning Point, 1924-1925 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) and the bibliography included in these works.

[767] For recent studies dealing with Chinese Islam and its believers: Françoise Aubin, “L’islam, une religion chinoise,” forthcoming in Revue bibliographique de Sinologie.

[768] Ahong [Persian alund] offers the rare case of a word pronounced differ ently from one of the characters transcribing it down (is generally read heng). For the ahong’s functions: Zhongguo Huizu dacidian [Great Dictionary of the Hui Nationality in China], ed. Qiu Shusen (Jiangsu guji chubanshe [Publishing House of Ancient Books in Jiangsu], 1992), 761.

[769] Chinese words which are plain transliterations of Arabic-Persian originals are here by convention hyphenated (except ahong, which long ago became for Chinese Muslims an everyday word).

[770] Although Huijiao indicated at that time, the worldwide Islam, we will keep a literal translation “Hui Religion” in the names of the associations where it occurs, to let speak by itself the terminological choice made by the Muslim activists.

[771] The reification of the concepts of Hanzu, “Han nationality” and minzu , “nation ality,” “ethnic group,” during the Republican time till its official acceptance by the Communist regime, is being detected more and more subtly by a whole series of excellent studies, the most recent being: Susan D. Blum, Portraits of ‘Primitives’: Ordering Human Kinds in the Chinese Nation (Oxford: Roman and Littlefield, 2001); Jonathan N. Lipman, “How Many Minzu in a Nation? Modern Travellers Meet China’s Frontier Peoples,” Inner Asia, 4/1 (2002): 113–130; Dru Gladney, Muslim Chinese. Ethnic Nationalism in the People’s Republic (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1st ed. 1991, 2nd ed. 1996).

[772] Guangxu 32, that is, 32nd year of the Guangxu era, is the date according to the Chinese calendar of the time.

[773] Zhenjiang: a town of Eastern Central China, about 60 km east of Nanjing.

[774] For Tong Cong [pron. Tong Ts’ong] (1864–1923) and his actions: Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 704–705, 993.

[775] For the cultural leadership of Japan in Asia after its victory over Russia, see Françoise Aubin, “Le Japon en terre dislam chinois et au pays de Gengis-khan (fin XIX-début XX siècle),” Études orientales, 21-22 (2004), Special issue on Le Japon et l’islam L’islam au Japon, pp. 36-79 and Japanese summary pp. 80-87. See a recent (anony mous) article about “Historical Materials on the Unrest of [Chinese] Students Staying in Japan in 1905”: “Guangxu sanshiyinian liuri xuesheng fengchaoshiliao ,” Lishi dangan , 2001/3: 62-67. About the action of the Muslim students who went to Japan in 1905: Matsumoto Masumi

, Chugoku minzoku seisaku no kenkyu. Shinmatsu kara 1945 nen made no ‘minzokuron’ wo chushin ni [Study about the Politic of Nationalities of China, Centred on the Theory of the Nationalities from the Late Qing to 1945] (Tokyo: Taga shuppan , 1999), 292–296.

[776] For Sha Shanyu (Shanyu being his courtesy name, zi, while his given name, ming, is Qing , 1879–1968): see Ma Zhongde and Yang Zhenghua , “Huizu aiguorenshi Sha Shanyu [A Hui Patriot, Sha Shanyu],” Huizuyan- jiu , 1993/4: 95-96; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 726. We must stress that a special feature of Muslim personal names is that many personalities are called by their courtesy name, zi (yi zi xing), instead of their given name, ming .

[777] Huizu yanjiu, 1993/4: 95.

[778] A. Vissière, “Association culturelle mahométane de Chang-hai,” forming “Etudes sino-mahométanes,” 2e série, 4, Revue du Monde musulman, 19 (1912): 228-240.

[779] The basic documentation about the Zhongguo Huijiao jujin hui (as about all the following associations) is due to a contemporary of the events, Fu Tongxian , Zhongguo Huijiaoshi [History of Islam in China] (Shanghai: Commercial Press, 1940, reprint Taibei: Commercial Press, 1969), 199-200. A detailed study is: Zhang Juling , “Zhongguo Huijiao jujin hui chuchuang jiping [First Stages of the Association for the Progress of the Hui Religion of China],” Huizu yanjiu, 1997/4: 1–11, 1998/1: 10–22, 1998/2: 14–16. About the branch founded in Yunnan: Sha Feiya , “1911–1951 nian de Yunnan Huizu Yi-si-lan-jiao zuzhi, 1911–1951 [Organization of Islam among the Hui of Yunnan in the Years 1911–1951],” Huizu yanjiu, 1992/4 (49-61): 49-53.

[780] Among the numerous notices devoted to the ahong ‘Abd al-Rahim Ma Songting (1895–1992), who is considered by the believers as one of the “Four Great Ahongs” and who has had a long career under the communist regime, see Sai Shengbao , “Aiguo zhuyizhe, yisilan jingxue jiaoyujia Ma Songting da ahong , [The Nationalist and Qurʿanic Teacher, the Great Ahong Ma Songting],” Huizu yanjiu, 1992/2: 98–100; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 969.

[781] The given name of the ahong famous under the name of ‘Abd al-Rahman Wang Haoran (1848–1919) is Kuan, a Chinese translation of Ra hman, “Merciful,” while Haoran is his courtesy name; he enjoys many notices, for example in Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 951; Bai Shouyi , “Ma Lianyuan, Wang Kuan, Ma Wanfu , , ,” in Zhongguo Musilin ; Matsumoto Masumi, Chugoku minzoku seisaku no kenkyu (see supra, note 11), 300-303.

[782] Ha Decheng (given name: Guozhen —Decheng being his courtesy name used as a given name, 1888–1943) is counted too as one of the “Four Great Ahongs”; see his notice (in French) by Leila Cherif, “Ha Te-ch’eng/Ha Decheng,” in Marc Gaborieau, Nicole Grandin, Pierre Labrousse and Alexandre Popovic, eds, Dictionnaire biographique des savants et grandes figures du monde musulman périphérique, du XIXe siècle à nos jours (Paris: EHESS), 1 (1992): 39; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 966.

[783] For Sha Shanyu: see note 12.

[784] For Wu Tegong (?–1963): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 717.

[785] For the Zhongguo Huijiao xuehui: Zhang Zhicheng , “Ershi shijichu Shanghai Yisilanjiao xueshu wenhua tuanti: Zhongguo Huijiao xuehui [A Cultural and Scholarly Islamic Organization in Shanghai at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century: The Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China],” Huizu yanjiu, 1992/3: 81-86; Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 201.

[786] About the Zhongguo Huijiao gonghui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 200.

[787] For Nur Muhammad Da Pusheng (given name: Fengxuan, , Pusheng being his courtesy name, 1874–1965): Donald W. Klein and Anne B. Clark, Biographic Dictionary of Chinese Communism, 1921-1965, 2 vols (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971), 2: 794-796; Da Jie , “Da Pusheng ahong zhuanlüe [Short Biography of the Ahong Da Pusheng],” Zhongguo Musilin, 1984/1: 18–26; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 960.

[788] For the Zhongguo Huijiao qingnian xuehui and the Huimin xuehui yanjiu hui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 202-203.

[789] For the Zhongguo Huijiao wenhua xiehui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 205.

[790] For Fu Tongxian (1905–1985): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 739.

[791] For the Zhongguo Yi-si-lan budao hui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 205.

[792] For Ma Hongkui (zi: Shaoyun , 1892 or 1893–1970): Howard L. Boorman and Richard C. Howard, eds, Biographical Dictionary of Republican China, 4 vols (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967–1971), 2 (1968): 468–469 (date of birth: 1893); Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 328. About the various Ma warlords of Gansu in Republican times: Jonathan N. Lipman, “Ethnicity and Politics in Republican China: The Ma Family Warlords of Gansu,” Modern China 10/3 (1984): 285–3 16 (family lin eages: 291); Ningxia san Ma [The Three Ma of Ningxia] (Beijing: Zhongguo wenshi chubanshe, 1988)—about Ma Hongkui: 149-366.

[793] For the Huimin jiaoyu cujin hui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 204.

[794] For the Zhonghua Huijiao zonghui: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 201.

[795] For Ma Lin (zi: Xunchen, 1876–1945): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 312.

[796] For Ma Buqing (zi: Ziyun, 1901-?): Boorman and Howard, eds, Biographical Dictionary of Republican China, 2 (1968): 473-474; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 340.

[797] For Ma Hongbin (zi: Ziyin, 1884–1960): Boorman and Howard, eds, Biographical Dictionary of Republican China, 2 (1968): 469-470; Ningxia san Ma, 49–143; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 321.

[798] For Ma Fuxiang (zi: Yunting , the name of his library being his pen-name: Jishantang, 1876–1932): Boorman and Howard, eds, Biographical Dictionary of Republican China, 2 (1968): 464-465; Ningxia san Ma, 3–45; Jonathan N. Lipman, Familiar Strangers. A History of Muslim in Northwest China (Seattle, WA: University of Washington Press, 1997), 167–177; Ding Mingjun , “Lun Ma Fuxiang zaixi- andai Huizu wenhua jiaoyusheshang de diwei . [Ma Fuxiang’s Position in the History of Culture and Education of the Hui],” Huizu yanjiu 1998/4: 58-69.

[799] For Shi Zizhou (given name: Zuoxin —Zizhou being his courtesy name —, 1879-d. in Taiwan 1967): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 315.

[800] For Wang Jingzhai (first given name: Wenqing , called too Hajj Sheykh, or Wang lao, “Old Wang,” 1871 or 1879?–1949): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 962; Zhongguo Musilin, 1989/2: 2-6; Saguchi Toru , “Chugoku Isuramu no kindai shugit [The Modernism of Chinese Islam],” Kanazawa daigaku hobun gakubu ronshu. Shigakuhen , 16 (1969): 37-40.

[801] About Bai Chongxi (Qurʿanic name: ‘Umar, 1893–1966): Boorman and Howards, eds, Biographical Dictionary (supra note 34), 3 (1970): 51-56.

[802] About Wuhan/Wuchang as a temporary wartime capital: Stephen R. MacKinnon, “Wuhan’s Search for Identity in the Republican Period,” in Joseph W. Esherick, ed., Remaking the Chinese City. Modernity and National Identity, 1900-1950 (Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 2000): 161–173, especially 168–170.

[803] For Da Pusheng: see note 23.

[804] For Ha Decheng: see note 18.

[805] For Ma Songting: see note 16.

[806] For Tang Kesan (whose dates are unknown): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 347.

[807] For the Zhongguo Huimin/Huijiao jiuguo xiehui: see Bai Youtao , “Zhongguo Huijiao jiuguo xiehui shulun [Account of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country],” Huizu yanjiu, 1995/4: 48-55. About its branch in Yunnan: Sha Feiya, “1911–1951 ni a …” (article quoted under note 15), 53-54.

[808] According to the Xinhua ribao of 1938, June 19th, March 10th, November 24th, as quoted by Huizu yanjiu, 1995/4: 49.

[809] For Chongqing during the war: Lee McIsaac, “The City as Nation. Creating a Wartime Capital in Chongqing,” in Remaking the Chinese City (quoted supra note 38), 174–191.

[810] This means that conversions to Islam occurred in the Republican time, a fact which is sometimes overlooked.

[811] Information here given about the Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country is entirely extracted from the Chinese article quoted in note 43.

[812] Cf. for example Guan Wei, “Jiaoyu jiuguo sichao yu jindai shehui bianqian [The Stream of Thoughts for Saving the Country by Education and the Changes of Modern Society],” Lishi dang an, 2002/3: 90-96. About the major educational debates during the late Qing and the early Republic: Paul Bailey, Reform the People. Changing Attitudes towards Popular Education in Early 20th Century China (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University, 1990, x-296). Among the numerous works dealing with Chinese education in the twentieth century, let us quote an article noticeable for its succinct survey of the main relevant questions: Colin MacKerras, “Education in the Guomindang Period, 1928–1949,” in David Pong and Edmund S. K. Fung, eds, Ideal and Realities: Social and Political Change in Modern China, 1860-1949 (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1985), 153–183.

[813] See F. Aubin, “L’enseignement dans la Chine islamique pré-communiste (du xvie siècle au milieu du xxe). Entre affirmation identitaire et modernisme,” in Nicole Grandin and Marc Gaborieau, eds, Madrasa. La transmission du savoir dans le monde musulman (Paris: Arguments, 1997): 373-401; Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi (1940: quoted supra note 15), 205-209. About the formation of a Chinese Muslim intellectual through education since the seventeenth century: Zvi Ben-Dor, The ‘Dao of Muhammad’: Scholarship, Education, and Chinese Muslim Literati Identity in Late Imperial China (Dissertation presented at University of California, Los Angeles, 2000), 51–107.

[814] About the nü (female) ahongs and their mosques, the Qingzhen nüsi Elisabeth Allès, Musulmans de Chine. Une anthropologie des Hui du Henan (Paris: Editions de lEcole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences sociales, 2000), 235-287; about the ability of the female ahong to read Persian: Allès, Musulmans de Chine, 286.

[815] Jonathan N. Lipman, “Hyphenated Chinese: Sino-Muslim Identity on Modern China,” in Gail Hershatter, Emily Honig, Jonathan N. Lipman and Randall Stross, eds, Remapping China. Fissures in Historical Terrain (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996), 97–112, 296-299—about what the author soundly calls the “scripturalist fundamentalism” of the founder of the Chinese Ikhwan: 105–106.

[816] About the first anti-Chinese trend of the Ikhwan in China in late Qing time: Lipman, ‘Hyphenated Chinese,” 105–106; Leila Cherif-Chebbi, ‘Ma Wanfu, Nuh, Zixi, surnommé Haj Guoyuan ou Ma Guoyuan (1853–1934)’, in Gaborieau et al., eds, Dictionnaire biographique des savants et grandes figures du monde musulman périphérique, du xixe siècle à nos jours (Paris: EHESS, 1998), 2: 33–34. About the political conformity of the second trend of the Ikhwan: Lipman, “Hyphenated Chinese,” 106–112; Lipman, “The Third Wave: Establishment and Transformation of the Muslim Brotherhood in China,” Etudes Orientales 13–14 (1994): 89–105, espe cially 96–103; Leïla Cherif-Chebbi, “L ‘Yihewani, une machine de guerre contre le soufisme en Chine?,” in Frederick de Jong and Bernd Radtke, eds, Islamic Mysticism Contested. Thirteen Centuries of Controversies and Polemics (Leiden: Brill, 1999): 576-602.

[817] Dru C. Gladney, “The Salafiyya Movement in Northwest China: Islamic Fundamentalism among the Muslim Chinese?,” in Leif Manger, ed., Muslim Diversity. Local Islam in Global Context (Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1999): 102–149, especially 130–135.

[818] Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 505.

[819] Ibid., 507, 704–705.

[820] See in the Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, a list with description of Muslim schools of dif ferent levels opened in late Qing times (505-509), in early Republican times (509-512), in the twenties (513-517), in the thirties and during the war (517-524), in the last years before the Communist taking of power (524-527), in the early Communist time (527-528), after the Cultural Revolution till 1989 (528-531).

[821] About the School Mingde: Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 515; Sha Feiya, “1911–1951 nia …” (quoted in note 15), 56, 59-61.

[822] Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 507; Sha Feiya, “1911–1951 ni a …” (see note 15), 57.

[823] About the Chengda School, among others, a presentation of the institution, of its aims, of its organization, by Ma Songting himself: “Zhongguo Huijiao yu Chengda shifan xuexiao [The Hui Religion of China and the Chengda Normal School],” Yugong banyuekan [The Bimonthly Tribute of Yu] 5/11 (1937), Huijiao zhuanhao [Special Issue about the Hui Religion]: 1–14; Liu Dongsheng, “Chengda shifan xuexiao shuyao [Summary of the History of the Chengda Normal School],” Huizu yanjiu 1993/2: 61–75; 1993/3: 71–78; Saguchi, “Chugoku Isuram …”: 19-44 [see supra note 36]; Matsumoto, Chugoku minzoku … (see note 11), 303–307.

[824] For Ma Songting: see note 16.

[825] For Tang Kesan: see note 42.

[826] For Ma Fuxiang: see note 34. About his links with the Chengda School: Ding Mingjun , “Lun Ma Fuxiang zai xiandai Huizu wenhua jiaoyu shishang de diwei [Ma Fuxiang’s Position in the History of Culture and Education of the Hui],” Huizu yanjiu, 1998/4: 58-69.

[827] The Chinese characters used for transliterating the syllables of Fu’ad are noteworthy: fu “good fortune, prosperity,” and de “Virtue.”

[828] For Ma Hongkui: see note 28.

[829] For the Normal Islamic School of Shanghai: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi (1940), 211–212; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 514.

[830] For the Normal School of Pingliang: Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 521.

[831] For the Normal School of Wanxian: Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi (1940), 212; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 516.

[832] For Ma Hongbin: see note 33.

[833] For Ma Fuxiang: see notes 34 and 62.

[834] According to Fu Tongxian, Zhongguo Huijiaoshi, 212-213.

[835] See a recent article about the subject (and references given there): Natascha Vittinghoff, “Readers, Publishers and Officials in the Contest for a Public Voice and the Rise of a Modern Press in Late Qing China (1860–1880),” T1oung Pao, 87/3–4: 393–455.

[836] The main references about the Muslim press in Republican China are: Rudolph Löwenthal (or Loewenthal), The Religious Periodical Press in China, 2 vols (Peking: The Synodal Commission in China, 1940, reprint San Francisco, CA: Chinese Materials Centre, Inc., 1996), 211-249 +Chart VII in two parts; the same, “Djarida [Press]/Japan,” EI2 , 2/30-34 (1963), “China and Japan” (or French edition, 2/30-34 (1963), “Chine et Japon,” 490-491). For a list of the 133 periodicals: Lei Xiaojing , “Zhongguo jinxiandai Huizu, Yi-si-lan-jiao baokan de jueqi, [Eminence of the Modern and Contemporary Press of the Hui Nationality and of Islam in China],” Huizu yanjiu 1997/1: 16-33.

[837] According to Lei Xiaojing, “Zhongguo jinxianda …” (see note 72): 19.

[838] Lei Xiaojing, “Zhongguo jinxianda …”: 19. About the beginning of a Muslim press in China: Zhang Juling , “20 shijichu Zhongguo Huizu Yi-si-lan yanjiu shubu jiping 20 [A Survey of the Study on the Hui Nationality and of Islam at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century],” Huizu yanjiu 2000/1: 10–15; 2000/2: 26–32.

[839] See a facsimile of the first page and of the table of contents of the Xing Hui bao in Marshall Broomhall, Islam in China. A Neglected Problem (London: Morgan and Scott, and China Inland Mission, 1910), opposite p. 283 and 283–284. See also Yao Jide , “Huizu liuxuesheng yu Yunnan xiandai Yi-si-lan wenhua , [Muslim Students Staying Abroad and the Contemporary Muslim Culture of Yunnan],” Huizu yanjiu 1996/3 (10-21): 11–12.

[840] About the Yuehua: Löwenthal, The Religious Periodical Press, 226-228; Huizu dacidian, 619; Lei Xiaojing “Yuehua yu shehui diaocha [The Yuehua and Social Investigation],” Huizu yanjiu 2000/2: 95-96; Matsumoto Masumi , Kingendai Chugoku no kokumin togo genri to Chugoku Isuramu kaikaku-ha no seijiteki shokankei ni tsuite no rekishigaku teki kenkyu [Historical Study on the Relationship between National Integration of Modern China and Islamic Reformers’ Roles in Politics] (Shibatashi, Niigata: Keiwa Gakuen Daigaku JinbunGakubu, 2003), ch. 2, “Kai aikokushugi no konkyo: Gekka ni miru Isuramu kaikaku-ha no ronri [The Logic of the Party of Islamic Reformers as seen in the Yuehua —The base of the Nationalism Hui],” 19-36. See also the paper by Matsumoto Masumi in the present volume.

[841] Löwenthal, The Religious Periodical Press, 227.

[842] Ibid., 226.

[843] Some American Protestant missionaries in China who specialized in the apostolate amongst Muslims bought all these publications. Thanks to them two collections can be consulted in United States: one in the New York Public Library (Isaac Mason fund), the other in the Harvard-Yenching Library (Claude L. Pickens fund). There is an analytical catalogue of the Pickens fund by Matsumoto Masumi , in Chugoku kenkyu geppo /Monthly Journal of Chinese Affairs 54/12 (2000): 28–42. For I. Mason, C. Pickens, and other Protestant missionaries, and their influence on the evo lution of Islam in remote places of China: Françoise Aubin, “L’apostolat protestant en milieu musulman chinois,” in Chine et Europe: évolution et particularités des rapports est-ouest du xvie au xxe siècle. Actes du IV colloque international de sinologie de Chantilly (Taipei, Paris and Hong Kong: Institut Ricci/Ricci Institute, 1991), 12-74.

[844] For Ma Jian (or Muhammad Ma Jian al-Sini, courtesy name Zishi , 1906–1978), one of the greatest figures of the Sino-Muslim intellectual history of the twentieth century, there are several detailed studies: Françoise Aubin, “L’islam chinois face à sa modernisation. Le cas de Ma Jian (Ma Chien) (1906–1978),” Etudes Orientales 19-20 (2003); Li Zhenzhong , Xuezhe de zhuiqiu. Ma Jian zhuan — [The Research of a Scholar. A Biography of Ma Jian] (Yinchuan: Ningxia renmin chubanshe, 2000)—a part of this book (chapters 8 to 11 and some pages of chapter 12) being simultaneously published as an article, under the same title, in Huizuyanjiu 2000/1: 64—102.

[845] For translations of the Qurʻan: Françoise Aubin, “Les traductions du Coran en chinois,” Etudes Orientales 13–14 (1994): 81-88.

[846] A bibliographical analysis of these beloved masterpieces of the past is found in Donald Daniel Leslie, Islamic Literature in Chinese, Late Ming and Early Ch’ing: Books, Authors and Associates (Belconnen, ACT: Canberra College of Advanced Education, 1981).

[847] For the Philosophy of Islam of Liuzhi and its editions: Leslie, Islamic Literature, 46 and chart p. 143.

[848] For a survey of several of the publications sponsored by Ma Fuxiang and translations (in French) of his moral exhortations: A. Vissière, “Les musulmans chinois et la République. Littérature islamique chinoise,” Revue des Etudes islamiques 3 (1927): 309-319, esp. 313-319.

[849] For Bai Chongxi: see note 37; and passim in The Cambridge History of China, Volume 12 and 13, Republican China (quoted in note 2).

[850] For the Guangxi Clique: The Cambridge History of China, 12: 293 sq., 13: 124 etseq. assim; and in the detailed biography of Bai Chongxi in Boorman and Howard’s Biographical Dictionary, 3: (51-55) 52-55.

[851] It is “The Storybook of Bai Chongxi” (Bai Chongxi chuanqi), by Su Liwen (Nanning: Guangxi renmin chubanshe , 1988).

[852] For Ma Buqing: see note 32.

[853] For Ma Bufang (zi: Zixiang , Qurʿanic name Husein): Boorman and Howard, eds, Biographical Dictionary of Republican China, 2 (1968): 474-475 (giving as date of birth 1903); Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 341-342 (giving as date of birth 1902).

[854] For Ma Lin: Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 312.

[855] For the Ruiwei Elementary School: Ibid., 524.

[856] Ibid.

[857] Ibid., 523.

[858] Ibid.

[859] Ibid.

[860] For Ma Fuxiang: see notes 34 and 84.

[861] Cf. note 84.

[862] For Ma Hongkui: see note 28.

[863] For Su Baoqiao: Su Yao , “Su Baoqiao shilue [Biographical Notice of SuBaoqiao], “Huizuyanjiu 1995/1: 82-88.

[864] For Ma Linyi (zi Zhenwu): Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 705.

[865] About Da Pusheng: note 23.

[866] For Tang Kesan: note 42.

[867] For Sha Shanyu: note 12.

[868] For Wu Tegong: note 20.

[869] ForTong Cong: note 10.

[870] For Wang Haoran: note 17.

[871] For Wang Jingzhai: note 36.

[872] For Ding Baochen: Zhonguo Huizu dacidian, 317, and Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 705, under the notice about his elder brother, Ding Ziliang (ming: Guorui , 1870–1935), who collaborated with him.

[873] For Yang Zhongming (given name Jingxiu —Zhongming being his courtesy name, appellation Xiuzhen, Qurʿanic name Salih): Yang Daye , “Yang Zhongming shengping [Yang Zhongming’s Whole Life],” Zhongguo Musilin/Muslims of China 1990/1: 12–16; Zhongguo Huizu Musilin, 959.

[874] For Ha Decheng: note 18.

[875] About Ma Songting: note 16.

[876] For Ma Jian: see note 80.

[877] Jonathan N. Lipman and Leila Cherif-Chebbi have already dealt in detail with the transformation of the Chinese Ikhwan: see note 52.

[878] For the Normal Islamic School of Shanghai: see note 65.

[879] For Ma Jian’s translation of the Lunyu: Giovanni and Virginia Vacca, “La prima traduzione araba del Lun yü (Dialoghi) di Confucio,” Oriente Moderno 18 (1938): 184–190. Ma Jian’s lectures in Arabic about Chinese Islam, held in Cairo in 1934, were translated into Italian by Virginia Vacca, “Notizie d’un Musulmano sui Musulmani Cinesi,” Oriente Moderno 15 (1935): 353–364, 425–434, 483–487.

[880] About Chen Keli: Leila Cherif-Chebbi, “Chen Keli, Yusuf,” in Gaborieau et al., eds, Dictionnaire biographique des savants et grandes figures du monde musulman périphérique (Paris: EHESS, 1998), 2: 31; Zhongguo Huizu dacidian, 978-979.

[881] For the Jahriyya in China, the sub-groups called menhuan and Ma Yuanzhang see Françoise Aubin, “En islam chinois: quels Naqshbandis?,” in Marc Gaborieau, Alexandre Popovic and Thierry Zarcone, eds, Naqshbandis. Cheminements et situa tion actuelle d1un ordre mystique musulman (Istanbul: Isis—Institut Français d’Etudes Anatoliennes, 1990) : 491-572 (about Ma Yuanzhang: 562); Françoise Aubin, “Chine,” in Henri Chambert-Loir and Claude Guillot, eds, Le culte des saints dans le monde musulman (Paris: Ecole française d’Extrême-Orient, 1995) : 367–388 (about Ma Yuanzhang: 376-380, 387-388); Jonathan N. Lipman, “Ma Yuanzhang and the Revival of the Jahriya,” in Familiar Strangers (Seattle, WA: University of Washington, 1997) : 177–186. A biography of Ma Yuanzhang can be found in Zhongguo Huizu yanjiu, 955.

[882] Jonathan N. Lipman, “Ma Qixi (1857–1914),” in Familiar Strangers: 186–199.

[883] For a brief survey of the politics of Japan in occupied China and Inner Mongolia see Françoise Aubin, “Le Japon en terre d’islam chinois et au pays de Gengis-khan” (forthcoming, see note 11).

[884] See for example a collective work which has a symptomatic title: Joshua A. Fogel and Peter G. Zarrow, eds, Imagine the People. Chinese Intellectuals and the Concept of Citizenship (Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1997).

[885] Excerpt from the Xing Hui pian zhaiyao [Summary of “A Leaf for Awakening the Hui”—the journal started in Tokyo in 1908] (Peking: Chinese Islamic Book Co at Ox Street Mosque, 1925, publication kept in the New York Public Library), appendix Lun Hui min [Discussion of the People Hui], 25a-27a.

[886] Ibid., 26a-26b.

[887] Lipman, “Hyphenated Chinese” (quoted note 51), 111. See also Gladney, Muslim Chinese (quoted note 7), 306 and et seq.

 Main reference titles

Boorman, Howard and Howard, Richard C., eds, Bibliographical Dictionary of Republican China (New York: Columbia University Press, 4 vols, 1967–1971 + Index volume 1979).

Fu Tongxian , Zhongguo Huijiaoshi [History of Islam in China] (Shanghai: Commercial Press, 1940, republication Taibei: Commercial Press, 1969).

Huizu yanjiu / Researches on Hui Nationality, periodical (No. 1: 1990), Yinchuan: Ningxia shehuike xueyuan [Academy of Social Science of Ningxia].

Zhongguo Huizu dacidian [Great Dictionary of the Hui nationality in China], ed. Qiu Shusen (Jiangsu guji chubanshe [Publishing House of Ancient Books in Jiangsu], 1992).

Zhongguo Musilin / China Muslims, periodical (issue 28: 1981), Beijing: Zhongguo yisilanjiao xiehui [Islamic Association of China].

* 13. Muslim Intellectuals and Japan: A Pan-Islamist mediator, Abdurreshid Ibrahim

Komatsu Hisao

Since the end of the nineteenth century, especially after the Russo-Japanese War in 1904–1905, Muslim intellectuals began to take substantial interest in the emergence of modern Japan, and to develop a positive image of Japan and the Japanese people. In general, they supposed that Japan adopted Western civilization without abandoning its traditional culture, becoming one of the most developed countries in the world within a short period after the Meiji revolution. Of these Muslim intellectuals interested in Japan, Abdurreshid Ibrahim (1857–1944) was among the most outstanding.

[888] He not only introduced Japan and Japanese people in detail to the broad Turkic Muslim audience through his extensive travels, by means of his journal, Âlem-i İslâm: Japonyada intivar-i İslâmiyet [The World of Islam: The Spread of Islam in Japan],[889] but also made efforts later in his life to establish a close relationship between the Muslim world and Japan based on his Pan-Islamic (/ttihad-i İslâm) ideology and strategy. This essay is a preliminary survey of his vision of modern Japan and aims to present basic information for further research on a comprehensive subject, Islam and Japan, the significance of which is clearly growing in the contemporary world.

 A leading Pan-Islamist in Russia

We will begin with an overview of Ibrahim’s activities before his arrival in Japan in 1909.[890] He was born in Tara, a city in the Tobolsk governorate, Western Siberia. According to his autobiography, his Tatar family came from the descendants of Bukharans who had migrated from Central Asia to Western Siberia. Being an ardent student of Islamic learning, he traveled through Odessa and Istanbul to Mecca and Medina in 1879, just after the Russo-Ottoman War (1877–1878). There, he mastered Islamic learning. After returning to his country in 1885 to engage in reforming outdated madrasas, he was appointed a qadi in the Spiritual Assembly of the Muslim law located in Ufa. Established by order of Catherine II (r. 1762–1796) to supervise “Muslim clergymen” such as the imams or mudarrises (madrasa teachers) in Russia proper and Siberia, this official institution enjoyed great authority among the Russian Muslims, who constituted at least 13% of the total population of the Empire at the beginning of the twentieth century. Ibrahim’s esteemed position as a qadi caused Japanese journalism to introduce him in later years as “the former president of Muslims in Russia, “ [891] even though such an office never existed. However, after a few years of protesting against the stagnation and collapse of the Assembly leaders under full control of the Russian government, Ibrahim resigned from his office to move to Istanbul in 1894.

Outside Russia, he published articles that criticized Russia’s oppressive policy toward her Muslim subjects. For example, in his essay Muslims in Russia published in Cairo in 1900, he exposed various measures of forced conversion and assimilation applied by Orthodox missionaries toward Tatar Muslims, as well as obstacles that the Russian authorities imposed on the Muslim educational reform movement. Among Russian Muslims, he was the first to openly criticize Russian policies toward Muslims. Nonetheless, he had to acknowledge the overwhelming power of Czarism as well as the incapability and ignorance of Russia's Muslim population. Remembering that the Muslim revolts against Qing rule in Xinjiang in the nineteenth century brought about only the great tragedy of a massacre, he urged his fellow Muslims to engage in educational reform and development instead of direct opposition to the ruling power.[892]

During his travels in Europe, Ibrahim came into contact with Russian revolutionaries and socialists in exile. Probably due to his apparent anti-Czarist discourses and activities, he was surrendered to Russian authorities by the Ottoman government on the former's insistence and for a time was in jail in Odessa. According to Russian authorities, he was nothing less than a dangerous Pan-Islamist who advocated the awakening and mutual integration of Muslims inside and outside the borders of the Russian Empire. In addition to this, it is said that during the Russo-Japanese War Ibrahim had made the close acquaintance of General Akashi Motojiro (1864–1919), a leading Japanese intelligence agent in Europe.[893]

When the Russian revolution in 1905 brought about relative freedom of speech and of the press, Ibrahim published Tatar and Arabic newspapers and journals such as the Ulfat and al-Tilmid in St Petersburg, and otherwise contributed to the development of Muslim journalism in Russia. At the same time, in order to unite Muslim peoples in the direction of reform and progress he endeavored to convene Russian Muslim congresses (which were held three times) and bring into existence the first Muslim political organization, the Ittifaq al-Muslimin [Union of (Russia's) Muslims]. As one of the most active leaders in the Muslim national movement in Russia, he published an interesting essay, Avtonomija [Autonomy], in 1907 that discussed the possible forms of autonomy for Muslim peoples in Russia. He envisaged territorial autonomy for the Qazaqs and Turkestanis as well as cultural autonomy for the Tatars and other Muslim minorities scattered among the Russian majority.[894] At any rate, his energetic activities in the political sphere during the revolutionary years caused later Japanese journalism to introduce him as “a former representative in the Russian parliament.”[895]

The reaction of Czarism after 1907 put an end to the first Muslim political movement, however, and many Muslim intellectuals in Russia were obliged to migrate to Istanbul, where the Young Turks revolution in 1908 made their political and journalistic activities secure. Unlike them, Ibrahim traveled first in Russian Turkestan and Bukhara [896] to witness negative aspects of Russian colonial rule, and then at the end of September 1909 set out on a great journey from Kazan through Siberia, Manchuria, Japan, Korea, China, Southeast Asia, India, and Arabia to Istanbul. On his travels, he continued to send his reports and essays to the Tatar newspaper Bäyanul-hak in Kazan and the Ottoman journal Sirat-i müs-takim in Istanbul.[897] He was not, however, merely a journalist traveling in Eurasia. His travel account, The World of Islam, shows that his great journey had at least two major aims: first to awaken and enlighten Muslim peoples by describing real situations in the Muslim world that extends into Eurasia, and second to elaborate a strategy for the liberation of Muslim peoples under the rule of Western great powers. According to Ibrahim, Japan would play a decisive role in this strategy. Arriving in Vladivostok in January 1909, he waited for a steamship bound for Japan. Given that he visited the Japanese consulate in Vladivostok to consult with the officials, it is reasonable to think that Japanese authorities obtained considerable information about this famous Muslim activist in Russia.

 Ibrahim in Japan

In February 2, 1909, Ibrahim arrived in Tsuruga harbor, where he observed on land the huge Russian cannon made in St. Petersburg and captured by the Japanese army during the previous war. In Japan, he observed considerable reminiscence about the war. After settling in Yokohama, he began to study Japan and the Japanese people with unlimited interest. Although he did not know the Japanese language, his acquaintance with Nakayama Itsuzo, who had a good command of Russian and was probably a member of the Kokuryukai (Black Dragon Society),[898] enabled Ibrahim to communicate with many Japanese people by way of the Russian language. Ibrahim notes, however, that “after discovering that the grammatical structure of Japanese is similar to Turkish, my desire to learn Japanese was stimulated so much.” He was proud of learning Japanese, and it helped his everyday life in Japan. In this way he began his field survey to study Japanese political, socioeconomic, military, and cultural systems, as well as customs and manners.

He stayed in Japan until June 1909. This long stay, exceptional in his great journey, underlines his strong interest in Japan. Indeed, he visited a variety of places: villages around Yokohama, the Parliament in session, the Sugamo prison, hospitals, shrines, temples, the Kabuki Theater, and a cherry blossom party. He preferred to visit schools such as Waseda University, the Tokyo Imperial University, the Tokyo Institute of Arts, and schools for girls. He even attended classes, as well as graduations. He was obviously impressed by a Japanese educational system that made rapid progress during the Meiji era (1868–1912). Underlying his admiration for Japanese education are the sentiments of a Jadid-Reformist intellectual who has not yet witnessed the full achievements of educational reform among Russian Muslims.

Another favorite place of his was the press bureaus. As soon as he arrived in Japan he visited the Kokumin shinbun, directed by a leading journalist, Tokutomi Soho (1863–1957), and the Hochi shinbun, which took pride in its daily 350,000 copies. The Hochi shinbun of February 16, 1909 reported on “an unusual giant” who is nothing but “an ex-representative in the Russian Parliament and head of the recently banned revolutionary newspaper Ulfat, Mr Rashid Ibrahim (60 years old) himself.” During his stay in Japan, major newspapers reported his activities and the aims of his journey with some curiosity. In other words, Ibrahim succeeded in introducing himself to the Japanese audience, who had hardly any knowledge about Muslims in Russia.

He tried to meet every kind of Japanese in order to study Japan and the Japanese people. His meeting list extends from ordinary people to ex-prime ministers, as well as university professors and notables. Among them we find such leading figures as Ito Hirobumi (1841–1909: one of the most eminent statesmen during the Meiji era, ex-prime minister), Okuma Shigenobu (1838–1922: ex-prime minister and ex-minister of foreign affairs, later once again prime minister), Inukai Tsuyoshi (1855–1932: later prime minister), Oyama Iwao (1842–1916: Marshal, ex-general commander in Manchuria), and two ultranationalist leaders who advocated Pan-Asianist ideology for the sake of Japanese interests, Toyama Mitsuru (1855–1944) [899] and Uchida Ryohei (1874–1937).[900] Probably by their introduction, he was sometimes invited to give lectures, which were in Russian. In these meetings and lectures he used to stress three points, as described later.

First, he commented in every talk that Japanese should keep their “national spirit (ahlak-i milliye).” Comparing Japanese characteristics— such as virtue, a sense of equality among people who are not divided into classes, and respectable manners— with characteristics of the European and Muslim worlds, he spares no word of admiration for Japanese virtue. Of all Japanese characteristics, he considered “national spirit” (sometimes translated into Japanese as “Yamato damashii”) to be the most important. According to him the reason for the rapid progress of the Japanese was an intensive acceptance of Western science and technology while nonetheless keeping Japanese spiritual values—in other words, not losing their own tradition and identity. Although he clearly overestimates a spiritual factor in Japanese development, at the base of his argument we can recognize the deep anxieties of a Muslim intellectual who witnessed the decline of Islamic tradition in the Ottoman Empire due to rapid Westernization after the Tanzimat reforms, as well as the great changes in Muslim societies threatened by powerful Western influences.

Second, he never forgot to criticize any attitude of blind Westernization, especially the activities of Christian missionaries in Japan. This criticism is simply another aspect of his first argument. On every occasion he raised an alarm against the trend of superficial Westernization among the people, the so-called “haikara” phenomena (derived from the “high collar” used in Western clothes, a symbol of Westernization), and pointed out political motives of the great powers behind the missionary activities, including the Russian Orthodox Church. Here we should recognize the Muslim intellectual who confronts threats of cultural imperialism in the guise of missionary activities, not merely a Pan-Islamist with a simple irritation and opposition to Christianity. He was of course aware that the new method of conversion and assimilation through education by the native languages of inorodcy (non-Russian and non-Orthodox peoples in the Russian Empire), introduced by N. Ilminskij (1822–1891), was a crucial threat to Tatar Muslims in the Volga-Ural region. We consider that Ibrahim overestimated missionary activities in Japan due to his experiences in Russia.

Third, he stressed the geopolitical importance of the Muslim world extending from North Africa to East Asia and Southeast Asia, especially in his conversations with statesmen and military agents. It is worth noting that he tried to draw their attention to Chinese Muslims (present-day Huis). According to him, Chinese Muslims could be the best partners for Japanese who wanted to penetrate into China. Such a partnership was planned as one of the rings of his great strategy, which envisaged the union of Asian peoples by joining the Muslim world with Japan and aimed to resist to the great powers' rule in Asia by this strong union. To join the Muslim world with Japan, he saw the best solution to be Japanese acceptance of Islam. Although he believed that Japanese virtue is in total accord with the doctrine of Islam, he was also convinced that the Japanese would never accept Islam if political and economical interests were lacking.

Ibrahim's vision is clearly presented in a speech published later in the journal GaikoJiho [Foreign Affairs], as follows:

In short, my purpose in visiting Japan is to investigate Japanese affairs in detail. Frankly, before the Russo-Japanese War I knew almost nothing about Japan. Japan's great success in this war affected me so much that I decided to come to Japan. I am sure we can learn many things in Japan, which is developing day by day like the rising sun. As to our Tatar people, words cannot describe the various kinds of oppression that we suffered during 450 years under Russian rule. The Russian government has not permitted us to learn our own history. They do not want to have enlightened Muslim subjects; for example, last year alone 15 Tatar schools, built by the people's own efforts and expense, were closed down by order of the government. You can understand everything by this simple example. I will repeat once more that, as a whole, Asians are disgusted by the Europeans. From this point of view, I am sure that bringing about the union of Asian countries to stand up to Europe is our legitimate means of self-defense. We Tatars do not hesitate to respect Japan as our senior, and we hope to send our youth to study in Japan. I will never believe that our independence can be achieved by ordinary means. It will become possible for us to carry out the independence movement only when the world order transforms all at once and great changes come about in the balance of power.[901]

 The Ajia Gikai [The Society for the Asian Cause]

Ibrahim’s eloquent argument emphasizing the significance of the “rising sun” in world politics could not fail to attract the attention of Japanese nationalists and Pan-Asianists in the late Meiji era. As he was considered the most eminent political leader among Russian Muslims, his convincing words must have stimulated Japanese intellectuals. Ibrahim’s Pan-Islamist vision of a union of Asian peoples coincided with their Pan-Asianist ideology. In fact, he became acquainted with Nakano Jotaro (1866–1928), an agent of the General Staff Office and ardent Pan-Asianist, and Ohara Bukei (1865–1933), a former General Staff officer and member of the Toa Dobunkai [902] who received his Muslim name Abu Bakr from Ibrahim. Introduced by these men, he cultivated close acquaintance with Toyama, the charismatic master of Pan-Asianists, and statesmen with the same ideology such as Inukai Tsuyoshi and Kono Hironaka (1849–1 921: ex-president of the Diet). Their common objectives were to pave the way for joining the Muslim world with Japan and to bring about the union of Asian peoples. As a first step, they planned to construct a mosque in Tokyo as a symbol of cooperation.

Finally, they agreed to establish a political society, Ajia Gikai, aimed at the union and defense of Asian peoples. According to Ibrahim it was established in Tokyo on June 7, 1909, and the initiators swore an oath to keep their agreement.[903] The prospectus of the society says as follows:

Our Asia, being full of sublime and sacred thought, occupies the most important place in the world. Asia is superior to any other continent in its wide space, vast landscape, huge population, and abundant products. Therefore the first civilization was born in Asia, and the greatest thought spread from Asia. However, it is a great pity for us that Asian peoples not only lack communication within them, but also do not hesitate to oppose each other. It was this opposition among Asian peoples that enabled Western powers to invade the East. Without being aware of this defect and putting an end to internal opposition, Asian peoples will have no future. Being confident in their capability, Asian peoples with superior ethics and manners as well as sound character and thought should endeavor after the reform and development of Asia. It is for this cause that we established the Ajia Gikai. We would like to address our proposal to a large audience in Asia and to call for their participation and assistance.

The prospectus referred to the following four directions of activities:

1. For the sake of the development of Asian countries, the society studies religion, education, economy, geography, colonization, international affairs, politics and military affairs in Asia.

2. Research results are to be published in our journal.

3. Our society gradually opens its branches in China, Thailand, India, Persia, Afghanistan, Turkey and other areas of importance.

4. Our society dispatches its members to Asian countries for field surveys. [904]

It is not certain to what extent the program was realized, because the society was short-lived. It is true, however, that according to Ibrahim’s proposal the president of the society, Ohara, sent a letter to the veyhülislam [the chief of the ulama in the Ottoman Empire] in September 1910 asking for the dispatch of ulama to Japan and financial assistance. It is said that at the beginning of 1911 membership was more than 100, and three Turkish graduates were learning Japanese at the temporary dormitory of the society in Tokyo.[905] Although the group failed to construct a mosque due to lack of money, their prospectus and programs were published in an Ottoman Turkish translation by the major Islamist journal in Istanbul, Sirat-i müstakim. [906] Since this journal circulated not only in the Ottoman Empire but also in Russia, we can suppose that the vision of the Ajia Gikai was popular among Turkic Muslim intellectuals.

Even after leaving Japan, Ibrahim continued to work in accordance with the program of the society. When he was in China, noting the rising waves of boycotting Japanese goods, he dared to call for the union and liberation of Asian peoples. He writes in his account of his travels that he contributed an article, “The East for the Eastern Peoples” to the Muslim journal published in Beijing, Zhengzong aiguo bao [The Journal of Correct Teaching and Love of the Country]. In this article, referring to Russian ambition in Inner Asia, the British invasion of Tibet, the French occupation of Tonkin, and the division of the Near-East and Iran by great powers, he pointed out that without a union of Eastern peoples they have no way to survive against merciless Western invasion, and anticipated the leading role of Japan that established her hegemony in Korea and Manchuria. Although this argument was not paradoxical for the author, who went so far as to advocate a Chino-Japanese union, he failed to consider how his argument for Japanese expansion in East Asia would affect a Chinese audience. Ibrahim probably told the program of the Ajia Gikai to Chinese Muslim leaders such as Wang Haoran (1848–1919).[907] A few decades later, however, they followed an alleged but popular hadith, “Love of one’s country is part of religion.” In other words, they participated intensely in anti-Japanese protest movements.[908]

In March 1910, just after a long journey, Ibrahim and his companion from India Yamaoka Kotaro (1880–1959), the first Japanese hajji, were invited to give lectures by the Society of Muslim Students from Russia in Istanbul. Ibrahim’s speech, which presented the prosperous future of the Ajia Gikai, won great applause from the audience. A young Bukharan student, Abdurauf Fitrat (1886–1938), may have attended this conference or read the Âlem-i İslâm carefully. In his Persian work, Munazara [The Debate], which became the manifesto of the Jadid-Reformist movements in Bukhara and Turkestan, Fitrat describes Ibrahim’s activities in Japan as follows:

The Venerable Abdurreshid Ibrahim, leaving his home with only 12 rubles, did not mind the trouble of visiting as far as China and Japan in order to establish the union of Islam. In the capital of Japan, Tokyo, he succeeded in converting some notables to Islam and even setting up an Islamic society.

This is nothing else than sincere service to Islam. One of the Japanese ministers is said to have dedicated his spare time for teaching children of the common people. Although he is a so-called school manager, he does not receive any money from anybody. It seems that he pays all expenses out of his own pocket.[909]

Of course, here Fitrat mentions the Ajia Gikai. The “school manager” may be marshal Oyama, who according to Ibrahim was living in a school as a supervisor after retiring from the army. By the way, when Fitrat’s work was translated into Uzbek in Russian Turkistan, this passage praising the devoted activities of Ibrahim was totally omitted, replaced by an account of humanistic activities of Tolstoy, due to Russian censors. However, positive images of Japan introduced by Ibrahim are found in other works of Fitrat such as Bayanat-i sayyah-i hindi [Tales of an Indian Traveler (Istanbul, 1912)], and Rahbar-i naëat [The Guide to Salvation (Petrograd, 1915)].

Despite Ibrahim’s personal efforts, clearly his vision of uniting Japan and the Ottoman Empire remained unrealized in real politics. When he visited Kamil Pava (1832–1913) to consult about his project, this experienced Ottoman statesman told him:

You are a little bit late to come. If you had come in the reign of Abdülaziz (1861–76), you would have enjoyed his favor. The late sultan was very fond of such projects. In those days, our mighty navy could serve to send you with special equipment. Sultan Abdülhamit (1876–1909) also intended to send a delegation of ulama; unfortunately, our ship Ertuærul sank near the Japanese coast. Although the sultan had a goal, he had no power to realize it.[910]

Indeed, the Ottoman Empire, confronted with a series of fatal problems since the Young Turks revolution in 1908, could not afford to elaborate an Eastern policy as Ibrahim desired. At the same time, a new nationalist ideology of Turkism began to gain a broader audience among Muslim intellectuals in the Empire.

 Ibrahim in war and revolution

Despite unfavorable conditions, Ibrahim worked actively as a Pan-Islamist journalist in Istanbul. His extensive travels as reported in Âlem-i İslâm made him widely known among Turkic-speaking Muslims. It is not, however, merely a travel journal. It is a unique work that reads the early twentieth century world from the viewpoint of a Pan-Islamist ideology based on his direct observations in Eurasia. While denouncing the great powers' colonial rule in Asia, the author does not hesitate to also criticize the weakness and contradictions that prevailed within the Muslim world. He describes at every opportunity the heavy damage caused by sectarian antagonism, corruption, and ignorance among Muslims. In other words, he is carrying out the duties of ulama, who should be responsible for the development of the Muslim community. This work is an example of enlightenment literature that aimed at awakening Muslim peoples in Asia. At the same time, it should not be missed that his detailed and overstated narration about Japan and the Japanese contributed to the formation of a long-lasting pro-Japanese image in modern Turkey.[911] For example, the poem Japonlar [Japanese], written by Mehmet Akif (1873–1936), who was inspired by the Âlem-i İslâm, introduced to fellow Muslims a "Japanese virtue" that is completely in accord with Islamic teachings. According to him, the Japanese could be the most perfect Muslims in the world. Along with the publication of his travel narrative, Ibrahim started to publish Ottoman journals such as the Teârüf-i müslimin [Acquaintance of Muslims: 1910–1911] and /slâm dünyasi [The World of Islam: 1913] to give information about the recent events in the Muslim world as well as to exchange opinions and information among Muslim intellectuals throughout the world.[912] In the former journal, an article by a member of the Ajia Gikai appeared. Ibrahim also published the Ottoman translation of a Japanese treatise that exposed Western oppressions against Asian peoples. In this treatise the author says:

Once a Tatar colleague [Ibrahim] visited Japan, and made a very important attempt. That is he asked Japanese government supports to recover their independence. According to him, if the Japanese government carries out seriously its mission of leading Asian peoples, it will succeed in uniting Asian peoples within three or five years.[913]

Ibrahim’s activism was also distinguished in the following war years. In 1911, when Italians invaded Libya under Ottoman rule, despite his advanced age he visited the front to encourage the defense army. Calling Ottoman Muslims for the jihad, he asked spiritual and material supports from Japan, Java, and India through his extensive networks of fellowship cultivated during his great travel. His Pan-Islamist activities were repeated during the Balkan war in 1912. In these war years, Ibrahim gained acquaintance with an eminent leader of the Young Turks, Enver Pava (1881–1922). When the Ottoman Empire entered the First World War in 1914, at Enver Pava’s request Ibrahim went to Berlin and, from a great number of Russian war prisoners captured by the German Army,[914] recruited Tatar Muslim soldiers who could fight on the Ottoman front. By publishing the newspaper Cihad-i İslâm [The Holy war of Islam] and working as an imam in the prisoner camps, he endeavored to form the Asian Battalion. Later on it was dispatched to the Iraqi front and fought against the British army. In 1918 he worked for the Tevkilat-i Mahsusa (Intelligence Department of the Ottoman Army) and helped Ottoman citizens returning from Russia to their homeland.[915]

In October 1918, after the defeat of the Ottoman Empire, he decided to go back to his native country, where the civil war had continued since the October revolution in the previous year. He may have expected that the revolution had put an end to the Czarist oppressions and brought about favorable conditions for Russia’s Muslims. On the way to Tobolsk, however, he found miserable people suffering from a famine that prevailed in the Volga-Ural region. In his native city, Tara, he taught Muslim young people for two years. When Bolshevik repression toward Muslims obliged him to leave Tara, he traveled through Xinjiang, China, and Manchuria to Moscow. On the way, he heard news of the victorious Turkish National Army recovering Izmir from the Greeks. In Moscow he made acquaintance with the highest leaders of the Bolsheviks, such as Lenin and Stalin, and worked to ensure the existence of Muslim communities in Russia as well as to help Muslim peoples suffering from great famines. According to Zeki Validov [Togan (1890–1970)], who hosted Ibrahim and his Indian companions in the South Urals in March 1920, they planned to unite the Muslim world with Soviet Russia for the liberation of Muslims under Western colonial rule.[916] However, recognizing that compromise with the Bolsheviks could not be possible, in the spring of 1923 Ibrahim decided to go back to Turkey.[917]

 Once again in Japan

However Ibrahim found that the new political conditions in the Republic of Turkey would never be favorable for him. First, his Pan-Islamist ideology was not allowable under Mustafa Kemal [Atatürk (1880–1938)]’s new regime, which had abolished the caliphate and aimed to be a secular national state. Second, Ibrahim’s anti-Soviet speaking and behavior was also intolerable for a Turkish government that cultivated close relations with Soviet Russia after the difficult years of the Turkish war for independence. Consequently, after 1925 Ibrahim was obliged to live in retirement in Konya, where a number of Muslim migrants from Russia were now living. This “home arrest” may have promised him a peaceful old age. Starting in the latter part of the 1920s, however, Japanese military attachés in Ankara came to invite him to Japan. Although the details of this invitation remain to be unearthed, cooperation with eminent Muslim leaders must have been indispensable for Japanese authorities that understood the strategic importance of the Muslim world spreading in Asia. Ibrahim once again came to Japan in October 1933.

Ibrahim was warmly welcomed by Tokyo’s Muslim community, headed by the Bashkir imam Muhammad Qurban-Aliyeff (Kurbangaliev, 1890–1972),[918] as well as by Japanese dignitaries in a reception held on November 5, 1933.[919] According to his talk published in the Yomiuri shinbun, he had a set of projects to be realized in Japan: first, to promote cooperation between the Muslim world and Japan, which had withdrawn from the League of Nations; second, to study the current state of affairs in Japan that he was visiting once again after a twenty-five years’ absence; third, to correct misunderstandings about Islam among the Japanese people, who got all their information about Islam from biased Western publications. The third project included the publication of his autobiography, which could instruct the Japanese as to the modern history of the Muslim world and the Japanese translation of the Qur1an.[920] Clearly, he was eager to realize his long-cherished plan to bring the Muslim world together with Japan in the post-war world order.

In Tokyo he was esteemed as the most respectable elder in a Muslim community that was established by Muslim émigrés, mostly Tatars, from the Russian Empire after the revolution. Especially after Kurbangaliev was deported to Manchuria in 1938, it was Ibrahim who presided in the community. When a long-desired mosque was set up in Tokyo in May 12, 1938, he was elected imam, thus securing a key position for his grand idea. At the same time he continued to work as an active journalist and contributed several articles to the Yani Yapon muhbiri [New Japanese Correspondent], a monthly Tatar-Ottoman journal founded by Kurbangaliev in February 1932. It aimed “to introduce Muslim peoples to social thought and movements important for both Japan and the Japanese people and for Muslims.” The journal’s nameplate is followed by these words: “a unique journal that introduces Japan to Muslim countries in the world.” In fact, it contains a number of anonymous articles informing Muslim readers about the state of affairs in Japan as well as pro-Japanese articles written by Muslim intellectuals. Considering its contents and the high quality of its publication, it is likely that the Japanese authorities gave both moral and material support to the publisher, the Tokyo Muslim Community headed by Kurbangaliev.

It is worth noting that Ibrahim contributed his articles before arriving in Japan. For example, in his article, “The Eastern World,” he thinks highly of the Japanese withdrawal from the League of Nations in March 1933. According to his interpretation, the League of Nations was nothing else than a trap set by Western great powers for putting Japan under their control and preventing Japan from playing a leading role in liberating Eastern peoples under Western rule. Therefore the day of Japanese withdrawal, March 10 [sic],[921] should be celebrated not only by Japanese people but also Eastern peoples, among others the Muslim peoples.[922] We find that his argument was totally in accordance with the hard-line foreign policy supported by Japanese right-wing thinkers.

The “el-Cihad [Holy war],” probably his first article written in Tokyo, is outstanding for its comprehensive and radical arguments. He reasons as follows:

In the recent World War, Muslim peoples have made great mistakes. Despite their great losses and suffering, Muslim peoples were deceived by the Western powers and could not gain anything after the war. Even today, these powers are conducting oppressive policies in Muslim countries. Muslim peoples seem to have lost every hope as to the future of Islam. However, they must grow out of their present miserable situations.

When great changes in the world and an unprecedented war are expected soon, Muslims should not make mistakes again. They should be careful and not be deceived. In this situation, they should pay attention to Japan and the Japanese people who, like us, give great importance to moral and spiritual matters, and do not spare sincere support to Muslims in Manchuria and Japan. Recently Japan announced its own worldview, different from the Western one, and declared its intention to put an end to the Bolsheviks’ inhuman policies [sic]. This statement was addressed to the 30 million Muslims living in Soviet Russia. Therefore all Muslims should participate on the Japanese side for their liberation, and fight for the sake of Islam in the forthcoming war. Regarding this important matter, the ulama should consider what is right and lawful according to the directions of the Prophet, the sacred hadith.[923]

The argument can be considered the leitmotiv throughout his last activities in Japan.

In another article, “The Relationship between Japan and Islam,” Ibrahim again raises the alarm as to Christian missionary activities in that country.[924] According to him, Christianity and Western rule in general threaten the “national spirit” and patriotism of oppressed peoples, as seen in the history of Asian peoples. Christianity deprives them of a natural spirit of bravery and brings about religious disputes among them. It is Islam that secures their survival against Western threats through Christianity. Despite the fall of the Ottoman Empire, Turkish people can live thanks to the spiritual force of Islam. From this point of view, the Japanese people also came to think about being acquainted with Islam. Protecting Japanese from the threats of Christianity is the most important for Asian peoples, especially Muslims.[925] Although his argument is rather subjective, he clearly shared a basic idea with the Japanese right wing that called for the revival of a martial spirit among Japanese people, in other words for the protection of the pure spirit of the Japanese. It is true that his arguments in the Yani Yapon muhbiri are consistent with those in the Âlem-i İslâm. However, his arguments in the former are more radicalized and militarized than in the latter. This change may reflect political and intellectual trends in Japan in the 1930s, as well as Ibrahim's sense of urgency as he anticipated a great change in the world.

Ibrahim participated in the organization of the Dai Nippon Kaikyo Kyokai [Great Japan Islamic Society]. In 1938, four months after the opening of the Tokyo mosque, this society came into existence under the presidency of General Hayashi Senjuro (1876–1943: ex-War Minister and Prime Minister). It aimed to establish close relations between Japan and 300 million Muslims in the course of building up the Toa shin chitsujo [New Order in East Asia]. While introducing the state of affairs in the Muslim world to a Japanese audience through the monthly journal Kaikyo sekai [The Muslim World], the society also supervised Muslim organizations in the occupied territories in China and Manchuria.[926] Cooperation with influential Muslim intellectuals such as Ibrahim must have been indispensable for Japanese authorities that worked to secure support from Muslim countries and populations in Asia. Mutual agreement existed between Ibrahim's Pan-Islamist strategy and Japanese expansionist strategies. It is not certain to what extent Ibrahim believed in the successful future of Japan. As far as this old Pan-Islamist was concerned, he had only a small-sized Tatar Muslim community in Tokyo and a journal with limited circulation. It is possible to raise a question: was not the Muslim world, to which Ibrahim addressed his work, an imagined community? He died in Tokyo on August 31, 1944, when Japanese defeat seemed certain.

 Conclusion

This paper presents an overview of the activities and ideas of Abdurreshid Ibrahim, who worked for Pan-Islamic causes throughout his life. The paper focuses on his relations with Japan. His checkered career is worth examining, not only from the viewpoint of the modern history of the Muslim world but also from that of the modern history of Japan. Japanese approaches to Ibrahim and the world of Islam as a whole remain to be studied. Finally, we would like to mention a legacy of Ibrahim in Japan. The late professor Izutsu Toshihiko (1914–1993) has described an interesting personal episode regarding his meeting with Ibrahim: when he was a young assistant, he took private lessons in the Arabic language from Ibrahim in Tokyo and was encouraged to study Islam.[927] Given that Izutsu later made a great contribution to Islamic studies in the world, Ibrahim’s name should be retained in the historiography of Islamic studies in Japan.

[888] In the last decade a number of studies of Abdurreshid Ibrahim’s life and activities have been published. As to the bibliography, see one of the most comprehensive works:Ismail Türkoælu, Sibiryalı Mevhur Seyyah Abdürrevid Ibrahim (Ankara: Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı, 1997), 172. Among other places, intensive studies have been conducted in Turkey. For example, see the special issues of Toplumsal Tarih (4/19, 4/20) published in 1995. In Japan also, several works have been published. For example, see: Komatsu Hisao, “Senkyuhyakugo nen zengo no sekai: Roshia musurimu no shiten kara [The World around 1905: From the Viewpoint of Russian Muslims],” in Kyoshano sekai: Teikokushugino jidai (Koza sekaishi 5) [The Age of Imperialism (A Course of the World History: 5)], ed. Rekishigaku Kenkyukai (Tokyo: University of Tokyo Press, 1995): 117–146; Komatsu Hisao, Kakumeino chuo ajia: Aru jadidono shozo [Revolutionary Central Asia: A Portrait of Abdurauf Fitrat] (Tokyo: University of Tokyo Press, 1996), 312; Sakamoto Tsutomu, “Yamaoka Kotarono Mekka junreito Abudeyurureshito Iburahimu [Yamaoka Kotaro’s Hajj and Abdurreshid Ibrahim],” in Ikei Osamu and Sakamoto Tsutomu, eds, Kindai nihonto toruko sekai [Modern Japan and the Turkic World] (Tokyo: Keiso Shobo, 1999): 157–217. See also Selçuk Esenbel and Inaba Chiharu, eds, The Rising Sun and the Turkish Crescent: New Perspective on the History of Japanese Turkish Relations (Istanbul: Boæaziçi University Press, 2003).

[889] Abdürrevid Ibrahim, Âlem-i Islâm: Japonya’da intivar-ı Islâmiyet, 2 vols (Istanbul: vol. 1: Ahmed Saki Bey Matbaası, vol. 2: Kadar Matbaası, 1910–1913), 620 _ 243. As a Japanese translation of the chapter on Japan: Abudeyurureshito Iburahimu, Japonya: isuramukei roshiajin no mita Meiji Nihon [Japonya: Meiji Japan Seen by a Russian Muslim], trans.Komatsu Kaori and Komatsu Hisao (Tokyo: Daisan Shokan, 1991), 412.

[890] As to his early life, see Abdürrevid Ibrahim, Tercüme-i hâlim yâke bavıma gelenler (St. Petersburg, n.d.), 128. Some sources inform us that he prepared an autobiography during his second stay in Japan. However, it remains unpublished.

[891] For example, see “Iburahimushito kataru,” in the Yomiuri Shinbun (June 11, 1909): 2.

[892] [Abdürrevid Ibrahim], Rusya1da Müslümanlar yahut Tatar Akvamının Tarihçesi ([Cairo], 1900), 88. Later on its Tatar version was published: Chulpan Yoldizi (St. Petersburg, 1907), 58.

[893] Wakabayashi Han, Kaikyo sekai to Nihon [The Muslim World and Japan] (Tokyo: Dainichisha, 1937): 9.

[894] Abdurreshid Ibrahim, Aftonomiya yake Idare-i Muhtariye (St. Petersburg,[1907]), 35.

[895] For example, see “Iburahimushito kataru,” in the Yomiuri Shinbun (June 11, 1909): 2. In fact, on the occasion of the Third Conference of Russian Muslims held in Nizhnii Novgorod in August 1906, Ibrahim was elected a member of the Central Committee of the Union of Russian Muslims (Musul1manskaja konstitucionno-narodnaja partija) by the greatest majority; however, this party was not authorized by the Russian government. See Nijni Novgorod1da vaki olan Rusya Müslümanları üçüncü nedvesinin muqarriratı: 16–21 August 1906 (Kazan: Matbaa-i Kerimiye, 1906): 16–19.

[896] For an annotated English translation of Ibrahim’s travel accounts in Bukhara see Kimura Satoru, “Bukhara-yi Sharif as Witnessed by a Tatar Intellectual in the Early 20th Century,” Iz istorii kul1turnogo nasledija Buhary 7 (Bukhara: Izdatel1stvo Bukhara, 2001): 95–111.

[897] The first part of his travels, describing his journey from Kazan to Vladivostok, was published in Tatar: Abdurreshid Ibrahim, Devr-i Alem (Kazan: Bäyanul-Hak, 1909), 160.

[898] Kokuryukai: A leading ultranationalist society founded in 1901 under the direction of Uchida Ryohei (see later) succeeded to the ideas and strategy of the Genyosha (see later). It advocated expelling Russia from Asia and Japanese expansion into Manchuria, Mongolia, and Siberia, as well as a hard-line foreign policy. The members were engaged in Russian and Chinese studies, and worked in close contact with the army. During the Russo-Japanese War, it provided the army with intelligence agents and translators. After the war, it supported the annexation of Korea and the Chinese revolutionary movement against the Qing dynasty. After the First World War it advocated the independence of Asian peoples under the guidance of Japan until the defeat in the Second World War.

[899] Toyama Mitsuru: charismatic leader of the first ultranationalist society Genyosha (1877–1946), which advocated Japanese advance on the continent and a hard-line foreign policy. Until his death, he maintained a strong influence among nationalist groups. His close relationship with Ibrahim continued all his life.

[900] Uchida Ryohei: active leader of the ultranationalist society Kokuryukai. He advocated war against Russia after the triple intervention in 1895, after the Sino-Japanese War. When Ibrahim visited Uchida, he was engaged in preparatory works for the annexation of Korea to Japan.

[901] Abudorashitto Iburahimu, “Dattanjin dokuritsuno kibo [Tatars’ Aspiration for Independence],” Gaiko Jiho 137 (1909): 212–219.

[902] The Toa Dobunkai [East Asian Friendship Society] was a nongovernmental society established in 1898 for the purpose of promoting friendship between Japan and China.

[903] The written oath is not found in the Âlem-i Islâm, but in Wakabayashi, Kaikyo sekai to Nihon.

[904] The prospectus of the Ajia Gikai was published on every issue of the journal Daito [Great East]. A preliminary survey of this journal is conducted in Japan. See Misawa Nobuo, “Ajia Gikai kikanshi Daito ni shoshusareru nijusseiki shoto no Nihonniokeru isuramu kankei joho [Introduction of Primary Sources Regarding Relations between Late Meiji Era Japan and the Islamic World: Information about the Islamic World in Early Twentieth-Century Japan Contained in the Journal of the Society for the Asian Cause, the Great Orient],” Toyo Daigaku Ajia Ahurika Bunka Kenkyusho (Kenkyu nenpo) 36 (2001): 60–75.

[905] “Ajia Gikai,” in the Nihon oyobi nihonjin 550 (1911): 8.

[906] “Japonya1da Dayto mecellesi ve Âsya Gikay cemiyetinin beyannamesi,” Sırat-I müstakim 6/133 (March 23, 1910): 42–44; “Âsya Gikay cemiyetinin maksad-ı tesisi,” Sırat-ı müstakim, 7/162 (October 5, 1911): 89.

[907] In the Âlem-i Islâm : 428, Ibrahim put a document bearing signatures of some initiators of the Ajia Gikai as well as of three Chinese Muslim leaders including Wang Haoran.

[908] For the details of sociopolitical movements of Chinese Muslims, see Matsumoto Masumi and Françoise Aubin’s papers in this volume.

[909] Fitrat Bularayi, Munazara-yi mudarris-i bularayi ba yak nafar Farangi dar Hindustan dar bara-yi makatib-i ëadida (haqiqat natiëa-yi tasadum-i afkar ast) (Istanbul: Matba2a-i islamiyya, 1911): 14. As to the details of the Munazara see Komatsu Hisao, “Bukhara and Istanbul: A Consideration about the Background of the Munazara ,” in Stéphane A. Dudoignon and Komatsu Hisao, eds, Islam in Politics in Russia and Central Asia (Early Eighteenth to Late Twentieth Centuries) (London, New York, and Bahrain: Kegan Paul, 2001): 167–180.

[910] Revid Efendi Ibrahim, Tarihin Unutulmuv Sahifeleri [Forgotten Pages of History] (Berlin, n.d.): 8.

[911] We can suppose that Ibrahim’s admiration for Japan had another aspect. The Japanese image was used as a mirror reflecting the defects of the Muslim societies.

[912] Ibrahim’s idea presented in these journals is well analyzed in Nadir Özbek, “Abdürrevid Ibrahim1in ikinci Mevrutiyet yılları: Teârüf-i Müslimin ve Islâm Dünyası,” Toplumsal Tarih 4/20 (1995): 18–23.

[913] Hatano [Hatano Uho], Asya Tehlikede [Asia in Crisis], translated by Japonyalı Mehmed Hilmi Nakava and Abdürrevid Ibrahim (Istanbul, 1912): 13–14.

[914] According to Ibrahim’s talk, about 84,000 Muslim soldiers were in German prison camps. “Torukokara Nihon1e [From Turkey to Japan] (1),” Yomiuri shinbun (December 10, 1933): 4.

[915] Türkoælu, Sibiryalı : 70–81.

[916] Validov, a leader of the Bashkir national movement, pointed out that their idea is nothing but an illusion, and tried to persuade them to give up the alliance with Communists. Zeki Velidi Togan, Hâtıralar: Türkistan ve Diæer Müslüman Doæu Türklerinin Millî Varlık ve Kültür Mücadeleleri (Istanbul: TAN Matbaası, 1969): 301–302. Cf. Verif Mardin, “Abdurreshid Ibrahim and Zeki Velidi Togan in the History of the Muslims of Russia,” in Korkt A. Ertürk, ed., Rethinking Central Asia : Non-Eurocentric Studies in History, Social Structure and Identity (Reading: Ithaca Press: 1999): 111–128.

[917] Türkoælu, Sibiryalı : 81–94.

[918] As to Kurbangaliev, see: Nishiyama Katsunori, “Kurubangali ryakuden: Senkanki zairyu kaikyotono mondaini yosete”[Short Biography of Kurbangali: Émigré Muslims in Japan during the Inter-War Period], Roshia kakumeishi kenkyu shiryo 3 (1996): 1–26; Ajslu Junusova, “Velikij imam Dal’nego Vostoka Muhammed-Gabdulhaj Kurbangaliev,” Vestnik Evrazii 2001/4[15]: 83–116.

[919] As to the details of the reception see, Yani Yapon muhbiri, 12 (1933): 41–45. I am very grateful to Dr Ismail Türkoælu for providing me this rare journal.

[920] “Toruko kara Nihon e (1–4),” in the Yomiuri shinbun (December 10, 12–14, 1933).

[921] Precisely on February 24, 1933, the Japanese delegation left its seats, protesting against the report of the Lytton commission that pointed out Japanese acts of aggression in Manchuria.

[922] Abdürrevid Ibrahim, “Vark âlemi,” Yani Yapon muhbiri 8 (1933): 4–7. As to Ibrahim’s argument, of course, we find opposite ones among contemporary Muslim intellectuals. For example Miyan Abdul Aziz, the ex-president of the All-India Muslim League, says as follows: Now it is quite clear … that Japan was contemplating aggression instead of achieving her object successfully by enlisting the goodwill of those concerned. For this reason it is impossible for Islam to sympathize with Japan’s present mood. Adjustment between nations there must be from time to time, but adjustment by force and violence is not the way of Islam. At this late time in the history of the world the moral sentiment must count, and a country that outrages it must expect general condemnation. Violence is the negation of Islam, which means peace. M. Abdul Aziz, The Crescent in the Land of the Rising Sun (London: Blades, East and Blades Ltd., 1941): 69. The author was requested to visit Japan to perform the opening ceremony of the Kobe mosque on behalf of the Islamic world in 1935, and during his long stay had ample opportunity of coming into contact with Japanese people and state of affairs. It should be noticed that he never refers to Ibrahim, while describing the inside story of the Tatar Muslim community in Tokyo in detail. According to the author he obtained a lot of information “regarding the real situation of Muslims in that country, which is full of spies and suspicious people.” Abdul Aziz, The Crescent in the Land of the Rising Sun, 25.

[923] Abdürrevid Ibrahim, “el-Cihad,” Yani Yapon muhbiri 12 (1933): 29–33. See also Türkoælu, Sibiryalı : 97.

[924] Ibrahim was critical of the Japanese law that authorized Christianity as one of Japan’s official religions but excluded Islam. For example, see his speech at the celebration of the publication of the Qur1an in Tokyo: Yani Yapon muhbiri 19 (1934): 43. A number of Japanese dignitaries participated in this reception.

[925] Abdürrevid Ibrahim, “Yapon ve Islâm münasebeti,” Yani Yapon Muhbiri 13 (1934): 37–41.

[926] For the details, see Office of Strategic Services, Research and Analysis Branch, Japanese Infiltration among Muslims in Russia and Her Borderlands, August 1944 (R&A No. 890. 2). I am very grateful to Prof. Edward J. Lazzerini for providing me this important material.

[927] Shiba Ryotaro, Shiba Ryotaro rekishi kandan [Shiba Ryotaro's Conversations on History] (Tokyo: Chuo koronsha, 2000, first published in the Chuo koron, 1993/1): 479–484.

* 14. Clash of Cultures?: Intellectuals, their publics, and Islam

Dale F. Eickelman

A new sense of public is emerging throughout Muslim-majority states and Muslim communities elsewhere. Joined with this new sense of public are new intellectual styles and messages, disseminated in increasingly diverse yet overlapping fields of communication and understanding. The influence of state authorities and intellectuals trained in the formal religious sciences remain strong, but their authority is increasingly displaced by intellectuals with increasingly disparate backgrounds. The Intellectuals and the Powers. The idea of "intellectual" implies an individual claiming or imputed to possess an especially intense awareness of the sacred center of social and spiritual values and the ability to reflect and explain valued categories of knowledge.[928] In the present era, people have increased latitude in choosing who can most effectively articulate core social and spiritual values. In the contemporary Muslim majority world, those with training in the formal religious sciences remain important but are increasingly complemented by lawyers, engineers, and others lacking formal religious training. Indeed, formal education is often less significant than an ability to communicate effectively in different media and across social classes. As Olivier Roy pointed out in the early 1990s, modernist Muslim intellectuals can often choose among audiences and languages.[929] A Moroccan religious intellectual can choose to write in French or Arabic, or to record a cassette in colloquial Moroccan Arabic or in one of Morocco's Berber languages. His South Asian counterpart can choose between Urdu and English, and a Qazaq might switch between Russian and Qazaq. At the present, men remain foregrounded as communicators of religious ideas and practices, although women are playing increasingly important roles.[930] Books remain an important and valued means of communication, but pamphlets, newspaper and magazine articles, audio cassettes, videos, and the ability to master (and have access to) the broadcast media play an increasingly significant role. The book may remain the apex of valued knowledge, but its role is multiplied by discussion in other media and by word of mouth.

In language, audience, and style, messages—and those who create them—have become increasingly diverse. In the religious domain, both intellectuals and audiences are shaped by increasingly open contests over the authoritative use of the symbolic language of Islam. New and increasingly accessible modes of communication have made these contests increasingly global, making even local disputes take on transnational dimensions. Islam and thinkers within the Islamic tradition have always been transregional or transnational, but increasingly open and accessible forms of communication play a significant role in fragmenting and contesting political and religious authority.

In one respect, recognition of the role of religion in shaping intellectuals and intellectual life in Muslim societies shows a remarkable continuity with the West. Open societies claim to respect religion and religious worship. At the same time, however, in the words of the philosopher Richard Rorty, religion usually functions as a “conversation-stopper” outside of circles of believers.[931] The role of religion in public life has fared no better. This is because prevailing social theories have marginalized religion and the role of religious intellectuals. To the extent that many Muslim majority societies have failed to construct open and civil societies, the role of religion in them is often almost automatically invoked as a cause for this failure. Yet for such Muslim-majority countries as Indonesia and Turkey, religious intellectuals play a major role in furthering the goals of civil society, religious pluralism, and tolerance.[932]

 Islam, modernity, and modernization theory

Ernest Gellner was characteristically blunt in his views of Islam, and his writings offer an exemplar of how religion in general, and Islam in particular, figure in much thinking about modernity. With the collapse of Marxist regimes, only Islam, Gellner argued, continued to resist the universal trend toward secularization and nationalism. As a faith, he regarded Islam as imposing “essential” constraints on the conduct and thought of those committed to it.[933] It offered a “closed system” of thought.[934] For Gellner, the “essence” of nationalism in the West is that a “high— literacy-linked—culture becomes the pervasive, membership-defining culture of the total society.” In Islam, in contrast, fundamentalism becomes the essence of total society. As a consequence, regimes are judged by “the religious norms of sacred law, rather than the secular principles of a Civil Society.” For Gellner, Islam “exemplifies a social order which seems to lack much capacity to provide political countervailing institutions or associations” and “operates effectively without intellectual pluralism.”[935]

Contrary to such assumptions, the Muslim majority world is demonstrating a vigorous and increasing diverse intellectual pluralism. Such debates and awareness of alternative interpretations of Islam and its role in society do not translate directly into political and social practice. However, the proliferation and increased accessibility of the means of communication in today’s global society, together with the rise of mass education, has increased the power of intellectuals to communicate and of audiences to listen and discuss. Religious intellectuals, like their secularly minded counterparts, tacitly compete for increasingly fragmented publics. Moreover, far from constituting an exception to worldwide trends, the role of religious intellectuals in the Muslim majority world increasingly reflects the spectrum of debate and public discussion prevalent in other parts of the world. Some religious leaders and intellectuals claim a privileged position for religious voices, but many more accept the pluralism of competing voices. In addition, the line between religious and secular voices is increasingly blurred.

Just as modern conditions facilitate a fragmentation of religious and political authority, they create diverse publics who understand ideas and messages in various ways. Some Muslim intellectuals increasingly form part of a transnational elite, but effectiveness on the global stage comes at a price. With globalization, mobility increases for a small segment of the elite but it increases polarities with the more localized rest. As a consequence, religious intellectuals like Iran’s Abdolkarim Soroush becomes more in tune with Edward Said and accessible at a multilingual website (http://www.seraj.org), but at the risk of losing touch with more localized audiences.

The conventional wisdom of social thought remains profoundly informed by modernization theory, the single most important social theory to influence both academic and policy approaches to the Third World from the 1950s to the late 1970s, and with continued significance today. The secular bias of modernization theory had its specific echo in analyses of the Islamic world. In the early 1960s, modernization theorists saw the Muslim world as facing an unpalatable choice: either a “neo-Islamic totalitarianism” intent on “resurrecting the past,” or a “reformist Islam” which would open “the sluice gates and [be] swamped by the deluge.”[936] In Daniel Lerner’s memorable phrase, Middle Eastern societies faced a stark choice—”Mecca or mechanization.”[937] At the least, such views suggest an intensely negative view of the possibilities of evolution in Muslim societies and an inherent preference for militantly secularizing reformers such as Turkey’s Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881–1938) and the Pahlavi Shahs of Iran, Reza Shah (1878–1944) and his son, Mohammad Reza Shah (1919–1980).

In such formulations, Islam is merely a particularly salient example of the hindering roles of religion and religious thinkers in modern society. Edward Shils offers a kinder, gentler, variant of the role of intellectuals in modern thought. For him, intellectuals possess an “innate need” to be in “frequent communication with symbols which are more general than the immediate concrete situations of everyday life.”[938] Although intellectual work originally arose from religious occupations, Shils writes that religious orientations in modern times attract “a diminishing share of the creative capacities of the oncoming intellectual elite.” In Shils’s view, among Western intellectuals in earlier periods, and Asian and African intellectuals since the nineteenth century, “the tradition of distrust of secular and ecclesiastical authority—and in fact of tradition as such—has become the chief secondary tradition of the intellectuals.”[939] The notion of the sacred has shifted in his view from religious concerns to a focus on and mastery of the technological, organizational, and political skills most useful in forging a modern state in the face of congeries of supposedly primordial loyalties. In modernization theory, the present thus belongs to the liberals and the technocrats, found primarily in the differentiated “modern” class. Shils argues that only intellectuals attached to “modern” values have the vision to rise above parochial identities and to attach themselves to the notion of a modern nation-state.

How disconcerting, then, for this view of modernization theory and the role of the nation-state to see no less a committed political leader than Václav Havel declare that “human rights, human freedoms, and human dignity have their deepest roots outside the perceptible world.”[940] On the state and its probable role in the future, writes Havel, “while the state is a human creation, human beings are the creation of God.”

Havel’s statement serves as a poignant reminder that religious belief and practice are not necessarily inimical to modernity and can play a vital role in public life. Nonetheless, common to all variants of modernization theory is the declining role of religion, except as a private matter, as modernization takes hold. To move toward modernity, political leaders must displace the authority of religious leaders and devalue the importance of traditional religious institutions. “Modernity” is seen as an “enlargement of human freedoms” and an “enhancement of the range of choices” as people began to “take charge” of themselves.[941] “Secularization” thus refers to the fact that religious, and religious intellectuals, come to have a less prominent or influential position in modern societies. Religion can retain its influence only by conforming to such norms as “rationality” and relativism, or by making compromises with science, economic concerns, and the state.

 Transnational religion and religious intellectuals

By the late 1970s this prevalent view of the declining role of religion began to erode. Several nearly simultaneous but independent developments indicated the continuing central role of religion in public life: the Iranian revolution, the rise of the Solidarity movement in Poland, the role of liberation theology in Latin American political movements, and the return of Protestant fundamentalism as a force in American politics.[942] Ignored by modernization theory, these developments and others suggest how religious ideas and practices sometimes act as a transnational force, at other times in highly locality- and historically specific contexts, and most often in an unstable and evanescent combination of the local and the global.

Even locally rooted movements benefit significantly with transnational sponsors or supporters, whether emigrants, states, or others sharing a group's objectives. Opposition to the Shah's regime was firmly rooted in Iran, but the safe haven provided for opposition leaders in exile, particularly Ayatollah Khomeini, and the transnational ties and freedom of movement and action of opposition leaders, were integral to the revolution's success. After the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the long-standing vertical transnationalism of the Roman Catholic Church was increasingly complemented by the horizontal transnationalism of decentralized grassroots networks and organizations created for purposes as diverse as Bible study, evangelicalism, and social and political action. Many of these organizations have direct and significant ties to the Church hierarchy, while others operate autonomously. Sometimes with direct Vatican encouragement but often without, such groups have played a significant role in sustaining resistance to authoritarianism and political repression and freely make tactical alliances with other like-minded groups. These groups, and their leaders, give concrete form to the ideas and practice of transnational civil society and suggest the changing framework within which ideas, movements, and practices spread.

Muslim religious intellectuals, and movements associated with them, operate in a significantly different context than Christian ones. Islam lacks a central organizational hierarchy. In certain limited contexts, Muslim intellectuals and organizations create formal institutions to "represent" Islam for various purposes. Thus in France since the 1930s, the imam of the grand mosque of Paris has been either an Algerian or Moroccan, presumed by the French state to represent "all" Muslim communities in France. In Germany, the Central Council of Muslims (ZentralRat der Muslime in Deutschland) "represents" Islam in such functions as the 2000 World's Fair in Hannover. There are also transnational organizations such as the Organization of the Islamic Conference and numerous nongovernmental organizations. Yet of themselves, such organizations do not form centers of intellectual organization, although fragmented and loosely linked networks of like-minded groups and individuals play a major role in disseminating ideas.

Contemporary religious transnationalism and the diffusion of ideas facilitated by it take many forms. Some are highly structured, while others are only informally organized and related primarily by affinity of goals. Informality and the lack of formal structure can be an organizational strength in contexts of political and religious oppression.

Paradoxically, however, it is easy to see formidable challenges to modernization theory. Of all the countries of the Third World, Iran was a society that had undergone enormous modernization prior to 1978–1979. Nonetheless, revolution ensued and not political stability, with the greatest challenge emanating from the growing urban middle classes, those who had benefited the most from modernization. Moreover, it was religious sentiment and leadership, not the secular intelligentsia that gave the revolution its coherence and force.

An Iranian born French political scientist, Fariba Adelkhah goes even further. She argues that the major transformations of the Iranian revolution took place since the 1990s. A new generation of Iranians, not even born at the time of the revolution, came of age and had a significantly different interpretation of social context than the preceding generation. Adelkhah argues that a “religious public sphere” (espace public confessionnel) has emerged in Iran in which politics and religion are subtly intertwined in ways not anticipated by Iran’s established religious leaders.[943]

The emergence of this public sphere has also been accompanied by a greater sense of personal autonomy for both women and men, and debates over core issues of politics and society that would have been difficult to imagine in an earlier era.[944] Others make the argument on a more general scale. Olivier Roy, one of the first to use the term “post-Islamism” in 1992, notes the proliferation of various types of Islamic movements. The fragmented and protean nature of these movements limits state efforts to control or channel them. Roy argues that the growing numbers of “centrist” Muslims largely support openings for democratization, while secular conservatives, often fearful about losing their special relationship with state authorities, often oppose efforts to open up the political system. Public religion, reminding the faithful of their commitment to higher values and contributing to shaping public and policy goals, has returned with force to the center stage of social and political life in the Muslim world and elsewhere.[945]

 The return of religion to public life

The initial force and imagery of Samuel Huntington’s “West vs. Rest” argument has largely dissipated. One lasting value, however, has been to spur a realization that there is no arbitrary division between “tradition” and modernity.[946] Huntington’s article indirectly pointed out that “tradition” co-exists with the modern and that a number of traditions may co-exist in any given society. There may be clashes, but the fault lines along which sides are divided are rarely clear and often shifting. Thus ethnicity, caste, clientelism, and religion can be distinctly modern or can at least co-exist with it. In a word, Huntington reintroduced the concept of culture to international relations theory. Unfortunately, having reintroduced culture and religion to thinking about politics, Huntington overstated their coherence and force. Culture is composed of more than explicit ideas and ideologies, but it consists of ideas that are debated, argued, often fought about, and re-formed in practice. Thus ideas and their articulation in political practice count, and cannot be reduced to objects that wiggle when the strings are pulled by political and economic forces.

The role of religious ideas and practices in the public life of Muslim majority societies can be seen as less exceptional if the European experience with secularism is reassessed. As historian Dominique Colas argues, religious discourse was a basic precondition for the rise of the early modern public sphere in Europe and strong Christian traces remain in such matters as blasphemy laws, religious holidays, and public prayers.[947] Contemporary defenders of secularism often exaggerate the durability and open-mindedness of thoroughly secular institutions in the United States, Turkey, India, and elsewhere. Indeed, in many contexts, a militant secularism seems to have an affinity with authoritarianism and intolerance.

The role of religious intellectuals in the Muslim-majority world remains suspect by many secularists, although many religious movements and leaders contribute significantly to an emerging public sphere, calling for mutual respect among religious traditions. Turkey’s Fethullah Gülen, Iran’s Muhammad Khatami and Abdolkarim Soroush, and Syria’s Muhammad Shahrur each make such appeals to their respective audiences. Over the past half century, there has been a rapid growth in mass education throughout the Muslim world. In country after country since mid-century, educational systems have vastly expanded.[948] Even where educational expansion has not kept up with population growth, large numbers of citizens now speak a common language that crosses localities, and think of religion and other aspects of their society as systems and objects. This makes them more capable of adapting and incorporating new elements. Education contributes to systematizing religious belief and practice, eroding intellectual and physical boundaries, and facilitating connections across formerly impenetrable boundaries of class, locality, language, and ethnic group.

Both mass education and mass communications, particularly the proliferation of types of media and access to them, profoundly influence how people think about religious and political authority throughout the Muslim world. We are still in the early stages of understanding how different media—print, television, radio, cassettes, music, and the Internet—influence groups and individuals, encouraging unity in some contexts and fragmentation in others. Taken together, these various means of communication have multiplied the means by which ideas and practices are shaped and shared. For many persons, the availability and rapidly declining cost of many new media have vastly accelerated the pace at which ideas and practices can be shaped and shared throughout the world.

 Turkey’s Nurculuk movement and its successors

A salient indication of the ways in which new forms of communication and rising levels of education contribute to new ideas of political and religious authority is to follow the development of the Nurculuk movement. It began in Turkey in the early twentieth century and today has followers throughout Europe, Central Asia, and North America. The teachings of its founder, Said Nursi (1873–1960), were originally written and passed on in samizdat form because of state hostility toward religious expression in the first decades of the Turkish republic. Since the 1950s, Nursi’s writings have been published in books and pamphlets with titles such as The Miracles of Muhammad, Belief and Man, and Resurrection in the Hereafter [949] These pamphlets have “the function of explaining, in accordance with the understanding of the age, the truths of the Quran."[950] Nursi insisted that books, not people, "have waged a battle against unbelief," thus distinguishing his teachings in principle from the master-disciple relationship at the core of most Sufi orders.[951]

Nursi stressed the importance of direct contact with texts and encouraged his followers to adopt his own approach. He emphasized exploring multiple combinations of knowledge, including learning outside the Islamic tradition. In 1910 a policeman in Tiflis, asking Nursi about his plans for building a religious school, said that it was hopeless to envision a unity of the "broken up and fragmented" Muslim world. Nursi replied:

They have gone to study. It is like this: India is an able son of Islam; it is studying in the high school of the British. Egypt is a clever son of Islam; it is taking lessons in the British school for civil servants. Caucasia and Turkestan are two valiant sons of Islam; they are training in the Russian war academy. And so on.[952]

In 1911, a half century earlier than the Second Vatican Council urged Christians and Muslims to resolve their differences and move beyond the conflicts of the past, Nursi advocated such a dialogue, and his successors have taken significant steps to engage in interfaith discussions.[953]

Another element in Nursi's writing sets him apart from religious intellectuals such as Muhammad Abduh (1849-1905) and Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838/9-1897). As much as these two predecessors appealed to the learned classes throughout the Muslim world and sought to popularize their message, their primary audience remained the educated, urban cadres. Nursi, in contrast, never lost his rural roots and often employed the metaphors and imagery of Turkey's rural population. Other religious modernists, in contrast, distanced themselves from popular belief and rhetorical styles. Nursi was familiar with the structure and content of modern scientific knowledge, but he also recognized the value of fable and metaphor in shaping his message. They facilitated understandings of his message in different social and historical contexts. Thus in the early part of Nursi's career, his writings and messages were listened to by audiences rather than read, either directly by Nursi to his disciples or by “persons who had already acquired religious prestige.” Moreover, in spite of the “official terror and persecution” carried out against those caught reading and teaching books in the old (Arabic) alphabet in the 1920s and 1930s, the practices continued.[954] The Risale-i Nur, the collection of Nursi’s principal writings, was first disseminated by “thousands” of women and men, young and old, making copies by hand, and by 1946 or 1947 through the use of a duplicating machine.[955] After 1956, when Nursi’s books were taken off the banned list and published in modern Turkish, readers were added to his audience—those whose primary contact with the Risale-i Nur was not necessarily the face-to-face or hand-to-hand contact of an earlier era.[956]

The Risale-i Nur is modern in the sense that its texts encourage reflection on ideas of society and nation. In countries other than Turkey, religious intellectuals also spoke of constitutionalism, justice, and the relation of Islamic belief to modern science, morality, public responsibilities, and the application of faith to public life and spiritual development. Moreover, Said Nursi made a distinctive contribution to the sense of public space in his post-1923 writings. The Syrian translator of his writings, Said Ramadan al-Buti, uses exegesis to reach this conclusion, reflecting on the disjunction in Said’s career between his early political activism and his post-1923 writings and activities. These writings encouraged reasoned reflection and action on core ethical and religious values without prescribing particular, context-specific political action.[957] More so than many of his contemporaries, Nursi’s message was accessible not only to religiously oriented educated cadres but also to the less educated, who saw in Said’s message a means of integrating faith with modernity, nationalism, and social revitalization.

The other defining feature of his message, especially in the earlier part of this century, was its success in articulating with the conditions of Turkish society, especially rural Turkish society, when the hold of local leaders was rapidly giving way to an increasingly effective state apparatus, improved communications, and centralization. The message was sufficiently adaptable in structure and content, however, so that it subsequently articulated with the Turkey of later eras and, increasingly, to an international audience. Nursi’s work is now communicated in multiple languages and publications and through a multilingual website (www.nesil.com.tr/). Nursi’s style is readily accessible to these multiple audiences, and women are taking an increasingly active role in promoting the message. For some readers, the specifics of Turkish historical development help explain the nuances of certain passages and the context for which they were originally intended. For others, however, the rich metaphors and imagery offer a point of departure for religious understanding that requires only minimal familiarity with the specifics of the times and places in Turkey where the various elements of the Risale-i Nur first came into existence.

In the current era, the Nurculuk movement has succeeded in attracting significant followers from all social classes in Turkey. Fethullah Gülen (b. 1938), a leading contemporary disciple of Nursi, articulates the views of one of the two major clusters of those inspired by Nursi's teachings. Like Nursi, Gülen's interpretation of Islamic values offers a union between religion and science, and tradition and modernity, stressing the compatibility of Islamic ideas and practices with Turkish nationalism, education, and the market economy.[958] Gülen's followers control a complex web of businesses and broadcast and print media. The movement has over 550 schools in Turkey and the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, especially Central Asia. Within Turkey, the only religious classes are those prescribed by the Turkish national curriculum. The schools do not promote any particular interpretation of Islam, but rather instill a morality and sense of discipline intended to pervade private conduct and public life. In Turkey, the curriculum strictly follows state guidelines. Elsewhere, English is the language of instruction and religion is not taught at all. Gülen also advocates a public role for women in society. To the consternation both of conservative Muslims and Turkey's secular elite, he has stated that the wearing of the headscarf by women is a matter of personal choice, not one prescribed by faith. One need not visit Turkey to learn more about Gülen's views, for they are available on websites in English and Turkish (www.fgulen.org and www.m-fgulen.org).

The businessmen, teachers, journalists, students, and others to whom his message appeals stress the combination of knowledge and discipline for spiritual and personal growth. Less a centralized network than loosely affiliated clusters of organizations, those inspired by Gülen's ideas stress discipline and dialogue.[959] The use of reason and acquisition of knowledge is stressed within Turkey itself, and this is combined with highly publicized and sustained dialogues with Christian and Jewish religious leaders, stressing tolerance, electoral politics, moderation, and participation in a market economy.

In spite of efforts of some elements of Turkey's militantly secularist elite to consider all those who advocate a public role for religious expression as antidemocratic "fundamentalists," most Turks consider Islam an integral part of their social identity. Indeed, the "background" understandings of Islam are on the side of Gülen and others who see Islam as a religion of dialogue, tolerance, and reason. In televised chat shows, interviews, and occasional sermons, Gülen has spoken about Islam and science, democracy, modernity, religious and ideological tolerance, the importance of education, and current events. In this respect, rising educational levels, strengthened ties between Turks living in Turkey and in Europe, and the proliferation of media and the means of communication favor these more open interpretations. Public opinion polling is still in its infancy in Turkey and the Middle East, but available data suggest a growing openness of interpretation. For example, in 1992, 1993, and 1994 a sample of rural and urban Turks (N = 1, 363) was asked whether Turkey was "Muslim," "European," or "both." Roughly the same number, 20–21%, said "European" in all three years. The number who said that Turkey was primarily Muslim, however, declined from 37% in 1992 to 25% in 1994, while the number who answered "both" increased from 25% to 36%.[960]

More recently, a survey conducted by Tesev, a Turkish think tank, found that 97% of those questioned identified themselves as Muslim, 92% said they fasted during the holy month of Ramadan, and 46% claimed to pray five times a day. But 91% also said different religious beliefs should be respected, and clear majorities thought it did not matter if Muslims consumed alcohol, failed to fast or pray or, if they were women, went outside without covering their heads. Only 21% called for an Islamic state, and once the implications were pointed out to them, some were not so sure.[961]

The Turkish experience does not represent the entire Muslim world, but it serves as a reminder of the diversity of the Muslim experience, both among intellectual formulations of Islamic thought, and the practical, implicit shared understandings of large numbers of people.

 Islamic modernity, Syrian style

Civil engineer Muhammad Shahrur’s 800-page long first book, al-Kitab wa al-Qur1an: Qiraa mua sira [The Book and the Qur1an: A Contemporary Interpretation], has sold tens of thousands of copies throughout the Arab world in both authorized (Damascus and Beirut) and pirate (Cairo) editions.[962] The book is widely circulated by photocopy elsewhere (including Saudi Arabia), in spite of the fact that its circulation has been banned or discouraged.

Books such as Shahrur’s could not have been imagined before there were large numbers of people able to read it and understand its advocacy of the need to reinterpret ideas of religious authority and tradition and apply Islamic precepts to contemporary society. Yet resistance to such challenges to established authority has also been intense.

Shahrur draws an analogy between the Copernican revolution and Qur1anic interpretation, which he says has been shackled for centuries by the conventions of medieval jurists, who had mastered the craft of chaining authoritative commentaries to prior authoritative ones and of creating chains (silsilas), of traditions of authoritative learning:

People believed for a long time that the sun revolved around the earth, but they were unable to explain some phenomena derived from this assumption until one person, human like themselves, said, “The opposite is true: The earth revolves around the sun.” … After a quarter of a century of study and reflection, it dawned on me that we Muslims are shackled by prejudices (musallimat), some of which are completely opposite the [correct perspective].[963]

Shahrur’s ideas directly challenge the authoritative tradition of Quranic exegesis (tafsir) and Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh). The subtitle of his first book—”a contemporary interpretation”—uses the term qiraa, which can mean either reading or interpretation, rather than the term tafsir, which directly evokes the established conventions of traditional Islamic learning from which Shahrur advocates a decisive break. For many Muslims and established men of religious learning, Shahrur argues that traditional disciplines of learning such as tafsir have implicitly acquired an authority equal to that of the Quran itself, except that the juridical tradition says little about tyranny, absolutism, and democracy.[964] Such ideas are at the center of an emerging social imaginary.

Because Shahrur's ideas pose such basic challenges to existing authority, he has been attacked in Friday sermons in Damascus and elsewhere, even though one leading legal scholar, Wael Hallaq, recently wrote that Shahrur's efforts to reformulate Islamic jurisprudence are the "most convincing" of all contemporary thinkers.[965] The appeal of Shahrur's ideas and the speed at which knowledge of his first book spread in the early 1990s is remarkable. Prior to 1998, his primary means of communication was the book, an unadorned means of persuasion that appeals to a growing educated middle class and continues to represent the pinnacle of knowledge to others. Beginning in 1997, he spoke on several public occasions in Syria, spoke several times in the US, and more recently (January-May 2000), participated in a weekly religious program on an Egyptian satellite channel, Nile TV, that discussed The Book and the Quran chapter by chapter.

Shahrur is not alone in attacking conventional religious wisdom and the intolerant certainties of religious radicals. Others also argue for a constant and open reinterpretation of how sacred texts apply to social and political life. Another Syrian thinker, the secularist Sadiq Jalal al-Azm, for instance, does the same. A debate between al-Azm and Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a conservative religious intellectual, was broadcast on al-Jazeera Satellite TV (Qatar) on May 27, 1997. For the first time in the memory of many viewers, the religious conservative came across as the weaker, more defensive voice. A similar debate took place in December 1997 on the same program between Nasir Hamid Abu Zayd and the Egyptian religious thinker, Muhammad Imara. Such discussions are unlikely to be rebroadcast on state-controlled television in most Arab nations, where programming on religious and political themes is generally cautious. Nevertheless, satellite technology and videotape render traditional censorship ineffective. Tapes of these broadcasts circulate from hand to hand in Morocco, Oman, Syria, Egypt, and elsewhere. Indeed, the format of satellite technology has begun to influence the format of books, in which scholars with contrasting views present their ideas. Recent titles in this style include Islam and Modernity and What is Globalism? [966]

 Conclusion

As a result of direct and broad access to the printed, broadcast, and taped word, more and more Muslims take it upon themselves to interpret Islam’s classical and modern texts. Much has been made of the “opening up” (infitah) of the economies of many Muslim countries, allowing “market forces” to reshape economies, no matter how painful the consequences in the short run. In a similar way, intellectual market forces support some forms of religious innovation and activity over others. The result is a collapse of earlier, hierarchical notions of religious authority based on claims to the mastery of fixed bodies of religious texts. Even when there are state-appointed religious authorities—as in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and some of the Central Asian republics— there no longer is any guarantee that their word will be heeded, or even that the religious authorities themselves will follow the lead of the regime.

Thinkers such as Fethullah Gülen, Muhammad Shahrur, and others are redrawing the boundaries of public and religious life in the Muslim-majority world by challenging religious authority, yet the replacement they suggest is a constructive fragmentation. With the advent of mass higher education has come an objectifi-cation of Islamic tradition in the eyes of many believers, so that questions such as “What is Islam?” “How does it apply to the conduct of my life?” and “What are the principles of faith?” are foregrounded in the consciousness of many believers and explicitly discussed. These objectified understandings have irrevocably transformed Muslim relations to sacred authority. Of crucial importance in this process has been a “democratization” of the politics of religious authority and the development of a standardized language inculcated by mass higher education, the mass media, travel, and labor migration. This has led to an opening up of the political process and heightened competition for the mantles of political and religious authority.

The impact of modern mass education is pervasive, but not necessarily in the ways intended by state authorities. Students are taught about the unity of Muslim thought and practice in a set national curriculum that includes Islamic studies as one subject among many. Even while teaching that Islam permeates all aspects of life, the formal principles of Islamic doctrine and practice are compartmentalized and made an object of study. The traditionally educated religious authorities sometimes adapt to this form of education, but some resist it. Without fanfare, the notion of Islam as dialogue, tolerance, and civil debate is gaining ground.

A new sense of public is emerging throughout Muslim-majority states and Muslim communities elsewhere. It is shaped by increasingly open contests over the use of the symbolic language of Islam. New and accessible modes of communication have made these contests increasingly global, so that even local issues take on trans-national dimensions. Muslims, of course, act not just as Muslims but according to class interests, out of a sense of nationalism, on behalf of tribal or family networks, and from all the diverse motives which characterize human endeavor. Increasingly, however, large numbers of Muslims explain their goals in terms of the normative language of Islam, and look to those intellectuals who can frame arguments in these terms.

This distinctly public sphere exists at the intersections of religious, political, and social life and contributes to the creation of civil society. People in Muslim majority societies have access to contemporary forms of communication that range from the press and broadcast media to fax machines, audio and video cassettes, from the telephone to the Internet. Like Christians, Hindus, Jews, Sikhs, and others, thinkers and activists in Muslim majority societies have more rapid and flexible ways of building and sustaining contact with constituencies than was available in earlier decades. These new media in new hands reverse the asymmetries of the earlier mass media revolution, when state authorities initially dominated radio and television. This combination of new media and new contributors to religious and political debates fosters awareness on the part of all actors of the diverse ways in which Islam and Islamic values can be created. It feeds into new senses of a public space that is discursive, performative, and participative, and not confined to formal institutions recognized by state authorities.

Publicly shared ideas of community, identity, and leadership take new shapes in such engagements, even as many communities and authorities claim an unchanged continuity with the past. Mass education, so important in the development of nationalism in an earlier era, and a proliferation of media and means of communication have multiplied the possibilities for creating communities and networks among them, dissolving prior barriers of space and distance and opening new grounds for interaction and mutual recognition.

In the present era, to paraphrase the Sudanese religious intellectual Hasan Turabi, an alim or religious intellectual is as likely to be an engineer or doctor as a religious scholar. Just as the new media have blurred the line between public and private, so has the modern era blurred the assumed hard and fast line between religion and politics. The prevailing secularist bias of prevalent theories of society has alternatively marginalized religious forces and religious intellectuals or has demonized them. Far from being resistant to modernity, the Muslim-majority world is as open to it as any other region of the world, even if the paths to modernity are multiple.[967] We live in a world in which an Islamic intellectual such as Fethullah Gülen meets popes and patriarchs, advocating diversity and tolerance in the public sphere more than many of his secular counterparts, and yet at the same time arguing that Islam is thoroughly compatible with an enlightened Turkish nationalism. Far from compromising the public sphere, religious movements and religious intellectuals can advocate compromise and a mutual agreement to persuade by words rather than by force. Contemporary religious intellectuals may claim strong links with the past, but their practice conveys significantly modern ideas of person, authority, and responsibility.

[928] Edward Shils, The Intellectuals and the Powers (Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1973), 3.

[929] Olivier Roy, L1Échec de l1islam politique (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1992), 37.

[930] Azam Torab, “Piety as Gendered Agency: A Study of Jalaseh Ritual Discourse in an Urban Neighbourhood in Iran,” Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute (N.S.) 2/2 (1996): 235–252.

[931] Richard Rorty, cited in John Keane, “The Limits of Secularism,” Times Literary Supplement, January 9, 1998: 12.

[932] For Indonesia, see Robert W. Hefner, Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000). For Turkey, see Bülent Aras, “Turkish Islam’s Moderate Face,” Middle East Quarterly 5/3 (September 1998): 23–30.

[933] Cited in John Davis, “An Interview with Ernest Gellner,” Current Anthropology 12/1 (1991), 71.

[934] Ibid., 69.

[935] Ernest Gellner, Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1994), especially 22, 29. For a further discussion of Gellner’s views, see Dale F. Eickelman, “From Here to Modernity: Ernest Gellner on Nationalism and Islamic Fundamentalism,” in John A. Hall, ed., Ernest Gellner and the Theory of Nationalism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998): 258-271. In contrast, Augustus Richard Norton, “Introduction,” in Augustus R. Norton, ed., Civil Society in the Middle East (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 25, argues vigorously that civil society is “theoretically, conceptually, normatively, and ontologically” as much a part of political discourse in the Middle East as it is elsewhere in the world.

[936] Manfred Halpern, The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1963), 129.

[937] Daniel Lerner, The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East (New York: Free Press, 1964 [orig. 1958]), 405.

[938] Shils, Intellectuals, 16.

[939] Ibid., 17.

[940] Václav Havel, “Kosovo and the End of the Nation-State,” New York Review of Books, June 10, 1999, 4-6.

[941] Triloki N. Madan, “Secularism in Its Place,” Journal of Asian Studies 6 (1987), 748.

[942] José Casanova, Public Religions in the Modern World (Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1994).

[943] Fariba Adelkhah, Être moderne en Iran (Paris: Karthala, 1998), 152-247, and Farhad Khosrokhavar and Olivier Roy, Iran: comment sortir d1une révolution religieuse (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1999), 143–205.

[944] See Ziba Mir-Hosseini, Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999).

[945] Robert Wuthnow, Producing the Sacred: An Essay on Public Religion (Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1994).

[946] Samuel Huntington, “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72/3 (1993): 22–49. See Dale F. Eickelman, “Muslim Politics:

The Prospects for Democracy in North Africa and the Middle East," in John Entelis, ed., Islam, Democracy, and the State in North Africa (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1997), 35–38, for a critique of Huntington's approach.

[947] Dominique Colas, Civil Society and Fanaticism: Conjoined Histories, trans. Amy Jacobs (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1997), and Keane, "Limits of Secularism," 12.

[948] Dale F. Eickelman, "Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies," American Ethnologist 19/4: 643-655; and Dale F. Eickelman, "Islam and the Languages of Modernity," Daedalus 129/1 (2000): 119–135.

[949] Said Nursi, The Miracles of Muhammad, translated from the Turkish by Ümit Vimvek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yayinlari, 1985); Said Nursi, Belief and Man, translated from the Turkish by Ümit Vimvek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yayinlari, 1985); and Said Nursi, Resurrection and the Hereafter, translated from the Turkish by Ümit Vimvek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yayinlari, 1985).

[950] Said Nursi, Nature: Cause or Effect? translated from the Turkish by Ümit Vimvek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yayinlari, 1985).

[951] Cited in Verif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi (Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1989), 4.

[952] Vükran Vahide, Bediuzzaman Said Nursi: The Author of the Risale-i Nur (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1992), 89-90. For a further discussion of the structure of Nursi's ideas and their appeal to different audiences, see Dale F. Eickelman, "Qur1anic Commentary, Public Space, and Religious Intellectuals in the Writings of Said Nursi," Muslim World 89/3–4 (1999): 260–269, from which part of this section is adapted.

[953] Thomas Michel, “Muslim-Christian Dialogue and Cooperation in the Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi,” Muslim World 86/3–4 (1999), 325.

[954] Vahide, Author, 217.

[955] Ibid., 219.

[956] Mardin, Religion and Social Change, 6.

[957] Muhammad Said Ramadan al-Buti, “Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s Experience of Serving Islam by Means of Politics,” in Third International Symposium on Bediüzzaman Said Nursi: The Reconstruction of Islamic Thought in the Twentieth Century and Bediüzzaman Said Nursi, 24th-25th September 1995, vol. 1, 111–121. Al-Buti is a prominent Syrian religious scholar who broadcasts a popular weekly television program in Damascus.

[958] For an excellent overview of the significance of the movement, see M. Hakan Yavuz, “Towards an Islamic Liberalism? The Nurcu Movement and Fethullah Gülen,” Middle East Journal 53/4 (1999): 584-605. See also Bülent Ara v, “Turkish Islam’s Moderate Face,” Middle East Quarterly 5/3 (1998): 23–29.

[959] Yavuz, “Islamic Liberalism,” 600.

[960] See David Pollock and Elaine El Assal, eds, In the Eye of the Beholder: Muslim and Non-Muslim Views of Islam, Islamic Politics, and Each Other (Washington, DC: USIA Office of Research and Media Reaction, 1995).

[961] Cited in “Fundamental Separation,” The Economist, June 10, 2000, “Ataturk’s Long Shadow: A Survey of Turkey,” 11.

[962] Muhammad Mahrur, al-Kitab wa al-Qur1an: Qira1a mu2a sira [The Book and the Qur1an: A Contemporary Interpretation] (Damascus: Dar al-Ahali, 1992). For a description and analysis of the book, see Dale F. Eickelman, “Islamic Liberalism Strikes Back,” Middle East Studies Association Bulletin 27/2 (1993): 163–168. For an example of his style of writing in English translation, see Muhammad Shahrur, Proposal for an Islamic Covenant, trans. Dale F. Eickelman and Ismail S. Abu Shehadeh (Damascus: al-Ahali, 2000). Shahrur’s Proposal is also available at http://www.islam21.org/pages/charter/may-1.htm

[963] Šahrur, Kitab, 29.

[964] Muhammad Mahrur, Dirasat islamiyya al-mu2a sira fi al-dawla wa al-muëtama2a [Contemporary Islamic Studies on State and Society] (Damascus: al-Ahali li al-taba2a waal-namr, 1994, 23.

[965] Wael B. Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), 253.

[966] Al-Islam wa al-2asr [Islam and Modernity], ed. 2Abd al-Wahid 2Alwani (Damascus: Dar al-Fikr, 1998). In this book, Tayyib Tizini, a Marxist philosopher, presents his views alongside the television preacher Sa2id Ramadan al-Buti. Ma al-2ulumiyya [What is Globalism] (Damascus: Dar al-Fikr, 1999) juxtaposes the views of a modernist Egyptian religious scholar, Hasan Hanafi, to those of the Syrian secularist philosopher, Sadiq Jalal al-2Azm.

[967] S. N. Eisenstadt, “Multiple Modernities,” Daedalus 129/1 (2000): 1–129.

* Glossary—index

[Page numbers currently don’t correspond with this version.]

‘ABBAS II HILMI (Egyptian Khedive from 1892 to 1914): 40 (Abdülhamid II’s hostility to him, because of his alleged support to al-Manār)

‘Abd AL-’AzIZ (Moroccan sultan from 1895 to 1907): 165 (his convocation of an “assembly of notables” in 1904–1905, and the opposition of Moroccan ulama to the ruler)

‘Abd AL-FATTAH B. ‘Abd AL-QAYYUM (the teacher of Riza al-Din in Nizhnye Chelchely, Southern Urals): 98 (his role in R.D.’s initiation to Islamic reform)

‘Abd AL-HAFIZ (Moroccan sultan from 1912)): 165 (his succession to his brother ‘Abd al-’Aziz, and his reception of the bay’A of the ulama of Fez in 1908)

‘Abd AL-HAFIZ AL-FASI (d. 1963–1964, constitutionalist ez): 166 (pupil of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

‘Abd AL-KARIM (1882–1963, leader of theulama from F Rif Mountains revolt in 1925): 182 (coincidence of his uprising with the Syrian revolt)

‘Abd AL-KARIM MURAD (or al-Muradi, d. 1926 [or 1928], Lebanese-born visiting scholar and traveler): 161 –175 (article by S. Reichmuth, esp. 165 –171)

‘Abd AL-QADIR AL-JAZA1IRI (1808–1883, Algerian community leader and Sufi shaykh): 45 (his intellectual influence in Syria)

‘AbdUH, MUHAMMAD (1849–1905, prominent Egyptian reformist thinker, Shaykh al-Azhar): 5 (his historical role in facilitating secular reform), 8 –11 (his role and audience as the editor of al-2Urwa al-Wuöqa), 12–14 (his stature as a paramount leader for the Islamic world), 17 –20 (his authorship of the Tafsir al-Manār), 26 (his reformist understanding of Islam), 27 (his rural origins, alien to the ulama aristocracy of the urban notables), 28 (his tradition of issuing fatwas on contemporary questions, as continued by al-Qaradawi), 47 (answer by al-Qasimi to an idea expressed in al-Manār), 55 , 56 (‘A.’s connection with the early development of the Salafiyya), 57 (‘A. on the independence of religious scholars from rulers), 58 (‘A.’s answer to Renan on the question of the “rigidity” of Islam), 60 (his idea of modernism entailing Arab cultural revival), 67 –68 (European views of his Epistle of Unicity), 74 (‘A.’s ideas as a root of Islamism in Ottoman Turkey), 77 (interest of the Ottoman Westernist journal /ctihad in ‘A.’s ideas), 79 –80 , 81 (‘A.’s impact on Mehmed Âkif), 85 , 90, 94 , 95, 98 –99 , 104 (his influence in Russia), 130 (translation of the Risala al-tawhid into Chinese in 1933), 145 (reference to ‘Abduh in the Malay-Indonesian writer Shaykh al-Hadi’s novel Farida Lanum), 146 –147 (attendance of ‘Abduh’s lessons by Shaykh Muhammad Tahir from Sumatra), 176, 178 , 202 (lessons given by ‘Abduh to Sh. Arslan in the Madrasa al-Sultaniyya during his exile in Beirut), 296 (educated, urban cadres as the primary audience of his message—contrary to the broader public of present-day religious intellectuals)

ABDÜLHAMAD II (Ottoman Sultan-Caliph from 1876 to 1909): 40 , 41, 42 , 43 (al-Zahrawi’s call for his deposition), 44 , 45 (connection between opposition to him and to popular Sufism), 46 (the Caliph as an obstacle to modernization), 47 (censorship under his reign), 150 –151 (support of the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam to Abdülhamid II and to the Caliphate), 170 (the Shari’A as a source of legitimacy under his reign)

ABU’L-’ALA AL-MA’ARRI (979–1058, Arab poet): 99 (his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

ACTION MAROCAINE (a Moroccan independentist party): 201 (its rapprochement with Messali al-Hajj)

ADABIY’AH DINIYYAH SCHOOL (created in Minangkabau in 1909): 154 (its founder Haji ‘Abdullah Ahmad’s association the Jama’Ah Adabiyyah)

ADAMS, CHARLES C. (historian of modernism in Egypt): 146 (his detailed description of al-Manār)

‘ADAT (Arabic: custom, customary law): 150 (struggle of al-Imam against customs and beliefs derived from ‘Adat)

ADELKHAH, FARIBA (political scientist studying the Islamic Republic of Iran): 293 (on the appearance of a “religious public sphere” in Iran in the 1990s)

AL-AFGHANI, ‘Abd AL-BAQI (Peshawar-born early twentieth-century ‘Alim): 47 (his obituary in al-Manār)

AL-AFGHANI, JAMAL AL-DIN ASADABADI (1838/9–1897, Iranian-born reformist thinker and political activist): 8 –9 (his role in the edition of al-’Urwa al-Wuöqa), 12 (his posthumous influence on Rashid Rida), 14 (his call for iætihad to revive the umma), 19, 55 (his role as a major inspiration for the Salafiyya), 33 (denegation of his Iranian origin in Arab countries and in Afghanistan), 40 , 42 –43 (some causes of tensions between Abu’l-Huda al-Sayyadi and al-Afghani), 74 (his ideas as a root of Islamism in Ottoman Turkey), 79 –80 (his impact on M. Âkif), 90 , 95 (his meeting with Barudi in Cairo in 1887), 94 , 95 (influence of his casuistry for justifying scientific discoveries), 96 , 99 (his meeting with Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din in St. Petersburg in 1888), 98 –99 (his discovery by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din), 104 (first translations of al-A.’s works in the Mura in 1908), 147 (his influence on the Malay-Indonesian Shaykh Muhammad Tahir), 202 –203 (his meeting with Sh. Arslan in Istanbul in 1889), 296 (educated, urban cadres as the primary audience of his message—contrary to the broader public of present-day religious intellectuals)

AFGHANISTAN: 4 (Soviet invasion of 1979), 33 (denegation of al-Afghani’s Iranian origin in Arab countries and in Afghanistan), 65 (Rashid Rida’s denunciation of the early twentieth-century Westernization policy)

AGA KHAN I (Hasan ‘Ali Shah, d. 1881, Nizari Imam): 228 (his arrival in India, to the Khoja community, from Persia)

AGA KHAN III (Sultan Ahmad Shah, d. 1957, Nizari Imam from 1885 to his death): 228 , 229 –230 (innovations brought about during his reign, after the establishment of British control over Hunza)

AGA KHAN IV (Shah Karim al-Husayni, Nizari Imam since 1957): 231 (his visit, the first by a Nizari Imam, to Northern Pakistan in 1960), 237 –238 (his role in the current modernization of the Isma ‘ili community)

AGA KHAN DEVELOPMENT NETWORK: 226 –240 (article by Nejima S.)

AGAYEF, Ahmed (1939, Azerbaijani nationalist thinker exiled in Turkey): 77 (his role as a figure of Turkism)

AHMADU BAMBA (1850–1927, leading Senegalese Sufi shaykh): 166 (his contacts with ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

AHMED MADHAT EFENDA (1844–1912, Ottoman Turkish reformist novelist and newspaperman): 101 (censorship of his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

ALLAQ : see ethics

AHONG (Chinese, from Persian alund : Islamic religious community leader): 117 , 118 (launching by the ahong s of the Chinese Islamic revival movement), 120 (their accommodation of Islamic belief with modern trends in the late Qing period), 121 (their role and prestige among the Hui), 123 (ahong s defining themselves as “those qualified to enlighten the people”), 125 (critic of their responsibility in cultural backwardness), 241 (role played by local imams in the expansion of popular religious education in Republican China), 242 –243 (role played by leading ahong s in the early twentieth-century expansion of associations of believers in Eastern China), 244 (education of ahong s as an aim of the Guild of the Hui Religion of China), 246, 257 , 259, 260 (“Four Great Ahong s”[si da ahong]—Wang Jingzhai, Da Pusheng, Ha Decheng, and Ma Songting—and their mobilization of the Chinese Muslims against the Japanese since 1937), 247 (stirring up of patriotic awareness of Chinese Muslims, and their military mobilization against the Japanese occupation, by the ahong s’ sermons), 248 (conservative attitude of grassroot ahong s in mosque teaching), 254 (flourishing of biographical literature on modern ahongs in the 1990s), 257 (chuany [“wearing the clothing of the robe]”): ceremony of graduation of the ahong s), 259 (hai-li-fan [from Arabic lalifa : “successor”] as the helper of an ahong), see also imam; ulama

AJIA GIKAI (Society of Asian Cause): 278 –281 (its creation in Tokyo in 1909 by Japanese Pan-Asianist circles)

AKASHI MOTOJIRO (1864–1919, Japanese general): 274 (his acquaintance with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim during the Russo-Japanese War)

AKÇURA, YUSUF (1878–1935, Volga Tatar nationalist thinker, exiled in Turkey): 77 (his role as a figure of Turkism)

ÂKAF, MEHMED (Ersoy, 1873–1936, editor of the Sirât-i müstakim): 74 –84 (article by Kasuya G.; especially 76 : Âkif’s role as editor of the Sirât-i müstakim ; 78 –81 : influence of al-Manār on his Islamism), 282 (his poem Japonlar and its inspiration from ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s Âlem-i Islam)

ALAGIa, MUKRIJA (1881–1936, Bosnian specialist of the Qur 1 an and tafsir): 213 (as a figure of the moderate jadid group)

‘ALAMI, MUSA (Arab political activist): 184 (his role as an intermediary between the Arab leaders and Ben Gourion in 1936)

ALAMUT: 226 (fall of Alamut and its impact on the place of Isma ‘ilis on the stage of the worlds of Islam)

ALBANIANS (Muslims of Albanian origin in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 211 (their place in the Muslim populations of the Balkans)

ALCOHOL AND ALCOHOLISM: 91 (Orthodox Christian influence on the struggle of Muslims vs. alcoholism in Imperial Russia), 298 (position of believers toward the consumption of alcohol in Turkey), see also ethics

ÂLEM-A /SLAM: JAPONYA’DA ANTAVAR-I /SLAMAYET (“The World of Islam: The Spread of Islam in Japan,” work [1910–1913] by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim): 273 , 280 –281 (its pioneering introduction of Japan and of the Japanese to a Muslim audience; its influence on Mehmet Âkif’s poem Japonlar)

ALEPPO: 43 (tomb of al-Sayyadi’s father), 182 (Aleppo as Ihsan al-Jabiri’s hometown)

ALGEÇIRAS: 165 (international conference of 1906 on Morocco)

ALGERIA: 201 (Sh. Arslan’s influence within the circle of the Algerian reformist ulama), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany—like the Algerian or Moroccan Imam of the Grand Mosque in Paris)

ALGERIAN ULAMA ASSOCIATION: 3 , 13 (Association’s maintenance of the heritage of al-Manār after 1935)

‘ALI (the Prophet Muhammad’s nephew and son-in-law, the fourth caliph): 49 (a speech by him forbidding anyone to curse Mu’Awiya)

‘ALI B. AHMAD ZNIBAR (Moroccan literati from Salé): 165 (his redaction of a first draft constitution for Morocco)

‘ALIM : see ulama

ALISAN, VEJSIL (chairman of the Concil of Ulama of Skopje): 194 (his participation in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935)

‘ALIYYA (reformed madrasa in Ufa, Western Urals, Russia): 90 , 98 (its creation by Kamali in 1906)

AL-ALUSI, SHIHAB AL-DIN (1802–1854, Ottoman mufti and exegete of the Qur 1 an): 20 (his Ruh al-Ma’An as the last encyclopaedic tafsir of the classical brand), 43 (his denunciation of some Rifa’i Sufi practices)

AMERICA: see USA

AMIN, QASIM (1863–1908, modernist Egyptian writer): 67 (his contributions on the question of the liberation of women)

AMSTERDAM: 194 (hope of members of the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for the building of a mosque in Amsterdam)

ANCESTRY: 13 , 22 (debates of the 1920s on the importance of a caliph being of Quraysh origin), 237 (decrease of the role of holy ancestry among present-day Isma ‘ili leaders in Northern Pakistan), 230 (claim of the legendary king Taj Moghol’s ancestry by the Isma’ili preacher Pir Sahib), 257 (Da Pusheng’s Persian ascendency), 258 (Muslim activist Sha Shanyu’s proudness of his Arab ancestry), 273 (Bukharan ascent of many Siberian Tatars, and of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim), see also authority

ANDAYA, BARBARA W. (historian of the Sultanate of Riau): 149 (role of the Sultans of Riau in the diffusion of al-Imam)

ANTIBES (city in southern France): 196 (organization by Sh. Arslan of a meeting of Ibn Saud and King Faisal, in 1930)

ARAB CALIPHATE: 6 (proposed by al-Kawakibi as a remedy to the shortcomings of the Ottoman Empire), 13 (Abu’l-Kalam Azad’s discarding of the importance for a caliph of being of Quraysh origin)

ARAB CULTURE: 7 (prominence of Arabic language and culture in the Islamic reformist thought), 68 (long “shadow” following the Mongol invasion)

ARAB NATIONALISM: 4 , 26 (its decline after the 1970s), 6 –7 (emphasis of ’uruba [Arabness, Arabism] in al-Kawakibi’s works), 50 (strengthening of popular nationalism in Syrian cities after First World War), 60 (necessity to weave the national and the religious to the Salafis’ eyes), 171 (Sh. Arslan’s efforts at drawing post-First World War Arab monarchs toward greater Arab unity), 178 –179 (beginning of the opposition of A. nationalism to the Ottoman state during First World War), 183 (on the opposition of Palestinian delegates to the Syrian Congress to the Syrian elements’ narrow territorial nationalism), see also nation and nationalism

ARABIAN PENINSULA: 56 (development of the Wahhabi movement, and its connection with the Salafiyya), 59 (criticism by R. al-’Azm of “Bedouin” states as ignorant of social life)

ARABIC LANGUAGE AND ALPHABET: 7 (prominence of A. language and culture in Islamic reformist thought), 105 (modernization through the translation of the A. sources of the Islamic renewal, in Imperial Russia), 125 (need for translations from A. stressed by early twenteith-century Chinese Muslim reformers), 128 (Chinese translations from A. journals of Egypt in the 1930s), 166 (foundation of A. schools by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad in Western Africa), 178 (Sh. Arslan’s study of A. language), 193 (A. as the official language of the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 232 (as a medium of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma’ilis), 248 –249 (giving up of making pupils memorize by heart the Q. in Chinese transcription, in Chinese Muslim religious schools, and its replacement by the arabization of religious teaching), 250 (teaching of Arabic language in Sino-Arabic schools), 251 (teaching of Arabic grammar in the normal Islamic schools opened in the 1920s to 1930s in Eastern China), 257, 259 (place of Arabic and Persian languages in the traditional curriculum of China’s mosque scools), 259 (Wang Jingzhai’s work as a translator from A. language into Chinese, and his two translations of the Quran, in classical and colloquial Chinese), 260 (Ha Decheng’s fluency in A. language, Urdu, and English), 260 (Ma Songting’s teaching of A. language at Beijing University, until the Cultural Revolution), 260 (Ma Jian’s translations from Chinese into A., notably of the Confucian Lunyu), 274 (Tatar and A. newspapers published in Russia by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim after the revolution of 1905), 295 (Nursi’s oral teaching, and the lasting preservation of its oral character because of the forbidding of the “old” Arabic alphabet in Republican Turkey)

ARABIC-CHINESE SCHOOL FOR GIRLS (Beiguan A-Zhong nüxiao): 255 (its creation in 1945 by Ma Bufang)

ARABIC PENINSULA: 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909), see also Saudi Arabia

ARABS: 6 (post-First World War shift in religious authority from the Turks to the Arabs, seen then by some as a means for Islamic regeneration), 22 (Rashid Rida’s insistence on the necessity of a cooperation between Arabs and Turks), 59 (Arabs as the first nation which has received Islam), 60 (Salafi idea of love of the Arabs as a pillar of Islam), 181 (unrealized scenario of a coalition of Arabs and Turks allied to the Soviet regime, after First World War), 258 (Muslim activist Sha Shanyu’s proudness of his Arab ancestry)

ARMENIANS: 46 (participation of Armenians of Egypt in the Ottoman Consultation Society)

ARSLAN, ‘ADIL (Sh. Arslan’s younger brother, and a key figure of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress): 182 , 184 –185, 186 (his role as a leading young Istiqlalist in the Arslan–Rida–al-Husayni alliance inside the Congress)

ARSLAN, SHAKIB (1869–1946, Lebanese publicist and political activist): 7 (his theory of a proper understanding of Islam as a remedy to the Muslims’ “backwardness”), 64 (his denunciation of Westernization in Atatürk’s Turkey), 166 (his visit by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad in Lausanne in 1922), 176 –210 (article on him by Raja Adal)

ASIR (province on the Arabian peninsula): 196 (as a contentious issue between Ibn Saud and Imam Yahya in 1934)

ASSEMBLY OF NOTABLES: see Maglis al-a’yan

ASSOCIATION FOR THE PURE AND TRUE [I.E. MUSLIM] EDUCATION OF THE STUDENTS IN TOKYO (Liudong Qingzhen jiaoyu hui): 242 –243 (its creation in 1907 by a group of thirty-six Chinese Muslim students), 252 (their publication, since 1908, of the journal Xing Hui pian)

ASSOCIATION FOR SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ON THE HUI PEOPLE (Huimin xueshu yanjiu hui): 244 (its creation in Nanking in 1936)

ASSOCIATIONS AND SOCIETIES: 3 , 13 (the Association of Algerian ‘Ulama’), 27 (founding conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama), 96 (Fraternity of the Tatar Students in Cairo), 121 (Association for Islamic Education in Tokyo), 121 (Chinese Revolutionary Association), 135 (Chinese Islamic Association for National Salvation), 147 (Pan-Malayan Association of Ulama), 148 (participation of Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi in the creation of the Persekutuan Rushdiyyah club in Riau in the early 1890s), 150 (calls of al-Imam to form associations for fostering education and development), 166 (foundation of Islamic societies by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad in Western Africa, on the model of the Ëam’iyyat al-Maqasid al-Layruyya of Beirut), 181 (creation of the Islamic International by Enver Pava), 188 –189 , 194 (Oriental Club in Berlin: its chairmanship by Sh. Arslan; Szynkewicz’s membership), 192 (reception of Sh. Arslan in Budapest by the Association of Gül Baba), 192 (Sh. Arslan’s coordination of the activities of the Red Crescent during the Balkan War of 1912), 194 (Society of the Muslim Youths in Cairo), 214 (creation of the “Mladi Muslimani” organization in Zagreb in 1941), 241 –247 (role of Muslim cultural associations in Republican China, in part. 243 (creation in 1912 of the first nation-wide association of believers, with subsidiary associations [fenhui]), 275 , 286 (probable meeting of a member of the Kokuryukai, Nakayama, with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in Yokohama in 1909), 278 (Toa Dobunkai [Japan] and the Islamic activism of one of its leading members, Ohara Bukei), 278 –279 (creation of the Ajia Gikai in 1909 by Japanese Pan-Asianist circles), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim and Yamaoka Kotaro’s invitation by the Society of Muslim Students from Russia in Istanbul), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany), see also benevolent societies; congresses, conferences and fairs; networks and networking, sponsorship

ASSOCIATION FOR STUDYING THE CULTURE OF THE HUI RELIGION (Huijiao wenhua yanjiu hui): 246 (its creation in 1936, under the chairmanship of General Bai)

ASTRONOMY: 146 , 147 (science studied and practiced by Shaykh Muhammad Tahir), 298 –299 (Shahrur’s analogy between the Copernician revolution and modern Qur1 anic interpretation)

AÖAR (“Monumentae,” biographical work by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din): 99 (on Riza al-Din’s biographical project)

AL-ATASI, HASHEM (leader of the Syrian National Block, the President of the Syrian Republic in 1936): 186 (his consultations with Sh. Arslan, in Geneva, prior to the signature of the treaty with France)

ATATÜRK (Mustafa Kemal, 1881–1938): 62 (post-First World War critics of his Westernization policy), 75 (journal /ctihad as a source of inspiration for A.’s first reforms), 180 (his first meetings with Sh. Arslan), 291 (modernization theory’s postulate of a preference for secularizing reformers like Atatürk in Turkey, or Reza Shah and Mohammad Reza Shah in Iran)

AUTHORITY: 6 (post-First World War shift in religious authority from the Turks to the Arabs seen as a means for Islamic regeneration),

45 (ulama’s role as leaders of uneducated masses in the late Ottoman Empire), 89 (Bigi’s criticism of the mode of transmission of learning in Sufi turuq), 89 –90 (renewal of the cult of the murshid among reformist Sufis in early twentieth-century Russia), 90 (in Russia by school teachers the shaking of the ulama’s authority, thanks notably to the maktab s and madrasas’ financing through benevolent associations), 90 (Rasuliyeff ‘s role and authority as head of the Rasuliyya Madrasa), 231 –232 (appearance of Isma ‘ili wa’iz s in Northern Pakistan in the 1970s, and its impact on the structure of religious authority among the Isma ‘ilis), 289, 290 , 295, 298 –299 , 300 (challenge to the ulama’s authority by new categories of literati in the contemporary Muslim majority world), 291 (E. Shils on the distrust of secular and ecclesiastical authority as a tradition of modern intellectuals), 295 (distinction of Nursi’s teaching, centered on autonomous book reading, from the master–disciple relationship that lies at the core of most Sufi orders), 296 –297 (Nursi’s success in articulating his message with rural Turkish society, when the hold of local leaders was giving way to the state apparatus), 299 (Shahrur’s challenge to the authoritative tradition of tafsir and fiqh, and his debates with conservative religious intellectuals on the interpretation of sacred texts), 300 (state-appointed religious hierarchies in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and ex-Soviet Central Asia, and their resistance to challenges to their authority), see also ancestry; ethics; ulama

AVTONOMIJA (“The Autonomy,” a work [1907] by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim): 274 (its discussion of varied possible forms of autonomy for the Muslims of the Russian Empire)

AWQAF : see waqf

AYAK DAVÂNI (lit. “Council-on-Foot,” in the Ottoman Empire): 162 (its consultative and representative mechanisms)

AZAD, ABU AL-KALAM (leader of the Khilafat movement, supporting the Ottoman dynasty): 13 (serialization of his ideas in al-Manār)

AL-AZHAR: 14 (al-A.’s conservatism until the late nineteenth-century), 24 (impact of al-A.’s reform on legal and educational reforms in Egypt), 67 (gradual reform of teaching in the first third of the twentieth-century), 87, 90 , 92, 95 , 96 –97 (attending of al-A. by students from the Russian Empire in the 1890s to 1900s), 123 , 127, 130 , 133 (al-A.’s attendance by Chinese Muslim students since the early 1920s), 130 (translations into Chinese of articles in al-A.’s journal Nur al-islam), 131, 250 –251 (arrival of two professors from al-A. at the Chengda Normal School in 1933), 145 (publication of the journal Seruan Azhar in al-A. in the 1920s by Malay-Indonesian students), 146 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s study of astronomy in al-A. in the 1890s), 198 (al-A.’s participation in the campaign against the Berber Dahir in Morocco), 244 (graduation of Da Pusheng, a religious scholar from Shanghai, in the 1880s), 256 (the sponsorship of Chinese students in al-A. by Ma Fuxiang in the 1930s), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi’s sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul), 260 (Ma Jian’s studies in al-Azhar in 1932–1939, with Yunnanese financial help), see also education; madrasa; schools and schooling; travels and travelling

AL-’AzM, RAFIQ (an early twentieth-century Damascene editorialist): 46 , 58 (his views on the “decline” of Islamic nations), 47 (his obituary notice in al-Manār), 59 (his critic of Bedouin life as a backward form of political organization)

AL-’AzM, SADIQ JALAL (late twentieth to twenty-first-centuries Syrian reformist thinker): 299 (his reinterpretation on how sacred texts apply to social life, and his debate with the conservative religious intellectual Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, on al-Jazeera satellite TV, in 1997)

BABANZÂDE, AHMED NAAM (Turkish traditionalist thinker of the late Ottoman period): 78 (his membership of the Khalwatiyya mystical path)

BACHELOR: see examination

BADAWI, M. A. ZAKI (historian of Egyptian reformers): 19 (his introduction of al-Afghani as the inspirer of the Salafiyya)

BAHRAIN: 4 (failed coup of 1981 by an Islamic liberation front)

BAI CHONGXI (1893–1966, leading Guangxi warlord, the minister of War in the Guomindang government in 1936–1949): 134 (his welcoming of the Chengda Normal School in Guilin in 1937), 246 –255 (his role in the creation and leadership of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country), 246 –247 (his chairmanship of the Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion), 255 (publication of a novel on his life in Guangxi in 1988)

BAIHUA : see Chinese language and literature

BAJRAKTAREVIa, FEHIM (1889–1970, a Bosnian orientalist): 213 (figure of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian secularized intelligentsia)

BALAFREJ, AHMED (b. 1908, Moroccan nationalist leader and statesman): 199 (his contacts with Sh. Arslan)

BALFOUR DECLARATION (promising a Jewish homeland in Palestine): 180 – 181 (its impact on the strategy of Arab nationalists)

BALIa, SMAIL (b. 1920, librarian and historian of Bosnian cultural life): 218 (representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

BALKAN WAR OF 1912: 192 (Sh. Arslan’s coordination of the activities of the Red Crescent), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s Pan-Islamist activities during the Balkan War of 1912)

BANDOENG CONFERENCE: 215 (its impact on the political utilization of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia)

BANKS: 4 (establishment of a first Islamic bank in Dubai in 1975), 237 –238 (utilization of the World Bank by Aga Khan IV for the modernization of the Isma ‘ili community in Northern Pakistan), see also commercial societies

BARSCY, STEFAN (Hungarian politician, Minister of Justice): 192 (his reception of Sh. Arslan in 1934)

BARUDI (‘Alim-Jan ‘Aliyeff, 1857–1921, Tatar ‘Alim from Kazan): 90 (his meetings with al-Afghani and ‘Abduh in Cairo, and his reform of the Muhammadiyya Madrasa), 94 (his personal library), 95 –96 (short assessment of his life and work)

BARUNI, SULAYMAN (pan-Arabic theoretician): 202 (his attacks against Sh. Arslan)

BAMAGIa, SAVFET-BEG (1870–1934, Bosnian poet, politician, and historian of local Ottoman literature): 213 (figure of the moderate jadid group)

BASHKIRS: 89 (their submission to a policy of school instruction in vernacular language in Cyrillic script in the late twentieth century)

BASARET (“Watchfulness,” newspaper published by the Young Ottomans in Istanbul in 1869–1879): 80 (its evolution toward Pan-Islamism)

BATTAL, ‘Abd-ALLAH (1882–1969, ‘Alim from Russia): 97 (his comments on ‘Abduh’s Tawhid, and on female education)

BAY’A (Arabic: oath of allegiance): 80 (popularization of the concept by the Young Ottomans, with a political meaning), 165 (allegiance given by the ulama of Fez to the sultan ‘Abd al-Hafiz in 1908)

BÄYANUL-HAK (“The Statement of Truth,” Tatar newspaper published in Kazan from 1906 to 1914): 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel correspondences to the B.H. in 1909)

BAYANAT-I SAYYAH-I HINDI (“The Tales of an Indian Traveller,” a work [1912] by Fitrat): 279 –280 (its positive image of Japan, as it had been introduced by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in his Istanbul conferences)

BAYAZITOFF, ‘ATA1 -ALLAH (1847–1911, leading ‘Alim in St. Petersburg, and the Muslim Chaplain of the Imperial Guard): 95 (his role as an intermediary between the Muslim subjects of the Czar and the central Russian authorities)

BEDOUINISM: 59 (its criticism by al-’Azm as a backward form of political organization)

BEGOVIa, MEHMED (1889–1970, Bosnian specialist of Islamic law): 213 (as a figure of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian secularized intelligentsia)

BEIJING: 124 , 250, 252 –253 (relocation of the Chengda Normal School after 1928, and its publication of the journal Yuehua), 243 (siege of some of the first associations of Muslim believers, from 1912 onward), 250 , 253 (creation by Da Pusheng and Wang Haoran, in 1907, of the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion, at the Ox Street Mosque, and its printing house)

BEIRUT: 166 (Ëam’iyyat al-Maqasid al-Layriyya and its influence on ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s Islamic societies), 178 (exile place of M. ‘Abduh, and of his teaching in the Madrasat al-Sultaniyya), 182 (Riyad al-Sulh’s hometown), 298 (distribution of Shahrur’s al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’n in both authorized [Damascus and Beirut] and pirate [Cairo] editions)

BEJTIa, ALIJA (1920–1981, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (representative of the crypto-opponent trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

BELGRADE: 192 (Sh. Arslan’s travel to Yugoslavia in 1931 and 1933–1934)

BEN GOURION, DAVID (1886–1973, leader of the Zionist Executive, and the first Prime Minister of Israel): 184 (his seeking of an arrangement with Arab leaders in 1936)

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES: 90 (role of Russian Orthodox charitable organizations in the emulation of Russia’s Muslim benevolent societies), 90 (their early twentieth-century substitution to waqf and zakat in the financing of Russia’s Islamic educational institutions), 166 (Ëam’iyyat al-Maqasid al-Layriyya of Beirut, and its influence on ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s Islamic societies), see also associations and societies; commercial societies; missionaries; sponsorship

BENNUNA, ‘Abd AL-SALAM (d. 1935, Moroccan political leader): 200 (his contacts with Sh. Arslan)

BERBER DAHIR (legal status created in 1931 by the French protectorate for the Berbers of Morocco): 197 –198 (its contestation throughout the world of Islam)

BERKES, NAYAZA (historian of modern Turkey): 74 (on the division of Ottoman intellectual circles into Westernists, Islamists, and Turkists), 77 (on the interest of Turkish Westernists in Islamic reformism)

BERLIN: 176 (place of anti-colonial congresses attended by Sh. Arslan), 180 (Sh. Arslan and Mustafa Kemal’s meeting in the Café Maskot in 1917), 180 –181 (exile of the CUP leadership and Sh. Arslan in Berlin in 1918), 181 (Talat Pava’s assassination in 1921), 184 (al-Husayni’s residence in Berlin during First World War), 187 (Sh. Arslan’s visit to the Goethe Musem), 188 –189 (his presence in Berlin after First World War, and his chairmanship of the Oriental Club), 190 (Arslan and von Oppenheim’s meeting in October 19391939), 194 (presentation of Szynkewicz’s dissertation on Rabghuzi’s Syntax), 281 (sending of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim to Berlin by Enver Pava, in 1915, for the recruitment of Tatar Muslim prisoners of war)

BERNE: 187 (Arslan’s attendance of the anti-imperialist congress of 1919)

BEYÂNÜLHAK (“Presentation of the Truth,” a journal edited in 1908–1912 by the Cemiyyet-i /lmiyye-i /slâmiyye): 75 (its role as the voice of opponents to modernist Islam)

BIBLE: 253 , 259 (Protestant’s dilemma as to the translation of the Bible into Chinese, whether to use the classical or the colloquial language, and its influence on the translation of the Qur 1 an), 292 –293 (expansion of grassroots Bible studies after the Second Vatican Council)

BID’A (Arabic: a forbidden innovation): 44 (bid’A s incorporated by early twentiethcentury Rifa’i Sufis in their ceremonies), 50 (condemnation of theatrical performances in pre-First World War Syria as a bid’A), 56 (criticism of b. by the Salafiyya), 154 (the denunciation of b. a by Haji ‘Abdullah Ahmad after his return from Mecca to Indonesia in 1905), 155 (argument on Indonesian traditionalists of journals as a Western innovation)

BIGI, MUSA JAR-ALLAH (1875–1949, Tatar reformist theologian): 89 (his criticism of the mode of transmission of learning in Sufi turuq), 90 (his studies with ‘Abduh at al-Azhar), 96 (his studies in al-Azhar and pilgrimage to Mecca with Kamali), 101 (his teaching in the Husayniyya Madrasa of Orenburg), 102 (his contribution to the Mura)

BIJEDIa, D?EMAL (1917–1977, Muslim Communist political leader of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (his role in the campaign for the recognition of a “Muslim nation” in Yugoslavia)

BIOGRAPHY: 47 (publication of obituary notices in al-Manār as a means of promoting reformist ideas), 99 (Riza al-Din’s Aöar, and his overall biographical project), 101

(Russian censorship of Ahmed Midhat Efendi’s biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din), 128 (introduction of figures of the world of Islam by the Yuehua journal), see also history and history writing; ulama AL-BITAR, ‘Abd AL-RAZZAQ (elder shaykh of early twentieth-century Damascene Salafis): 44 (his critic of al-Zahrawi’s radical view on Sufism), 47 (his obituary notice in al-Manār), 49 (raising of a mob against him and other reformers in Damascus in 1908)

BLUHM-WARN, PIJPER (adviser of the Dutch Government for the Native and Arab Affairs): 144 (on the selective censorship of al-Manār in Indonesia)

BOLSHEVIKS: 179 (their utilization of Enver Pava against the British in Central Asia), 180 –181 (agreement of March 1921 with Great Britain, and its impact on the strategy of Arab nationalists), 282 (Bolshevik repression, and the emigration of Muslim intellectuals from Russia), see also Trotsky

BOMBAY: 229 , 230 (consolidation of his power by Aga Khan III from this city)

BOOKS AND BOOK TRADING: 166 (book trading as a profession exerted by the young ‘Abd al-Karim Murad), 250 (purchase of Islamic books in Egypt by Ma Songting, in 1932, for the future library of the Chengda Normal School), 256 (edition of Han kitab s —Confuciano-Muslim books—in early modern China), 260 (Ha Decheng’s importation of Islamic literature from Egypt, India, and Turkey), 289 (books as a present-day important means of communication, challenged by a wide range of new media), 295 (distinction of Nursi’s teaching, centered on autonomous book reading, from the master–disciple relationship at the core of most Sufi orders), 296 (dissemination of Nursi’s Risale-i Nur by “thousands” of men and women, and after Second World War through the use of a duplicating machine), 298 (distribution of Shahrur’s al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’a in both authorized and pirate editions), 299

(Shahrur’s use of the term qira’a [reading] instead of tafsir [Qur 1 an exegesis], and the attacks against him in lutba s [Friday sermons] in Damascus and elsewhere), see also libraries; journals and newspapers; orality; printing and printing houses; reading; translation

BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA: 211 –225 (article by A. Popovic)

BOURGUIBA, HABIB (Tunisian nationalist leader and President): 201 (his edition of an issue of L’Action tunisienne in homage to Arslan)

BOWEN, HAROLD (mid-twentieth-century historian of the world of Islam): 57 (on the theoretical unity of religion and state in Islam)

BOXER REBELLION (of 1900 in China): 241 (reactions of Chinese Muslim intellectuals to the turmoils of the early twentieth century)

BRUSSELS: 187 (Sh. Arslan’s attendance of the anti-imperialist congress of 1922)

BUBI (madrasa in Izh-Bobino, Western Urals): 98 (its reform by the Bubi brothers since 1895)

BUBI (‘Abd-Allah Ni’matullin, alias Bubi, 1871–1922): 98 (his role in the reform of the Bubi Madrasa, and his translations of ‘Abduh’s works)

BUBI (‘Ubayd-Allah Ni’matullin, alias Bubi, 1866–1936): 98 (his role in the reform of the Bubi Madrasa)

BUDAPEST: 192 (Sh. Arslan’s travel to Hungary in 1934), 193 (isolation of the Muslim community in Budapest in the 1930s), 194 (hope of members of the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for the building of a mosque in the city)

BUDDHISM AND BUDDHISTS: 58 (their outdistancing of Muslims in progress in modern times), 260 (Yang Zhongming’s comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam in the Sijiao yaogua)

BUKHARA: 90 , 92, 93 (Bukhara as the education place of Kazan Tatar ulama, from Marjani to Barudi), 99 (center of a deep renewal of kalam in the first half of the nineteenth century), 273 (Bukharan ascent of many Siberian Tatars, and of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travels to Russian Turkestan and Bukhara in 1908), 279 –280 (Munazara, the manifesto of the jadid movement in Bukhara) AL-BUKHARI, SALIM (late nineteenth-century Syrian reformist ‘Alim): 46 (his participation in the circle of Rafiq al-’Azm), 47 (his obituary in al-Manār)

BULGARIA: 58 (its secession from the Ottoman Empire, and opposition to it), 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe)

BULGHARS: see Volga Bulghars

BURHANUDDIN AL-HELMI (reformist thinker from Minangkabau): 148 (his participation in the debate against the Kaum Tua)

BURUSHASKI LANGUAGE (vernacular tongue of Hunza): 236 (writing of poetry in Burushaski by Hunza’i)

AL-BUTI, SAID RAMADAN (Syrian translator of Nursi’s works): 296 (his use of exegesis to reach his conclusions)

CACHIN, MARCEL (1869–1958, French socialist leader): 187 (his relations with Sh. Arslan)

CAFÉMASKOT (in Berlin): 180 (as a meeting place of Mustafa Kemal and Arslan)

CAI YUANPEI (leading personality of the Chinese cultural world, at the eve of the Japanese invasion): 251 (his involvement into the creation of the Fude Library)

CAIRO: 7 (General Islamic Conference for the Caliphate), 46 (meeting of Rafiq al-’Azm and Rashid Rida in 1894), 46 (foundation of the Ottoman Consultation Society), 90, 95 (meeting of Barudi with al-Afghani and ‘Abduh in 1887), 96 (creation of the Fraternity of the Tatar Students in Cairo in 1906), 144 –145 (Indonesian students in Cairo in the late colonial period), 145 (city described in Shaykh al-Hadi’s novel Farida Lanum), 147 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s mission to Mecca and Cairo in 1903), 177 (Sh. Arslan’s close links with C.’s intellectual world), 185 (siege of the Executive Committee of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, marginalized after 1925 by a newly created Finance Committee in Jerusalem), 194 (Muslim Congress of Cairo in 1926), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi’s sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul), 274 (publication, in 1900, of Rusiyada musulmanlar by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim), 298 (the distribution of Shahrur’s al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’a in both authorized [Damascus and Beirut] and pirate [Cairo] editions)

CALIPHATE: 6 (Arab caliphate proposed by al-Kawakibi as a remedy to the shortcomings of the Ottoman Empire), 13 (Abu'l-Kalam Azad discarding the importance of a caliph being of Quraysh origin), 13 (Khilafat movement in South Asia), 21 (Rashid Rida's thought on the Caliphate), 22 (Rida as a successor to classical theoreticians of the caliphate), 28 –29 (differences of perception on the caliphate between Rida and al-Qaradawi), 42 , 43 (al-Zahrawi's call for Abdülhamid II's deposition), 64 (abolition of the caliphate in Turkey in 1924), 88 (Spiritual Assembly of the Muslim Law created in Russia as an instrument for turning Muslims away from the Ottoman sultan-caliph), 150 –151 (Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam supporting Abdülhamid II on the question of the Caliphate)

CASABLANCA: 167 (its occupation by the French in March 1907)

CATHERINE II (Empress of Russia from 762 to 1796): 88 (her 1773 Edict of Religious Tolerance), 273 –274 (her establishment of the Spiritual Assembly of Ufa in 1788)

CATHOLIC CHURCH AND ORGANIZATIONS: 65 (restitution of their confiscated endowments to French Catholic organizations)

CATHOLICS: see Christianity and Christians

CAUCASUS: 89 (Southern Caucasian influences on the elaboration of the usul-I ëadid in Russia), 192 (Northern Caucasian origins of Arslan's mother and wife) #AUMEVIa, D?EMALUDIN (1870–1938, a chairman of the Concil of Ulama in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 194 (his participation in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 213 (as a figure of the early twentieth-century "semireformist" trend in Yugoslavia)

CEMAL PAVA, AHMED (1872–1922, Young Turk leader and Ottoman statesman): 179 , 180 (his reign of terror in Damascus in 1914–1917)

CEMAYYET-A /LMAYYE-A /SLÂMAYYE (“Association of the Scholars of Islam”): 75 (conservative organization led by Mustafa Sabri Efendi)

CEMAYET-A SÛFAYYE (“Sufi Association,” an organization of the late Ottoman period): 78 (the links of its chairman with the Naqshbandiyya and the CUP)

CENSORSHIP: 48 (in the Ottoman Empire under Abdülhamid II), 86 (in the Russian Empire after the 1905 Revolution), 101 (Russian censorship of Ahmed Midhat Efendi’s biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din), 144 (in the Dutch East Indies in the 1920s to 1930s), see also police; prison

CENTRAL ASIA: 295 (expansion of the Nurcu movement outside Turkey), 297 (F. Gülen’s movement’s web of more than 550 schools in Turkey and the CIS, especially in Central Asia), 300 (stateappointed religious hierarchies in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and ex-Soviet Central Asia, and their defence of their authority)

CENTRAL SPIRITUAL BOARD OF THE MUSLIMS OF INNER RUSSIA AND SIBERIA: 101 (its creation in 1921, and its chairmanship by Barudi and by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

CERIa, MUSTAFA (b. 1952, current Reis ul-Ulama of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 218 (representative of the religious scholars of independent B.-H.)

CEVDET, ABDULLAH (1869–1932, leader of Westernists in late Ottoman Turkey): 75 (his position in this current)

CEYLON: 260 (Ha Decheng’s travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society)

CHANGDE (city in the north of Hunan, in south central China): 249 (appearance of the first new-style Chinese Muslim schools in 1898, at the initiative of a local mosque)

CHANGSHA (city in Hunan): 256 (creation of the Jiejin new-style Muslim primary school, and its replacement of the city’s mosque school)

CHEMISTRY: 46 (as a discipline to be caught up from Europeans)

CHEN KELI (1924–1970, Ikhwani militant executed during the Cultural Revolution): 261 (his studies with Wanj Jingzhai, Ma Songting, and Ma Jian, and his work as a prolific translator)

CHEN YUAN (leading personality of the Chinese cultural world, at the eve of the Japanese invasion): 251 (his involvement into the creation of the Fude Library)

CHENGDA NORMAL SCHOOL (Chengda shifan xuexiao, school created for Hui youth in Jinan, the capital of Shandong): 124 , 252 – 253 (its edition of the journal Yuehua, after its moving to Beijing in 1928), 130 , 133 (its sending of students to al-Azhar in 1932 and 1937), 131 (arrival of two professors from al-Azhar, Dali, and Fulifela, in 1933), 133 (creation of the Fude Library in 1936, in memory of King Fu 1 ad of Egypt), 134 , 251 (school’s evacuation from Beijing to Guilin after the Japanese invasion of China in 1937), 250 (the school’s opening by the ahong Ma Songting in Jinan in 1925), 251 (school’s return to Beijing in 1945, under the name of High Institute of the Hui People), 256 (support given by Ma Fuxiang to the school’s rebirth in Beijing), 258 (role played by the activist Tang Kesan in the school’s administration), 260 (role of the reformist activist and translation Yang Zhongming), 260 (Ma Songting’s role in the school’s history)

CHIANG KAI-SHEK: see Jiang Jieshi

CHINA: 117 –142 (article by Matsumoto M.), 161 (early twentieth-century Chinese constitutionalist movement, and its impact outside China), 241 –272 (article by F. Aubin), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909), 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s emigration from Siberia through Xinjiang, China, and Manchuria), 284 (supervision of local organizations by the Dai Nippon Kaikyo Kyokai in the occupied territories in China and Manchuria

CHINESE COMMUNIST PARTY: 117 (its support by a fraction of Chinese Muslims since the mid-1930s), 136 –137 (its new nationality policy after 1937), 241 (breaking of its alliance with the Guomindang in 1927), 247 (its support to the creation of a subsidiary association [fenhui] of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 249 (support given by the Ikhwani movement to the CCP, as the guarantee of a strong power), 256 –257 (collaboration between Muslim activists and the Communist Party and régime—in part. 257 : Su Baoqiao’s activities for the CCP in Changsha, and Da Pusheng’s biography), 259 (Communist activist Ding Baochen’s influence on Wang Jingzhai, as a defender of the colloquial Chinese language and literature), 261 (collaboration between the CCP and Hu Songshan’s pro-Chinese Ikhwani movement)

CHINESE ISLAMIC ASSOCIATION FOR NATIONAL SALVATION: 135 (its appeal for the national unity of Chinese people in 1940)

CHINESE LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE: 127 (Yuehua ’s practice of translating and criticizing Arabic and English books), 128, 130 , 134 (Ch. translations from Egyptian journals in the 1930s), 130 , 135, 244 (initiatives and disputes over the translation of the Qur’an into Ch.), 130 (translation of ‘Abduh’s Risala al-tawhid into Ch. in 1933), 131 (a translation into Ch. of the History of Islam by Khuzuli), 242 (Ch. language as a vector of denomination for Chinese Muslims), 248 –249 (giving up of making pupils drone by heart the Qur1 an in Ch. phonetical transcription, in Chinese Muslim religious schools, and its replacement by the teaching of Arabic language and learning of the Qur’anic text), 249 (Ikhwani influence on the arabization of religious teaching, and on the prohibition of Chinese and Sufi influence among Ch.-speaking Muslims), 250 (teaching of Ch. language and literature in Sino-Arabic schools), 251 (teaching of Ch. language and literature in the normal Islamic schools opened in the 1920s to 1930s in Eastern China), 252 (publication of colloquial-Chinese [baihua] Muslim journals since the early 1900s), 253 (Protestant’s dilemma as to the translation of the Bible into Ch., whether to use the classical [wenyan] or the colloquial [baihua] language, and its influence on the translation of the Qur 1 an), 256 (teaching of colloquial Ch. language in the primary schools created by Ma Fuxiang in Ningxia), 259 (teaching of Ch. language in the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion), 259 (Ch. language in the traditional curriculum of mosque schools in China), 259 (Ding Baochen’s influence on Wang Jingzhai as a defender of the colloquial Ch. Language and literature), 259 (Wang Jingzhai’s work as a translator from Arabic language into Chinese, and his two translations of the Quran, in classical and colloquial Chinese), 260 (Yang Zhongming’s selflearning of Chinese language and literature), 260 (Ma Jian’s translations from Chinese into Arabic, notably that of the Confucian Lunyu), 262 (cultivation of Chinese classical literature in Ma Yuanzhang’s Jahriyya menhuan, a subbranch of the Chinese Naqshbandiyya)

CHITRAL: 229 (tightening of British control over this region, and its consequence for the modern history of Isma ‘ilism)

CHONGQING (a city in Sichuan): 246 (relocation, in 1938, of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation the Country), 247 (first representation of Guojia chishang in 1940)

CHRISTIANITY AND CHRISTIANS: 58 (their outdistancing of the Muslims in progress in modern times), 88, 93 (the Edicts of Religious Tolerance taken in Russia by Catherine II in 1773 and Nicholas II 1905), 178 (US Protestant schools in the Near-East, and the attendance of one of them by Sh. Arslan), 178 (Maronite Christian Madrasa al-Hikma in Beirut, and its attendance by Sh. Arslan), 241 (the anti-Christian outburst in China in 1925), 253 , 259 (Protestant’s dilemma as to the translation of the Bible into Chinese, whether to use the classical or the colloquial language), 260 (Yang Zhongming’s comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam in the Sijiao yaogua), 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s critic of Christian missionary activity in Japan), 292 (appearance of Solidarnosc in Poland, the role of liberation theology in Latin America, and the return of Protestant fundamentalism as expressions of an overall Christian revivalism), 292 –293 (Second Vatican Council’s influence on the emergence of transnational decentralized grassroots networks), 294 (religious discourse as a precondition for the rise of the early modern public sphere in Europe), 297 (F. Gülen’s organization’s publicized and sustained dialogues with Christian and Jewish religious leaders)

CHRISTIANIZATION OF MUSLIMS: 65 (its denunciation by Rashid Rida), 85 (chr. Of the Muslims of the Volga and Urals region since the mid-sixteenth century), 88 (the first interruption of Russia’s policy of chr. of its Muslim subjects in the late eighteenth century), 133 (Muslim reformers in Egypt requesting that the King contain Christian missions), 191 –192 (international debates on Christian religious propaganda in Libya), 197 –198 (Berber Dahir in Morocco, seen in the world of Islam as an instrument of chr. of the Berbers), 274 (denunciation of the chr. of Russia’s Muslims by Ibrahim in his Rusiyada musulmanlar)

CAHAD-I /SLÂM (“The Holy War of Islam,” an Ottoman journal): 281 (his publication during First World War by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim)

CIMIc, ESAD (b. 1931, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian of literature): 217 (as a representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

CIRCASSIANS (Muslim group in the Northern Caucasus, with numerous diasporas in the Near-East): 46 (participation of Circassians of Egypt in the Ottoman Consultation Society), 178 (Circassian origins and connections of Sh. Arslan, through his mother and his wife), 211 (Muslims of Circassian origin in Bosnia-Herzegovina)

CIRCLE OF EQUITY (classical concept of Islamic political thought): 168 (the adaptation of two versions of this circle from Ibn Khaldun by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States): 297 (F. Gülen’s movement’s web of more than 550 schools in Turkey and the CIS, especially in Central Asia)

CLERGY (in Russian: duhovenstvo): 88 (creation on the nucleus of a registered Muslim “clergy” by Catherine II since 1782), 99 (nomination of Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din as a qadi of the Spiritual Assembly of the Muslim Law), 216 (Gazi Husrev-beg Medrese of Sarajevo and its role in the education of the official religious leaders of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia during the Communist period), 273 –274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s appointment as a qadi of the Spiritual Assembly of Ufa), see also ulama

CLEVELAND, WILLIAM L. (biographer of Sh. Arslan): 183 (on Rida’s role in reintegrating Arslan with Arab leaders), 186 (on Arslan’s weigh in the ratification of the French-Syrian treaty of 1936), 187 (on representations of Europe as an imperial threat as to the 1880s)

CLOTHING: 63 (adoption of the European costume by the Ottoman Sultan Mahmud II), 63 –64 (al-Khatib’s contribution to the dispute on the Islamic dress), 63 (edition of a paper by al-Fath on the wearing of a turban or a fez), 66 (Italian and British publications urging women to return to decency in dress), 91 (Christian Orthodox influence on the Muslim campaigns on the wearing of the headscarf in Imperial Russia), 152 (al-Imam ’s condemnation of the wearing of European clothing), 155 (al-Munir ’s argument on the wearing of neckties and hats as not prohibited by the Qur 1 an and Hadith), 297 (F. Gülen’s advocacy of a public role for women in society, and statement that the wearing of the headscarf by women is a matter of personal choice), see also headscarf; identity; westernization; women and the “women question”

COLAS, DOMINIQUE (historian of the former USSR): 294 (on religious discourse as a precondition for the rise of the early modern public sphere in Europe)

COLONIALISM: 68 (thirteenth-century Mongol invasion as an equivalent of modern European colonialism), 85 (submission of the Volga region to Russia from the mid-sixteenth-century onward), 88 , 89 (Catherine II’s seductive policy toward the Kazakhs, and their submission to a policy of school instruction in vernacular language in Cyrillic script), 91 (confrontation of Russia’s Steppe territory with Slavic colonization in the nineteenth century), 164 –165, 167 (France’s early twentieth-century interference into the affairs of Morocco), 165 (ulama’s mobilization against the French encroachments in early twentieth-century Morocco), 167 (occupation of the Moroccan city of Wujda by the French army in March 1907), 180 (British invasion of Jerusalem in 1917), 180 –181 (the French suppression of Faisal’s ephemerous Syrian kingdom), 182 (shaking of the French colonial empire by the Rif Mountains’ and the Syrian revolts in 1925), 182 –186 (Shahbandar’s position as to the French mandate in Syria), 183 (political consequences of the coming of the British to the Near-East after First World War), 184 (opposition to the British and French colonization policies in the world of Islam by the Mufti of Jerusalem al-Husayni; alliance of the Nazshashibi faction with the British administration in Palestine, and its opposition to the Husayni faction after First World War), 187 (Tunisia’s occupation by France since 1881, and British occupation of Egypt in 1882; obsolescence of the Egyptian traveller Tahtawi’s influence after European colonial encroachments in the early 1880s), 187 (Sh. Arslan’s rapprochement with the French anticolonial left), 190 (von Oppenheim’s grand plans for expelling the French and British from the Middle East), 200 –201 (new perception of France in Arab nationalist circles after the Franco-Syrian Treaty of 1937), 229 (tightening of British control over Hunza, and its consequence for the modern history of Isma ‘ilism), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s denunciation of Russian, British, and French colonization), 281 (his encouragement of Ottoman resistance against the Italian invasion of Libya in 1911), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s translations into Ottoman Turkish of Japanese literature on Western oppression of Eastern peoples), see also westernization COMMERCIAL SOCIETIES: 243 –244 (their role in the financing of Islamic schools in early twentieth-century China), 260 (Ha Decheng’s travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society), see also banks; merchants; sponsorship

COMMITTEE OF UNION AND PROGRESS: see CUP

COMMUNICATION: 126 (Wang Jingzhai’s diffusion in China of information on reformist movements in Egypt), 289 (O. Roy on the possibility for modern Muslim intellectuals to choose among languages and audiences), 289 (increasingly important role played by women in modern communication), 290 (growing accessibility of the means of communication and the increased power of intellectuals to communicate and of audiences to discuss), 296 (educated, urban cadres as the primary audience of ‘Abduh and al-Afghani’s message—contrary to the broader public of present-day religious intellectuals), 297 (communication of Nursi’s message through a multilingual website), see also books and book trading; Internet; journals and newspapers; language; mass media; orality

COMMUNISM AND COMMUNIST PARTIES: 147 (arrest of Shaykh Muhammad Tahir in Sumatra in 1928, on suspicion of Communist leanings), 181 (Sh. Arslan’s meetings with Zinoviev in Saint Moritz and in Moscow, and with Trotsky in Moscow), 201 (alliance of the French Communist Party with Messali al-Hajj’s Etoile Nord-Africaine), 214 (influence of state Communism in Yugoslavia on the evolution of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia), 217 (pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia), 241 (breaking of the alliance between the Guomindang and the Chinese Communist Party in 1927), 249 (support given by the Ikhwani movement to the Chinese Communist Party, as an embodiment of a strong power), 256 –257 (collaboration between Muslim activists and the Communist Party and régime in mid-twentiethcentury China), 261 (collaboration between the Chinese Communist Party and Hu Songshan’s pro-Chinese Ikhwani trend), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s contacts with Russian revolutionaries during his travels in Europe), see also Socialism and Socialist parties

CONFEDERETION OF THE HUI RELIGION IN CHINA (Zhonghua Huijiao zonghui): 245 (its creation in 1934 in Nanking)

CONFUCIANISM: 121 , 242, 248 (its place in the Chinese imperial examination system), 250 (Ma Fuxiang’s knowledge of Confucianism, and sympathy for the Ikhwani movement), 253(use of Confucian terminology and reasoning by pre-modern Chinese ulama, notably Liu Zhi, for expounding Islamic theology), 256 (place of Confucianism in the education of young Chinese Muslims), 256 (edition of Han kitab s—Confuciano-Muslim books), 260 (Yang Zhongming’s comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam in the Sijiao yaogua), 260 (Ma Jian’s translations from Chinese into Arabic, notably that of the Confucian Lunyu), 262 (place of Confucianism and Sufism in the readings of twentieth-century ahong s)

CONGRESSES, CONFERENCES, AND FAIRS: 6 , 27 (al-Kawakibi’s fictitious Mecca conference); 7 (General Islamic Conference for the Caliphate in Cairo in 1926), 7, 198 (General Islamic Conference of Jerusalem in 1931); 27 (conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama in London in 2004), 65 (early twentieth-century conferences of Protestant missionaries in Jerusalem), 101 (World Islamic Congress of Mecca in 1926), 150 (discussion by al-Imam of a proposed Congress of Religion to be held in Tokyo), 165 (international conference of Algeçiras in 1906), 176 (Sh. Arslan’s participation in anticolonial congresses in Paris, Berlin, and Rome), 181 (meeting of Trotsky and Arslan during a general conference of the Komintern in Moscow), 183 (regular publication of reports of Zionist congresses in Europe by La Nation arabe), 187, 190 (Arslan’s attendance of the socialist and anti-imperialist in Berne, Geonoa, and Brussels 1919–1927), 187 (Arslan’s attendance of the tenth Anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution in Moscow in 1927), 191 , 193 –194 (European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 194 (Pan-Polish Muslim Congress of 1925), 194 (Muslim Congress of Cairo in 1926), 199 (Bludan Congress of 1937 against the Zionist immigration to Palestine), 215 (the Bandoeng Conference and its impact on the political utilization of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia), 246 (conference of Wuchang in 1937, organized by Bai Conqxi for mobilizing the Chinese Muslims against the Japanese), 293 (representation of the Muslims of Germany by the Zentral Rat der Muslime in the 2000 World’s Fair in Hannover), see also associations and societies; networks and networking; travels and travelling

CONSTITUTIONALISM: 61 (Turkey’s early twentieth-century constitutionalism as a model for the world of Islam), 61, 161

(Japan’s early twentieth-century constitution as a model for the world of Islam), 61 (early twentieth-century claims by religious scholars of Morocco for a consultative regime), 161 –174 (article by S. Reichmuth), 161 (early twentieth-century Chinese constitutionalist movement, and its impact outside China), 163 (nineteenth-century constitutional initiative in Tunisia), 165 (convocation of the “Assembly of Notables” by the Morocan sultan ‘Abd al-’Aziz in 1904–5), 167 (Iranian monarch Mohammad ‘Ali Shah’s role in the Constitutional Revolution), 296 (constitutionalism in the work of twentieth-century Muslim religious intellectuals), see also leadership; parliament; state and state apparatus

CONSULTATION AND CONSULTATIVE RÉGIMES (Arabic: mura): 61 (consultative régimes in early twentieth-century Japan, Iran, Egypt, and Turkey), 80 (popularization of the concept of a consultative régime by the Young Ottomans), 169 (Rashid Rida and ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s reference to the recommendation of consultation in the Qur1 an)

COUNCIL SYSTEM (instigated from the 1970s onward by the Nizari Imams): 233 (its organization in the Isma ‘ili communities of Northern Pakistan)

COUNCIL-ON-FOOT: see ayak divâni CRIMEA: 88 (its annexation to Russia in 1783 and the consequences of this event on Russia’s policy toward Islam), 89 (experimentation of the usul-i ëadid education method by Gaspralï in the 1880s)

CRIMEAN WAR (in 1854–1855): 93 (its perception by Russia’s Muslims)

CROATIANS: 212 (their share in the population of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

CULTURAL FRIENDLY ASSOCIATION OF THE HUI RELIGION OF CHINA (Zhongguo Huijiao wenhua xiehui): 244 –245 (its creation in Shanghai in 1934)

CULTURAL REVOLUTION: 260 , 261 (its impact on the Chinese Muslim community, and on the personal destiny of its religious leaders)

CUP (Committee of Union and Progress): 41 (its branches in Syria), 43 (its participation in the failed underground publication of a journal in Homs), 44 (its support by Qadiri Sufis in Syria), 46 (Rafiq al-'Azm's adhesion to its branch in Damascus), 75 (A. Cevdet's role in its foundation), 78 (links of a number of its members with Sufi lodges and organizations), 179 (Sh. Arslan's meeting with officers from the CUP during the Cyrenaica campaign of 1911–1912), 179 (Kayali on the CUP as an advocate of Ottoman nationalism, and on its "conversion" to Islamism after the Balkan wars), 180 –181 (exile of the CUP leadership in Berlin in 1918), 181 (Enver Pava's foundation of the Islamic International as an extension of the CUP), 181 (CUP's successive adaptation of Ottomanism, Islamism, and Turkism)

CYRENAICA: 179 (Ottoman campaign of 1911–1912 to preserve it against Italian conquest)

DA PUSHENG (Nanking-born Muslim Chinese religious scholar of Shanghai, graduated from al-Azhar, one of the "Four Great Ahong s" of China): 244 (his role in the relations of the Muslim community of China with the Guomindang and the Communist Party, and in the creation of the Guild of the Hui Religion in China, in 1929), 246 (his participation in the Wuchang conference, and in the creation and administration of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the the Salvation of the Country), 250 , 260 (its initiation, with Wang Haoran, in 1907, of the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion at the Beijing mosque of Ox Street), 251 (his co-direction of the Normal Islamic School of Shanghai since 1928), 251 (his leading role in the creation and administration of the Normal Islamic School of Pingliang, in Gansu, since 1937), 257 (a summarized biography, including his links with Ma Linyi, his travel to India)

DADIa (early eighteenth-century Dalmatian traveller): 163 (his mention of the interest of Istanbul's ruling circles in the form of government of Venice)

DAHOMEY: 166 (workplace of 'Abd al-Karim Murad's)

DAI NIPPON KAIKYO KYOKAI ("Great Japan Islamic Society," created in Tokyo in 1938): 284 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's participation in its organization)

DALI, SAYYID MUHAMMAD (professor from al-Azhar): 131 (his arrival to the Chengda Normal School in 1933)

DAMASCUS: 179 (Cemal Pava's reign of terror in 1914–1917, and its political consequences), 188, 189 –190 (impact of Wilhelm II's declaration, in 1898, on Germany being the protector of Muslims), 298 (the distribution of Shahrur's al-Kitab wa'l-Qur'a in both authorized [Damascus and Beirut] and pirate [Cairo] editions)

DANISHGAH-I KHANAH-I HIKMAT (lit. "The University of the House of Wisdom"): 236 (creation of this locus of Isma 'ili religious studies in Hunza in 1961, and its relocation in Karachi in 1977) \

DERVAV VAHDETÎ (1870–1909, Naqshbandi shaykh, leader of the /ttihâd-i Muhammedî Cemiyeti): 75 (his role in the counterrevolution of April 1909)

DHAHABI, MUHAMMAD HUSAYN (Egyptian specialist of tafsir): 17

AL-DIN WA'L-ADAB ("Religion and Good Manners," Tatar journal published by Barudi in 1906–1908 and 1913–1917):

95 (its popularization of Barudi's madrasa teaching)

DIN WA MA'IMAT ("Religion and Life," conservative journal published in Orenburg in 1906–1917): 102 (as a tribune for Muslim religious people), 106 (its quotations from al-Manār)

DING BAOCHEN (journalist of Beijing): 259 (his influence on Wang Jingzhai as a defender of the colloquial Chinese language and literature)

DAVÂN-I HÜMÂYUN (Imperial Council, in the Ottoman Empire): 162 (its consultative and representative mechanisms)

DAYANET /VLERA RAYASETA ("Directorate of Religious Affairs of Turkey"): 79 (its order of a Turkish translation of the Qur1 an from Mehmed Âkif)

DJOZO, HUSEIN (1912–1982, collaborator of Kemura's): 215 (as a representative of the official leaders of the Muslim Religious Community under Tito)

DOBRAbA, KASIM (1910–79, Bosnian specialist of Oriental manuscripts): 216 (as a representative of the opposition trend among the Muslims of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

DRUZES (Lebanese heterodox sect of Isma ‘ili Islam): 177 –178 (as Arslan’s original milieu)

DUBAI: 4 (Islamic bank of Dubai)

DUNHUA SCHOOL OF SHANGHAI: 258 (its sponsorship by Sha Shanyu after Second World War)

DURICS, HUSZEIN HILMI (Mufti of the Muslims of Hungary in 1934–1936): 192 –193 (his regular contacts with Arslan)

DUTCH EAST INDIES: 144 (Dutch efforts at banning al-Manār from their colonies), 147 (arrest of Shaykh Muhammad Tahir in Sumatra on suspicion of Communist leanings), 151 (defence of the Riau court by al-Imam vs. encroachments of the Dutch administration)

D?ABIa, ALI FEHMI (1853–1918, Mufti of Mostar and a teacher at the University of Istanbul): 218 (as a representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

D?EMALOVIa, SMAIL: 192 (his series of articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe)

EAST ASIA: 25 (late twentieth-century reference for non-Western modernization)

“EASTERNERS”: 63 –64 (dress and textile industry as an element of “Eastern” identity)

EDICTS OF RELIGIOUS TOLERANCE (taken by the Czars of Russia): 88 (by Catherine II in June 1773), 93 (by Nicholas II in April 1905)

EDUCATION: 24 , 26 –27 (education of Muslim Brother leaders in secular institutions), 76 (Young Turks’ Islamic reforms in the judicial and educational systems), 89 (experimentation of the usul-i ëadid by Gaspralï in Crimea in the 1880s), 89 , 277 (N. Il’minskij’s policy of school instruction in vernacular languages and Cyrillic script for the non-Orthodox peoples of the Russian Empire), 146 , 154 (Shaykh Ahmad Khatib al-Minangkabawi’s role as a teacher for many students from Java in Mecca), 238 (changes in the mode of acquisition of literacy among present-day Isma ‘ilis, and its strengthening of self-help), 241 (expansion of popular religious education seen by Chinese Muslims as a condition to modernization), 244 (education of ahong s as an aim of the Guild of the Hui Religion of China), 245 (action of the Society for the Promotion of the Education of the Hui People, in Ningxia, for bringing together the Uighurs and the Muslim Han through a common education), 247 (“Save the Country by Education,” motto popular in China since the late Qing), 247 –248 (the opposition of the “New Style of Education (xinshi jaioyu)” to the “Scriptural Hall Education (jingtang jiaoyu)”—that is the traditional system of mosque instruction—in early twentieth-century China), 248 (correct religious education seen as the absolute remedy for all the evils of the time—among early twentieth-century Chinese Muslims), 248 (giving up of making the pupils drone by heart the Q. in Chinese Muslim religious schools, and the launching of a phonetic method of teaching Arabic language), 255 (Western Chinese warlords’ work in favor of reformed education), 262 (education as the royal way of entering the modern world, to the eyes of Chinese Muslim reformists), 274

(‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim urging his fellow Muslims to engage in educational reform instead of armed opposition to the ruling power), 276 (educational progresses of the Meiji era in Japan, and their impact on Muslim travellers), 289 (formal education being challenged by the ability to communicate in different media in the contemporary Muslim majority world), 290, 294 –295 (rise of mass education and the increased power of intellectuals to communicate and of audiences to discuss), 295 –296 (Nursi’s apology of early twentieth-century Western-style school education among the Muslims), 297 (F. Gülen’s interpretation of Islamic values offering a union between religion and science, faith and nationalism, education and the market economy, and tradition and modernity), see also ethics; madrasa; schools and schooling; sponsorship, teaching; universities

EGYPT: 4 (beginning of an Islamic revival in Egypt in the late 1970s), 14 (‘Abduh’s authority as the Grand Mufti of Egypt), 24 (impact of al-Azhar’s reform on legal and educational reforms), 27 (Muslim Brothers in Egypt), 43 , 46 (Egypt as a refuge to Rafiq al-’Azm in 1894), 46 (participation of Turks, Armenians, and Circassians of Egypt in the Ottoman Consultation Society), 61, 161 (early twentieth-century constitutionalism as a model for the world of Islam), 65 (Rida’s denunciation of early twentieth-century Westernization trends), 66 (edition by the Egyptian press of Italian and British texts urging women to return to decency in dress), 79 (Egypt as a refuge to Mehmed Âkif in 1926), 85 (fascination for Egypt among Muslim literati in late Imperial Russia), 86 (Egypt as a major destination for Muslim travellers from the Russian Empire), 122 –123 , 259 (influence of Wang Haoran’s travels to Turkey and Egypt on his reformist thought), 127 (information on Egypt in Hui periodicals of the 1930s), 128, 253 (Chinese translations from Egyptian Salafi journals in the 1930s), 131 (relations between al-Azhar and the Chengda Normal School), 145 (description of Egypt in Shaykh al-Hadi’s novel Farida Lanum), 148 (Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi accompanying the Sultan and Raja Muda of Riau to the hajj and to Egypt), 163 (nineteenthcentury constitutional initiatives by Egyptian sovereigns), 164 (support of Syrian Islamic reformists to Young Ottomans and Young Turks), 177 (Arslan’s Egyptian network), 187 (the British occupation of Egypt since 1882), 250 –251 , 260 (Ma Songting’s travel to Egypt and other Islamic countries, in 1932–1933, to find out new pedagogical methods), 255 (Ma Bufang’s travel to Egypt in the early 1950s), 260 (Ha Decheng’s travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society), 260 (Ha Decheng’s importation of Islamic literature from Egypt, India, and Turkey), 300 (resistance to the challenges to their authority by stateappointed hierarchies in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and ex-Soviet Central Asia), see also al-Azhar; Cairo

ENGINEERING: 46 (as a discipline to be caught up from Europeans)

ENGLISH LANGUAGE: 178 (its study by Arslan), 193 (E. as one of the languages of the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 237 (the central place of E. in modern Isma ‘ilis’ education and literacy), 249 (E. as a matter of teaching in Chinese Muslim reformed religious schools), 257 (Da Pusheng’s learning of English language in India), 260 (Ha Decheng’s fluency in Arabic language, Urdu, and English), 297 (E. language as the language of instruction in F. Gülen’s schools outside Turkey)

ENVER PAVA (1881–1922, Young Turk leader and Ottoman Turkish statesman): 179 (his first meeting with Sh. Arslan during the Cyrenaica campaign, and origin of their lasting friendship), 180 –181 (his deeds in the former Russian Empire and his death in Eastern Bukhara), 181 (his foundation of the Islamic International as an extension of the CUP), 188 (his sending of Arslan to Berlin to negotiate problems regarding the Caucasus), 281 (his acquaintance with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim during the Balkan War of 1912)

ESCORIAL: 200 (Sh. Arslan’s consultation of manuscripts on the history of Muslim Spain)

ETHICS (Arabic: allaq): 90 (role of ethics literature in the reform of Russia’s madrasas), 100 (“women question” in the ethical debates of the 1900 to 1910s in Russia), 296 (relation of Islamic belief to modern science in the work of twentiethcentury Muslim religious intellectuals), 297 (instillation by F. Gülen’s movement of a morality and sense of discipline intended to pervade private conduct and public life), see also alcohol and alcoholism; clothing; education; women and the “women question”

ETOILE NORD-AFRICAINE (political organization created by Messali al-Hajj): 201 (its affinities with the French Communist Party)

EUROPE: 187 (on representations of Europe as an imperial threat since the 1880s), 295 (expansion of the Nurcu movement outside Turkey)

EUROPEAN MUSLIM CONGRESS OF GENEVA (in 1935): 191 (debates on the Italian administration of Libya), 193 (composition of the congress and Arslan’s personal role), 194 (mobilization by the congress of resources for the building of a mosque in Warsaw)

EUROPEANIZATION: see Westernization

EUROPEANS: 59 –63 (their domination over the world of Islam, its alleged benefits for the Muslims, and the reactions to this idea after First World War), 163 (challenge of European hegemony and its role in the emergence of constitutional movements outside Europe), 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe)

EXAMINATION (civil service examination of Bachelor [xiucai] in imperial China): 242 (its abolition in September 1905),

260 (its passing by the self-taught reformist ahong Yang Zhongming in 1899)

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE (of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, in Cairo): 184 (its tentative marginalization by the Finance Committee after 1925), 184 –185 (Arslan’s resignation from the E.C., followed by Lutfallah’s ousting from the chairmanship of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in 1927, and by the creation of a concurrent E.C.)

EXILE: 77 (division of Turkism between “Ottomans” and Turkic exiles), 218 (M. T. Oki- and A. Zulfikarpasi-, representatives of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora), 275 (exile of Muslim intellectuals of Russia to Turkey after the Czarist reaction of 1907 and the Young Turk revolution of 1908), see also migration

FAISAL (ruler in Syria, then in Iraq [1921–1933] in the aftermath of First World War): 50 (the swelling of popular nationalism during his brief rule in Syria), 177 (Sh. Arslan’s offering of his services for council and mediation during his reign in Iraq), 180 –181 (suppression of his ephemerous Syrian kingdom by the French), 181 (bearing of a message from him by Arslan to Zinoviev), 182 (his choice of al-Jabiri as his Chamberlain during his short reign in Syria), 195 (support given to him by Arslan in his attempts to unite Iraq and Syria), 196 (preparation by Arslan of the 1930 treaty of friendship with Ibn Saud)

FANGHUI KINDERGARTEN (Fanghui youzhiyuan): 255 (its creation by Ma Bufang)

FARIDA LANUM (novel on the women question by Shaykh al-Hadi): 145 (setting up of its intrigue in Cairo)

AL-FARRA, ABU YA’LA (990–1065, classical theoretician of the state): 22 (as a premodern predecessor to Rashid Rida)

FARUQ (1920–1965, King of Egypt in 1936–1952): 133 (his role in the relations between al-Azhar and the Chengda Normal School)

FASCISM: 190 –191 (Sh. Arslan’s relationship to Mussolini, and to his policy in Libya) 214, 216 (impact of Fascism on Bosnian-Herzegovinian intellectuals during and after Second World War), see also nation and nationalism

AL-FASI, ‘ALLAL (1906–1974, Moroccan nationalist leader and statesman): 199 (his contacts with Sh. Arslan)

AL-FATH (Salafi periodical published in Cairo): 55 (journalistic forum of the Salafiyya in Egypt), 60 (a 1947 article on the love of the Arabs as a pillar of Islam), 63 (edition of a paper on the wearing of a turban or a fez), 128 (al-F.’s spreading in China in the 1930s), 198 (Sh. Arslan’s papers against the Berber Dahir)

FATIMIDS (tenth to twelfth centuries Isma ‘ili dynasty of North Africa, then Egypt and Syria): 237 (Fatimid period seen as a golden age by present-day Isma ‘ili scholars and literati)

FATWA : 14 –16 , 27 (al-Manār ’s struggle to make iëtihad possible and to issue modern fatwa s), 28 –29 (al-Qaradawi’s continuation of al-Manār ’s mission of issuing fatwa s on contemporary questions), 47 (review by al-Manār of a treatise by al-Qasimi on the history and nature of the fatwa), 48 (Rashid Rida’s fatwa against the Shiite practice of cursing Mu’Awiya), see also fiqh, maùhab, Shari’A

FEMINISM: see women and the “women question”

FENHUI (Chinese word: subsidiary association): 243 (creation in 1912 of the first nation-wide association of Muslims of China, with subsidiary associations), 245 (creation, in Lanzhou, of a subsidiary association of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China), 247 (subsidiary associations of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), see also associations and societies

FEZ: 165 (siege of the Kattaniyya mystical path), 166 (the coming of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad in 1906)

FI ZILAL AL-QUR’A (work on tafsir by Sayyid Qutb): 20 (its influence compared to that of the Tafsir al-Manār)

FIKRET, TEVFIK (1870–1915, leader of Westernists in late Ottoman Turkey): 75 (his attacks against the doctrines of the Islamic state)

FILFILA, MUHAMMAD IBRAHIM (professor from al-Azhar): 131 (his arrival to the Chengda Normal School in 1933)

FILIPOVIa, MUHAMED (b. 1929, Marxist philosopher of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 217 , 218 (as a representative of the ideology of “ethnic Muslims” in B.-H.)

FILIPOVIa, NENAD (b. 1962, Bosnian Ottomanist): 218 (as a representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

FINANCE COMMITTEE (of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, in Jerusalem): 184 (its creation by the Istiqlalist wing of the congress, and its financial support by Ibn Saud)

FIQH (Islamic jurisprudence): 44 (attack of traditional fiqh by al-Zahrawi), 47 (publication by al-Qasimi of al-Z.'s treatise on jurisprudence, philosophy, and logic), 75 (Islamist critic of mezhepsizlik as undermining the traditional legal apparatus), 76 (Young Turks' Islamic reforms in the judicial and educational systems), 95 (central place of the usul al-fiqh [the methodology of jurisprudence] in Barudi's teaching), 298 – 299 (Shahrur's analogy between the Copernician revolution and Qur 1 anic interpretation, and his challenge to the authoritative tradition of tafsir and fiqh), see also fatwa; maùhab ; Shari'A

FIRSTWORLDWAR: 74 (its consequences on the debates about the role of Islam in the Ottoman society), 183 (its overall influence on the political situation in the Near-East)

FITRAT, 'Abd AL-RA'UF (1886–1937, Bukharan writer and political activist): 279 –280 (his comments on 'Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's Istanbul conferences)

FRANCE: 65 (restitution of their confiscated endowments to Catholic organizations), 163 (influence of French political thought in the world of Islam), 164 –165 , 167 (France's early twentieth-century interference into the affairs of Morocco), 180 –181 (French suppression of Faisal's kingdom in Syria), 182 (shaking of the French colonial empire by the Rif Mountains and the Syrian revolts in 1925), 182 (French Mandate on Lebanon, and the declaration of independence of 1920), 184 (opposition to French colonization policy by the Mufti of Jerusalem al-Husayni), 186 (circumstances of the French-Syrian treaty of independence in 1936), 187 (French occupation of Tunisia since 1881), 187 (Sh. Arslan’s rapprochement with the French anti-colonial left), 190 (von Oppenheim’s grand plans for expelling the French and British from the Middle East), 200 –201 (new perception of France in Arab nationalist circles after the Franco-Syrian Treaty of 1937), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s denunciation of Russian, British, and French colonization), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany)

FRATERNITY OF THE TATAR STUDENTS IN CAIRO: 96 (on its creation in 1906)

FRENCH COLONIES: 65 (encouragement of Catholic organizations to spread Christianity in North Africa and Syria)

FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY: 201 (its alliance with Messali al-Hajj’s Etoile Nord-Africaine)

FRENCH LANGUAGE: 176 (language of publication of La Nation arabe), 178 (its study by Sh. Arslan), 193 (one of the languages of the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935)

FRIENDLY ASSOCIATION OF THE HUI PEOPLE OF CHINA FOR THE RESISTANCE TO JAPAN AND THE SALVATION OF THE COUNTRY (Zhongguo Huimin kangri jiuguo xiehui): 246 (its creation in 1937 in Tianjin)

FRIENDLY ASSOCIATION OF THE HUI PEOPLE OF CHINA FOR THE SALVATION OF THE COUNTRY (Zhongguo Huimin jiuguo xiehui): 246 –247 (its creation in 1937 at the Wuchang conference, relocation to Chongqing in 1938, and change of name), 246 –247, 255 (Bai Chonqxi’s role in its history), 258 (Tang Kesan’s role in its history), 259 (Wang Jingzhai’s role in its history)

FRIENDLY ASSOCIATION OF THE HUI RELIGION OF CHINA FOR THE SALVATION OF THE COUNTRY: see Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country

FU TONGXIAN (modernist thinker and the author of a reference history of Chinese Islam): 244 –245 (his participation in the foundation of the Cultural and Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China, in Shanghai, in 1934)

FU'AD (1868–1936, King of Egypt in 1922–1936): 131 , 250 –251 (his role in the setting up of relations between al-Azhar and the Chengda Normal School)

FUDE LIBRARY (Fude tushuguan, in Chengda Normal School): 133 , 250 –251, 260 (its creation in 1936 in memory of King Fu1 ad of Egypt)

ËAMA'A (semi-corporate community of scholars headed by a qadi): 162 (its representation in late medieval Timbuktu)

ËAMA'AT-LANA : see jamaat-khana

ËAM'IYYAT AL-MAQASID AL-LAYRIYYA (early twentieth-century benevolent society in Beirut): 166 (its influence on 'Abd al-Karim Murad's Islamic societies)

ËAM'IYYAT AL-MUBBAN AL-MUSLIMU¯N ('Organization of Muslim Youths'): 68 (opening of its numerous chapters in Arab countries)

GANSU: 251 (creation of the Normal Islamic School of Pingliang, in 1937)

GASPRALÏ (or Gasprinskij, Ismail Bey, 1869–1914, a Crimean Tatar publicist): 85 (his publication of his journal al- Nahda in Cairo in 1908), 89 (his experimentation of the usul-i ëadid in Crimea since 1881, and publication of the Tarëuman from 1883 onward)

AL-GAYLANI, ‘ALI (an Iraqi Prime Minister), 190 (his proposal of an alliance with Germany in the fall of 1940)

G.

AZA: see italic>jihad

GAZI HUSREV-BEG MEDRESE (in Sarajevo): 216 (its role in the education of the official religious leaders of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia during the Communist period)

GELLNER, ERNST (philosopher and anthropologist of Muslim majority societies): 290 (on Islam as the only force resisting against the trend toward secularization and nationalism since the collapse of Marxist regimes)

GELVIN, JAMES (historian of post-First World War Syria): 50 (his depiction of two nationalist subcultures, one popular, another elitist)

GENERAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PURE AND TRUE EDUCATION OF EAST ASIA (Dongya Qingzhen jiaoyu zonghui): see General Association for the Religious Education of the Muslim People of East Asia

GENERAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE RELIGIOUS EDUCATION OF THE MUSLIM PEOPLE OF EAST ASIA (Dongya Mumin jiaoyu zonghui): 242, 243 (its creation in 1906 in Zhenjiang, and its renaming)

GENEVA: 178 (editing and printing place of La Nation arabe), 181 –182 (creation of the Syrian Congress in 1921 for petitioning the League of Nations Permanent Mandates Commission), 191 , 193 –194 (Muslim Congress of Europe in 1935), 194 (hope of members of the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for the building of a mosque in Budapest)

GENOA: 187 , 190 (Sh. Arslan’s attendance of the congress of the League of Oppressed Nations in 1921, and his probable meeting there with Mussolini)

GERMAN LANGUAGE: 193 (one of the languages of the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935)

GERMAN SOCIETY FOR ISLAMIC STUDIES: 189 (its studies on Sh. Arslan’s work between 1915 and 1938), 194 (Szynkewicz’ role in its foundation)

GERMANY: 184 (counterweight to British and French hegemony in the Near-East), 184 (its support by Sh. Arslan and al-Husayni during Second World War), 188 (Arslan’s overall relationship with this country), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany)

GHANEM, SHUKRI (Maronite Lebanese political activist): 186 (his presumed role in the failure of the negotiations between Arslan and the French authorities in 1925–1926)

AL-GHAZALI (twelfth-century prominent philosopher of Islam): 99 (his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

GHIZR: 229 (tightening of British control over this region, and its consequence for the modern history of Isma ‘ilism), 230 –231 (history of a modern pir family in Ghizr)

GIBB, H. A. R. (historian of the world of Islam): 57 (on the theoretical unity of religion and state in Islam)

GIRARD, ANDRÉ (law professor at the University of Paris): 192 (his polemics with S. D?emalovi- on the condition of Muslims in Bulgaria)

GOETHE MUSEUM (in Berlin): 187 (its visit by Sh. Arslan in 1917)

GÖKALP, ZAYA (1876–1924, theoretician of Turkish nationalism): 77 (his role as the leading figure of the Osmanlis)

GOLDEN HORDE: 103 (as a historical entity of reference for Russia’s nineteenthcentury Muslim reformers)

GREAT BRITAIN: 65 (Protestant revivalism), 66 (spread of publications urging women to return to religious decency in dress and conduct), 163 (influence of British political thought in the world of Islam), 180 (British invasion of Jerusalem in 1917), 183 (political consequences of the coming of the British to the Near-East after First World War), 184 (opposition to British colonization policy in the world of Islam by the Mufti of Jerusalem al-Husayni), 187 (British occupation of Egypt in 1882), 187 (support of the post-First World War British left to Zionism as an obstacle to rapprochement with Arab nationalists), 190 (von Oppenheim’s grand plans for expelling the French and British from the Middle East), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s denunciation of Russian, British, and French colonization)

GREEKS (the Muslims of Greek origin in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 211 (their place in the Muslim populations of the Balkans)

GU JIEGANG (leading personality of the Chinese cultural world, at the eve of the Japanese invasion): 251 (his involvement into the creation of the Fude Library)

GUILD OF THE HUI RELIGION IN CHINA (Zhongguo Huijiao gonghui): 244 (its creation in Shanghai in 1929, and its failure to fulfil its goals)

GUILIN (city in southern China): 134 , 251 (relocation of the Chengda Normal School, from 1937 to 1945)

GÜL BABA ASSOCIATION (in Budapest): 192 –193 (its reception of Sh. Arslan in 1934)

GÜLEN, FETHULLAH (b. 1938, Turkish religious intellectual, a leading disciple of Nursi): 294 , 300 (contribution of his movement to the emergence of a public sphere in Turkey), 297 , 301 (his interpretation of Islamic values offering a union between religion and science, faith and nationalism, education and the market economy, and tradition and modernity)

ÆUM cD (Arabic: “rigidity”): 58 (debate between Renan and ‘Abduh on the question of the “rigidity” of Islam)

GUO MORUO (or Kuo Mo-jo, Chinese writer): 246 –247 (his membership of the Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion)

GUOJIA CHISHANG (“The Acme of the Nation,” a play by Lao She): 247 (its command by the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country, and its first representation in Congqing in 1940)

GUOMINDANG (Chinese Nationalist Party): 117 , 123 (its support by Chinese Muslim leaders, during the Republican period), 134 (its support to Yuehua ’s publication and diffusion after 1937), 241 (breaking of the G.’s alliance with the Communist Party in 1927), 244 , 245 (checking of Sun Yatsen’s “Three People Principles” by Chinese Muslim students of Nanking, in search of contradictions with Islam), 245 (promotion of a Muslim lobby inside the Guomindang), 249 (the support given by the Ikhwani movement to the G., as the guarantee of a strong power)

GYPSIES (Muslims of Gypsy origin in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 211 (their place in the Muslim populations of the Balkans)

HA DECHENG (1888–1943, an ahong from Shanghai—one of the “Four Great Ahong s” of China—and the manager of an international commercial society): 243 –244 , 260 (role of his society in financing the schooling of future ahong s, and in purchase of Islamic books overseas), 244 (his leading role in the creation of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China), 246

(his participation in the Wuchang conference, and in creation of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the the Salvation of the Country), 251 (his co-direction of the Normal Islamic School of Shanghai since 1928), 253 (his choice of classical Chinese language for the translation of the Qur 1 an), 258 (his collaboration with Shu Shanyu and Wu Tegong on his translation of the Qur1 an), 260 (influence of his hajj in 1913 on his rejection of the traditional mosque teaching), 260 (language abilities, and his travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society)

HADDAD, MAHMOUD (historian of Islamic reform): 23 (his insistence on Rida's concern on the political independence of Islam)

HADHRAMAWT (in Yemen, place of origin of leading Malay-Indonesian ulama): 148 (for Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi), 149 (for Shaykh Muhammad-Salim al-Kalali)

HADITH (sayings of the Prophet Muhammad): 48 (early twentieth-century debates on the Umayyad caliph Mu'Awiya's role in their transmission), 56 ('Abduh's praise of the Wahhabiyya for removing layers between men and a true study of the Qur 1 an and Hadith), 57 ('Abduh's comment on the Prophet Muhammad's saying about the scholar's independence from unjust rulers), 96 (Hadith's rational approach in Barudi's teaching), 99 –100 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din's focusing of religious teaching on the Qur1 an and the Sunna), 102 –103 (publication by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din of a set of comments on the Hadith), 122 (early twentieth-century Hui calls for a return to the Qur1 an and the Hadith, within the framework of Chinese Islam), 125 (need for accurate translations and interpretations of the Hadith stressed by Chinese Muslim reformers), 126 –127 , 129, 131 –132 , 134, 135 (use of Hadith by Hui thinkers for defining watan), 150 (al-Imam 's emphasis on the need to return to the Qur 1 an and the Hadith)

HAD?IBAJRIa, FEJZULAH (1913–1990, learned Qadiri shaykh, and opponent to the Yugoslavian Communist regime): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

HAD?IBEGIa, HAMID (1898–1988, Bosnian- Herzegovinian historian): 217 (representative of the crypto-opponent trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

HAD?Ia, KASIM (1917–1990, Muslim religious writer of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

HAD?Ia, OSMAN NURI (1869–1939, Bosnian writer on Islamic topics): 213 (representative of the modertate jadid group)

HAD?IJAHIa, MUHAMED (1918–1986, Muslim religious writer and historian of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

HAFIZ (a Persian classical poet): 79 (his influence on the young M. Âkif)

HAI-LI-FAN: see ahong

HAIKARA (Japanese word, from the English “high collar”: an adjective pointing at western lifestyles adopted in Meiji Japan, used with a nuance of both admiration and cynicism): 276 –277 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s warnings against superficial Westernization in Japan)

HAJI ‘ABBAS BIN MUHAMMAD TAHA (‘Alim from Singapore, second editor of al-Imam, in 1908): 147 –148 (his biography, especially his call for the creation of the Persekutuan Ulama Kaum Semenanjung)

HAJI ‘AbdULLAH AHMAD (founder of the Sekolah Diniyyah al-Islamiyyah, of the Adabiyah Diniyyah School, and of al-Munir in Minangkabau): 153 –154 (his biography, especially his studies in Mecca and his Salafi da’wa in Java)

HAJI AHMAD MANAM (1834–1938, reformist ‘Alim of the Kelantan region): 145 (sources of his reformist ideas)

HAJI MUHAMMAD YUSSOF BIN MUHAMMAD: see Tok Kenali

HAJI WAN MUSA BIN HAJI ABDUL SAMAD (1874–1939, reformist ‘Alim of the Kelantan region): 145 (the sources of his reformist ideas)

HAJJ (the pilgrimage to Mecca): 96 (its place in the biography of early twentiethcentury Muslim intellectuals from Russia), 122 –123, 259 (influence of his hajj, and of his travels to Egypt and Turkey on Wang Haoran’s reformist ideas), 144 (role of Indonesian hajjis in the diffusion of al-Manār in the Archipelago), 147 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir settling down in Singapore as an organizer of the pilgrim brokerage), 148 (Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi accompanying the Sultan and Raja Muda of Riau to the hajj and to Egypt), 195 (the hajj made by Arslan in 1929 for meeting Ibn Saud), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi’s sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul), 260 (Ha Decheng’s hajj, in 1913, and its influence on his rejection of the traditional mosque teaching), 261 (influence of Hu Songshan’s hajj on his Chinese nationalist convictions), 263 (the hajj as the best occasion for a discovery of the outside world for twentieth-century Chinese Muslim intellectuals), see also networks and networking; travels and travelling

AL-HAJJ, MESSALI (1898–1974, Algerian nationalist and socialist leader): 201 (Sh. Arslan’s influence on his ideological evolution)

LALIFA (Arabic, “successor”): 228 –289 (title in the religious hierarchy of the Isma ‘ili community), see also hai-li-fan

HALAM, SAAD (Ottoman Grand Vizier in 1913–1917): 188 (his strained relations with the German ambassador Wangenheim, and Sh. Arslan’s intermediary between them)

HALLAQ, WAEL B. (historian of the Islamic thought): 14 (his demonstration that iëtihad was exercised at least up till the sixteenth century)

HAN: 245 (action of the Society for the Promotion of the Education of the Hui People, in Ningxia, for bringing together the Uighurs and the Muslim Han)

HAN KITAB (Confuciano-Muslim books): 256 , 262 (their edition in Western China in the 1930s)

HANAFI RITE: 14 (discourse of Ottoman Hanafi ulama on the closure of iëtihad), 92, 93 , 95 –96 (nineteenth-century rehabilitation of pre-Mongol Hanafi tradition in Central Asia and Russia), 103 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s apology of the practice of the shari’A in the pre-Mongol period)

HANBALI RITE: 14 –15 (its nonacknowledgement of the concept of a closure of iëtihad), 101 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s early Soviet sympathy for neo-Hanbali movements)

HAND?Ia, ADEM (1916–1998, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (representative of the crypto-opponent trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

HAND?Ia, MEHMED (1869–1939, famous Bosnian theologian): 213 (as a figure of the early twentieth-century “semireformist” trend in Yugoslavia)

HANAOÆLU, M. VÜKRÜ (historian of the Young Turks): 41 (on the breadth of opposition to Sultan Abdülhamid II in Syria), 44 (on the support of Qadiri Sufis to the CUP’s efforts in Syria in 1895–1897), 81 (on the belief of Ottoman statesmen that their destiny lays in Europe)

HANNOVER: 293 (representation of the Muslims of Germany by the Zentral Rat der Muslime in the 2000 World’s Fair in Hannover)

HASAN AL-BANNA (leading founder of the Muslim Brothers): 126 (diffusion of information on him and on the Muslim Brothers among the Hui of China), see also Ikhwani movement

HASANDEDIa, HIVZIJA (b. 1915, Muslim religious writer of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

HASHEMITES: 183 (opposition between Syrian and Palestinian elements of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress on the question of the allegiance to the H.)

HAVEL, VACLAV (Czech writer and statesman): 292 (on the compatibility of religious belief and modernirt)

HAVERIa, TARIK (b. 1955, Bosnian specialist of medieval Arabic philosophy): 218 (representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

HAYASHI SENJU¯RO (1876–1943, Japanese War and Prime Minister): 284 (his chairmanship of the Dai Nippon Kaikyo Kyokai)

HEADSCARF (Arabic: hiëab): 91 (Russian Orthodox Christian influence on the Muslim campaigns for the wearing of headscarf by women in late Imperial Russia), 297 (F. Gülen's advocacy of a public role for women in society, and statement that the wearing of the headscarf by women is a matter of personal choice), see also clothing; ethics; identity; westernization; women and the "women question"

HIGH INSTITUTE OF THE HUI PEOPLE (Huimin xueyuan): 251 (name taken by the Chengda Normal Scool after its final relocation in Beijing in 1945, until its suppression in 1958)

HIKAYAT PERCINTAAN KEMUDAAN (novel by the Malay writer Ahmad Kotot): 145 (manifesto of Islamic reform)

AL-LILAFA, WA AL-IMAMA AL-'UZMA FI ALISLAM (work on the Caliphate by Rashid Rida): 21

HINDENBURG, PAUL VON (1847–1934, President of Germany's Weimar Republic in 1925–1934): 188 –189 (his reception of Sh. Arslan in 1930)

HISTORY AND HISTORY WRITING: 4 (Anwar al-Sadat’s assassination as the landmark of a new era in the history of Islam), 64 (Turkish history as a proof of the country’s European character), 93 , 103 (imprint of Russian imperial historiography on the early twentieth-century Volga Tatar perceptions of the Volga Bulghars and of the Golden Horde), 128 , 134 (Yuehua ’s re-evaluations of Hui history in China), 217 (obligation for Bosnian-Herzegovinian Muslims to reinterpret the recent and remote past after the end of the Communist era), 232 (Islamic history as a matter of religious education by the wa’iz s among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s work “The Muslims in Russia, or a Short History of the Tatar People”), see also biography; identity

“HISTORY OF ISLAM” (in Chinese: Islan Zongjiaoshi): 131 (a work [1920] by Muhammad Khuzuli, translated into Chinese since 1933)

HOCHI SHINBUN (important early twentiethcentury Japanese newspaper): 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to the newspaper’s bureau in 1909) HOMS (city in Syria): 43 (tentative underground publication of a journal by al-Zahrawi)

HONG KONG: 247 (creation of a subsidiary association of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country)

HOURANI, ALBERT (historian of Islamic reform): 24 (on the discredit of Westernizers after the First World War), 38 (the critics of his introduction of the Islamic reform party as “progressive”), 43 (on al-Kawakibi’s animosity toward al-Sayyadi as the expression of family competition for religious authority in Aleppo)

HU SONGSHAN (1880–1956, anti-Sufi ahon? of the Ihwani school in Ningxia): 136 (his mobilization of the Hui against the Japanese occupation of China), 261 (influence of his hajj on his Chinese nationalist convictions; his transformation of the Ikhwani teaching into a pro-Chinese trend)

AL-HUDA (Malaysian newspaper published in Singapore): 144 (its distribution in Cairo)

HUGO, VICTOR (1802–1885, French writer): 79 (his influence on the young M. Âkif)

HUI (Chinese-speaking Muslims): 117 –142 (article by Matsumoto M.), 241 –172 (article by F. Aubin, in part. 242 , 245 – 247 : definition of the Hui as an ethnic [Huimin], religious [Huijiao], or national [Huizu] group)

HUIHUI MINZUWENTI (“The Hui Nationality Question”): 137 (booklet by Li Weihan on the CCP’s policy toward the Hui)

HUKIa, ABDURAHMAN (1921–1990, collaborator of Kemura’s): 215 (representative of the official leaders of the Muslim Religious Community under Tito)

HUMPHREYS, R. STEPHEN (historian of the world of Islam): 8 (on Islam as a significant political force in the Arab lands after Second World War)

HUNAN (province in south central China): 249 (the appearance of the first newstyle Chinese Muslim schools in 1898)

HUNGARY: 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe)

HUNTINGTON, SAMUEL (political philosopher): 294 (discussion of his “West vs. East” argument)

HUNZA: 229 (tightening of British control over this region, and its consequence for the modern history of Isma ‘ilism), 236 (creation of the Danishgah-i Khana-yi Hikmat in 1961)

HUNZA’I, ‘ALLAMA NASIR AL-DIN NASIR (b. 1917, an Isma ‘ili religious scholar of Northern Pakistan): 235 –237 (his contribution to the present-day re-interpretations of Nasir-i Khusraw’s works, and his poetry in Burushaski language)

HURAMOVIa, ABDUL HAMID (chairman of the Muslim Association, and member of the Oriental Institute of Warsaw): 194 (his participation in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935)

HURGRONJE, SNOUCK (leading adviser of the Dutch colonial government of East Indies on Islamic affairs): 67 (Rida’s response to his views), 144 (his suggestion that the Dutch supervise returning hajjis for preventing the diffusion of Islamic literature), 149 (his remark on al-Imam as a suitable place for the Sultans of Riau to publish their grievances)

HÜRRAYET (“Freedom,” newspaper published by the Young Ottomans in London in 1868–1870): 80 (its pioneering arguments on pan-Islamism)

HÜRRAYET VE /TALÂF FIRKASI (“Freedom and Association Party,” opposition party of the late Ottoman period): 78 (links of a number of its members with Sufism)

HUSAYNI FACTION (in Palestine): 184 (its opposition to the Nashashibi faction after First World War)

AL-HUSAYNI, HAJJAMIN (Mufti of Jerusalem, and the Chairman of the Supreme Muslim Council of Palestine in the 1910s to 1940s): 182 , 186 (his strategic alliance with Rida and the Arslan brothers inside the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 183 (modification of his role in the aftermath of First World War), 184 (his opposition to British and French colonization in the world of Islam), 184 (his alliance with the young Istiqlalists, and their creation of a special finance committee in Jerusalem in 1925), 190 (his proposal of an alliance with Germany in the fall of 1940), 196 –197 (his nomination of a delegation to arbitrate the conflict between Imam Yahya and Ibn Saud in 1934)

HUSAYNIYYA (reformed madrasa in Orenburg, Southern Urals): 98 (model of well-equipped urban educational institution in Russia), 100 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s teaching of the Hadith), 101 (the teaching activity of Bigi and of al-Qadiri)

HUSAYNOFF, AHMAD BAY (1837–1906, patron of the Husayniyya Madrasa): 100 (his introduction by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din as a model benefactor)

LUTBA (ARABIC: the Friday sermon): 299 (Shahrur’s use of the term qira’a [reading] instead of tafsir [Qur 1 an exegesis], and attacks against him in lutba s [Friday sermons] in Damascus and elsewhere)

LWAJA (Persian: “master,” title given notably to representatives of the Isma ‘ili Nizari Imam): 230 (this title given to Pir Sahib)

HYGIENE: 94 (insistence of Russia’s Muslim reformers on the improvement of sanitary conditions in mosques and madrasas), 256 (teaching of hygiene in the primary schools created by Ma Fuxiang in Ningxia)

IBADIS: 27 –28 (participation of Shiite and Ibadi scholars in the conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama in 2004)

IBN ABI DIYAF (d. 1874, Tunisian historian): 162 (his justification of the constitutional limitation of the ruler’s power)

IBN ‘AQIL, MUHAMMAD (early twentiethcentury Singapore reformist scholar–merchant of Hadrami origin): 48 –49 (his project of an essay against the Umayyad caliph Mu’Awiya)

IBN KHALDUN (fourteenth-century jurist and thinker from Ifriqiyya): 63 (quoted as an authority by al-Khatib on Muslims following the ways of other nations), 168 (adaptation by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad of his version of the concept of Circle of Equity)

IBN RUSHD (Averroes): 99 (his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

IBN SAUD (founder of the Saudi dynasty): 177 (Sh. Arslan’s offering of services for council and mediation), 184 (I.S.’s financial support to the Istiqlalist wing of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 190 (von Oppenheim’s grand plans for building an alliance with I.S.), 195 (I.S.’s invitation to Arslan to become a high official of his administration), 196 (preparation by Arslan of the 1930 treaty of friendship with Faisal)

IBN SHIHAB, SAYYID HASAN (early twelfthcentury scholar of Islam): 48 –49 (his essay refuting Ibn ‘Aqil)

IBN SHIHAB, SHAYKH ABU BAKR (Hadrami teacher in Hyderabad): 49 (his essay refuting Sayyid Hasan Ibn Shihab’s attack on Ibn ‘Aqil)

IBN TAYMIYYA (1263–1328, Hanbali jurist, great ancestor of modern reformist and revivalist thinkers): 8 (as the great ancestor of Salafiyya), 33 (al-Manār ’s review of I.T.’s multi-volume fatwa collection), 68 (al-Azhar’s use of his texts for basing fatwas), 77 (his introduction by Yaltikaya in the Turkist journal /slâm mecmuasi), 78 (publication of papers on him in the early Republican Turkish Sufi periodical Mihrab), 99 (his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

IBRAHIM (OR IBRAHIMOFF), ‘Abd AL-RASHID (1857–1944, a pan-Islamist Siberian Tatar activist): 273 –288 (article by Komatsu H.)

/BRAHAM MÜTEFERRAKA (d. 1745, highranking Ottoman bureaucrat of Hungarian origin): 163 (his proposals for military reforms along European lines)

/BRET (“Warning,” Turkish newspaper published in 1870–1903 by N. Kemal): 81 (its relations with M. Âkif)

/CTAHAD (Arabic iëtihad [q.v.]: Turkish journal edited in 1904–1932 by A. Cevdet): 75 (chief organ of Westernist ideas in the late Ottoman Empire), 77 (its interest in Islamic reform, especially in ‘Abduh’s thought)

IDENTITY: 6 (Rida’s emphasis on ’uruba), 6 –7 (al-Kawakibi’s ideas on Arab identity), 63 –64 (dress and textile industry as an element of “Eastern” identity), 297 (majority of Turks considering Islam as a part of their identity), 298 (measure of religious practice and identity through the observance of Ramadan in Turkey), see also clothing; history and history writing; nationalism

IDRISMURSHIDILMU’AzZAM SHAH (a Sultan of Perak): 147 (his appointment of Shaykh Muhammad Tahir after the latter’s return from Egypt)

IËMA2 (Arabic: consensus [of the learned]): 80 (popularization of the concept by the Young Ottomans, with a new political meaning)

IËTIHAD (Arabic, independent legal reasoning in the interpretation of sacred texts): 11 (its apology by al-Maraghi), 13 – 16 (posterity of al-Afghani and ‘Abduh’s thought on iëtihad), 27 (commonness of iëtihad and of innovative fatwa s in present-day Islam), 28 (al-Qaradawi’s apology of iëtihad), 47 (review by al-Manār of a treatise by al-Qasimi supporting the use of the telegraph in declaring the beginning and the end of Ramadan), 48 (al-Qasimi’s praise of Ibn ‘Aqil’s independent use of reason, qualified of ijtihad), 75 (hostility of Ottoman ulama to the reopening of “the gates of iëtihad “), 92 (opposition of taqlid and iëtihad in Islamic reformist thought), 150 (al-Imam ’s emphasis on the need to practice iëtihad), see also kalam, philosophy; reason

/HSANOÆLU, DR EKMELEDDAN (Secretary General of the OIC): 27 (his participation in the founding conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama)

AL-ILWAN (Malay-Indonesian journal first published in Pulau Pinang in 1926): 145 (its role in the spread of Kaum Muda ideas in the Kelantan region)

IKHWANI MOVEMENT (or “Muslim Brothers”): 249 (its Wahhabi roots, appearance in China in the early twentieth century, and influence on the arabization of religious teaching, and on the prohibition of Chinese and Sufi influence), 250 (Ikhwani influence on the creation of the Sino-Arabic schools in Western China), 250 (Ma Fuxiang’s knowledge of Confucianism, and sympathy for the Ikhwani movement), 253 (celebration of patriotism by Chinese adepts of the Ikhwani movement), 253 –254 (modern Ikhwani critic of Liu Zhi’s Tianfang xingli for its Sufi content), 255 (support to the Ikhwani movement by the Ma warlords of Western China), 261 (Hu Songshan’s transformation of the Ikhwani teaching into a pro-Chinese trend)

IL’MINSKIJ, NIKOLAJ (1822–1871, a Director of the Kazan Seminar for Orthodox Missionaries): 89 , 277 (his policy of school instruction in vernacular languages and Cyrillic script for the non-Orthodox peoples of the Russian Empire)

AL-IMAM (“The Community Leader,” Malay journal published in 1906–1908): 143 –158 (article by Azyumardi Azra, especially 145 –153)

IMAM YAHYA (Yemeni ruler): 177 (Sh. Arslan offering his services for council and mediation), 195 –196 (Imam Yahya’s conflicts with Ibn Saud)

IMAMA (Arabic: Islamic leadership): 43 (al-Zahrawi addressing the question of Muslim leadership)IMAMOVIa, MUSTAFA (b. 1941, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 218 (representative of the traditional secular intelligentsia)

IMAM(S): 241 (role played by local imams in the expansion of popular religious education in Republican China), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany—like the Imam of the Grand Mosque in Paris), see also ahong ; clergy; ulama

IMPERIAL COUNCIL: see divân-i hümâyun

AL-’IMRAN (a Sura of the Qur 1 an): 57 (its commentary by ‘Abduh)

INDIA: 92 (place of origin of the early twentieth-century Islamic reformist trend in Russia), 161 (overall influence of the Indian constitutionalist movement), 257 (Da Pusheng’s travel to India as a representative of Shanghai merchants), 260 (Ha Decheng’s travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society), 260 (Ha Decheng’s importation of Islamic literature from Egypt, India, and Turkey), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909)

INDONESIA: 13 (Muhammadiyah as the second Islamic organization of Indonesia today), 143 –158 (article by Azyumardi Azra), 290 (major role of religious intellectuals in furthering the goals of civil society in countries like Indonesia and Turkey)

INQIRAZ (Arabic: “decadence”): 93 (invention of the concept by nineteenthcentury Tatar ulama, and its application to Central Asia)

INTERNET: 291 (accessibility of the works by modern religious intellectuals through the Internet), 297 (communication of Nursi’s message and F. Gülen’s movement through multilingual websites), see also communication; mass media; networks and networking

INUKAI TSUYOSHI (1855–1932, statesman of the Meiji era): 276 , 278 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

AL-IQBAL (Indonesian newspaper published in Java): 144 (its distribution in Cairo)

IRAN: 4 , 26 –27 (Islamic Revolution of 1979 and its impact abroad), 23, 27 (Islamic Constitution), 61, 161 , 164, 167 (Iran’s early twentieth-century Constitutional Revolution, and its impact in the world of Islam), 65 (Rida’s denunciation of Iran’s early twentieth-century Westernization policy), 291 , 293 (discussion of the modernization theory’s postulate of a preference for secularizing reformers like Atatürk in Turkey, or Reza Shah and Mohammad Reza Shah in Iran), 294 (Mohammad Khatami and the reformist movement’s contribution to the emergence of a public sphere in Iran), 300 (stateappointed religious hierarchies in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and ex-Soviet Central Asia, and their resistance to challenges to their authority)

IRMAD (“Guidance,” Arabic journal of Egypt): 128 (its diffusion in China in the 1930s)

AL-IRMAD (“Guidance,” Indonesian journal published in Pekalongan): 144 (its diffusion in Cairo)

‘IMA 1 (Arabic: the night prayer): 92 (early nineteenth-century Bukhara dispute on ‘ima in sub-boreal regions)

ISAKOVIa, ALIJA (1932–1997, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian of literature): 217 (representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

ISHAQI, MUHAMMAD ‘AYYAZ (1878–1954, Tatar novelist and a leader of the islahi movement): 94 (his criticism of the madrasa-centered strategy of modernization of the Muslims of Russia)

ISLAHI MOVEMENT (protestation movement of madrasa students in Russia in 1905–1914): 94 (its criticism of the madrasa-centered strategy of modernization among Russia’s Muslims)

/SLÂM DÜNYASI (“The World of Islam”): 281 (its publication by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in Istanbul in 1913)

/SLÂM MECMUASI (“Islamic Review,” Turkist journal published between 1913 and 1918): 77 (contribution of authors from other trends of thought)

ISLAMIC CONSTITUTION OF IRAN: 23 (influence of al-Sadr’s ideas on the Iranian Constitution of 1979)

ISLAMIC INTERNATIONAL (Islamintern): 181 (its foundation in Moscow by Enver Pava as an extension of the CUP)

ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN: 27 (theory of the wilayat al-faqih as its backbone)

ISLAMIC REVOLUTION OF 1979 IN IRAN: 4 , 26 –27, 292 (its expression of an overall Islamic revival), 292 –293 (on locally rooted movements—like opposition to the Shah’s regime in Iran—benefiting with transnational sponsors or supporters)

ISLAMIC SUMMIT OF 1969: 7 (seen as a first embodiment of al-Kawakibi’s ideas of an Islamic conference)

ISLAMINTERN: see Islamic International

ISLAMISM: 74 –84 (in late Ottoman Turkey; in particular 75 –76 : its main figures and journals), 170 –171 (Shari’A in the debates between Westernists and Islamists in the Ottoman parliament after 1908), 179 (CUP’s “conversion” to Islamism after the Balkan wars), 181 (CUP’s successive adaptation of Ottomanism, Islamism, and Turkism), 293 –294 (O. Roy on the present-day proliferation of different types of Islamist movement, and his use of the term “post-Islamism”), see also identity; nation and nationalism; pan-Islamism; Turkism

ISLAMOLOGY: 248 , 253 (influence of Western studies in islamology on twentieth-century Chinese Muslim learned circles) ISMA ‘ILIS AND ISMA ‘ILISM: 226 –240 (article by Nejima S.)

ISTANBUL: 182 (education place of Ihsan al-Jabiri), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi’s sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and of Istanbul), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s settlement in 1894), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim and Yamaoka Kotaro’s invitation by the Society of Muslum Students from Russia in Istanbul), 280 –281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s journalistic activity in Istanbul in the early 1910s)

ISTIQLALISTS (Arabic, “independentists,” radical wing of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress): 184 (role played by one of their leaders, ‘Adil Arslan, and their creation of a special Finance Committee in Jerusalem in 1925), 184 –185 (Lutfallah’s ousting by the I. from the chairmanship of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in 1927), 185 (I.’s pan-Arabism and its opposition to Shahbandar’s People’s Party)

ITALY: 65 (reconciliation of the Italian state with the Vatican, and its impact on the subsequent Catholic revival), 66 (spread of publications urging women to return to religious decency in dress and conduct), 163 (influence of Italian political thought in the world of Islam), 179 (Italian conquest of Cyrenaica in 1911–1912), 184 (Italy as a counterweight to British and French hegemony in the Near-East), 184 (its support by Sh. Arslan and al-Husayni during Second World War), 190 –191 (Arslan’s relationship to Italy, and his criticism of the Italian policy in Libya), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s encouragement of Ottoman resistance against the Italian invasion of Libya in 1911)

ITO HIROBUMI (1841–1909, prominent statesman of the Meiji era): 276 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

ITTIFAQAL-MUSLIMIN (“Union of Muslims”, a political party created in Russia in 1905): 97 (the membership of prominent ulama educated in al-Azhar), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s endeavours for its creation)

/TTAHAD VE TERAKKA: see CUP

/TTAHÂD-I MUHAMMEDÎ CEMAYETA (“Mohammedan Union,” subdivision of the Islamist trend in late Ottoman Turkey): 75 (its role in the counterrevolution of April 1909, and as a root of the Nurcu movement)

IVAN THE TERRIBLE (Czar of Russia from 1533 to 1584): 88 (his capture of Kazan in 1551)

IVORY COAST: 166 (workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

IZETBEGOVIa, ALIJA (1925–2003, Bosnian politician and statesman): 216 , 218 (leader of the opposition trend among the Muslims of Bosnia-Herzegovina under the Socialist régime)

IZMIR: 282 (recapture of the city by the Turkish Army from the Greeks in 1922, and its influence on ‘Abd al-Rashid’s Ibrahim’s decision to migrate to Turkey)

IZUTSU TOSHIHIKO (1914–1993, prominent Japanese islamologist): 285 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim, and the latter’s influence on him)

‘IZZ AL-MAML cK (Arabic: “dignity of the subject”): 168 (concept developed by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

‘IZZ AL-MULK (Arabic: “royal dignity”): 168 (concept developed by Ibn Khaldun)

AL-JABIRI, IHSAN (Ottoman bureaucrat, King Faisal’s Chamberlain, Arslan’s partner from 1925 to 1937, and the coeditor of La Nation arabe): 178 (his role in the journal’s edition), 182 (further elements of his biography)

AL-JABIRI, SA’D-ALLAH (member of the Syrian delegation to France in 1936): 186 (his consultations with Sh. Arslan in Geneva prior to the signature of the treaty leading to independence)

JADID (Arabic: “new”): 212 , 213 (denomination of late nineteenth-century reformists in Bosnia-Herzegovina)

JADIDISM (term used by modern historians on Islamic reform in the Russian Empire): 90 (problematic character of this denomination)

AL-JAHIZ (tenth-century Arab moralist): 90 (translation of his works into Tatar language in Imperial Russia)

JAHRIYYA: see Naqshbandiyya

JAMA’AH ADABIYYAH (association created in Minangkabau by Haji ‘Abdullah Ahmad): 154 (its role in the funding of the Adabiyah Diniyyah School after 1909)

JAMA’AT-KHANA (Persian word, lit. “communal house,” center for prayer and assembly among Isma ‘ilis): 228 (its new functions in modern times)

JANISSARIES: 162 (N. Kemal’s reference to them as a limitation to the sultan’s absolute power)

JAPAN: 25 , 59, 242 –243 (present-day reference for non-Western modernization in the world of Islam), 61, 161 (Japan’s early twentieth-century constitution as a model for the world of Islam), 64 (Japan’s model of development compared by Arslan with that of Atatürk’s Turkey), 118 , 127 –128, 134 –135 , 137, 245 –246 , 262 –263 (evolution of Chinese Muslim patriotism before, during and after the Sino-Japanese War, and the evolution of the CCP’s nationality policy), 120 , 121, 242 –243 (stay of Chinese Muslim literati in Japan and their absorption of Western modernism), 150 (discussion by al-Imam of a proposed Congress of Religion to be held in Tokyo), 167 , 273 (echo of the Japanese victory over Russia in 1904 throughout the world of Islam), 242 –243 (Japanese intermediary in the diffusion of Western ideas on ethnicity, nationality, and citizenship among early twentiethcentury Chinese Muslims), 256 (Ma Linyi’s studies in Japan in 1903–1905), 273 –288 (article by Komatsu H.)

JAPANESE LANGUAGE: 275 (discovery by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim of the structural similarity of Japanese and Tatar language)

JAPONLAR (“The Japanese,” poem by Mehmet Âkif): 281 (its inspiration by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s Âlem-i /slam)

JAVA: 48 (tensions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims after the publication of Ibn ‘Aqil’s treatise on the Umayyad caliph Mu’Awiya)

AL-JAZA’IRI, TAHIR (late nineteenth-century Syrian reformist ‘Alim): 45 (his participation in Rafiq al-’Azm’s reformist circle), 47 (publication of his school primer on theology in al-Manār ; his dissensions with R. Rida)

AL-JAZEERA (Qatari satellite TV channel): 299 –300 (debates between S. J. al-’Azm and Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, and between Nasir Hamid Abu Zayd and Muhammad 2Imara on al-Jazeera in 1997)

JERUSALEM: 7 (General Islamic Conference of 1931), 65 (early twentieth-century conferences of Protestant missionaries in J.), 180 (entrance of the British troops in 1917), 184 (Sh. Arslan’s involvement in Jerusalem politics around 1935), 185 (siege of the Finance Committee of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, created in 1925 by young Istiqlalists against the Cairo Executive Committee), 194 (status of J. considered by the European Muslim Congress of 1935 not as a political, but as a religious issue)

JEWS AND JUDAISM: 297 (F. Gülen’s organization’s publicized and sustained dialogues with Christian and Jewish religious leaders)

JIANG JIESHI (or Chang Kai-shek, 1887–1975, Chinese nationalist leader and statesman): 246 (his support to Bai Chongxi in the latter’s attempt at uniting the Hui to the Han, in 1937, against the Japanese)

JIEJIN (lit. “Advance Together”) SCHOOL (in Changsha, Hunan): 256 (creation of the new-style primary school, by Ma Linyi, and its replacement of the city’s mosque school)

JIHAD: 88 (?azawat [wars for the defence or extension of the territory of Islam] of the 1730s to 1770s in European Russia), 125 (jihad seen by the Chinese Muslim warlord Ma Fuxiang as war against non-Muslims), 135 (jihad against Japan as a sacred duty for the Muslims of China after 1937), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s call to the jihad after the Italian invasion of Libya in 1911), 281 (publication of Cihad-i /slam during First World War by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim), 283 –284 (publication of a paper on jihad by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim after his settlement in Tokyo), see also colonialism; westernization

JINGTANG (Chinese: Qur 1 anic school attached to a mosque): 121 (the jingtang s’ traditional financing by the zakat), 241 (their traditional role in the transmission of popular religious knowledge), 247 –248 (opposition of the “New Style of Education (xinshi jaioyu)” to the “Scriptural Hall Education (jingtang jiaoyu)”—that is, traditional system of mosque and madrasa instruction—in early twentieth-century China), see also schools and schooling; sponsoring

JINGTANG JIAOYU (Chinese: “Scriptural Hall Education”—that is, system of mosque and madrasa instruction prevailing among Chinese Muslims between the sixteenth and twentieth centuries): 247 –248 (opposition of the “New Style of Education (xinshi jaioyu)” to the jingtang jiaoyu in early twentieth-century China)

JINN (Arabic: spirit): 45 (criticism by Rashid Rida of al-Sayyadi’s assertions of having visions of jinn s)

AL-JISR, Shaykh Husayn (1845–1909, Syrian reformist thinker): 9 , 26 (his role in the education of Rashid Rida, especially in modern sciences), 42 , 166 (his creation of the Madrasa al-Wataniyya in Tripoli), 81 (his introduction by M. Âkif as a perfect ‘Alim), 166 (his presumed influence upon ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

JORDAN: 27 (Muslim Brothers in Jordan)

JOURNALS AND NEWSPAPERS: 8 –10 , 13, 33 , 42, 105 , 144 (journal al-’Urwa al-Wuöqa as an antecedent to modern Islamist periodicals), 9 (influence of al-’Urwa al-Wuöqa ’s discourse on tafsir upon Rida), 43, 166 (early twentieth-century Egyptian newspaper al-Mu’ayyad and its Islamic themes), 63 (participation of the newspaper al-Muqattam in the post-First World War dispute on the wearing of hats or fez), 76 , 275, 279 (Ottoman Islamist journal Sirat-i müstakim ’s staff, its publication of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel correspondences in 1909, and translation of the programmes of the Ajia Gikai), 81 (N. Kemal’s publication of the journal /bret), 85 –116 (article by S. A. Dudoignon on the Mura, in particular 98 –105), 117 –142 (article by Matsumoto M. on the Yuehua, especially 124 –136), 128 (distribution of the Egyptian journal Maëmu2 al-rasa’il in China in the 1930s), 130, 134

(translation into Chinese of papers from al-Azhar’s Nur al-islam in the 1930s), 144 (distribution of the Indonesian newspapers al-Mir’a al-muhammadiy a and al-Talira al-islamiyya in Cairo), 144 (role of the port of Tuban for the diffusion of al-Manār in the Indonesian archipelago), 145 (role of the journal Seruan Azhar in the emergence of an Islamic discourse in Indonesia), 145 (role of the journals Pengasuh and Saudara in the spread of Kaum Muda ideas in the Kelantan region), 146 –147 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s role in the launching of al-Imam), 148 (role of the Tunas Melayu and of Neracha in promoting the reformist cause among Singapore Muslims), 149 (role of the Riau court in the circulation of al-Imam in the Riau region), 151 (support of the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam to the Young Turks after 1908), 152 (criticism of the turuq, especially the Naqshbandiyya, in the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam), 153 –154 (‘Abdullah Ahmad’s visit to Singapore in 1908, and his idea to publish a journal similar to al- Imam), 155 (argument on Indonesian traditionalists of journals as a Western innovation), 201 (Sh. Arslan’s influence within the circle of the Algerian reformist ulama through the journal al-Mihab), 202 (smuggling of La Nation arabe in Morocco), 243 , 245 (role of journals for helping early twentieth-century Chinese Muslim school reformers to present their ideas), 251 –254 (history and statistics of the Muslim periodicals of China in the Republican period, 274 (Tatar and Arabic newspapers published by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim after the Russian revolution of 1905), 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to the Tokyo bureaus of Japanese newspapers in Tokyo in 1909), 280 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s publication of the Ottoman journals Teârüf-i müslimin and /slam dünyasi), 284 (Kaikyo Sekai ’s introduction of the world of Islam to the Japanese audience), 283, 284 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s collaboration to the Yani Yapon Mulbiri), 289 (book as a present-day important means of communication, challenged by other modern media), see also books and book trading; printing and printing houses; sponsorship

DE JOUVENEL (French High Commissioner in Syria): 182 (his discussions with Arslan on the destiny of Tripoli), 185 (his succession to Sarrail after the Syrian revolt of 1925), 185 (his meetings with Arslan and Jabiri in Paris in November 1925 and July 1926)

AL-JUNDI, Muhammad Salim (Syrian historian): 41 (his balanced assessment of al-Sayyadi)

KABUL: 92 (education place of early twentieth-century Volga Tatar scholars of Islam)

KAIKYO SEKAI (“The Muslim World,” journal of the Dai Nippon Kaikyo kyokai): 284 (his introduction of the world of Islam to the Japanese audience)

KALAM (Islamic dogmatic theology): 92 (its renewal in Bukhara in the early nineteenth-century), 94 (its focusing on the central pillars of Islam in reformist thought), 99 (al-Ghazali as a major reference on reformist kalam in Central Asia and Russia), see also philosophy

KAMALI, ZIYA (1873–1942, Tatar ‘Alim from Ufa): 90 (his creation of the ‘Aliyya Madrasa in 1906), 96 (his studies in al-Azhar and his pilgrimage to Mecca with Bigi)

KAMAL PAVA (1832–1913, Ottoman statesman): 280 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim, and his views on the perspective of the conversion of Japan to Islam)

KAMPFFMEYER, GEORG (German orientalist, chairman of the German Society of Islamic Studies): 189 (his lectures on Sh.Arslan’s literary works), 194 (his relations with Szynkewicz)

KANO: 166 (workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad, and his death place, and center of the Tijaniyya mystical path, represented locally by Muhammad Salga, a pupil of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

KAPID?Ia, HAMDIJA (1904–1974, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

KARACHI: 233 (center of the council system instigated from the 1970s onward by the Nizari Imams), 236 (relocation of the Danishgah-i Khana-yi Hikmat in 1977)

KARAMAT (Arabic: prodigies accomplished by a special grace of God): 99 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s refutation of the theory of karamat accomplished by saints)

KARbIa, FIKRET (b. 1955, Bosnian specialist of Islamic law): 218 (representative of the religious scholars of independent B.-H.)

KARIa, ENES (b. 1958, Bosnian specialist of Qur 1 anic studies): 218 (representative of the religious scholars of independent B.-H.)

KARIMI, MUHAMMAD FATIH (1870–1937, Tatar pamphleteer and traveller): 100 (his role as chief redactor of the Waqt),

102 (his contributions on educational questions to the Mura)

KATLAN, ‘Abd AL-FATTAH (an early twentieth-century Syrian publisher): 56 (his foundation of the Matba’A Salafiyya printing press)

KATTANIYYA (mystical path with its main center in Fez): 165 (its mobilization against early twentieth-century French encroachments in Morocco), 166 (‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s arrival to the Zawiya of the Kattaniyya in 1906)

KAUM MUDA (Malay-Indonesian: “young group,” as opposed to the Kaum Tua, “old group”): 146 (definition of these factions of reformists and traditionalists in the Malay-Indonesian world), 148 (Haji ‘ABbas’s efforts at uniting the two trends in the Pan-Malayan Association of Ulama), 153 (reaction of the Kaum Muda after the disappearance of al-Imam in 1908)

AL-KAWAKIBI, ‘Abd AL-RAHMAN (1854–1902, Syrian reformist thinker): 6 –7 (his ideas on Arab identity), 32 (editions of his Umm al-Qura), 43 (Rida’s review of his essay The Characteristics of Tyranny, written against Abdülhamid II), 46 (publication of an essay on al-K. in al-Manār), 55 (al-K.’s connection with the early development of the Salafiyya)

KAYALI, HASAN (historian of the Young Turks): 179 (on the CUP as an advocate of secular Ottoman nationalism), 181 (on the Ottoman Empire’s viability during the last ten years of its history)

KAZAKHS (or Qazaqs, a modern Central Asian nation): 88 (Catherine II’s seductive policy toward them), 89 (their submission to a policy of school instruction in vernacular language in Cyrillic script), 274 (territorial autonomy proposed for the Kazakhs by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1907)

KAZAN: 88 (city’s capture by Ivan the Terrible in 1551), 90 (reform of the Muhammadiyya Madrasa by Barudi since 1891)

KEDOURIE, ELIE (historian of constitutionalism in the Middle East): 161 (Arab constitutionalism as a parody of the same trends in Western Europe)

KELANTAN REGION (Indonesia): 145 (spread of Kaum Muda ideas by al-Manār and the local Islamic press in the 1920s)

KEMAL, MUSTAFA: see Atatürk

KEMAL, NAMIK (1840–1888, Turkish writer, leader of the Young Ottomans): 80 (his influence on M. Âkif), 81 (his publication of the journal /bret), 162 (his justification of the constitutional limitation of the ruler’s power), 170 (his identification of the Shari’A with Rousseau’s concept of Natural Law)

KEMURA, SULEJMAN (1908–1975, Reis ul-Ulema of Yugoslavia): 215 (representative of the official leaders of the Muslim Religious Community under Tito)

KERR, MALCOLM (historian of Islamic reform): 5 (on ‘Abduh and Rida’s contribution to secular reform), 22 –23 (on Rida’s theory of the Caliphate as a statement of ideals)

AL-KHALILI, AHMAD (Grand Mufti of Oman, the highest position of the Ibadi school): 27 (his participation in the founding conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama)

KHATAMI, MOHAMMAD (Iranian religious intellectual, the President of the Islamic Republic in 1997–2005: 294 (Khatami, Soroush, and the reformist movement’s contribution to the emergence of a public sphere in Iran)

AL-KHATIB, MUHIBB AL-DIN (editor and main author of al-Fath): 56 (his foundation of the Matba’A Salafiyya printing press), 63 (his edition of a paper on the wearing of a turban or a fez), 68 – 71 (translation of “The Campaign for Renewal and Reform”), 128 (translation of his article on smoking in the Yuehua)

KHAYR AL-DIN AL-TUNISI (c. 1822–1890, Caucasian-born Tunisian statesman): 187 (obsolescence of his influence after European colonial encroachments in the early 1880s)

KHILAFAT MOVEMENT (of South Asia): 13 (discussions about the support to be given to the Ottoman dynasty)

KHOJAS (Karachi-based business Isma ‘ili community): 227 (their sociological specificities), 233 (their leading role in the council system set up since the 1970s by the Nizari Imams)

KHOMEINI, AYATOLLAH RUHOLLAH (1902–1989, leader of the Islamic Revolution of Iran and the first “Guide” of the Islamic Republic): 23 , 27 (his theory of the wilayat al-faqih as the backbone of the Islamic Republic)

KHOURY, PHILIP S. (historian of modern Syria): 183 (on the opposition of Palestinian delegates to the Syrian-Palestinian Congress to the Syrian elements’ narrow territorial nationalism), 185 (on the opposition between the Istiqlalists and Shahbandar’s People’s Party in the late 1920s)

KHOWAR LANGUAGE (vernacular language in Northern Pakistan): 232 (as a medium of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis)

KHUZULI, MUHAMMAD (teacher at al-Azhar): 131 (translation into Chinese of his “History of Islam” since 1933)

KIN’AN, SYLAYMAN (member of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in Geneva after 1921): 182 (elements of his biography)

KITAB SEMPURNAAN PELAJARAN (“The Book of Perfection in Education”): 148 (its publication in 1906 by Haji ‘ABbas b. Muhammad Taha)

AL-KITAB WA AL-QUR’AN: QIRA’A MU’ASIRA (“The Book and the Qur 1 an: A Contemporary Interpretation,” a work by M. Shahrur): 298 (its distribution throughout the Arab world in both authorized and pirated editions), 299 (its discussion on the Egyptian satellite channel Nile TV in 2000)

KOKUMIN SHINBUN (early twentieth-century Japanese newspaper directed by Tokutomi Soho): 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to the newspaper’s bureau in 1909)

KOKURYcKAI (“Black Dragon Society,” Japanese ultranationalist organization created in 1901): 275 (probable meeting of one of its members, Nakayama, with Ibrahim in Yokohama in 1909), 286 (note 11)

KOMINTERN: 181 (meeting of Trostky and Arslan in Moscow during a general conference of the Komintern)

KONO HIRONAKA (1849–1921, Pan-Asianist Japanese statesman): 278 (his strategy for joining the world of Islam with Japan)

KONYA: 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s retirement in this city between 1925 and his departure to Japan in 1929)

KOREA: 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909)

KORKUT, DERVAV (museum curator and editor of a journal in Belgrade): 194 (his participation in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935)

KOTOT, AHMAD (b. 1894, Malay writer): 145 (his novel Hikayat Percintaan Kemudaan as a manifesto of Islamic reform)

KRAMER, MARTIN (historian of the Islamic revival): 187 (his vision of Sh. Arslan as a spokesman of the Arabs in the West)

KREMEVLJAKOVIa, HAMDIJA (1893–1966, Bosnian historian): 214 (figure of the new jadid trend)

KUNLUN SECONDARY SCHOOL (Kunlun zhongxue): 255 (its creation in 1946 by Ma Bufang)

KUNMING (capital city of Yunnan): 250 , 260 (the creation of the Mingde School)

LAGOS: 166 (workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s)

LAMMENS, FATHER HENRI (French author on modern Islam): 67 (Rida’s response to his views)

LANGUAGE: 232 , 235 (Urdu as the medium par excellence of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis), 242 (Chinese language as a vector of denomination for Chinese Muslims), 252 (publication of colloquial Chinese [baihua] Muslim journals since the early 1900s), 289 (O. Roy on the possibility for modern Muslim intellectuals to choose among languages and audiences), 297 (communication of Nursi’s message and F. Gülen’s movement through multilingual websites), see also communication; translation LANZHOU (capital city of Gansu): 245 (creation of a subsidiary association [fenhui] of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China, led by Muslim warlords)

LAO SHE (Chinese writer): 246 –247 (his membership of the Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion), 247 (writing of a play, Guojia chisang, on the common front of Hui and Han facing the Japanese enemy)

LAOJIAO (Chinese: “the old religion”): 119 (its heritage of the classical theory of the “unity of being”), 120 (its theorization of the concordance of Islam with Confucianism)

LAROUI, ABDALLAH (historian of Moroccan nationalism): 170 (his critic of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s draft constitution)

LAUSANNE: 166 (‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s visit to Sh. Arslan in 1922)

LAW: 169 (‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s draft law code, and its reference to the Ottoman Mecelle)

LE TOURNEAU, ROGER (historian of modern Northern Africa): 199 (on Sh. Arslan’s personal impact in Morocco)

LEADERSHIP: 7 , 27 (al-Kawakibi’s thought on the umma ’s leadership), 12 (Rida’s introduction of ‘Abduh as a paramount leader of the umma), 13 (discussions within the Khilafat movement about the support to be given to the Ottoman dynasty), 21 (abolition of the Ottoman Sultanate in 1922), 23 (influence of Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr’s concept of political guidance of the “righteous authority” on the Islamic Constitution of Iran), 43 (al-Zahrawi addressing the question of Muslim leadership), 57 (‘Abduh’s comment on the salaf ’s independence from rulers), 61 (theory of the Shari’A’s rule as an alternative to absolute authority), 64 (abolition of the Caliphate in Turkey in 1924), 89 –90 (renewal of the cult of the murshid among reformist Sufis in early twentieth-century Russia), 165 (Moroccan sultan ‘Abd al-’Aziz’s convocation of an “assembly of notables,” and the opposition to him of Moroccan ulama), 167 , 168 (his duties according to classical and modern Islamic political thought), 178 (Sh. Arslan succeeding his father as governor of the Shuf Mountains), 228, 231 (abolition of Northern Pakistan’s principalities, and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s), 241 (reactions of Chinese Muslim intellectuals to the overthrow of the Qing dynqasty), see also state and state apparatus

LEAGUE OF NATIONS: 181 –182 (creation of the Syrian Congress in 1921 for petitioning its Permanent Mandates Commission), 198 (sending of a resolution by the Islamic Congress of Jerusalem in 1931, against the Berber Dahir in Morocco), 283 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s praise of Japan’s withdrawal from the L.N. in 1933)

LEAGUE OF OPPRESSED NATIONS: 187 , 190 (its congress in Genoa in 1921)

LEARNED SOCIETY OF THE HUI RELIGION OF CHINA (Zhongguo Huijiao xuehui): 244 (its creation in Shanghai in 1925)

LEARNED SOCIETY OF THE YOUTH FOR THE HUI RELIGION IN CHINA (Zhongguo Huijiao qingnian xuehui): 244 (its creation in Nanking in 1931)

LEBANESE ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL: 182 (its administration of Mount Lebanon from 1861 to 1919, and declaration of independence in 1920)

LEBANON: 177 (Sh. Arslan’s birthplace), 178 (Arslan succeeding his father as governor of the Shuf Mountains), 179 (famine in L. before First World War), 182 (Mount Lebanon’s administration by the Lebanese Administrative Council from 1861 to 1919, and declaration of independence by the latter in 1920)

LECTURERS: see wa’iz LI WEIHAN (a top-ranking Han cadre of the CCP): 137 (his role in drafting the party’s policy toward ethnic minorities after 1938)

LIBRARIES: 47 (al-Qasimi’s library in Damascus), 94 (Russia’s Muslim reformists’ concern on the need for public libraries), 133 (Fude Library in the Chengda Normal School), 133, 250 – 251 , 260 (creation of the Fude Library in 1936, in memory of King Fu 1 ad of Egypt), 244 (creation of an Islamic library in Shanghai after 1925 by the Learned Society of the Hui Religion in China), 244 (construction of libraries as an aim of the Guild of the Hui Religion of China), 250 (purchase of Islamic books in Egypt by Ma Songting, in 1932, for the future library of the Chengda Normal School), 256 –257 (Su Baoqiao’s administration of the library created by the Communist Party in Changsha), see also books and book trading; madrasa; sponsorship

LIBYA: 190 –191 (Sh. Arslan’s attacks against Mussolini’s policy in Libya), 201 (Arslan’s friendship with Ahmad al-Sharif al-Sanusi), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s encouragement of Ottoman resistance against the Italian invasion of Libya in 1911)

LINSXIA: 255 (birthplace of the Ma warlords of Western China)

LISAN AL-’ARAB (“The Arabic Language,” an early twentieth-century journal of Tangier): 165 (its publication of a second draft constitution for Morocco in 1908)

LITERACY: see education

LIU ZHI (late Ming—early Qing Muslim Chinese scholar): 119 –120 (his role in the elaboration of the Islamic thought through Chinese characters), 253 –254 (successive reprint of his Tianfang xingli, and its modern Ikhwani criticism for its Sufi content)

LIUTONG QINGZHEN JIAOYUHUI (Association for Islamic Education in Tokyo): 121 (its creation by Hui expatriates in 1907)

LJUBOVIa, AMIR (b. 1945, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian of local Ottoman literature): 218 (representative of the traditional secular intelligentsia)

LONGUET, JEAN (French socialist politician): 187 –188 (his relations with Sh. Arslan)

LUNYU (the Confucian “Analects”): 260 (its translation into Arabic by Ma Jian)

LUTFALLAH, MICHEL (Syrian political activist, Chairman of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress): 182 (his alliance with Shahbandar against Arslan, Rida and al-Husayni), 183 (his and Shahbandar’s opposition to Palestinians on the questions of territorial nationalism, compromise with Zionism, and allegiance to the Hashemites), 184 (challenge posed to M. L. by the creation by young Istiqlalists of the Finance Committee of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress, in 1925), 184 –185 (M. L.’s ousting from the chairmanship of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in 1927 by Rida and the Istiqlalists), 185 (conciliatory positions of the Lutfallah—Shahbandar faction regarding the British Mandate and creation of a Greater Lebanon), 185 –186 (his and Shahbandar’s intrigues against Arslan’s negotiations with French officials)

MA BUFANG (1902/3 –1975, nephew of Ma Lin: Chinese Muslim warlord, governor of Qinghai, and member of the Guomindang’s Central Executive Committee): 246 (his membership in the board of trustees of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 255 (support to the Ikhwani movement by the Ma warlords of Western China), 255 (his travel to Egypt in the early 1950s, and his erm as a Nationalist ambassador to Saudi Arabia in 1961), 255 (his work in favor of reformed Muslim education)

MA BUQING (1901–?, Muslim warlord of Lanzhou, in Gansu, a nephew of Ma Lin’s): 245 (his family’s role in the creation, in Lanzhou, of a subsidiary association of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China), 246 (his membership in the board of trustees of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 255

(support to the Ikhwani movement by the Ma warlords of Western China)

MA FUXIANG (1876–1932, powerful Hui warlord of Ningxia): 124 , 125, 250 , 256 (his role in the foundation and in the financing of the Chengda Normal School, during its Beijing period), 125 (his being a follower of laojiao Islam), 250 (his knowledge of Confucianism and sympathy for the Ikhwani movement), 251 (his support to the Shanghai Normal Islamic School), 252 (his support to the publication of the journal Yuehua since 1929), 254 (his sponsorship of the edition of almost all the celebrated works of classical Chinese Islam from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries), 255 –256 (elements of his biography), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi's sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai's pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul)

MA HONGBIN (Muslim warlord of Lanzhou, in Gansu, a nephew of Ma Fuxiang): 245 (his role in the creation, in Lanzhou, of a subsidiary association of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China), 246 (his membership of the board of trustees of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country)

MA HONGKUI (1892/3 –1970, Ma Fuxiang's son, a Ningxia Muslim warlord and governor): 245 (his membership, from 1933 to 1948, of the direction of the Society for the Promotion of Education of the Hui People), 246 (his membership of the board of trustees of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 251 , 256 (his support to the creation of a reformed Islamic school in Ningxia, and continuation of his father's work for Muslim education)

MA JIAN (1906–1978, Yunnanese translator of the Qur 1 an into Chinese): 127 (his sending to al-Azhar in 1931 by the Shanghai Islamic School), 130 (his translation of 'Abduh's Risala al-tawhid in 1933), 253 (his role in the translation of Islamic literature from Arabic, and from European islamology), 253 (his choice of colloquial Chinese language for the translation of the Qur 1 an), 258 (his collaboration with Shu Shanyu and Wu Tegong on their translation of the Qur1 an), 260 (his studies in Shadian, Kunming, Shanghai, and al-Azhar; his teaching in the Sino-Arabic school of Shadian, and his moving to the North-West of China, for becoming a disciple of Hu Songshan), 260 (his translations from Chinese into Arabic, notably that of the Confucian Lunyu), 260 (his professorship in the Beijing University)

MA LIN (Muslim warlord of Lanzhou, in Gansu): 245 (his family's role in the creation, in Lanzhou, of a subsidiary association of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China)

MA LINYI (known as Ma Zhenwu, 1864–1938, Hunanese modernizer of Islam): 256 (his studies in Japan, his creation of the new-style Jiejin primary school in Changsha, and his books on modern schooling, Xin jaioyu xue and Yisi-lan-jiao gailun), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi's sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai's pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul)

MA SONGTING (1895–1992, leading ahong of Chengda, one of the 'Four Great Ahong s'): 128 (his arguments on the publications of translations of the Qur1 an and of tafsir in the Yuehua), 133, 260 (his role in setting up relations with al-Azhar, and in the creation of the Fude Library), 243 (his membership of the Society for the Advance of the Hui Religion of China), 246 (his participation in the Wuchang conference, and in the creation of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the the Salvation of the Country), 250, 260 (his opening of the Chengda Normal School in 1925), 250 –251, 260 (his travel to Egypt and other Islamic countries in 1932, to find out new pedagogical methods), 260 (his training in the Sino-Arabic curriculum at the Ox Street Mosque), 260 (his teaching of Arabic language in the Bejing University until the Cultural Revolution)

MA YUANZHANG (1853–1920, leader of a Jahriyya menhuan — sub-branch of the Naqshbandiyya): 262 (his cultivation of Chinese classical literature)

MA ZHU (late Ming—early Qing Muslim Chinese scholar): 119 –120 (his role in the elaboration of Islamic thought through Chinese characters)

MAÙHAB (Arabic: theological and jurisprudential rite): 75 (Ottoman Islamist critic of mezhepsizlik [the refusal of madhab obedience] as undermining the traditional legal apparatus), 155 (al-Munir ’s contestation of the Shafi’i hegemony, and its advocacy of maùhab pluralism in the Indonesian archipelago)

MADRASA (school of higher Islamic theological and judicial education): 42 (Madrasa al-Wataniyya and its establishment by Husayn al-Jisr), 76 (reform of madrasas by the Young Turks), 87 (madrasas’ role in transmitting ‘Abduh’s influence to the Russian Empire), 90, 92 , 98 (appearance of reformed madrasas in the Volga–Urals region of Russia, and their financing by benevolent societies), 90 (Rasuliyeff ‘s role and authority as head of the Rasuliyya Madrasa), 91 (madrasas’ role in modernization processes in European Russia), 93 (essentially practical content of their reform in early twentieth-century Russia), 94 (Tuqay’s critic of the madrasa-centered strategy of modernization of the Muslims of Russia), 101 (al-Qadiri’s teaching in the Husayniyya Madrasa of Orenburg), 127 (sending of students to al-Azhar in 1931 by the Shanghai Islamic School), 147 (Madrasa al-Mansur in Penang), 152 (role of new-style madrasas in the diffusion of reformist newspapers in the Malay-Indonesian world), 152 (role of al-Imam in the formulation of a system of education centered on the need for both a purified Islam and modern secular knowledge), 153 (role of the Egyptian scholar 2Uthman Efendi Raffat in the direction of the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-Islamiyya of Singapore), 153 –154 (influence of the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-Islamiyya of Singapore on the creation of the Sekolah Diniyyah al-Islamiyyah in Minangkabau in 1908), 154 (Adabiyah Diniyyah School, founded in Minangkabau in 1909), 216 (Gazi Husrevbeg Medrese of Sarajevo and its role in the education of the official religious leaders of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia during the Communist period), 247 –248 (opposition of the “New Style of Education (xinshi jaioyu)” to the “Scriptural Hall Education (jingtang jiaoyu)”—that is traditional-system of madrasa instruction—in early twentieth-century China), 273 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s engagement in the reform of madrasas in Russia), see also education; mosques; schools and schooling; sponsorship

MADRASAT AL-HIKMA (in French: “La Sagesse,” Maronite Christian school in Beirut): 178 (its attendance by Sh. Arslan)

MADRASAT AL-IQBAL AL-ISLAMIYYA (founded in Singapore in 1908): 153 (role played by al-Imam in its creation), 153 –154 (madrasa’s influence on the launching of the Sekolah Diniyyah al-Islamiyyah)

MADRASAT AL-MANSUR (established in Penang by Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi): 147 (teaching given by Shaykh Muhammad Tahir)

MADRASAT AL-SULTANIYYA (in Beirut): 178 (lessons received there by Sh. Arslan from M. ‘Abduh)

AL-MADRASAT AL-WATANIYYA (‘The National School’ founded by Husayn al-Jisr in Tripoli, 1879–1882): 42 (its attendance by the young al-Maghribi)

MADRID: 200 (Sh. Arslan’s stay in this city in 1930, with the young al-Fasi and Balafrej)

MAËALLAT AL-AZHAR : see Nur al-islam

MAGHREB: 59 (criticism by al-'Azm of 'Bedouin' states as most ignorant of social life), 177 (place of Maghreb and of Maghreb's independence movement in Sh. Arslan's thought), 197 –202 (Arslan's political influence in this region)

AL-MAGHRIBI, 'Abd AL-QADIR (an early twentieth-century reformer and journalist from Lebanese Tripoli): 42 (his studies at the Madrasa al-Wataniyya, and his connections with 'Abduh and Rida)

MAËLISU – AL-A'YAN (Arabic: Assembly of Notables): 165 (its convocation by the Moroccan sultan 'Abd al-'Aziz in 1904–1905)

MAËM c 2 AL-RASA'IL ("Collected Epistles," Arabic journal of Egypt): 128 (its distribution in China in the 1930s)

MAHATHIR MOHAMAD (Prime Minister of Malaysia from 1981 to 2003): 25 , 26 (on the possibility of a combination of Islam and modernity)

AL-MAHDI AL-FASI (d. 1963–1964, constitutionalist ulama from Fez): 166 (his being a pupil of 'Abd al-Karim Murad)

MAHMUD II (Ottoman Sultan from 1808 to 1838): 63 (his adoption of the European costume)

MAKTAB : see schools and schooling MALAYSIA: 25 (reference for non-Western modernization), 143 –158 (article by Azyumardi Azra)

MALIK SY (early twentieth-century Senegalese Sufi shaykh): 166 (his contacts with ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

Al-Manār (journal published by Rashid Rida between 1898 and 1935): 3 –39 (article by Kosugi Yasushi), 40 –54 (article by David D. Commins), 55 –73 (article by Mahmoud Haddad), 79 –81 (al-M. ’s impact on Mehmed Âkif’s Islamism), 85 –116 (article by Stéphane A. Dudoignon), 117 –141 (article by Matsumoto M.), 143 –158 (article by A. Azra), 169 (Rashid Rida’s discourse in al-M. on political consultation), 176 (contributions by Sh. Arslan), 178 –179 (comparison of al-M. with La Nation arabe by R. Adal)

MANCHURIA: 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909), 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s emigration from Siberia through Xinjiang, China, and M.), 282 –283 (Qurban-’Aliyeff ‘s deportation to M. in 1938), 284 (supervision of local organizations by the Dai Nippon Kaikyo Kyokai in the occupied territories in China and M.)

MAO ZEDONG (Chinese Communist leader and dictator): 136 –137 (reformulation of the CCP’s nationality policy after 1937), 256 –257 (his brother Mao Zemin’s collaboration with the Muslim activist Su Baoqiao)

MAO ZEMIN (d. 1943, Communist activist, Mao Zedong’s brother): 256 –257 (his collaboration with the Muslim activist Su Baoqiao)

AL-MARAGHI, MUSTAFA (1881–1945, disciple of ‘Abduh and a reformer of al-Azhar): 11 (his apology of his master’s Iëtihad)

MARCO POLO BRIDGE INCIDENT (of 7 July 1937): 245 –246 (impact of the Japanese invasion of China on the Chinese Muslims' relation to the state)

MARDAN, VERAF (historian of modern Turkey): 80 (on a meeting point of nineteenth-century Islamic modernism with Young Ottoman thought)

AL-MARËA'IYYA AL-SALIHA ("guidance by the righteous authority"): 23 (concept developed by Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr)

AL-MARJANI (Shihab al-Din, 1818–1889, 'Alim from Kazan): 92 –93 (his role in the spreading of reformist thought from Central Asia to European Russia), 98 –99 (discovery of his work by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

MARONITES: see Christianity and Christians

MARTEL (French High commissioner in Syria): 186 (his correspondence with Viénot on Arslan's role as a counterweight to Shahbandar's opposition to the treaty on independence)

MARTYRDOM: 135 (Hui discourse on martyrdom after Japan's invasion of China)

MARXISM: 290 (E. Gellner on Islam as the only force resisting against the trend toward secularization and nationalism since the collapse of Marxist regimes)

MAMH cR ERLAR (Tatar, “Famous Men,” series published by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din): 99 (Riza al-Din’s overall biographical project)

MASLAHAT AL-BILAD (Arabic, “the interest of the country”): 169 (key issue of Islamic reformist political thought, for example in ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s draft constitution)

MASS MEDIA: 289 , 295, 301 (challenges to formal education by a new ability to communicate in different media, in the contemporary world of Islam), 289 (book as a present-day important means of communication, challenged by other modern media), 296 (educated, urban cadres as the primary audience of ‘Abduh and al-Afghani’s message—contrary to the broader public of present-day religious intellectuals), 297 (control by F. Gülen’s followers of a web of broadcast and print media), 299 (discussion of Shahrur’s al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’a on the Egyptian satellite channel Nile TV in 2000), 299 –300 (debates between S. J. al-’Azm and Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi and between Nasir Hamid Abu Zayd and Muhammad 2Imara on al-Jazeera in 1997, and the circulation of tapes of these broadcasts from hand to hand), see also communication; journals and newspapers; Internet

AL-MAWARDI, ABU’L-HASAN (a medieval theoretician of the state): 22

MAWLAWIYYA (Sunni Sufi mystical path): 44 (its criticism by Rashid Rida)

MECCA: 4 (the armed revolt of 1979); 6 (al-Kawakibi’s fictitious conference), 96 (place of the hajj in the biography of early twentieth-century ulama from Russia), 101 (World Islamic Congress of 1926), 120 (the influence of Islamic revivalism on Chinese Muslim travelers and pilgrims), 122 (city’s influence on Wang Haoran’s reformist thought), 144 (role of Indonesian hajjis in the diffusion of al-Manār in the Archipelago), 145

(growing number of Malay-Indonesian students there in the 1920s), 146 (Mecca as study place of the Malay-Indonesian reformist thinker Shaykh Muhammad Tahir), 146 (role of the Shafi'i imam Shaykh Ahmad Khatib in the teaching of students from Java), 147 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir's mission to Mecca and Cairo in 1903), 148 (study place of the 'Alim from Singapore Hajji 'ABbas b. Mohammad Taha), 148 (Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi accompanying the Sultan and Raja Muda of Riau to the hajj and to Egypt), 154 (study place of Haji 'Abdullah Ahmad), 273 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's study in Mecca and Medina), see also hajj

MECELLE (in full: Maëallat al-ahkam al- 'Adliyya, Ottoman law code elaborated in 1869–1878): 169 (its influence upon 'Abd al-Karim Murad's draft constitution for Morocco)

MEDINA: 166 (workplace of the young 'Abd al-Karim Murad), 273 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's study in Mecca and Medina)

MEHMEDBAMIa, AHMED (1877–1942), Director of the State Medrese King Alexander of Skopje): 213 (figure of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian secularized intelligentsia)

MEHTAR : 228 (title of local rulers in the North of Pakistan until the 1970s), 231 (abolition of the principalities and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s)

MEIJI ERA (1868–1912): 276 (educational progresses of this period in Japan, and their impact on Muslim travellers)

MENHUAN : see Sufism

MERCHANTS: 149 (businessman Shaykh Muhammad-Salim al-Kalali’s support of the journal al-Imam), 243 (the creation of the Militia of Merchants of the Pure and True in Shanghai in 1911), 258 (role of merchants and traders in the early twentieth-century Islamic revival in Eastern China), see also commercial societies; sponsorship

MEVLEVIYE: see Mawlawiyya

MEZHEPSIZLIK (Turkish, refusal to submit oneself to a theological school—Arabic: maùhab): 75 (Islamist criticism of mezhepsizlik as undermining the traditional legal apparatus)

MIGRATION: 85 , 91 (confrontation of the Muslim populations of the Urals and of Siberia with Slavic mass migration since the late nineteenth century), 152 (influence of the local distribution of al-Imam in Minangkabau in 1906–1908, and of the travels of migrants [perantau] on the appearance of al-Munir in 1911), 275 (exile of Muslim intellectuals of Russia to Turkey after the Young Turks revolution of 1908), 282 (Bolshevik repression, and the emigration of Muslim intellectuals from Russia; in Turkey, their geographical concentration in Konya), see also exile; travels and travelling

MAHRAB (Turkish Sufi periodical published in 1923–1925): 78 (its publication of articles on Ibn Taymiyya)

MILITIA OF MERCHANTS OF THE PURE AND TRUE (Qingzhen shangtuan): 243 (its creation in late 1911 by merchants of Shanghai)

MINANGKABAU (region of Java): 146 (role of local Manarists in diffusing al-Manār), 152 (influence of the local distribution of al-Imam in 1906–1908, and of the travels of migrants [perantau] on the appearance of al-Munir in 1911), 153 –154 (creation of the Sekolah Diniyyah al-Islamiyyah in 1908)

MINGDE (“Luminous Virtue”) SCHOOL (Sino-Arabic school at Kunming): 250 (an example of the Sino-Arabic schools of Western China)

MINZU (Chinese: national group): 137 (CCP’s definition of national groups after 1937)

MIR (Persian: “leader”): 228 (title of local rulers in the North of Pakistan until the 1970s), 231 (abolition of the principalities and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s)

MIR MUHAMMAD NAZIR KHAN (mir of Hunza at the turn of the twentieth century): 229 (his becoming of an agent of the Nizari Imam after the establishment of British control over Hunza)

MIR, MUSTANSIR (historian of Islamic reform): 20 (his comment on ‘Abduh’s break with the traditional style of tafsir)

AL-MIR’A AL-MUHAMMADIYYA (Indonesian newspaper published in Yogyakarta): 144 (its distribution in Cairo)

MIRACLES: see karamat

MISSIONARIES (Christian Catholic): 191 –192 (debates of the 1930s on the Christian religious propaganda in Libya), 198 (increasede presence on French missionaries in Morocco in the 1930s, and its perception throughout the world of Islam)

MISSIONARIES (Christian Orthodox): 89 (renewal of their activity in late nineteenth-century Russia), 274 (denunciation of the Christianization of Russia's Muslims by Ibrahim in his Rusiyada musulmanlar), 276 , 284 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's criticism of Christian missionary activity in Japan)

MISSIONARIES (Christian Protestant): 65 (their denunciation by Rashid Rida; their successive conferences in Jerusalem), 276, 284 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's criticism of Christian missionary activity in Japan), see also revivalism (Christian)

MLADI MUSLIMANI ("Young Muslims," political group in Bosnia-Herzegovinia): 214 (its appearance in Sarajevo, Mostar, and Zagreb 1941)

MODERNIZATION THEORY: 291 –292 (criticism by D. F. Eickelman of the postulate of a parallelism modernization/secularization)

MOGADISHU (Maqdishu): 162 (Somalian port city dominated in the tenth-century by dynasties of qadis)

MOHAMMAD 'ALI SHAH (Iranian monarch in 1907–1908): 167 (his role in the Constitutional Revolution)

MOHAMMAD REZA SHAH (1919–1980, Iranian monarch from 1941 to 1979): 291 (modernization theory's postulate of a preference for secularizing reformers like Atatürk in Turkey, or Reza Shah and Mohammad Reza Shah in Iran)

MOLIÈRE (Jean-Baptiste Poquelin, 1622–1673, French playwright): 126 (his quotation by Wang Jingzhai for his definition of watan)

MONGOLIAN LANGUAGE: 256 (teaching of Mongolian language in the primary schools created by Ma Fuxiang in Ningxia)

MONGOLS: 68 (thirteenth-century Mongol invasion as an equivalent of modern European colonialism)

MOROCCO: 61 (early twentieth-century claims by religious scholars for a consultative regime), 161 –174 (article by S. Reichmuth), 182 (revolt of the Rif Mountains in 1925), 197 –200 (Sh. Arslan’s influence on Morocco’s nascent nationalist movements), 199 (protests of the late 1930s to mark solidarity with the Palestinian cause), 202 (smuggling of La Nation arabe in Morocco), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany—like the Algerian or Moroccan Imam of the Grand Mosque in Paris)

MOSCOW: 181 (siege of the Islamic International founded by Enver Pava), 181 (meeting place of Trotsky and Arslan during a general conference of the Komintern), 187 (Arslan’s attendance of the anti-imperialist congress of 1922)

MOSQUES: 5 –6 (their role in structuring local Muslim communities), 86, 95 (debates on the building of the Great Mosque of St. Petersburg in 1908–1912), 128 (Yuehua ’s historical researches on mosques and Hui communities), 194 (call of the European Muslim Congress for the building of a mosque in Warsaw, and its construction under Szynkewicz’s supervision), 241 –242 (traditional role of mosques in popular religious education among Chinese Muslims), 243, 253 (role of printing houses appending to mosques, and journals, for helping early twentiethcentury Chinese Muslim school reformers to present their ideas), 247 –248 (opposition of the “New Style of Education (xinshi jaioyu)” to the “Scriptural Hall Education (jingtang jiaoyu)”—that is, the traditional system of mosque instruction—in early twentieth-century China), 250 (creation by Da Pusheng and Wang Haoran, in 1907, of the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion, at the Ox Street Mosque), 278, 279 , 283 (successive phases of the early twentieth-century project of construction of a mosque in Tokyo, until its opening in 1938), 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to “represent” Islam in France and Germany—like the Algerian or Moroccan Imam of the Grand Mosque in Paris), see also madrasa; sponsorship

MOSTAR: 214 (creation of the Mladi Muslimani organization in 1941)

MOUNT LEBANON: 182 (its administration from 1861 to 1919 by the Lebanese Administrative Council)

MU’AWIYA (the first Umayyad caliph): 48 (Shiite practice of cursing him)

AL-MU’AYYAD (an early twentieth-century Egyptian newspaper with an Islamic orientation): 43 (article by Zahrawi on Abdülhamid II’s claim to the caliphate), 166 (contributions by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

MUFTIa, SALIM (Mufti of Sarajevo, and leader of the Balkan Muslim world): 194 –195 (his participation in Jerusalem Congress in 1931, and in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 205 (his call to the creation of a global umma)

MUFTIYYAT (of Russia): 88 (its creation and its location in Ufa in 1782), 97 (its weakness, preventing a centralization of Islamic reform in Russia)

MUËTAHID : see ulama

MUHAMMAD B. ‘Abd AL-KABIR AL-KATTANI (leader of the Zawiyya of the Kattaniyya brotherhood in Fez): 165 (his role in the mobilization of the ulama against French encroachments in early twentiethcentury Morocco)

MUHAMMAD SALGA (d. 1939, key figure of the Tijaniyya in Kano): 166 (his studies with ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

MUHAMMAD V (1909–1961, Sultan then King of Morocco from 1927 to 1961): 198 (his early contacts with the Moroccan nationalist circles)

MUHAMMADIYAH (reformist movement established in 1912 in Central Java): 13 (its place as the second Islamic organization in Indonesia today), 155 (its historical roots in the early twentieth century)

MUHAMMADIYYA (madrasa in Kazan, Russia): 90 , 95, 98 (its reform by Barudi since 1891)

MUHAWARAT AL-MUSLIH WA’L-MUQALLID (“Debate between a Reformer and an Imitator,” work by Rashid Rida): 14

MUHIa, FUAD (b. 1941–1991, Marxist philosopher of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 217 (as a representative of the ideology of “ethnic Muslims” in B.-H.)

AL-MUHTASIB, ‘Abd AL-MAJID (Lebanese specialist of tafsir): 17

MUJEZINOVIa, MEHMED (1916–1998, Bosnian-Herzegovinian epigraphist): 217 (as a representative of the crypto-opponent trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

MUKDEN INCIDENT (of September 18, 1931): 129 (its impact on the anti-Japanese movement among the Hui of China)

MUNAZARA (“The Debate,” work by Fitrat, and the manifesto of the jadid movement in Bukhara and Russian Turkestan): 279 –280 (its comments on ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s Istanbul conferences)

AL-MUNIR (“The Candle,” Indonesian journal published in 1911–1916): 143 –158 (article by Azyumardi Azra, especially 153 –155)

AL-MUQADDIMA (Ar. “The Prolegomena,” major work of Ibn Khaldun): 168 (adaptation by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad of Ibn Khaldun’s version of the concept of Circle of Equity)

AL-MUQATTAM (early twentieth-century pro-British newspaper): 63 (its participation in the post-First World War dispute on the wearing of hats or fez)

MURID (Persian, “disciple”): 228 –229 (title in the religious hierarchy of the Isma ‘ili community)

MURSHID (Arabic, guide of a Sufi path): 89 –90 (renewal of the cult of the murshid among reformist Sufis in early twentieth-century Russia)

MÛSÂ KÂZIM EFENDA (Naqshbandi shaykh and a veyhülislâm of the late Ottoman period): 77 (his contribution to the Turkist journal /slâm mecmuasi), 78 (his chairmanship of the Cemiyyet-i Sûfiyye, and his links with the ruling CUP)

MUSIC: 247 (organization of a company of Hui singers for the popularization of anti-Japanese songs, by the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), see also songs

MUSLIM BROTHERS: 3 , 7 –8, 28 (their genealogical links with al-Manār), 21 (contribution of M.B. to the late twentiethcentury renewal of tafsir), 23 (Muslim Brothers' realization of the ideas of al-Manār as a mass movement), 24, 26 –27 (education of Muslim Brother leaders in secular institutions), 126 (diffusion of information on the M. B. among the Hui of China), 136 (role of the Ikhwani school in Ningxia in the mobilization of the Hui against the Japanese occupation of China)

MUSSOLINI, BENITO (1883–1945, Italian Fascist leader and dictator): 190 –191 (Sh. Arslan's relationship to him, and to his policy in Libya)

MUTAFARNIJ (Arabic, 44 "franconizer," that is imitator of European laws and systems): 24 (use of this notion by Rida)

NAFI, BASHEER M. (historian of Islamic reform): 16 (on the transition from Muslim reformers to Islamic intellectuals), 25 (on Islamic reform facilitating the assimilation of modernity for Islam), 38

(criticizing Hourani for presenting Islamic reform as a mere response to the Western challenge)

NAHDA (Arabic: “revival,” generic term for designating the late nineteenth-century revival of Arabic thought and literature): 6 (al-Kawakibi’s vision of it)

AL-NAHDA (“Revival,” journal published in Arabic in Cairo by Gaspralï in 1908): 86 (its aim as promoting the unity of the world of Islam)

NAKANO JOTARO (1866–1928), agent of Japan’s General Staff Office and an ardent Pan-Asianist): 278 (his introduction of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim into the Japanese Pan-Asianist circles)

NAKAYAMA ITSUZO (probable member of the Kokuryukai): 275 (his meeting with Ibrahim in Yokohama in 1909)

NAMETAK, ALIJA (1906–1987, Muslim religious writer of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

NANKING: 244 (creation, in 1931, of the Learned Society of the Youth for the Hui Religion in China, in Nanking—then the capital of the Guomindang government), 244, 245 (checking of Sun Yatsen’s “Three People Principles” by Muslim Chinese students of Nanking), 245 (launching of the Confederetion of the Hui Religion in China, in 1934), 247 (relocation to N. of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country)

NAQSHBANDIYYA (Sunni Sufi mystical path): 45 (Shari’A-minded Sufism of the path’s early twentieth-century Syrian branches), 78 (Turkish N.’s relations with the Cemiyyet-i Sûfiyye and with the ruling CUP),

78 (influence of Naqshbandi–Khalidi teachings on Nursi’s thought), 91, 92 (spreading of Shah Wali-Allah’s thought in Russia by the Naqshbandiyya–Mujaddidiyya), 96 (Tatar ‘Alim Barudi’s reception into the Syrian N. between 1908 and 1910), 152 (criticism of the N. in the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam), 262 (cultivation of Chinese classical literature in the early twentiethcentury Jahriyya menhuan, a sub-branch of the Chinese N.)

NASHASHIBI FACTION (in Palestine): 184 (its alliance with the British administration, and its opposition to the Husayni faction after the First World War)

NASIF, MUHAMMAD (friend of al-Qasimi’s in Jeddah): 48 –49 (his involvement in al-Qasimi’s dispute with Rida and Ibn ‘Aqil on the Shiite practice of cursing Mu’Awiya)

NASIR-I KHUSRAW (prominent eleventhcentury theoretician and propagator of Isma ‘ilism): 232 , 234 –237 (present-day re-interpretations of his works by educated Isma ‘ili middle classes)

LA NATION ARABE (journal published near Geneva from 1930 to 1938 by the delegation of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress under the direction of Sh. Arslan): 64 (its denunciation of Westernization in Atatürk’s Turkey), 176 –210 (article by Raja Adal)

NATIONAL BLOCK (Syrian political party): 186 (its role in the signature of the treaty of independence with France in 1936)

NATION AND NATIONALISM: 4 –5 , 26 (transition from nationalism to Islamism in the world of Islam in the 1970s), 50 (popular nationalism in the Syrian cities after First World War), 60 (necessity to weave the national and the religious to the Salafis’ eyes), 118 , 127 –128, 134 –135 ,

137, 245 –246 , 253, 261 262–263 , 279 (evolution of Chinese Muslim patriotism before, during and after the Sino-Japanese War, and the evolution of the CCP’s nationality policy), 126 (influence of modern Middle Eastern nationalisms upon Hui patriotism in China), 135 (translation of the Qur 1 an into Chinese as an activity in the service of the nation), 179 (Kayali on the CUP as an advocate of secular Ottoman nationalism), 183 (on the opposition of Palestinian delegates to the Syrian Congress to the Syrian elements’ narrow territorial nationalism), 190 (incompatibility between the Nazis’ ultra-nationalist racial ideology and Sh. Arslan’s thought), 197 (Arslan’s influence on Morocco’s nascent nationalist movements), 241 –272 (nationalism and patriotism among Chinese Muslims, in part. 244 : checking of Sun Yatsen’s “Three People Principles” by Chinese Muslim activists, to know whether they contradict Islam; 245 : action of the Society for the Promotion of the Education of the Hui People, in Ningxia, for bringing together the Uighurs and the Muslim Han), 253 (celebration of patriotism by Chinese adepts of the Ikhwani movement), 261 (influence of Hu Songshan’s hajj on his Chinese nationalist convictions; his transformation of the Ikhwani teaching into a pro-Chinese trend), 276, 284 (Japanese “national spirit (allaq-I milliya)” praised by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim as a model for the world of Islam), 277 (interest of Japanese nationalists and Pan-Asianists in ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s discourse), 290 (E. Gellner on Islam as the only force of resistance against the trend toward secularization and nationalism since the collapse of Marxist regimes), 296 (Nursi’s Risale-i Nur ’s encouragement of reflection on ideas of society and nation), 297 , 301 (F. Gülen’s interpretation of Islamic values offering a union between faith and nationalism), see also Fascism; identity; Pan-Asianism; secularism

NATIONALITY: 137 (Li Weihan’s role in drafting the CCP’s policy toward ethnic minorities after 1938), 215, 216 , 217 (nations and nationalities system created in Yugoslavia after 1945), 242 , 245 –246, 263 (nationality [minzu] system in the People’s Republic of China, and its application to the Hui nationality [Huizu]), 245 (action of the Society for the Promotion of the Education of the Hui People, in Ningxia, for bringing together the Uighurs and the Muslim Han), 247 exclusion of Xinjiang Muslims from the scope of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country

NERACHA (“The Scales,” weekly newspaper created in 1911 by Haji ‘ABbas in the Tanjung Pagar district of Singapore): 148 (its role in promoting the reformist cause)

NETWORS AND NETWORKING: 7 , 293 (OIC as an example of present-day transnational Muslim organizations), 247 (international lobbying organized by the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country during the Japanese occupation), 292 (on locally rooted movements—like opposition to the Shah’s regime in Iran—benefiting with transnational sponsors or supporters), 292 –293 (Second Vatican Council’s influence on the emergence of transnational decentralized grassroots networks), 297 (F. Gülen’s organization being less a centralized network than loosely affiliated clusters of organizations), see also associations and societies; Internet; travels and travelling

NEW DESTOUR PARTY (Tunisian independentist organization): 201 (its rapprochement with Messali al-Hajj)

NGOs: 226 –240 (article by Nejima Susumu, in part. 238 : (coordination of their activity with Isma ‘ili religious organizations)

NIGERIA: 166 (a workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad, and his death place)

NILE TV (Egyptian satellite television channel): 299 (discussion of Shahrur’s al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’a in 2000)

NINGXIA (north-western province of China with a notable Muslim population): 245 (creation, in 1933, of the Society for the Promotion of Education of the Hui People, and its sponsorhip by the warlord Ma Hongkui), 256 (Ma Fuxiang’s foundation and sponsorship of Muslim schools)

NIZHNYE CHELCHELY (village near Kuchuchat, in the Southern Urals): 98 (education place of Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

NORMAL ISLAMIC SCHOOL OF PINGLIANG (Pingliang Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao, in Gansu): 251 (its creation in 1937 under Da Pusheng’s direction)

NORMAL ISLAMIC SCHOOL OF SHANGHAI (Shanghai Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao): 251 (its creation in 1928)

NORMAL ISLAMIC SCHOOL OF WANXIAN (Wanxian Yi-si-lan shifan xuexiao, in Hebei): 251 (its creation in 1929 under Da Pusheng’s direction)

NORMAL SCHOOLS: 250 –251 (their establishment among Chinese Muslims in the 1920s to 1930s)

NORTHERN AREAS (of Pakistan): 226 (specificities of Isma ‘ilism in the Northern Areas and in the Chitral distrits)

N cR (Arabic: “Light,” Tatar journal published in St. Petersburg in the 1900s): 94 (its editor Bayazitoff)

NU –R AL-ISLAM (bulletin of al-Azhar, renamed in the 1930s Maëallat al-Azhar): 130 , 134 (translation into Chinese of its papers in the 1930s)

NURCU MOVEMENT (larger Islamist cemaat in twentieth-century Turkey): 75 (its genealogical links with the /ttihâd-I Muhammedî Cemiyeti), 295 –298 (its history and sociology)

NURSA, BEDAÜZZAMÂN SAAD (1873–1960, founder of the Nurcu movement): 75 (his participation in the counterrevolution of April 1909), 78 (influence of Naqshbandi-Khalidi teachings on his thought), 295 (distinction of his teaching, centered on autonomous book reading, from the master–disciple relationship at the core of most Sufi orders), 296 (its calls of resolving confessional differences between Christians and Muslims)

ODESSA: 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s stay in jail)

OHARA BUKEA (1865–1933, Japanese General Staff officer and member of the Toa Dobunkai): 278 (his introduction of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim into the Japanese Pan-Asianist circles), 279 (his correspondence with the Ottoman veyhülislam [1910] for asking the dispatch of ulama to Japan) OIC (Organization of the Islamic Conference): 7 , 293 (example of presentday transnational Muslim organizations)

OKIa, MUHAMED TAYYIB (1902–1977, historian and professor in the University of Ankara): 218 (representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

OKUMA SHIGENOBU (1838–1922, prominent statesman of the Meiji era): 276 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

OPPENHEIM, MAX FREIHERR VON (German orientalist, foreign service officer, and archaeologist): 189 –190 (his relations with Sh. Arslan)

ORALITY: 198 (diffusion of the incantation ya latif! throughout Morroco’s mosques as a protest against the Berber Dahir), 295 (Nursi’s oral teaching, and the preservation of its oral character because of the forbidding of the “old” Arabic alphabet in Republican Turkey), see also books and book trading; communication; language; reading

ORENBURG (city in the Southern Urals region): 85 –86 (the siege of the journal Mura)

ORIENTAL CLUB (of Berlin): 188 –189 , 190 (its chairmanship by Sh. Arslan after the First World War)

OSMANLIS (“Ottomans,” subdivision of the Turkist school of political thought): 77 (its main figures and trends)

OTTOMAN CONSULTATION SOCIETY: 46 (its foundation in Cairo by Rafiq al-’Azm and Rashid Rida)

OTTOMAN DYNASTY: 21 (its dependence on the Sultanate-Caliphate for its legitimacy)

OTTOMAN EMPIRE: 7 (the multiplication of Islamic conferences after the empire’s demise), 14 (conservatism of the Hanafi maùhab in the O.E.), 21 , 183 (consequences of the empire’s demise for the world of Islam), 58 (secession of Bulgaria, Romania, and Serbia), 74 (consequences of First World War on the debates on the role of Islam in Ottoman society), 89 (Ottoman influences on the elaboration of the usul-i ëadid in Russia), 93 (O.E. as a refuge land for the Muslims of Russia in the decades following the Crimean War), 151 (Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam ’s considerations of the modernization of the Ottoman army), 161 (overall influence of the Ottoman constitutionalist movement), 162 (consultative and representative mechanisms in classical Ottoman political institutions), 163 (Dadi-’s mention of the interest of early eighteenth-century Ottoman ruling circles in Venice’s form of government), 164 (restoration of the Ottoman constitution in 1908), 170 (Shari’A in the debates of the newly established Ottoman parliament since 1908), 179 (Sh. Arslan’s attachment to a multi-ethnic O.E.), 179 (Ottoman campaign of 1911–1912 in Cyrenaica), 181 (the emergence of an Ottoman culture in the last ten years of the O. period), 278, 280 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s failed efforts at uniting Japan and the Ottoman Empire), see also Turkey

OTTOMAN PARLIAMENT: 188 , 192 (Arslan’s role in the parlament’s Foreign Affairs Committee)

OTTOMAN TURKISH LANGUAGE: 178 (its study by Sh. Arslan)

OTTOMANISM (overall orientation of late Ottoman political thought): 78 (its links with Westernism, Islamism, and Turkism), 181 (CUP’s successive adaptation of Ottomanism, Islamism, and Turkism), 183 (Sh. Arslan’s transition from Ottomanism to Arabism)

AL-OUEZZANI, MOHAMED (Moroccan nationalist leader): 200 (his contacts with Sh. Arslan)

OX STREET MOSQUE (in Beijing): 250 , 259 (creation by Da Pusheng and Wang Haoran, in 1907, of the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion), 253 (role of the printing house appending to the O.S.M. in the publication of reformist journals), 257 (Da Pusheng’s studies in the O.S.M., under the guidance of Wang Haoran), 260 (Ma Songting’s studies in the O.S.M., after Wang Haoran and Da Pusheng initiated a Sino-Arabic curriculum there)

OYAMA IWAO (1842–1916, Japanese Marshal, general commander in Manchuria): 276 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

PADRI MOVEMENT (late eighteenth to early nineteenth-centuries political movement in Central Sumatra): 146 (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s grandfather’s belonging to this movement)

PAKISTAN: 226 –240 (article by Nejima Susumu, in particular 238 : lack of an opposition of Ima’ilis to the state in spite of their autonomous strategies of modernization)

PALESTINE: 27 (presence of the Muslim Brothers), 180 (Sh. Arslan’s anguish at the fate of Palestine in 1917), 181 –182 (weigh of Palestinian delegates oin the Syrian Congress created in Geneva in 1921), 183 (publication of articles on the Palestinian question by La Nation arabe), 194 (Palestinian question being considered by the European Muslim Congress of 1935 not as a political, but as a religious issue), 199 (protests of the late 1930s, in Morocco, to mark solidarity with the Palestinian cause)

PAN-ASIANISM: 276 (launching of this ideology in Japan for the sake of Japanese interests), 278 (coincidence between Ibrahim’s Pan-Asianism and the statesponsored Japanese Pan-Asianist ideology), see also identity; nationalism

PAN-ISLAMISM (in Turkish: ittihâd-i /slâm): 80 (invention of this concept by the Young Ottomans), 86, 98 (accusation against nonconformist Muslim thinkers in the late Russian Empire), 147 (influence of al-Afghani’s pan-Islamism on the Malay-Indonesian thinker Shaykh Muhammad Tahir), 150 (pan-Islamism in the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam), 273 – 288 (article by Komatsu H.), see also Islamism

PAN-POLISH MUSLIM CONGRESS (of 1925): 194 (its election of Szynkewicz as Mufti of Poland)

PAN-TURKISM: 86 (accusation against nonconformist Muslim thinkers in the late Russian Empire)

PANEL (key element of the judicial system set up since the 1970s by the Isma ‘ili Nizari Imams in Pakistan): 233 –234 (implementation of this system in Northern Pakistan)

PANG SHIQIAN (Hui scholar): 131 (his translation into Chinese of the “History of Islam” by Khuzuli)

PARIS: 176 (place of anti-colonial congresses attended by Sh. Arslan), 182 (education place of Ihsan al-Jabiri), 199 (place of Sh. Arslan’s meeting with al-Fasi and Balafrej in 1930)

PARLIAMENT: 167 , 168, 169 (Shari’A’s central place in the parliamentary system proposed by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad for Morocco), 170 (Shari’A in the debates of the newly established Ottoman parliament since 1908), 179 (Sh. Arslan’s election to the Ottoman parliament in 1913, and his activity in this framework), see also constitutionalism

PATRIOTISM: see nationalism

PEDAGOGICAL INSTITUTE OF THE HUI RELIGION (Huijiao shifan xuetang, in Beijing), 250 , 259 (its creration in 1907 by Da Pusheng and Wang Haoran, at the Ox Street Mosque)

PENANG (city in the Indonesian archipelago): 147 (location of the Madrasa al-Mansur)

PENGASUH (Malay-Indonesian journal first published in Kota Bharu in 1918): 145 (its role in the spread of Kaum Muda ideas in the Kelantan region)

PERAK (Malaysian state): 147 (installation of Shaykh Muhammad Tahir after his return from Egypt in 1899)

PERSEKUTUAN RUSHDIYYAH (club created in Riau in the early 1890s): 148 (participation of Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi in its creation)

PERSEKUTUAN ULAMA KAUM SEMENANJUNG (Pan-Malayan Association of Ulama): 148 (appeal for its creation in 1936, for uniting reformists and traditionalists)

PERSIAN LANGUAGE: 214 (role of Ma-ir Sikiri-, specialist of Persian language and literature, in the Bosnian new jaded trend), 230 (Persian as the language of the Isma ‘ili da’wa in Xinjiang in the early twentieth century), 232 (Persian as a medium of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis), 248 (replacement of Persian by Arabic language in Chinese Muslim schools—Persian remaining till the post-Maoist period the literary language of female ahong s), 257 , 259 (place of Arabic and Persian languages in the traditional mosque scools of China)

PERSIANS: 10 (their being concerned by the awakening of Islam), 162 (early Abbasid Shiites of Persian extraction as an “autocratic block” opposed to the “constitutional block” of the Sunnis), 257 (Da Pusheng’s Persian ascendency)

PETER THE GREAT (Czar of Russia from 1686 to 1725): 85 (impact of his reforms on the conversion of Muslims to Orthodox Christianity in the Volga-Urals region), 88 (his reform of the Russian Orthodox Church as a model for Catherine II’s creation of a Muslim “clergy”)

PHILOSOPHY: 47 (publication by al-Qasimi of al-Zirkishi’s treatise on jurisprudence, philosophy, and logic), 58 (Renan and ‘Abduh’s polemic on the “rigidity” of Islam), 119 , 123, 125 (Hui classical theories of adhesion to the Chinese Imperial state), 119 –120 (Liu Zhi and Ma Zhu’s role in the elaboration of the Huiru philosophy), 120 (combination of wahdat-i wuëud with Confucian terminology in Huiru philosophy), 122 (avatars of the wahdat-i wuëud theory in the early twentieth century), 168 (adaptation by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad of Ibn Khaldun’s version of the concept of Circle of Equity), 169 (maslahat al-bilad as a key issue of Islamic reformist political thought, for example, in ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s draft constitution), 170 (N. Kemal’s identification of the Shari’A with Rousseau’s concept of Natural Law), 244, 245 (checking of Sun Yatsen’s principles by Muslim Chinese students of Nanking, to know whether they contradict Islam), 253 –254 (Liu Zhi’s early eighteenth-century treatise “The Philosophy of Islam,” and its multiple reprints), 260 (Yang Zhongming’s comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam in the Sijao Yaogua), see also kalam

PILGRIMAGE: see hajj

PIR (Persian word, “elder”): 228 –229 (title in the religious hierarchy of the Isma ‘ili community)

PIR SAHIB (b. 1929, Isma ‘ili pir of Ghizr): 230 –231 (history of his family, and transformation of his authority during the twentieth century)

POINCARÉ, RAYMOND (1860–1934, French statesman): 186 (role of his government in the failure of the negotiations with the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in 1925–1926)

POLAND: 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe), 194 (acknowledgement of the Polish government by the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for its favorable treatment of its Muslim population), 194 (Pan-Polish Muslim Congress of 1925)

POLICE: 170 (suggestion of a new Police Law for Morocco by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad), see also censorship; prison; secret services

PONSOT (French High Commissioner in Syria): 186 (his succession to de Jouvenel in 1926, after the failure of the negotiations with the Syrian-Palestinian Congress)

POPOVIC, ALEXANDRE (historian of Islam in the Balkans): 193 (on the Muslims of Hungary in the Interwar period)

POZDERAC, HAMDIJA (1924–1989, Muslim Communist political leader of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (his role in the campaign the the recognition of a “Muslim nation” in Yugoslavia)

PRINTING AND PRINTING HOUSES: 56 (foundation of the Matba’A Salafiyya printing press), 90 (role of printing in Arabic characters in the undermining of the ulama’s transmission of learned culture, in Imperial Russia), 243 , 253 (role of printing houses attached to mosques, and journals, for helping early twentieth-century Chinese Muslim school reformers to present their ideas), 254 (Ma Fuxiang’s sponsorship of the publishing of almost all the celebrated works of classical Chinese Islam from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries), 256 (the publishing of Han kitab s—Confuciano-Muslim books), 295 (formal education being challenged by the ability to communicate in different media in the contemporary Muslim majority world), 296 (dissemination of Nursi’s Risale-i Nur by “thousands” of men and women, and after Second World War through the use of a duplicating machine), 297 (control by F. Gülen’s followers of a web of broadcast and print media), see also books and book trading; journals and newspapers; sponsorship

PRISON: 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s stay in jail in Odessa), see also police

PROTESTANTS: see Christianity and Christians

PURIVATRA, ATIF (b. 1928, Muslim secular politician in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 217 (representative of the ideology of “ethnic Muslims” in B.-H.)

QADI (Arabic: judge of the Shari’A): see ulama

QADIM (Arabic word, lit. “old, ancient”): 212 (denomination of late nineteenth-century traditionalists in Bosnia-Herzegovina)

AL-QADIRI, DHAKIR (1878–1954, ‘Alim of Ufa): 97 (his popularization of Qasim Amin’s writings on the status of woman), 101 (his teaching in the Husayniyya Madrasa), 102 (his contribution to the Mura)

QADIRIYYA (Sunni Sufi mystical path): 44 (support provided by its Syrian branches to the CUP)

AL-QALQASHANDI, SHIHAB AL-DIN AHMAD (medieval theoretician of the state): 22

AL-QARADAWI, SHAYKH YUSUF (leading Sunni revivalist thinker, the chairman of the European Council for Fatwa and Research): 28 (inheriter of the school of al-Manār), 299 (his debate with the Syrian reformist intellectual S. J. al-’Azm about the interpretation of sacred texts, on al-Jazeera satellite TV in 1997)

QARI (Qur 1 an reader): 90 (qari s’ role in the shaking of the ulama’s authority in the Russian Empire), see also reading; ulama

AL-QASIMI, MUHAMMAD JAMAL AL-DIN (leading early twentieth-century Damascene reformer): 20 (his praise by Rida as “the renewer of Islamic sciences”), 27 (his non-urban social origins), 45 (his short biography; his critics against Sufism as irreconcilable with the Qur1 an and the Sunna), 47 (reviews of his works, and his obituary notice in al-Manār ; his library in Damascus), 48 –49 (his participation in the debate with Rida and Ibn ‘Aqil on the Shiite practice of cursing Mu’Awiya), 49 (raising of a mob against him and other local reformers in Damascus in October 1908)

QATAR: 299 –300 (debates between S. J. al-’Azm and Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi and between Nasir Hamid Abu Zayd and Muhammad 2Imara on al-Jazeera in 1997)

QING DYNASTY: 241 (reactions of Chinese Muslim intellectuals to its overthrow)

QUR’AN: 7 , 9, 13 , 15 –16, 22 , 26, 28 (call to a return to Q. exegesis in reformist thought), 18–20 (‘Abduh’s lectures on the Q.), 45 (Q.’s antinomy with Sufism, according to al-Qasimi), 56 (‘Abduh’s praise of the Wahhabiyya for removing the layers between men and a true study of the Q. and Hadith), 79 (Q.’s lost translation into Turkish by M. Âkif), 96 (rational approach to the Q. in Barudi’s teaching), 99 –100 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s focusing of religious teaching on the Q. and the Sunna), 122 (early twentieth-century Hui calls for a return to the Q. and the Hadith, within the framework of Chinese Islam), 123, 259 (Wang Jingzhai’s two translations of the Q., in classical and colloquial Chinese), 125 (need for accurate translations and interpretations of the Q. stressed by Hui reformers), 128 (Ma Songting’s arguments on the publication of translations of the Q. in the Yuehua), 130, 135 , 253 (disputes on the translation of the Q. into Chinese), 150 (al-Imam ’s emphasis on the need to return to the Q. and the Hadith), 169 (‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s reference to the recommendation of consultation in the Q.), 232 (Q. as a matter of religious education by the wa’iz s among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis), 244 (launching of the Q.’s translation into Chinese by the Learned Society of the Hui Religion in China), 245 (creation of the Society for the Diffusion of Chinese Islam, in 1933, for spreading the Muslim doctrine through the translation of the Q. into Chinese), 248 (giving up of making the pupils memorize by heart the Q. in Chinese phonetic transcription in Chinese Muslim religious schools, and its replacement by the teaching of Arabic language and learning of the Qur 1 anic text), 258 (Shu Shanyu and Wu Tegong’s collaboration with Ha Decheng and Ma Jiang on their translations of the Q.), see also language; reading; translation

QURAYSH (tribe of the Prophet Muhammad): 13 , 22 (debates of the 1920s on the importance of a caliph being of Quraysh origin)

QURBAN-’ALIYEFF, MUHAMMAD (1890–1972, Bashkir religious scholar exiled in Japan): 282 –283 (his relations with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim during the latter’s exile in Japan, and his deportation to Manchuria in 1938)

AL-QURSAWI (‘Abd al-Nasir Abu’l-Nasr, 1776–1812, an ‘Alim from the Volga Region): 92 (his role in the appearance of Islamic reform in Bukhara), 98 –99 (discovery of his work by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din through the latter’s master ‘Abd al-Fattah)

AL-QUWWATLI, SHUKRI (Istiqlalist leader, opposed to the Hashemites): 184 (his amenity to receive financial support from Ibn Saud, and his participation in the creation of the Jerusalem finance committee of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress)

RABAT: 198 (beginning of the ya latif incantations in Rabat’s mosques, as a protest against the Berber Dahir)

RADIO: see mass media

RAHBAR-I NAËAT (“The Guide of Salvation,” work [1915] by Fitrat): 279 –280 (its positive image of Japan, introduced by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in his Istanbul conferences)

RAILROAD: see travels and travelling

RAJA (title of local rulers in the North of Pakistan until the 1970s): 228 , 231 (abolition of the principalities and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s)

RAMADAN: 192 (Arslan’s travel in Yugoslavia in 1933–1934 “for spending Ramadan with [his] Yugoslavian friends”), 298 (measure of religious practice and identity through the observance of Ramadan in Turkey)

RAMIYEFF (Muhammad Shakir [1857–1912] and Muhammad Dhakir [1859–1921], entrepreneurs and publicists of Orenburg): 100 , 101 (their edition of the Waqt newspaper and the Mura journal)

RASULIYEFF, SHAYKH ZAYN-ALLAH (1833–1917, Naqshbandi shaykh the Eastern Urals): 90 (his role and authority as head of the Rasuliyya Madrasa), 99 (his biography by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

READING: 89 (radical change introduced by the usu l-i ëadid in the practice of reading among the Muslims of Russia), 232, 234 –237 (present-day re-interpretations of Nasir-i Khusraw’s works by educated Isma ‘ili middle classes), see also books and book trading; orality

REASON (in Arabic: ‘Aql): 48 (al-Qasimi’s praise of Ibn ‘Aqil’s independent use of reason, qualified of iëtihad), 96 (Hadith’s rational approach in Barudi’s teaching), 150 (apology of reason by the authors of al-Imam), see also science

REBAC, HASAN (1890–1953, prominent member of the High Direction of the Bosnian Muslim Community): 214 (figure of the new jadid trend)

RED CRESCENT: 192 (Sh. Arslan’s coordination of the activities of the Red Crescent during the Balkan War of 1912)

RED?Ia, ENVER (b. 1915, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (a representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

RENAN, ERNEST (French philosopher): 58 (‘Abduh’s response to him on the question of the “rigidity” of Islam)

RENAUDEL, PIERRE (French socialist politician): 188 (his relations with Sh. Arslan)

REVIVALISM (Christian): 65 (Catholic revivalism after the signature of the Latran Agreement; Protestant revivalism in England), 292 (appearance of Solidarnosc in Poland, role of liberation theology in Latin America, and return of Protestant fundamentalism as expressions of an overall Christian revivalism)

REZA SHAH (1878–1944, Iranian monarch from 1925 to 1941): 291 (modernization theory’s postulate of a preference for secularizing reformers like Atatürk in Turkey, or Reza Shah and Mohammad Reza Shah in Iran)

RIAU (Indonesian sultanate): 149 (role of the Riau court in the circulation of al-Imam in the Riau region), 151 (defence of the Riau court by al-Imam against the encroachments of the Dutch administration)

RIDA, RASHID (1865–1935, Syrian reformist thinker, editor, and main author of al-Manār): 3 –39 (article by Kosugi Yasushi), 40 –54 (article by David D. Commins), 55 –73 (article by Mahmoud Haddad), 79 –80 (his impact on Mehmed Âkif), 99 (his rehabilitation of Ibn Taymiyya), 164 (his support to the Young Turks), 166 (his presumed influence on ‘Abd al-Karim Murad), 176, 178 –179 , 202 –203 (his close friendship with Sh. Arslan, and his occasional opposition to him), 182 –183 , 186 (his strategic alliance with the Arslan brothers and Hajj Amin al-Husayni inside the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 184 –185 (R.’s role and the Istiqlalists’ in Lutfallah’s ousting from the chairmanship of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress in 1927), 194 (minute of silence in remembrance of R. R. in the European Muslim Congress of Geneva)

RIF MOUTAINS (in Morocco): 182 (revolt of ‘Abd al-Karim in 1925)

RIFA’IYYA (Sufi mystical path): 41 (advocated by al-Sayyadi), 44 (its patronage by Abdülhamid II)

RISALAH PENTING PADA MASALAH JILATAN ANJING DI ATAS EMPAT MAZHAB (“An Important Epistle on the Case of Being Licked by a Dog According to the Four Madhab s of the Sunnis”): 148 (booklet by Haji ‘ABbad and Burhanuddin al-Helmi against the traditionalists of Singapore)

RISALAT AL-TAWHID (The “Epistle of Unicity,” by ‘Abduh): 67 (its view by early twentieth-century European authors), 68 (teaching of this work at al-Azhar), 130 (its translation into Chinese by Ma Jian in 1933)

RASALE-A NUR (“The Treatise of Light,” collection of Nursi’s principal writings): 296 (its dissemination by “thousands” of men and women, and after Second World War through the use of a duplicating machine), 296 (its encouragement of reflection on ideas of society and nation)

RIZA AL-DIN B. FAKHR AL-DIN (1859–1936, ‘Alim and publicist from the Southern Urals): 85 –116 (article by S. A. Dudoignon)

RIZVIa, MUHSIN (b. 1930, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian of literature): 217 (representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

ROFF, WILLIAM (historian of Malay-Indonesian national movements): 145 (his study on Malay-Indonesian students in Egypt and Hijaz in the 1920s), 145 –146 (his assessment of al-Imam ’s role in diffusing Islamic reform in the Malay-Indonesian world), 147 (on Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s combination of reformism and modernism), 148 (on Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi’s education), 149 –150 (on the realm of concern of al-Imam), 152 (on the circulation of al-Imam)

ROME: 176 (place of anti-colonial congresses attended by Sh. Arslan), 191 (Arslan’s meetings with Mussolini and Theodoli in 1934)

RORTY, RICHARD (Northern American philosopher): 290 (on religion acting as a “conversation-stopper” outside of circles of believers)

ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES (1712–1778, French philosopher): 170 (N. Kemal’s identification of R.’s concept of Natural Law with that of the Shari’A)

ROY, OLIVIER (philosopher and social scientist of Muslim majority and minority societies): 289 (on the possibility for modern Muslim intellectuals to choose among languages and audiences), 293 –294 (on the proliferation of different types of Islamist movement, and the use of the term “post-Islamism”)

R cH AL-MA’ANI (work by al-Alusi): 20 (last encyclopaedic tafsir of the classical brand)

RUIWEI ELEMENTARY SCHOOL (Ruiwei xiaoxue): 255 (its creation, with a military training, in 1944 by Ma Bufang)

RUMANIA: 58 (its secession from the Ottoman Empire, and its opposition to it), 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe)

RURALITY/URBANITY: 27 (‘Abduh, al-Qasimi’s and numerous other early twentieth-century reformist thinkers’ rural origins, alien to the ulama aristocracy of the urban notables), 98 (education of Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din in the village of Nyzhnye Chelchely), 296 , 297 (Nursi and other present-day religious intellectuals’ preservation of their rural roots)

R cSIYADA MUSULMANLAR YAKH cD TATAR AQWAMINING TA’RIKHCHASI (“The Muslims in Russia, or a Short History of the Tatar People,” work [1900] by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim): 274 (its publication in Cairo)

RUSSIAN EMPIRE: 85 –116 (article by S. A. Dudoignon, in part. 88, 93 (Edicts of Religious Tolerance taken in Russia by Catherine II in 1773 and Nicholas II 1905), 161 (impact of the revolution of 1905 on the Muslim opinion), 167 , 273 (echo of the Japanese victory over Russia in 1904 throughout the world of Islam), 273 –288 (article by Komatsu H.)

RUSSIAN REVOLUTIONARY ORGANIZATIONS AND PARTIES: 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s contacts with Russian revolutionaries during his travels in Europe)

RUSSO-TATAR SCHOOLS (russko-tuzemnye mkoly): 92 (their perception by the Muslims of Russia)

SABAHATTAN, “PRINCE” (1877–1948): 74 –75 (chief of a Westernist current in late Ottoman Turkey)

MABANOVIa, HAZIM (1916–1971, a Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (representative of the crypto-opponent trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

SABRA EFENDA, MUSTAFA (1869–1954, conservative veyhülislâm, leader of the Cemiyyet-i /lmiyye-i /slâmiyye): 75 (his role as an Islamist leader in late Ottoman Turkey)

AL-SADAT, ANWAR (Egyptian President from 1970 to 1981): 4 (his assassination as the landmark of a new era in the history of Islam)

SA’DI (Persian classical poet): 79 (his influence on the young M. Âkif), 90 (translation of his works into Tatar in Imperial Russia)

AL-SADR, MUHAMMAD BAQIR (modern Shiite theoretician of the state): 23 (influence of his concept of political guidance of the “righteous authority” on the Islamic Constitution of Iran)

SAFAHAT (“Phases,” collection of poems by M. Âkif): 79 (its publication from 1911 onwards)

LA SAGESSE: see Madrasat al-Hikma SAINT MORITZ (ski resort in Switzerland): 181 (place of Zinoviev and Sh. Arslan’s first meeting)

SAINT PETERSBURG: 86 , 95 (debates on the construction of the city’s Great Mosque in 1908–1912), 96 (meeting of al-Afghani and Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din in 1888)

SALAF (Arabic, “predecessors,” religious scholars of the early generations of Islam): 7 , 8, 11 , 20, 33 (symbol of pure Islam in Salafi thought), 57 (‘Abduh’s comment on the salaf ’s independence from rulers)

SALAFI/SALAFIYYA (broad trend of Islamic thought, claiming for a return to the pure Islam of the Salaf): 8 , 18 –19, 33 (its historical roots and principles), 11 (its relation to taqlid and iëtihad), 26 , 36 (its genealogical links with al-Manār), 43 (in Damascus; its relation to Sufism), 53 (its origin and early development in Egypt and Syria), 54 (its heterogeneity in its early stage), 55 (al-Kawakibi’s onnection with the early development of the Salafiyya), 56 , 60 (its acceptation of Western ideas within an Islamic framework), 64 (its hostility to Westernization after the abolition of the caliphate in 1924), 68 (Salafiyya as a midway between imitation and modernism identified with change), 74 (ideas of its thinkers as roots of Islamism in the Ottoman Empire), 77 –78 (links of the late Ottoman Salafi-oriented periodicals with Sufism), 79 –80 (the Salafiyya’s impact on M. Âkif), 81 (its little influence on Turkish Ottoman intellectuals before 1908), 92 (Salafi influences in the early twentieth-century madrasas of Russia), 128 (Chinese translations from Egyptian Salafi journals in the 1930s), 152 (the critic of the turuq, especially the Naqshbandiyya, in the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam),

155 (early twentieth-century roots of the Indonesian Salafi organizations Muhammadiyah and Persuatan Islam), 249 (Salafiyya’s activity in China since the foundation of the People’s Republic in 1949)

SAMARQAND: 92 , 93 (education place of nineteenth-century and early twentiethcentury Tatar scholars of Islam)

AL-SANUSI, AHMAD AL-SHARIF (head of the Sanusiyya tariqa and Libyan leader): 190 –191 , 201 (his relationship with Sh. Arslan)

SARAJEVO: 214 (creation of the Mladi Muslimani in 1941), 216 (Gazi Husrevbeg Medrese and its role in the education of the official religious leaders of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia during the Communist period)

SARRAIL, MAURICE (French High Commissioner in Syria): 185 (his unpopularity, and his replacement by the relatively liberal de Jouvenel after the Syrian revolt of 1925)

SAUDARA (Malay-Indonesian journal first published in Pulau Pinang in 1928): 145 (its role in the spread of Kaum Muda ideas in the Kelantan region)

SAUDI ARABIA: 255 (Ma Bufang’s term as Nationalist ambassador to S.A. in 1961), 300 (state-appointed religious hierarchies in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt, Malaysia, and ex-Soviet Central Asia, and their resistance to challenges to their authority), see also Arabian peninsula; hajj; Mecca

AL-SAYYADI, SHAYKH ABU’L-HUDA (Syrian religious advisor to Abdülhamid II): 40 , 41 –43 (his overall attitude toward reformers), 44

(his publications defending Rifa’i ceremonies), 45 (review by Rashid Rida of his 1906 essay on the Shari’A)

SAYYID MUHAMMAD B. ‘AQIL B. YAHYA (associate of al-Imam in Singapore): 145 (his role in the journal’s diffusion in the Indonesian Archipelago)

SAYYID QUTB (1906–1966, main theoretician of the Muslim Brothers): 20 (influence on his tafsir), 24 (his education in a secular institution)

SAYYID SHAYKH B. AHMAD AL-HADI (1862–1934, scholar from Malacca, founder of the Madrasa al-Mansur in Penang): 147 (his mission to Mecca and Cairo in 1903), 148 –149 (his biography, especially his participation in the formation of the Persekutuan Rushdiyyah)

SCHACHT, JOSEPH (historian of Islamic law): 14 (his assertion on the closure of the gate of iëtihad by the tenth century)

SCHOOL OF MUSLIM SOURCES (Muyuan xuetang) of Zhenjiang: 243 , 250 (its opening by Tong Cong in 1905)

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOLING: 76 (reform of Ottoman madrasas by the Young Tu • rks), 87 (madrasas’ role in the transmission of ‘Abduh’s influence in the Russian Empire), 89 (experimentation of the usuli ëadid in Crimea in the 1880s), 89 (submission of the Bashkirs to a Russian state policy of school instruction in vernacular language in Cyrillic script, in the late nineteenth century), 90 (role of Russia’s Muslim school teachers in shaking the ulama’s authority; schools and madrasas’ financing through benevolent associations), 92 (Russo-Tatar schools and their perception by the Muslims of Russia) 166 (foundation of Arabic schools by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad in Western Africa), 178 (US Protestant schools in the Near-East, and attendance of one of them by Sh. Arslan), 243 (creation of the “School of Muslim Sources” by Tong Cong in Zhenjiang in 1905), 243 –244 (financing of early twentieth-century Islamic schools in China by commercial societies), 244 (creation of a variety of schools by the Learned Society of the Hui Religion in China, from 1925 onward), 244 (construction of libraries as an aim of the Guild of the Hui Religion of China), 247 (the creation of schools as a key aim of early twentieth-century Chinese Muslim associations), 249 (following, by Chinese Muslim reformed religious schools, of the curriculum of Chinese official schools), 249 (appearance of the first new-style Chinese Muslim schools in Hunan in 1898), 250 (appearance of Sino-Arabic schools in Western China), 250 –251 (establishment of normal schools among Chinese Mudslims in the 1920s to 1930s), 255 –256 (school foundations by Western Chinese Muslim warlords), 256 (Ma Linyi’s creation of the Jiejin school, and his books on modern schooling), 259 (Wang Haoran’s role in the creation of new-style mosque schools in China), 260 (opening of a Sino-Arabic curriculum in Kunming in the early 1920s), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit of universities and schools for girls in Tokyo in 1909), 295 –296 (Nursi’s apology of early twentieth-century Western-style school education among the Muslims), 297 (F. Gülen’s movement’s web of more than 550 schools in Turkey and the CIS, especially in Central Asia), see also education; jingtang; libraries; madrasa; mosques; Sino-Arabic curriculum; universities

SCIENCE: 20 (al-Qasimi’s praise by Rida as “the renewer of Islamic sciences”), 46 (chemistry and medicine as disciplines to be caught up from Europeans), 94 , 95 (influence of al-Afghani’s casuistry for justifying scientific discoveries), 194 (Szynkewicz’s relations and exchanges with German scientific circles), 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s praise of Japan’s acceptance of Western science and technology, and his warnings against superficial Westernization), 298 –299 (Shahrur’s analogy between the Copernician revolution and Qur1 anic interpretation), 296 (relation of Islamic belief to modern science in the work of twentieth-century Muslim religious intellectuals), 297 (F. Gülen’s interpretation of Islamic values as offering a union between religion and science), see also reason; secularization and secularism; westernization

SEBALÜRREVÂD (“The Straight Path,” name taken by the Sirât-i müstakim after 1912): 76 (a description of its staff)

SECRET SERVICES: 192 (flurry of reports by the French secret services on Sh. Arslan in the 1930s), 281 –282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s collaboration with the Intelligence Department of the Ottoman Army), see also police

SECULARIZATION AND SECULARISM: 5 (its overestimation in the history of modernization processes), 24 (Sayyid Qutb’s education in a secular institution), 56 (criticism of Western secularism by early Salafis, and their call for the separation of religion and politics), 59 (al-’Azm’s considerations on the separation of religious and worldly matters), 75 (attacks by the newspaper Volkan against the Turkish revolution of 1908 as made up by “secularists”—dehrî s), 80 (Young Ottomans’ opposition to the legal secularization started with the Tanzimat), 290 (E. Gellner on Islam as the only force resisting against the trend toward secularization and nationalism since the collapse of Marxist regimes), 291 –292 (criticism by D. F. Eickelman of the postulate of a parallelism modernization/ secularization, through the example of the Iranian revolution of 1979), 294 (religious discourse as a precondition for the rise of the early modern public sphere in Europe), see also nationalism; reason; westernization

SEKOLAH DINIYYAH AL-ISLAMIYYAH (new style madrasa of the Minangkabau area): 153 –154 (influence of the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-Islamiyya of Singapore on its creation in 1908)

SENEGAL: 166 (workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

SERBIA: 58 (its secession from the Ottoman Empire, and its opposition to it)

SERBS: 212 (their share in the population of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

SERUAN AZHAR (journal of the Malay-Indonesian students of al-Azhar in the 1920s): 145 (its role in the emergence of an Islamic discourse in the Archipelago)

VEYHÜLASLÂM (highest religious authority in the Ottoman Empire): 76 (reforms of its status and functions in 1916 and 1917)

SHA SHANYU (1879–1968, Chinese Muslim teacher, journalist at the Shenbao of Shanghai, and public activist): 243 (his leading of the militia created in late 1911 in Shanghai by local merchants), 244, 258 (his participation in the creation, in 1925, of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion in China, and, in 1929, of the Guild of the Hui Religion in China), 258 (his and Wu Tegong's collaboration with Ha Decheng and Ma Jiang on their translations of the Qur 1 an)

SHADIAN (city in the far South Eastern China): 260 (Ma Jian's birthplace, and a center of Sino-Arabic schooling)

SHAFI'IYYA (one of the four madhab s of modern Sunni Islam): 146 (Malay-Indonesian Shaykh Ahmad Khatib as the Imam of the Shafi'i madhab in Mecca and Medina), 155 (al-Munir 's contestation of the Shafi'i hegemony, and its advocacy of madhab pluralism in the Indonesian archipelago)

SHAH WALI-ALLAH OF DELHI (1703–1762, Indian Muslim reformist thinker): 91 (diffusion of his thought in Inner Eurasia by the Naqshbandiyya-Mujaddidiyya)

SHAHBANDAR, ‘Abd AL-RAHMAN (Arab nationalist, a rebel chief during the Syrian revolt of 1925): 182 (his alliance with M. Lutfallah against Arslan, Rida and al-Husayni in the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 183 (his and Lutfallah’s opposition to Palestinians on questions of territorial nationalism, his compromise with Zionism, and his allegiance to the Hashemites), 185 (conciliatory positions of the Lutfallah—Shahbandar faction regarding the British Mandate and the creation of a Greater Lebanon), 185 –186 (Shahbandar’s and Lutfallah’s intrigues against Arslan’s negotiations with the French officials), 186 (Sh.’s unfruitful opposition to the French-Syrian treaty of 1936)

SHAHRUR, MUHAMMAD (Syrian reformist religious intellectual): 294 , 300 (his contribution to the emergence of a public sphere in Syria), 298 –300 (his work al-Kitab wa’l-Qur’an and its current interpretation, in part. 298 –299 : Shahrur’s analogy between the Copernician revolution and Qur 1 anic interpretation)

SHANGHAI: 127 (Shanghai Islamic School), 243 (creation of the Militia of Merchants of the Pure and True in 1911), 243 –244 (creation, by Ha Decheng and others, of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China), 244 (creation of the Guild of the Hui Religion in China in 1929), 244 –245 (creation, in 1934, of the Cultural Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China), 251 (creation of the Normal Islamic School of Shanghai in 1928), 260 (Ha Decheng’s work of modernization of Islam in Shanghai)

SHANGHAI ISLAMIC SCHOOL: 127 (its sending of students to al-Azhar in 1931)

SHARI’A (Islamic law): 15 (field of reflection opened by al-Manār on the Sh.), 22 (caliphate as a guarantee of the rule of the Sh.), 61 (Sh.’s rule as an alternative to absolute authority), 64 (Sh.’s undermining after the abolition of the caliphate in 1924), 75 (criticism by the newspaper Volkan against the Turkish revolution of 1908 for not implementing the Sh.), 76 (reform of Ottoman Sh. a courts in 1917), 88 (debates on the field of application of the Sh. in the Russian Empire), 167 (Sh.’s central place in the parliamentary system proposed by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad for Morocco), 170 (Young Ottomans’ confidence in the Sh. as a source of dignity and as a baseline for political institution-building), 170 (Sh. as a source of legitimacy under Abdülhamid II), 197 –199 (creation of the Berber Dahir in 1931 by the French protectorate in Morocco, and its contestation throughout the world of Islam), see also fiqh

SHAWQI, AHMAD (1868–1932, Egyptian poet and dramatist): 203 –204 (his friendship with Sh. Arslan)

SHAYKH AHMAD KHATIB AL-MINANGKABAWI (Shaykh Muhammad Tahir’s cousin, and the imam of the Shafi’i madhab in Mecca and Medina): 146 , 154 (his role as a teacher for many students from Java in Mecca)

SHAYKH AL-HADI (Malay-Indonesian writer): 145 (his novel Farida Lanum on reformist themes)

SHAYKH MUHAMMAD-SALIM AL-KALALI (managing director of al-Imam): 149 (his role for the journal as a businessman)

SHAYKH MUHAMMAD TAHIR B. JALALUDDIN AL-MINANGKABAWIAL-AZHARI (1869–1957, reformist ‘Alim from Sumatra): 146 –147

(his biography, assessing his role in the launching of al-Imam)

SHAYKH SAYYID MUHAMMAD B. ‘AQIL (director of the al-Imam Printing Company Ltd.): 149 (his tendencies toward Shi’ism)

SHI ZIZHOU (Chinese Muslim political personality): 245 –246 (his role in the leadership of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country)

SHIHATA, ‘AbdULLAH MAHMUD (historian of Islamic reform): 20 (on the respective contributions by ‘Abduh and Rida)

SHIITES: 48 (Shiite practice of cursing the caliph Mu’Awiya; the tensions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims in Singapore after the publication of Ibn ‘Aqil’s treatise on Mu’Awiya), 149 (Shaykh Sayyid Muhammad b. ‘Aqil’s tendencies toward Shi’ism), 162 (early Abbasid Shiites as an “autocratic block” opposed to the “constitutional block” of the Sunnis)

SHILS, EDWARD (author of The Intellectuals and the Power, Chicago 1973): 291 (on the distrust of secular and ecclesiastical authority as a tradition of modern intellectuals)

SHINA LANGUAGE (vernacular language in Northern Pakistan): 232 (as a medium of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis)

SHUF MOUNTAINS (in south central Lebanon): 178 (Sh. Arslan succeeding his father as governor of this region)

SIBERIA: 85 , 91 (confrontation of its Muslim populations with Slavic mass migration since the late nineteenth century), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909), 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s emigration from Siberia through Xinjiang, China, and Manchuria), see also Tara

SICARD, JULES (French author on modern Islam): 67 (Rida’s response to his views)

SIERRA LEONE: 166 (workplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

AL-MIHAB (Algerian reformist newspaper): 201 (Sh. Arslan’s influence within the circle of the Algerian reformist ulama)

SIJIAO YAOGUA (“The Essential Content of the Four Religions,” treatise by Yang Zhongming [1898]): 260 (its comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam)

SIKIRIa, MAaIR (1893–1966, Bosnian specialist of Persian language and literature): 214 (figure of the new jaded trend)

SILAJD?Ia, HARIS (b. 1945, Bosnian-Herzegovinian politician): 218 (allied and at the same time an opponent to Izetbegovi-)

SINGAPORE: 48 (tensions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims after the publication of Ibn ‘Aqil’s treatise on the Umayyad caliph Mu’Awiya), 49 (publication of a second essay rebutting Ibn ‘Aqil), 147 (installation of Shaykh Muhammad Tahir in 1905, as an organizer of the pilgrim brokerage), 148 (activity of Haji ‘ABbas after his return from Mecca in 1905), 153 (creation of the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-Islamiyya in 1908), 153 –154 (‘Abdullah Ahmad’s visit to Singapore in 1908, and his idea to publish a journal similar to al-Imam)

SINO-ARABIC CURRICULUM (in Chinese: Zhong-A xuexiao, school teaching Chinese literacy and Arabic language, in Western China): 250 (its appearance under the tutelage of adherents to the Ikhwani movement), 250, 260 (Da Pusheng and Wang Haoran’s initiation, in 1907, of a Sino-Arabic curriculum in the Ox Street Mosque of Beijing), 251 (Sino-Arabic University of Ningxia), 260 (opening of a Sino-Arabic curriculum in Kunming in the early 1920s)

SINO-ARABIC UNIVERSITY (Zhong-A daxue, founded in Ningxia by the warlord Ma Hongbin in 1932): 251 (its transformation into the Yunting Provincial Normal School)

SIRÂT-I MÜSTAKÎM (“The Straight Path,” influential journal of late Ottoman Islamist circles, published from 1908 onwards): 76 (its staff), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel correspondences to the S.M. in 1909), 279 (translation on the prospectus and programmes of the Ajia Gikai)

SIRHINDI, AHMAD (seventeenth-century reformer of the Naqshbandiyya mystical path): 89 (new interpretations of his work in Inner Eurasia, since the late eighteenth century)

AL-SIYASA (“The Policy,” treatise by ‘Abd al-Karim Murad): 166 (its illustration of Murad’s political interests)

AL-SIYASA AL-MAR’IYYA (“The Shari’A-Based Policy,” by Ibn Taymiyya): 68 (model for modern theoreticians of the Islamic state)

SMAJLOVIa, AHMED (1938–1988, collaborator of Kemura’s): 215 (as a representative of the official leaders of the Muslim Religious Community under Tito)

SMOKING: see tobacco

SOCIALISM AND SOCIALIST PARTIES: 26 (elimination of Socialism from the Middle East scene since the 1970s), 187 –188 (Sh. Arslan’s rapprochement with the French anti-colonial socialists and radical-socialists in the mid-1930s), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s contacts with Russian revolutionaries during his travels in Europe), see also Communism and Communist parties

SOCIETY FOR THE ADVANCE OF THE HUI RELIGION (Zhongguo Huijiao jujin hui): 243 , 259 (its creation in Beijing in 1912, first nationwide association of the believers, with subsidiary associations [fenhui])

SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF CHINESE ISLAM (Zhongguo yi-si-lan budao hui): 245 (its creation in 1933 in Taiyuan, Shanxi, for the spreading of the Muslim doctrine)

SOCIETY OF MUSLIM STUDENTS FROM RUSSIA (in Istanbul): 279 (its invitation of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim and Yamaoka Kotaro)

SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF EDUCATION OF THE HUI PEOPLE (Huimin jiaoyu cujin hui): 245 (its creation in Ningxia in 1933, and its direction by the warlord Ma Hongkui)

SOLIDARNOSC (Polish trade union): 292 (its appearance as the expression of an overall religious revival)

SONGS: 247 (organization of a company of Hui singers for the popularization of anti-Japanese songs, by the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), see also music

SOROUSH, ‘AbdOLKARIM (an Iranian religious intellectual): 291 (availability of his works on the Internet), 294 (Khatami, Soroush, and the reformist movement’s contribution to the emergence of a public sphere in Iran)

SOUTHEAST ASIA: 25 (as a reference for non-Western modernization), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909)

SOVEREIGNTY (Arabic hakimiyya, of God, or of the people): 164 (launching of this discussion theme by the Young Ottomans)

SPAHO, MEHMET (1883–1939, Bosnian politician): 214 (as a figure of the new jadid trend)

SPAIN: 164 –165 (its early twentieth-century interference into the affairs of Morocco), 199 –200 (Arslan’s interest in the history of Muslim Spain, in the late 1930s)

SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY OF THE MUSLIM LAW (created in Russia in 1788): 88 (its location in Ufa, then in Orenburg), 99 (nomination of Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din as one of its qadis), 101 (replacement of the Assembly in 1921 by the Central Spiritual Board of the Muslims of Inner Russia and Siberia), 273 –274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s appointment as a qadi of the Spiritual Assembly of Ufa)

SPONSORSHIP: 40 (‘ABbas II Hilmi’s alleged support to al-Manār, and Abdülhamid II’s hostility to him for this reason), 90 (early twentieth-century replacement of waqf and zakat by benevolent societies for the financing of Russia’s Islamic educational institutions), 90 (the shaking of the ulama’s authority in Russia by school teachers, thanks notably to the maktab s and madrasas’ financing through benevolent associations), 100 (Ahmad Bay Husaynoff ‘s sponsorship of the Husayniyya Madrasa of Orenburg, and his posthumous introduction by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din as a model benefactor of the Muslim community of Russia), 100 , 101 (sponsorship of the Waqt newspaper and the Mura journal in Orenburg by the Ramiyeff brothers), 121 (financing of Qur1 anic schools by the zakat —tianke —among the Hui), 149 (businessman Shaykh Muhammad-Salim al-Kalali’s support of the journal al-Imam), 149 (role of the Riau court in the circulation of al-Imam in the Riau region), 151 (Tengku Osman’s speech in the Rushdiyyah Club of Riau in 1906 after his return from Cairo), 184 (al-Quwwatli’s amenity to receive financial support from Ibn Saud, and his participation in the Jerusalem finance committee of the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 243 –244 (role of commercial societies in the financing of Islamic schools in early twentieth-century Eastern China), 245 (creation, in Ningxia in 1933, of the Society for the Promotion of Education of the Hui People, and its sponsorhip by the warlord Ma Hongkui), 245 (role of Muslim warlords in the creation, in Lanzhou, of a subsidiary association of the Confederation of the Hui Religion in China), 246 –255 (his role in the creation and leadership of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Salvation of the Country), 246 –247 (his chairmanship of the Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion), 254 (Ma Fuxiang’s sponsorship of the edition of almost all the celebrated works of classical Chinese Islam from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries), 256 (Ma Fuxiang’s foundation and sponsorship of Muslim schools in Ningxia, of the journal Yuehua, and of Chinese students in al-Azhar), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi’s sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul), 260 (Yunnanese financial help to Ma Jian’s studies in al-Azhar), 292 –293 (on locally rooted movements—like opposition to the Shah’s regime in Iran—benefiting with transnational sponsors or supporters), see also associations and societies; benevolent societies; jingtang ; journals and newspapers; libraries; madrasa; maktab ; merchants; mosques; schools and schooling; zakat

STATE AND STATE APPARATUS: 22 (current reinterpretation of al-Qalqashandi’s classical theory of the state), 23 (influence of Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr’s concept of political guidance of the “righteous authority” on the Islamic Constitution of Iran), 68 (Ibn Taymiyya’s al -Siyasa al-mar’iyya as a model for modern theoreticians of the Islamic state), 75 (T. Fikret’s attacks against the doctrines of the Islamic state), 163 (Dadi-’s mention of Istanbul’s early eighteenth-century ruling circles’ interest in Venice’s form of government), 163 (Müteferriqa’s proposals for military reforms along European lines in the Ottoman Empire), 169 (reform of awqaf in ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s political thought), 194 (acknowledgment of the Yugoslav government by the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for its favorable treatment of its Muslim population), 228 , 231 (abolition of Northern Pakistan’s principalities, and the opening of the Karakorum Highway in the 1970s), 238 (lack of an opposition of Ima’ilis to the state in Tajikistan, in spite of their autonomous strategies of modernization), 249 (support given by the Ikhwani movement to the warlords, as the represerntatives of a strong power), 296 –297 (Nursi’s success in articulating his message with rural Turkish society, when the hold of local leaders was giving way to the state apparatus), see also authority; constitutionalism; leadership; sovereignty; Sufism; ulama

STEPPE TERRITORY (Russian: Stepnoj kraj): 89 (renewal of Christian Orthodox missionary activity in late nineteenth century), 91 (territory’s confrontation with Slavic colonization)

SU BAOQIAO (1895–1962, Hunanese Muslim religious and Communist activist): 256 (his activities in Changsha inside the CCP)

SUaESKA, AVDO (b. 1927, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (as a representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

SUMI´a, HASAN (1937–1991, Bosnian-Herzegovinian historian): 217 (as a representative of the pro-Communist trend in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian intelligentsia)

SUFISM: 41 –43 , 45 (popular Sufism; links between the Rifa'iyya mystical path and the Ottoman power); 43 (attack by al-Zahrawi against popular Sufism); 44 (criticism of the Mawlawiyya by Rashid Rida; patronage of the Rifa'iyya mystical path by Abdülhamid II; disputes between the Rifa'iyya and the Qadiriyya); 44 (attack by al-Zahrawi, arguing that Sufism is alien to Islam); 45 (Shari'Aminded Sufism of the Naqshbandiyya path; the antinomy of Sufism with the Qur 1 an and the Sunna, according to al-Qasimi); 76 (criticism of Sufi lodges or tekke s by late Ottoman, Islamists, for being suffused with superstition), 77 –78 (links of the late Ottoman Salafioriented periodicals with Sufism), 78 (publication of articles on Ibn Taymiyya by the Turkish Sufi periodical Mihrab in 1923–1925), 89 (Bigi's criticism of the traditional mode of transmission of learning in Sufi turuq), 91 (diffusion of Shah Wali-Allah's thought in Inner Eurasia by the Naqshbandiyya-Mujaddidiyya), 99 (reformist critics of the heterodox practices of Sufi paths in Russia), 125 , 130 (turmoil among Chinese Sufi lineages—menhuan s—in the 1930s, and the reformist response to it), 152 (critic of the turuq, especially the Naqshbandiyya, in the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam), 165 (Kattaniyya's role in the mobilization of the ulama against French encroachments in early twentiethcentury Morocco), 166 ('Abd al-Karim Murad's relations with Malik Sy in Senegal, and with the Tijaniyya's key figure Muhammad Salga in Kano), 190 –191, 201 (Ahmad al-Sharif al-Sanusi's relationship with Sh. Arslan), 249 (Ikhwani influence on the arabization of religious teaching, and on the prohibition of Chinese and Sufi influence among Chinese-speaking Muslims), 253 (call of Chinese adepts of the Ikhwani movement to a reconciliation between and with the different Sufi allegiances), 253 –254 (the modern Ikhwani criticism of Liu Zhi’s Tianfang xingli for its Sufi content), 262 (cultivation of Chinese classical literature in the early twentieth-century Jahriyya menhuan, a sub-branch of the Chinese N.), 262 (place of Confucianism and Sufism in the readings of twentieth-century ahong s), 295 (distinction of Nursi’s teaching, centered on autonomous book reading, from the master–disciple relationship at the core of most Sufi orders), see also authority; books and book trading; education; language; state and state apparatus; ulama

AL-SULH, RIYAD (member of the Syrian- Palestinian Congress, and the Lebanese Republic’s first Prime Minister in 1943): 182 (his succession to Kin’An in the Syrian-Palestinian Congress), 186 (his consultations with Sh. Arslan in Geneva prior to the signature of the treaty of indpendence)

AL-SULH, RIZA (Interior Minister in Faisal’s cabinet in 1920): 182 (his son Riyad’s role in the Syrian-Palestinian Congress)

SUN SHENGWU (progressive literati of the Huabei region in the 1930s): 125 (his role in the launching of the Yuehua journal)

SUN YATSEN (1866–1925, founder of the Chinese Republic): 122 (his meeting with the reformist ahong Wang Haoran), 244, 245 (checking of his “Three People Principles” by Chinese Muslim activists of Nanking, to know whether they contradict Islam), 256 (the influence of his ideas on the young Ma Linyi)

SUN YOUMING (progressive literati of the Huabei region in the 1930s): 125 (his role in the launching of the Yuehua journal)

SUNNA (tradition of the sayings of the Prophet Muhammad): 13 (Indonesian Muhammadiyah’s call for return to the Sunna), 15 , 22, 26 (Rida’s condemnation of the neglect of the Sunna), 28 (continuation of Rida’s discourse on the Sunna by al-Qaradawi), 45 (Sunna’s antinomy with Sufism, according to al- Qasimi), 96 (the rational approach to the Sunna in Barudi’s teaching), 99 –100 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s focusing of religious teaching on the Qur1 an and the Sunna)

SUNNI ISLAM: 178 (its being joined by the Druze-born Sh. Arslan)

M cRA : see consultation and consultative regimes

M cRA (“Council,” a Tatar–Bashkir journal published in Orenburg from 1908 to 1918): 85 –116 (article by S. A. Dudoignon, in particular 98 –105)

S cRA AL-BAQARA (Sura of the Cow): 19 (its comment by Rida in the Tafsir al-Manār)

SURKATI, AHMAD (founder of the Irshad movement in Indonesia): 144 (his permission by Dutch censorship to receive al-Manār)

SWITZERLAND: 176 , 182 (as the residence place of Sh. Arslan, in connection with the location of the League of Nations in Geneva)

SYRIA: 27 (Muslim Brothers in S.); 41 (local branches of the CUP); 49 –50 (influence of al-Manār), 164 (support of Syrian Islamic reformists to Young Ottomans and Young Turks), 179 (famine in S. before First World War), 180 – 181 (French suppression of Faisal's ephemerous Syrian kingdom), 181 –186 (Arslan's relationship with S.), 298 –300 (Islamic modernism through the work of M. Shahrur)

SYRIAN-PALESTINIAN CONGRESS (created in 1921 in Geneva for petitioning the League of Nations' Permanent Mandates Commission): 181 –182 (its change of name upon the request of Palestinian delegates), 183 (publication of its resolutions in La Nation arabe), 184 (creation of its Finance Committee by young Istiqlalists in Jerusalem after 1925, and marginalization of the Cairo Executive Committee), 184 –185 (Sh. Arslan's resignation from the Executive Committee, and Lutfallah's ousting from the chairmanship of the S.-P.C. in 1927)

SZYNKEWICZ, JAKUB (Polish orientalist of Tatar origin, the Mufti of Poland from 1925 onwards): 194 (his relations with German scientific circles)

TABAYI2 AL-ISTIBDAD ("The Characteristics of Tyranny," an essay by al-Kawakibi): 43 (attack on the Hamidian regime)

TAFSIR (Arabic: exegesis, notably of the Qur 1 an): 9 (influence of al-'Urwa al-Wuöqa 's discourse on tafsir upon Rida), 13 (tafsir as the central issue of al-Manār in its earlier stage), 16 –20 (the Tafsir al-Manār), 20 (al-Alusi's Ruh al-Ma'An as the last encyclopaedic tafsir of the classical brand), 57 ('Abduh's commentary of the Sura al-'Imran), 95 (tafsir 's central place in Barudi's teaching), 127 (Yuehua 's publication of articles on tafsir), 128 (Ma Songting’s arguments on the publications of tafsir in the Yuehua), 298 – 299 (Shahrur’s analogy between the Copernician revolution and Qur1 anic interpretation, and his challenge to the authoritative tradition of tafsir and fiqh) Tafsir al-Manār : 16 –20 Tafsir al-Qasimi : 20

AL-TALIRA AL-ISLAMIYYA (Indonesian newspaper published in Pekalongan): 144 (its distribution in Cairo)

TAHTAWI, RIFA’A (1801–73, Egyptian traveller and scholar): 187 (obsolescence of his influence after European colonial encroachments in the early 1880s)

TAIWAN: 254 , 255 (exile of Chinese Muslim leaders after 1949)

TAIYUAN (capital city of Shanxi): 245 (creation, in 1933, of the Society for the Diffusion of Chinese Islam)

TAIYUAN RIBAO (“The Daily of Taiyuan,” regional newspaper of the Shanxi in the 1930s): 245 (its utilization by the Society for the Diffusion of Chinese Islam for spreading news on religious matters)

TAJ MOGHOL (legendary fourteenth-century king of Badakhshan): 230 (claim of his ancestry by Pir Sahib)

TAJIKISTAN: 238 (lack of an opposition of Ima’ilis to the state, in spite of their autonomous strategies of modernization)

TALAT PAVA, MEHMED (1874–1921, leading CUP politician, minister of Interior, Grand Vezir): 179 , 180 (Sh. Arslan’s contacts with him in order to alleviate the famine in Syria and Lebanon), 181 (his assassination by an Armenian assassin in Berlin)

TANG KESAN (Shandong activist of Muslim education, active between 1925 and 1946): 125 , 250, 258 (his direction of the Chengda Normal School since 1925, and his role in the launching of the Yuehua journal), 246, 257 –258 (his participation in the Wuchang conference, and in the creation and leadership of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the the Salvation of the Country), 246 –247 (his co-chairmanship of the Association for Studying the Culture of the Hui Religion)

TANGIER: 165 (publication of a second draft constitution for Morocco by the journal Lisan al-'Arab in 1908), 200 (Arslan's short stay in, and expulsion from this city in 1930)

TANZAMAT: 276 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's critic of Westernization in Turkey after the Tanzimat reform)

TAQLID (Arabic, 'imitation': conformation of religious and judicial practice with theological and jurisprudential literature): 11 , 14 –16 (its place in Rida's thought and legacy), 150 (al-Imam 's emphasis on the need to reject taklid buta : blind acceptance of intermediary authority), 154 (condemnation of blind taqlid by al-Munir), 276 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's praise of Japan's acceptance of Western science and technology, and warnings against Tanzimat-style Westernization)

TARA (city in the Tobol'sk governorate, Western Siberia): 273 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's birthplace), 282 (his two-year stay there, and his teaching activity after First World War)

TARBUSH: see fez

TARËUMAN (“The Interpreter,” newspaper published by Gasprali from 1883 to 1914): 89 (as the main platform of the Islamic reformist tendency in Russia until First World War)

TARIHI KADIM (“Ancient History,” poem by Tevfik Fikret): 75 (being an attack against the doctrines of the Islamic state)

TARIQA (pl. turuq, Arabic: “path,” Sufi mystical path): 89 (Bigi’s critic of the mode of transmission of learning among the turuq)

TASKHIRI, AYATOLLAH MOHAMMAD ‘ALI (a Shiite jurist, the chairman of the World Forum for the Proximity of Islamic Schools of Thought): 27 –28 (his participation in the founding conference of the World Union of Muslim Ulama in 2004)

TATAR LANGUAGE: 274 (Tatar and Arabic newspapers published by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim after the Russian revolution of 1905)

TATARS: 88 (their historical role as a cultural intermediary between Russia and Central Asia), 273 (the Bukharan ascent of Siberian Tatars, and of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim), 274 (cultural autonomy proposed for the Tatars by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1907), 281 (sending of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim to Berlin by Enver Pava, in 1915, for the recruitment of Tatar Muslim prisoners of war)

AL-TAWHID (“The Unicity,” work by ‘Abduh): 94 (its influence on the renewal of kalam in Russia)

TEACHING: see schools and schooling TEÂRÜF-I MÜSLIMIN (“The Acquaintance of Muslims”): 281 (its publication by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in Istanbul in 1910–1911)

TEKKE (Turkish: Sufi lodge): 76 (criticism of tekke s by late Ottoman, Islamists, for being suffused with superstition)

TELEGRAPH: 47 (its use in declaring the beginning and the end of Ramadan, as supported by al-Qasimi)

TELEVISION: see mass media

TENGKU OSMAN (member of the Riau ruling family): 151 (his speech in the Rushdiyyah Club in 1906 after his return from Cairo)

TETOUAN: 200 (Arslan’s stay in this Moroccan city in 1930)

TEVFAK RAVAD BEY (Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs in the early Republican period): 64 (his declaration on Turkish history proving the country’s European character)

THEATRE: 50 (its condemnation in pre-First World War Syria as an innovation forbidden by Islam), 126 (Molière’s quotation by Wang Jingzhai for his definition of watan), 247 (Lao She’s writing of a play, Guojia chisang, on the common front of Hui and Han facing the Japanese enemy)

THEODOLI, MARQUIS (President of the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations): 191 (his meeting with Arslan in 1935)

THREE PEOPLE PRINCIPLES (Sanmin zhuyi, an ideology promoted by Sun Yatsen): 244 , 245 (checking of Sun Yatsen’s principles by Muslim Chinese students of Nanking, to know whether they contradict Islam)

TIANFANG XINGLI (“The Philosophy of Islam,” early eighteenth-century work by the theologian Liu Zhi): 253 –254 (its multiple reprints)

TIANKE : see zakat

TIBET: 247 (creation of a subsidiary association of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s denunciation of the British invasion of Tibet)

TIJANIYYA (modern Western African Sunni Islamic mystical path): 166 (‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s relations with its key figure Muhammad Salga in Kano)

AL-TILMIÙ (“The Student,” Arabic-language journal published in St. Petersburg): 274 (its edition by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim)

TIMBUKTU: 162 (as a medieval merchant city dominated in the fifteenth century by dynasties of qadis)

TITO (Josip Broz, 1892–1976, dictator of Yugoslavia): 215 (his diplomatical utilization of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia in the framework of the Non-Aligned block)

TOA DOBUNKAI (“East Asian Friendship Society,” established in 1898 for promoting friendship between Japan and China): 278 (conversion to Islam of one of its members, Ohara Bukei)

TOA SHIN CHITSUJO (“New Order in Eastern Asia”): 284 (a motto of the Japanese military régime in the 1930s)

TOBACCO: 128 (Chinese translation of a paper by al-Khatib on smoking as beneficial to Western powers)

TOK KENALI (nickname of Muhammad Yussof bin Muhammad, 1868–1933, reformist ‘Alim of the Kelantan region): 145 (sources of his reformist ideas)

TOKUTOMI SOHO (1863–1957, leading Japanese journalist, director of the Kokumin shinbun): 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to the newspaper’s bureau in 1909)

TOKYO: 150 (discussion by al-Imam of a proposed Congress of Religion to be held in Tokyo), 242 –243 (role played by a group of thirty-six young Chinese Muslims in the creation, in 1907, of the Association for the Pure and True [i.e. Muslim] Education of the Students in Tokyo), 252 (their publication, as to 1908, of the journal Xing Hui pian), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to Waseda University, the Tokyo Imperial University, the Institute of Arts, and schools for girls in 1909), 278 , 279 (successive phases of the early twentieth-century project of construction of a mosque in Tokyo)

TOKYO IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY (in Tokyo): 275 (its visit by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

TONG CONG (1864–1923, Chinese Muslim religious scholar and activist): 242 –243 (his creation, in 1906, of the General Association of the Religious Education of the Muslim People of Eastern Asia, and his renaming of this structure), 243, 250 (his opening, in 1905, of the School of Muslim Sources [Muyuan xuetang]), 258 (influence on him of former Chinese Muslim students in Japan)

TONKIN: 279 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s denunciation of the French colonization of Tonkin)

TOYAMA MITSURU (1855–1944, Japanese ultranationalist leader): 276 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

TRADITION: 294 (its coexistence with the modern in any given society), 297 (F. Gülen’s interpretation of Islamic values offering a union between religion and science, faith and nationalism, education and the market economy, and tradition and modernity)

TRALJIa, MAHMUD (b. 1918, Muslim religious writer of Bosnia-Herzegovina): 216 (representative of the opposition trend among the Muslim religious leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina)

TRANSLATION: 80 (translations by M. Âkif from M. F. Wadjdi’s encyclopaedia and commentary of the Qur1 an), 90 (translation of Sa’di’s works into Tatar in Imperial Russia), 127 (Yuehua ’s practice of translating and criticizing Arabic and English books), 128, 130 , 134, 253 (Chinese translations from Egyptian Salafi journals in the 1930s), 130, 135 , 244, 253 (disputes over the translation of the Qur1 an into Chinese), 130 (translation of ‘Abduh’s Risala al-tawhid into Chinese in 1933), 130 , 134 (translation into Chinese of papers from al-Azhar’s Nur alislam in the 1930s), 131 (translation into Chinese of the History of Islam by Khuzuli), 245 (creation of the Society for the Diffusion of Chinese Islam, in 1933, for spreading the Muslim doctrine through the translation of the Qur 1 an into Chinese), 253 , 259 (Protestant's dilemma as to the translation of the Bible into Chinese, whether to use the classical or the colloquial language, and its influence on the Chinese translation of the Qur 1 an), 258 (Shu Shanyu and Wu Tegong's collaboration with Ha Decheng and Ma Jiang on their translations of the Qur1 an), 259 (Wang Jingzhai's work as a translator from Arabic into Chinese, and his two translations of the Qur 1 an, in classical and colloquial Chinese), 281 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's translations into Ottoman Turkish of Japanese literature on Western oppression of Eastern peoples), see also books and book trading; journals and newspapers; language; westernization TRAVELS AND TRAVELLING: 88 –89 (role of railroad in the suppression of the cultural intermediary of Tatar caravan traders between Russia and Central Asia), 102 (N. Ya 1 usheff 's travel correspondences to the Mura), 122 –123 , 259 (influence of Wang Haoran's hajj, and of his travels to Turkey and Egypt, on his reformist thought), 127 (sending of students to al-Azhar in 1931 by the Shanghai Islamic School), 147 (Sayyid Shaykh b. Ahmad al-Hadi's mission to Mecca and Cairo in 1903), 166 ('Abd al-Karim Murad stay and work in Senegal Sierra Leone, and Nigeria), 181 (Sh. Arslan's meetings with Zinoviev in Saint Moritz and in Moscow, with Trotsky in Moscow), 187 (obsolescence of the Egyptian traveler Tahtawi's influence after European colonial encroachments in the early 1880s), 192 (Sh. Arslan's travels in Yugoslavia in 1931 and in 1933–1934 "for spending Ramadan with [his] Yugoslavian friends"), 200 (Sh. Arslan's stay in Tetouan in 1930), 229 (homage paid to Aga Khan III in Zanzibar by a son of the mir of Hunza), 250 –251 , 260 (Ma Songting's travel to Egypt and other Islamic countries in 1932, to find out new pedagogical methods), 255 (Ma Bufang's travel to Egypt in the early 1950s), 256 (Ma Linyi's studies in Japan in 1903–1905), 257 (Da Pusheng's travel to India as a representative of Shanghai merchants), 259 (Ma Fuxiang and Ma Linyi's sponsorship of Wang Jinzhai's pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1921, and of his visit of al-Azhar and Istanbul), 260 (Ha Decheng's hajj, in 1913, and its influence on his rejection of the traditional mosque teaching; his travels to India, Ceylon, and Egypt on behalf of his commercial society), 261 (influence of Hu Songshan’s hajj on his Chinese nationalist convictions), 263 (overseas travel, or direct contact with travellers, as the great event in the career of a twentieth-century Chinese Muslim intellectual), 274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s contacts with Russian revolutionaries during his travels in Europe), 275 , 280 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travels to Russian Turkestan and Bukhara, then to the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East, and their echo in the world of Islam), 281 (the sending of ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim to Berlin by Enver Pava, in 1915, for the recruitment of Tatar Muslim prisoners of war), 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s emigration from Siberia through Xinjiang, China, and Manchuria), see also hajj; networks and networking

TRIPOLI (of Lebanon): 42 , 166 (siege of Husayn al-Jisr’s experimental school al-Madrasa al-Wataniyya), 165 (birthplace of ‘Abd al-Karim Murad)

TROTSKY (Lev Bronstejn, 1879–1940, Russian revolutionary leader): 181 (his meeting with Sh. Arslan in Moscow)

TUBAN (a port in East Java): 144 (its role during the colonial period for the diffusion of al-Manār in the Indonesian archipelago)

TUNAS MELAYU (“The Malay Seeds,” monthly journal created by Haji ‘ABbas in 1913 in the Tanjung Pagar district of Singapore): 148 (its role in promoting the reformist cause)

TUNISIA: 163 (nineteenth-century constitutional initiative), 187 (its occupation by France since 1881)

TUQAY, ‘Abd-ALLAH (1886–1913, Volga Tatar poet, leader of the Islahi movement): 94 (his critic of the madrasacentred strategy of modernization of the Muslims of Russia)

TURABI, HASAN (Sudanese religious intellectual): 301 (on the likeliness for present-day ulama to be engineers or doctors as well as religious scholars)

TURBAN: 63 –64 (post-First World War controversy about the wearing of a hat or a turban)

TURKESTAN: 274 (territorial autonomy proposed for Turkestan by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1907), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travels to Russian Turkestan and Bukhara in 1908)

TURKEY: 21 (abolition of the Sultanate in 1922), 61 (its early twentieth-century constitutionalism as a model for the world of Islam), 62 (post-First World War critics of Westernization in Atatürk’s T.), 64 (abolition of the caliphate in 1924), 64 (Turkish history as a proof of the country’s European character), 74 –84 (influence of al-Manār in T.), 122 –123 , 259 (influence of Wang Haoran’s travels to T. and Egypt on his reformist thought), 150 –151 (publication of news on T. by al-Imam, at the same time as news from Japan), 260 (Ha Decheng’s importation of Islamic literature from Egypt, India, and T.), 275 (exile of Muslim intellectuals of Russia to T. after the Czarist reaction of 1907 and the Young Turks revolution of 1908), 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s critic of Westernization in Turkey after the Tanzimat reform), 282 (recapture of Izmir by the Turkish Army from the Greeks in 1922, and its influence on ‘Abd al-Rashid’s Ibrahim’s decision to migrate to T.), 290 (major role of religious intellectuals in furthering the goals of civil society in countries like Indonesia and T.), 294 (Fethullah Gülen and his movement’s contribution to the emergence of a public sphere in T.), 295 –298 (history and sociology of the Nurcu movement in T. and abroad, in part. 296 –297 : Nursi’s success in articulating his message with rural Turkish society, when the hold of local leaders was giving way to the state apparatus)

TURKISH LANGUAGE: 193 (as one of the languages of the European Muslim Congress of Geneva in 1935), 281 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s translations into Ottoman Turkish of Japanese literature on Western oppression of Eastern peoples)

TURKISM (school of political thought in the late Ottoman Empire): 77 (its division between “Ottomans” and Turkic exiles), 170 –171 (role played by Turkists in the debates on the Shari’A in the Ottoman parliament after 1908), 181 (CUP’s successive adaptation of Ottomanism, Islamism, and Turkism)

TURKS: 6 (post-First World War shift in religious authority from the Turks to the Arabs seen as a means for Islamic regeneration), 10 (Turks’ concern in the awaikening of Islam), 22 (Rida’s insistence on the necessary cooperation of Arabs and Turks), 46 (participation of Turks of Egypt in the Ottoman Consultation Society), 65 (Rida’s critic of the role played by “renegade Turks” in Westernization), 211 (the Muslims of Turkish origin in the Balkans)

TURUQ : see tariqa

UCHIDA RYOHEI (1874–1937, Japanese ultranationalist leader): 276 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

UFA (a city in the Western Urals): 88 (as the siege of the Muftiyyat of Russia since 1782), 90 (creation of the ‘Aliyya Madrasa by Kamali in 1906), 273 –274 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s appointment as a qadi of the Spiritual Assembly of Ufa)

UIGHURS (modern Turkic-speaking Muslimbackground people of Xinjiang): 245 (action of the Society for the Promotion of the Education of the Hui People, in Ningxia, for bringing together the Uighurs and the Muslim Han), 247 (exclusion of Uighurs from the scope of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country)

ULAMA: 11 (ulama of the Salaf as a reference to modern reformers of Islam), 14 (change in the intellectual profile of ulama in the twentieth century), 24 (status of the muëtahid in Shiite Islam), 27 (rural origins of early twentieth-century reformist ulama), 45 (the ulama's role as leaders of uneducated masses in the late Ottoman Empire), 56 ('Abduh's praise of the Wahhabiyya for removing layers between men and true study of the Qur 1 an and Hadith), 76 (reforms of the status and functions of the Ottoman veyhülislâm in 1916 and 1917), 81 (Ottoman ulama's uneasiness in challenging the Westernization movement), 90 (school teachers and qari s' questioning of ulama's authority in Imperial Russia), 96 (nomination by Barudi of a female qadi in the muftiyyat of Russia in 1917), 150 (ulama's responsibility, from the reformist viewpoint, in the transmission of impure Islam), 162 (the qadi's political role in classical Islamic societies), 164 (crucial support of large part of the ulama to constitutional movements in early twentieth-century Iran, Egypt, and Turkey), 165 (ulama's mobilization against the French encroachments in early twentieth-century Morocco), 170 (restriction of the qadi's role in 'Abd al-Karim Murad's draft constitution for Morocco), 171 (ulama's entrance into the political arena in the world of Islam, since the late nineteenth century), 216 (Gazi Husrev-beg Medrese of Sarajevo and its role in the education of the official religious leaders of the Muslim community of Yugoslavia during the Communist period), 273 –274 ('Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim's appointment as a qadi of the Spiritual Assembly of Ufa), 289 , 292 (challenge to the ulama's authority by new categories of literati in the contemporary Muslim majority world), 290 (major role of religious intellectuals in furthering the goals of civil society in countries like Indonesia and Turkey), 299 (Shahrur's challenge to the authoritative tradition of tafsir and fiqh), 301 (Hasan Turabi on the likeliness for ulama to be engineers or doctors as well as religious scholars), see also ahong ; authority; clergy; education; mosques

ULFAT (“The Rapprochement,” Tatar newspaper published in St. Petersburg in 1906–1907): 274 , 276 (its edition by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim)

ÜLKEN, HALMA ZAYA (historian of modern Turkey): 76 (his classification of Turkish Islamists into four groups: traditionalists, modernists, moderates, and anti-modernists)

’UMAR AL-MUKHTAR (military leader of the Libyan resistance against the Italians): 191 (his relationship to Sh. Arslan)

UMM AL-QURA (“The Mother of Cities,” an essay by al-Kawakibi): 6 (on the imaginary conference in Mecca), 32 (on its various editions), 43 (its publishing by Rida in serial form)

UMMA (community of Muslim believers): 7 , 27 (al-Kawakibi’s thought on the umma ’s leadership), 12 (Rida’s introduction of ‘Abduh as a paramount leader of the umma), 13 –15, 20 –21 , 28 (‘Abduh and Rida’s discourse on the unity and revitalization of the umma), 205 (Mufti-’s call to the creation of a global umma), see also nation and nationalism; nationality; watan

UNIVERSITIES: 260 (Ma Songting’s teaching of Arabic language at Beijing University, until the Cultural Revolution), 260 (Ma Jian’s professorship in the Beijing University), 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s visit to universities and schools for girls in Tokyo in 1909) see also education; madrasa; schools and schooling

UNITY OF BEING: see wahdat al-wuëud

URALS: 85 , 91 (confrontation of its Muslim populations with Slavic mass migration since the late nineteenth century), 88 (renewal of Christian Orthodox missionary activity in the late nineteenth century)

URBANITY: see rurality

URDU LANGUAGE: 232 (U. as the medium par excellence of religious education among Northern Pakistani Isma ‘ilis), 235 (translation of Nasir-i Khusraw’s works from Persian to U. by Hunza’i), 257 (Da Pusheng’s learning of U. in India), 260 (Ha Decheng’s fluency in Arabic language, Urdu, and English)

‘UR cBA (Arabic, “Arabic identity,” “Arabism”): 6 (Rida’s emphasis on ‘uruba)

AL-’URWA AL-WUT ¯QA (“The Firmest Bond,” a journal edited in Paris in 1884 by Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and Muhammad ‘Abduh): 8 –10 , 13 (first journal calling for a revival of Islam, and a predecessor of al-Manār), 33 (its reprint), 42 (its influence on Maghribi and Rida), 96 (its reading by the young Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din in Orenburg), 105 (its high rating in Russia until the early 1910s), 144 (journal’s circulation in the Malay-Indonesian world) USA: 178 (US protestant schools in the Near-East, and attendance of one of them by Sh. Arslan), 292 (return of Protestant fundamentalism as an expression of an overall present-day Christian revivalism), 295 (expansion of the Nurcu movement outside Turkey), 299 (Shahrur’s lectures in the USA in the late 1990s) USSR: 188 , 192 (Sh. Arslan’s role in the Ottoman parliament’s foreign commission during negotiations with the Bolsheviks and the Soviet government)

US cL AL-FIQH (methodology of Islamic jurisprudence): 95 (its central place in Barudi’s teaching)

US cL-I GADID (“new method” of teaching the Arabic alphabet in Turkic languages): 89 (its experimentation by Gaspralï in Crimea in the 1880s)

USÛLÜ 1 L-HIKEM FÎ NIZÂMI 1 L-ÜMEM (treatise by /brahim Müteferrika): 163 (its proposals for military reforms along European lines)

‘UTHMAN EFENDI RAFFAT (Egyptian scholar): 153 (first director of the Madrasa al-Iqbal al-Islamiyya of Singapore)

UZUNÇARVILI, /SMAAL HAKKI (historian of the Ottoman state): 162 (on the consultative and representative mechanisms in sixteenth- and seventeenth-centuries Ottoman councils)

VAGLIERA, LAURA (Italian orientalist): 191 (her paper at the Muslim Congress of Europe in 1935, on “What Europe Thinks on Islam”)

VATICAN COUNCIL (Second, 1962–1965): 292 –293 (its influence on the emergence of transnational decentralized grassroots networks), 296 (its calls of resolving confessional differences between Christians and Muslims)

VELAYAT-E FAQIH : see wilaya al-faqih VENICE: 163 (Dadi-’s mention of Istanbul’s early eighteenth-century ruling circles’ interest in Venice’s form of government)

VIDEO: see mass media

VIÉNOT (French Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs): 186 (his meeting with Arslan in Geneva, prior to the signature of the treaty of independence with Syria in 1936)

VLADIVOSTOK: 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s travel to Siberia, the Far-East, South Asia, and the Near East in 1909)

VOLGA BULGHARS: 93 , 103 (as a community of reference for Russia’s nineteenth-century Muslim reformers)

VOLGA REGION: 85 (its submission to Russia since the mid-sixteenth century)

VOLKAN (“The Vulcano,” 1908–1909, newspaper of the /ttihâd-i Muhammedî Cemiyeti): 75 (its struggle against the CUP)

WAHDAT AL-WUÆ cD (Arabic: “unity of being,” notion borrowed from the mystical thinker Ibn al-’Arabi): 119 (its place in Hui classical theories of adhesion to the Chinese Imperial state), 120 (its combination with Confucian terminology in Chinese Islam), 122 (avatars of the unity of being theory in the early twentieth-century), 123 (interpretation of patriotism in the framework of the unity of being theory by ahong s of the early Republican period), 125 (following of the doctrine by the warlord Ma Fuxiang)

WAHHABI/WAHHABIYYA: 56 (its apology by Rashid Rida in the last phase of his life)

WAHHABI REFORMISM: 249 (its influence on the Ikhwani movement in China)

WA’IZ (Arabic word: preacher, lecturer): 231 –232 (appearance of Isma ‘ili wa’iz s in Northern Pakistan in the 1970s, and its impact on the structure of religious authority among the Isma ‘ilis)

WADJDI, MUHAMMAD FARID (1875–1954, Egyptian disciple of Muhammad ‘Abduh): 80 (translations by M. Âkif from his encyclopaedia and commentary of the Qur1 an)

WAKHAN (region in the Pamirs): 230 (place of origin of Pir Sahib’s lineage)

WALLACHIANS (Muslims of Wallachian origin in Bosnia-Herzegovina): 211 (their place in the Muslim populations of the Balkans)

WANG CENGSHANG (former student of Istanbul University): 126 (his presentation of the Qur1 an)

WANG DAIYU (late Ming—early Qing Muslim Chinese scholar): 119 –120 (his role in the elaboration of Islamic thought through Chinese characters)

WANG HAORAN (or Wang Kuan, 1848–1919, prominent ahong of Beijing and reformer of the Islamic curriculum): 122 –123 , 259 (influence of his hajj, and of his travels to Egypt and Turkey on his reformist thought), 243 , 259 (his direction of the Society for the Advance of the Hui Religion of China), 250 , 259, 260 (his creation with Da Pusheng, in 1907, of the Pedagogical Institute of the Hui Religion at the Beijing mosque of Ox Street), 256 (his collaboration in Beijing, after 1908, with Ma Linyi), 257 (Da Pusheng’s studies in the Ox Street Mosque of Beijing, under Wang Haoran’s guidance), 279 (Wang Haoran’s meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim, and the latter’s failure to convert him to a rapprochement with Japan)

WANG JINGZHAI (1871 or 1879–1949, also known as Wang Wenqing, influential ahong of Tianjin, one of the “Four Great Ahong s” of China): 123 , 124 –125 (his studies in al-Azhar, and his Chinese translation of the Qur 1 an), 126 (his diffusion of information on reformist movements in Egypt), 245 –246 (his role in the creation of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the Resistance to Japan and the Salvation of the Country), 246 (his participation in the Wuchang conference, and in the creation and administration of the Friendly Association of the Hui People of China for the the Salvation of the Country), 259 (biographical sketch, including his education, travels, and activity)

WANG KUAN: see Wang Haoran

WANXIAN (city in Hebei): 251 (establishment of the Normal Islamic School of Wanxian in 1929)

WAQF (pl. awqaf, Arabic: pious endowment): 90 (their partial replacement by benevolent societies in Imperial Russia), 169 (reform of awqaf in ‘Abd al-Karim Murad’s political thought), 191 –192 (the international debates on the Italian administration of waqf s in Libya)

WARLORDS (of Western China, during the Republican period): 245 , 254 –258 (their role in the sponsoring of the revival of Islamic culture in China), 249 (support given by the Ikhwani movement to the warlords, as the representatives of a strong power), 255, 261 (support to the pro-Chinese Ikhwani movement, and of Hu Songshan’s ideas, by the Ma warlords of Western China)

WARSAW: 194 (call of the European Muslim Congress for the building of a mosque in W., and its construction under Szynkewicz’s supervision)

WASATIYYA (Arabic, lit. “middle way,” concept developed by al-Qaradawi): 28

WASEDA UNIVERSITY (in Tokyo): 275 (its visit by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in 1909)

WATAN (Arabic: homeland, fatherland): 126 (Molière’s quotation by Wang Jingzhai for his definition of watan), 126, 129 , 132 –133 (the definition of watan through the Hadith among the Hui of China), 133 (Hui interpretation of watan as a Chinese state with a non-Muslim majority), see also nation and nationalism; nationality; umma WATT, W. MONTGOMERY (historian of Islam and of the Arab world): 162 (early Abbasid Sunnis as a “constitutional block” opposed to the “autocratic block” of the Shiites)

WENYAN : see Chinese language and literature

WESTERNISTS (late Ottoman school of political thought): 74 –75 (its role as a source of inspiration for Atatürk’s first reforms; its opposition to Islamists), 170 –171 (Shari’A in the debates between Westernists and Islamists in the Ottoman parliament after 1908)

WESTERNIZATION: 24 (polemic use of the notion of mutafarnij [“franconizer”] by Rida), 25 (early discussions of the assumption that modernization implies Westernization), 56 , 60 (selective acceptation of Western ideas by the Salafiyya, within a general Islamic framework), 62 , 64 (post-First World War critics of Westernization in Atatürk’s Turkey), 65 (Rida’s critic of the role played by “renegade Turks” in Westernization), 79 (E. Zola’s influence on the young M. Âkif), 80 (Young Ottomans’ opposition to the superficial adoption of parts of European culture), 94 (Russia’s madrasas accused by conservative ulama of being an instrument of Westernization), 96 (some excesses of the theory of Westernization, about the Muslims of Russia), 101 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s pessimism about Western civilization), 120 (absorption of Western modernism in Japan as seen by early twentieth-century Muslim travellers), 163 (Ottoman bureaucrat /brahim Müteferrika’s proposals for military reforms along European lines), 242 (influence of Western ideas, through a Japanese intermediary, on ethnicity, nationality, and citizenship among early twentieth-century Chinese Muslims), 248, 253 (influence of Western studies in islamology on twentieth-century Chinese Muslim learned circles), 276 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s praise of Japan’s acceptance of Western science and technology, and warnings against superficial Westernization), 295 –296 (Nursi’s apology of early twentiethcentury Western-style school education among the Muslims), see also alcohol and alcoholism; clothing; colonialism; hygiene; identity; translation

WILAYA AL-FAQIH (Arabic, “guardianship by the jurist”): 23 (formulation of the concept by Ayatollah Khomeini), 27 (its antecedence by Rida’s theory of the caliphate of the mujtahid)

WILHELM II (German emperor, r. 1888–1918): 188 , 189 –190 (impact of his declaration in Damascus, in 1898, on Germany being the protector of Muslims, and on Sh. Arslan’s relationship to the Kaiser’s approach toward Islam)

WOMEN AND THE “WOMEN QUESTION”: 66 (Rashid Rida’s writings on the “danger of liberating women”), 96 (Barudi’s nomination of a female qadi in the muftiyyat of Russia), 97 (popularization by al-Qadiri of Qasim Amin’s writings on the status of woman), 99 (Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din’s series on the famous women of Islam), 100 (“women question” in the ethical debates of the 1900 to 1910s in Russia), 145 (Malay-Indonesian writer Shaykh al-Hadi’s novel Farida Lanum on feminist themes), 248 (female ahong s in twentieth-century China, with Persian language as their literary language), 289 (increasingly important role of women in modern communication), 297 (women’s increasingly active role in the promotion of Nursi’s message), 297 (F. Gülen’s advocacy of a public role for women in society, and statement that the wearing of the headscarf by women is a matter of personal choice), see also biography; clothing; education; ethics; headscarf; language; nationalism

WORLD BANK: 237 –238 (its utilization by Aga Khan IV for the modernization of the Isma ‘ili community in Northern Pakistan)

WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS OF MECCA IN 1926: 101 (its attending by Riza al-Din b. Fakhr al-Din)

WORLD UNION OF MUSLIM ULAMA: 27 (its foundation in 2004 in London)

WU TEGONG (d. 1963, Muslim Chinese journalist at the Shenbao of Shanghai): 244 , 258 (his role in the creation of the Learned Society of the Hui Religion of China in 1925, and of the Guild of the Hui Religion in China in 1929), 258 (his collaboration, beside Sha Shanyu, with Ha Decheng and Ma Jiang on their translations of the Qur1 an)

WUCHANG (one of the three cities forming Wuhan, in central China): 246 (conference organized in 1937 by Bai Conqxi, to mobilize the Chinese Muslims against the Japanese)

WUJDA (Moroccan city): 167 (its occupation by the French army in March 1907)

XIN JIAOYU XUE (“Schools with the New Education,” book on modern schooling by Ma Linyi): 256 (its influence in China)

XIN ZONGZHEN (prominent ahong in Hebei): 136 (his mobilization of the Hui against the Japanese occupation of China)

XING HUI PIAN (“A Leaf for Awakening the Hui”): 252 (the publication of this journal, since 1908, by the thirty-six students who had created in Tokyo the Association for the Pure and True Education)

XINJIANG: 230 (Yarkand as Pir Sahib’s birthplace, and the center of his family’s Isma ‘ili da’wa in the 1910–1920s), 235 (Isma ‘ili da’wa led in the 1940s by Hunza’i), 247 (exclusion of Muslims from Xinjiang from the scope of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country), 282 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s emigration from Siberia through Xinjiang, China, and Manchuria)

XINSHI JAIOYU (Chinese: “New Style of Education”): 247 –248 (its introduction among Muslim Chinese in the early twentieth-century)

XIUCAI : see examination

XUEWENBO (teacher of the Chengda Normal School in the 1930s): 135 (his poem “Song of the Hui with an anti-Japanese Determination”)

YA LATIF! (“O God!”): 198 (incantation diffused throughout Morroco’s mosques as a protest against the Berber Dahir)

YALTIKAYA, VERAFEDDAN (1879–1947, Ottoman religious scholar): 77 (his introduction of the pioneer Salafi thinker Ibn Taymiyya in the Turkist journal /slâm mecmuasi) YAMAOKA KOTARO (1880–1959, first Japanese performer of the hajj): 279 (his and ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s lectures in the Society of Muslims Students of Russia, in Istanbul)

YAN’AN: 247 (creation of a subsidiary association of the Friendly Association of the Hui Religion of China for the Salvation of the Country)

YANG SISHI (contributor to Yuehua): 130 (his praise of Nur al-islam for providing solutions to conflicts among madhab s and Sufi orders in Chinese Islam)

YANG ZHONGMING (1870–1952, activist of the modernization of Islamic teaching in China): 260 (his writing of the Sijiao yaogua, and his role at the Changda Normal School)

YANI YAPON MULBIRI (“The New Japanese Correspondent,” a monthly Tatar-Ottoman journal founded in Tokyo by Qurban-’Aliyeff in 1932): 283 , 284 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s collaboration to the journal)

YARKAND (city in south western Xinjiang): 230 (Pir Sahib’s birthplace, and the center of his family’s Isma ‘ili da’wa in the 1910–1920s)

YA’USHEFF, NUSHIRWAN (d. 1917, Bashkir traveller and travel writer): 102 (his correspondences in the Mura)

YEMEN: 195 –196 (Imam Yahya’s conflicts with Ibn Saud)

YI-SI-LAN-JIAO GAILUN (“A Summary of Islam” book on modern schooling by Ma Linyi): 256 (its influence in China)

YIHEIWANI: see Ikhwani movement

YIWOBAO (“To Develop Us,” journal created in 1905 by Tong Cong for presenting his pedagogical ideas): 243

YOKOHAMA: 275 (‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim’s stay in this city in 1909)

YOUNG OTTOMANS: 80 (their influence on Mehmed Âkif; their invention of the concept of pan-Islamism), 164 (their support by Islamic reformists in Syria and Egypt), 170 (their confidence in the Shari’A as a source of dignity and as a baseline for political institution-building)

YOUNG TURKS: 76 (their Islamic reforms in the judicial and educational systems), 151 (support of the Malay-Indonesian journal al-Imam to the Young Turks after 1908), 164 (support to Y.T. by Islamic reformists in Syria and Egypt), 275 (exile of Muslim intellectuals of Russia to Turkey after the Young Turks revolution of 1908)

YUEHUA (“Moonlight,” Chinese Muslim journal published from 1929 to 1948 by the new Chengda School at Beijing): 117 –142 (article by Matsumoto M., especially 124 –136), 253 (journal’s stress on patriotism, Ikhwani inspiration, and call for a reconciliation between and with the different Sufi allegiances), 256 (sponsorship of the journal by Ma Fuxiang)

YUGOSLAVIA: 192 (articles in La Nation arabe on Islam in Eastern Europe), 192 (Sh. Arslan’s travels in Yu. in 1931 and 1933–1934), 194 (acknowledgment of the Yugoslav government by the European Muslim Congress of 1935 for its favorable treatment of its Muslim population), 211 –225 (article by A. Popovic)

YUNTING PROVINCIAL NORMAL SCHOOL (Shengli Yunting shifan xuexiao): 251 (former Sino-Arabic University of Ningxia)

ZAGREB: 214 (creation of the Mladi Muslimani organization in 1941)

AL-ZAHRAWI, ‘Abd AL-HAMID (early twentieth-century Syrian publicist, an associate of Rashid Rida’s): 43 (his attempt at the underground publication of a journal in Homs), 44 (his attack on common views on Sufism and jurisprudence), 46 (his book on Muhammad’s first wife, Khadija), 47 (his obituary notice in al-Manār)

ZAKAT (Islamic alms tax, amounting to one fortieth of a household’s income): 5 (its being left for private initiative in modern era), 19 (in Rida’s comment of the Qur 1 an), 45 (approval by Rashid Rida of Sayyadi’s views on the collection of the z.), 90 (its partial replacement by benevolent societies in Imperial Russia), 121 (financing of Qur1 anic schools by the zakat —tianke —among the Hui), 227, 229 –230 , 233 (tithe on the tenth part of a household income, as it is perceived among the Nizari Isma ‘ilis)

ZANZIBAR: 229 (homage paid to Aga Khan III in Z. by a son of the mir of Hunza)

AL-ZAWAWI, ‘Abd-ALLAH (early twentiethcentury scholar from Mecca): 48 (his involvement in the debate between Rida and Ibn ‘Aqil on the Shiite practice of cursing Mu’Awiya)

ZEKI VALIDOV, AHMED (1890–1970, Bashkir political activist, memorialist and historian): 282 (his meeting with ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim in the Southern Urals in March 1920)

ZENTRAL RAT DER MUSLIME (Central Council of Muslims, Germany): 293 (creation of central formal institutions, since the 1930s, to ‘represent’ Islam in France and Germany)

ZHAO ZHENWU (progressive literati of the Huabei region in the 1930s): 125 (his role in the launching of the Yuehua journal)

ZHENGDONG AIGUO BAO (‘Correct Teaching and Love of the Country’): 252 (publication of this Hui journal in Beijing, in spoken Chinese language, since 1904), 279 (publication of a paper by ‘Abd al-Rashid Ibrahim)

ZHENJIANG (a city in Jiangsu): 242 (creation of the General Association for the Religious Education of the Muslim People of Eastern Asia, in 1906)

ZHONGGUO TONGMINGHUI (Chinese Revolutionary Association): 121 (membership of Hui students in Tokyo)

ZHUYUAN BAIHUA BAO (“The Colloquial-Language Journal of the Garden of Bamboos”): 252 (publication of this Chinese Muslim journal in Beijing since 1906)

ZINOVIEV (Grigorij E. Radomylskij, alias Z., 1883–1936, a Bolshevik leader): 181 (his meetings with Sh. Arslan in Saint Moritz and in Moscow)

ZIONISM: 183 (opposition of Palestinian delegates to the Syrian Congress against the Syrian elements’ will of compromising on the issue of Zionism), 187 (support of the post-First World War British left to Zionism, an obstacle to a rapprochement with Arab nationalists)

AL-ZIRKISHI (sixteenth-century Shafi’i scholar): 47 (publication by al-Qasimi of al-Z.’s treatise on jurisprudence, philosophy, and logic)

ZOLA, EMILE (1840–1902, French critic and novel-writer): 79 (his influence on the young M. Âkif)

ZULFIKARPASI-, ADIL (b. 1921, Bosnian politician, founder of the Boshnakian Institute in Zurich): 218 (as a representative of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian diaspora)

#title The Qur’an, Morality and Critical Reason

#subtitle The Essential Muhammad Shahrur

#author Muhammad Shahrur

#date 2009

#source <[[https://brill.com/edcollbook/title/14878?language=en][brill.com/edcollbook/title/14878]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2023-09-11T11:42:44

#authors Muhammad Shahrur, Andreas Christmann, Dale F. Eickelman

#topics Indigenous, Half-finished error correcting #cover m-s-muhammad-shahrur-the-qur-an-morality-and-criti-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 Book Details

 Series Title Page

Social, Economic and Political Studies of the Middle East and Asia

(S.E.P.S.M.E.A.)

(Founding editor: C.A.O. van Nieuwenhuijze)

Editor

Dale F. Eickelman

Advisory Board

Fariba Adelkhah

(SciencesPo/CERI, Paris)

Roger Owen

(Harvard University)

Armando Salvatore

(University of Naples “L’Orientale” – Humboldt University, Berlin)

VOLUME 106

 Book Title Page

The Qur’an, Morality

and Critical Reason

The Essential Muhammad Shahrur

Translated, Edited, and with an Introduction by

Andreas Christmann

LEIDEN • BOSTON

2009

 Publisher Details

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Cover photo courtesy Dale F. Eickelman. All rights reserved.

The publication of this book has been financially supported by the Institute of Contemporary Intellectual Studies, Beirut – Lebanon

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Shahrur, Muhammad.

[Selections. English. 2009]

The Qur’an, morality and critical reason : the essential Muhammad Shahrur / translated, edited, and with an introduction by Andreas Christmann.

p. cm. — (Social, economic and political studies of the Middle East and Asia)
Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-90-04-17103-9 (hardback : alk. paper)

1. Islam. 2. Islam—20th century. 3. Shahrur, Muhammad—Interviews. 4. Scholars, Muslim—Interviews. I. Christmann, Andreas. II. Eickelman, Dale F., 1942- III. Title. IV. Series.

BP161.3.S48213 2009

297.2—dc22

2008049375

ISSN 1385–3376

ISBN 978 90 04 17103 9

2009 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands. Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill, Hotei Publishing, IDC Publishers, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Koninklijke Brill NV provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA. Fees are subject to change.

Printed in the netherlands.

 Front Matter

 Foreword by Dale F. Eickelman

Both mass education and mass communications, particularly the proliferation of media and the means by which people communicate, have profoundly influenced how people think about religious and political authority throughout the Muslim world. Multiple means of communication have eroded the frontier between ‘authorized’ and ‘illicit’ communications, making the control of information and opinion much more difficult than it was in prior eras and fostering, albeit inadvertently, a fragmentation of authority and a civil society of dissent. We are only now beginning to understand how different media—print, television, radio, cassettes, music, and the Internet—influence groups and individuals, encouraging unity in some contexts and fragmentation in others, but the written word remains the privileged cultural vehicle for shaping religious beliefs and practices throughout the Muslim world. Books and pamphlets, including banned ones, are talked about and invoked as authority in sermons, cassettes, lectures, reviews, and conversations. In seeking to ban and confiscate them, censors only draw attention to their existence and increase their circulation.

At the high end of this transformation is the rise to significance of books such as Muhammad Shahrur's. His first major book in Arabic, al-Kit§b wa'l-Qur"§n: Qir§"a mu#§ßira [The Book and the Qur"§n] (1990), became an unexpected best-seller throughout the Arab world in spite of its length of over 800 pages and being banned in several countries. Four successive books (through 2008) followed, further elaborating and articulating his ideas on the state, civil society, and democracy in Qur'anic thought, values and ethics in modern society, and the sources of tyranny and terrorism.

The Book and the Qur"§n became an instant success, with tens of thousands of copies sold throughout the Arab world in both authorized (Damascus and Beirut) and pirated (Cairo) editions, and was widely circulated by photocopy elsewhere (including Saudi Arabia), in spite of the fact that its circulation was banned or discouraged. The impact of Shahrur's writings, like those of comparable writers, is not limited to those who read it. A much larger number of people learned about his book in reviews or rebuttals or in admonitions not to read it. We may live in what sociologist Manuel Castells has famously called the era of the 'network society,' but the main vehicle for the spread of Shahrur's ideas from the outset has been the printed word. The covers of Shahrur's books are austere, distinctive from the eye-catching techniques of modern graphic design. Ironically, only the pirated Egyptian editions show a flair for graphic design.

The impact of ideas such as Shahrur's could not have been imagined before large numbers of people were able to read his books and understand his sustained advocacy. Shahrur argues that there is a need to reinterpret ideas of religious authority and tradition, and to apply Islamic precepts to contemporary society. Yet popular resistance to such challenges to established authority has also been intense. Dozens of books and many more critical reviews have been written and Friday sermons delivered in response to Shahrur. The popularity and appeal of his argument has so infuriated some of his traditionalist detractors that they imitate the cover design of his book and even insert in their bibliography the number of ‘factual errors’ in his essay—‘over 2,500’ by one 1996 account. Such error-counters fail to realize that Shahrur’s goal is to redefine how Muslims and non-Muslims alike think about religion and sacred authority.

From the outset in his writings, Shahrur has made a striking analogy between the Copernican revolution and Qur’anic interpretation. Copernicus (1473–1543) replaced the older Ptolemaic view of a universe in which all celestial bodies revolved around a stationary earth with one in which the earth revolved daily on its own axis and once yearly (at least with a solar calendar) around the sun. Shahrur writes that Qur’anic interpretation has been shackled for centuries by the conventions of medieval jurists, who had mastered the craft of chaining authoritative commentaries to prior authoritative ones and of creating genealogies, or chains (silsilas), of traditions of authoritative learning.

Shahrur’s intent is to replace this long tradition with human reason. On issues ranging from the role of women in society to rekindling a ‘creative interaction’ with non-Muslim philosophies, Shahrur argues that Muslims should reinterpret sacred texts anew and apply them to contemporary social and moral issues: “If Islam is sound [ß§liÈ] for all times and places,” then we must not neglect historical developments and the interaction of different generations. We must act as if “the Prophet just ... informed us of this Book.”

Shahrur’s ideas directly challenge the authority of traditional Qur’anic exegesis (tafsÊr), collections of sayings of the prophet (ÈadÊth), and Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh). The subtitle of his first book—‘a contemporary interpretation”—uses the term qir§“a, which can mean either reading or interpretation, rather than the term tafsÊr, which directly evokes the established conventions of traditional Islamic learning from which Shahrur advocates a decisive break. For many Muslims and established men of religious learning, Shahrur argues that traditional disciplines of learning such as tafsÊr have implicitly acquired an authority equal to that of the Qur’an itself. As Shahrur explains, the four conventional schools of Islamic jurisprudence say little about tyranny and absolutism, although they deal extensively with rules for inheritance and ritual cleanliness.

Because Shahrur’s ideas pose such basic challenges to existing authority, he has been periodically attacked in some Friday sermons in Damascus since the publication of his first book. As a Muslim Brother said to me in Kuwait in June 1993, Shahrur is “worse than Salman Rushdie” because he proclaims his faith in Islam but advocates a critical stance toward established conventions of authoritative learning. The Kuwaiti continued: “Not all Muslims have a high level of education or an ability to know Islam. That’s why we have committees of properly qualified scholars, to keep such books out of the hands of Muslims who cannot distinguish between Shahrur’s correct understandings and deviations, especially his errors on ideas of women and the family.”

These attacks on Shahrur are all the more important because his notion of disseminating his ideas is almost as formally rigorous as Kant’s notion of ‘public’ contained in his essay on the Enlightenment, in which the idea of ‘public’ is the words of a writer appearing before readers independent of authoritative intermediaries such as preachers, judges, and rulers. For a long time, Shahrur’s public speaking invitations were rare. Beginning in the early 1990s, however, he began to grant newspaper interviews in Arabic and English, has appeared on various Arabic satellite channels, and has made public presentations in English in North America and Europe. The Arabic appearances are meticulously recorded on his website (w ww. shahrour.org). Unsurprisingly, the website is austere. It is easy to navigate, but its focus is on the text. This unadorned means of persuasion, however, appeals to a growing educated middle class.

Shahrur’s use of the term ‘Copernican revolution’ to emphasize contemporary innovations in interpreting God’s word contains an element of hyperbole. The cliché of the Renaissance, itself a nineteenth century term, is that people like Copernicus discarded the dusty parchments of earlier eras to learn ‘directly from nature.’ In practice, the revolution wrought by Copernicus and others combined first-hand observations and the careful analysis of received opinions of the past, made possible through the dissemination of multiple texts through printing. The present ‘revolution’ in thinking about Islam is not a complete break with the past. However, the rise in educational levels and the multiple channels of communication have created an unprecedented opportunity for people to talk back to authorities, both religious and political, and to invest conventional forms with new meanings and contexts. The field of discourse has shifted, so that even those who advocate a more exclusively Islamic intellectual development do so in a language and style that assumes background knowledge of ideas and institutions which are not distinctively Muslim. The current situation is far different from earlier eras, when men of religious learning all read essentially the same ‘core’ texts.

The Qur’an, Morality, and Critical Reason presents for the first time in English a comprehensive account of Shahrur’s original approach to how to think about Islam. In preparing the Arabic original of this book, Shahrur has naturally drawn on his nearly two decades of writing about Islam. In so doing, however, he has gone beyond and created a text that is often both new and consistently accessible.

In an interview that I conducted with Muhammad Shahrur in Damascus in 1996, published for the first time in this volume, we explored his original sense of audience. Over the years, Shahrur has learned to communicate to new and wider audiences. His earlier writings dealt only obliquely with the rough topics of the world in which we live—tyranny and terrorism. His more recent writings in Arabic, and this book in English, confront these hard issues head on.

The Qur’an, Morality, and Critical Reason is in part a long-term dialogue with Shahrur’s audience in the Arab world, Europe, North America, and even Indonesia—where his work in translation has received a wide and appreciative audience. Andreas Christmann, like myself, saw early on the originality of Shahrur’s work and his approach to linking faith to reason. This translation is so clear and effective that it is at times easy to think that it was written originally in English rather than translated from Arabic. Christmann’s introduction, like his annotated explanations of Shahrur’s narrative, adds value by giving readers an intimate sense of the intricacies of Shahrur’s approach to critical inquiry, the context for the interpretive issues that Shahrur addresses, and a window into the critical debates now underway in the Arabic-speaking world.

Shahrur’s approach goes to the heart of current debates about how to interpret Islam in the modern world. In many respects I find his approach to thinking about religion and reason the Arabic counterpart to Wilfred Cantwell Smith’s highly influential The Meaning and End of Religion (1962). Shahrur vigorously offers an innovative approach to interpreting Islam and its relation to other faiths, prophetic tradition, the controversial ‘limits’ (Èudåd) of Islamic law, women, and political Islam—including a head-on confrontation with advocates of tyranny and terrorism.

In The Qur’an, Morality, and Critical Reason Shahrur boldly confronts controversial issues and at the same time links the fundamentals of faith—and not just Islamic faith—to critical reason. He offers a strong argument for a civil society that encompasses both Muslims and non-Muslims alike. This book is a portal to his thought for the English-speaking world, and Andreas Christmann’s superb introduction and annotated translation makes it an exciting and accessible point of departure for Shahrur to engage a wide audience in the English-speaking world.

 Acknowledgements

Since this book is a compilation of texts which have been specifically rearranged and modified for this translation, it could not have been done without a considerable amount of collaboration with Muhammad Shahrur and those people around him who support his work. I wish to thank Muhammad Shahrur for the time he spent with me explaining his thoughts in the most patient and scholarly manner. I also thank Sultan al-#Awa for his superb managerial skills in arranging the meetings between Muhammad Shahrur and me in Damascus and Abu Dhabi; Mayada a l-Kayali and Randa a l-Sahli for their tremendous efforts in selecting and arranging with me the Arabic texts from Shahrur's monographs, journal articles, interviews, and conference papers; MuÈammad JamÊl al-Qaßß§ß for his IT-support; Muhammad Khaled and Mustafa Baig for their help and assistance in the Department of Middle Eastern Studies at Manchester University; my colleague Ronald Buckley who read drafts of this book and made numerous invaluable corrections and improvements; Dale F. Eickelman who was of tremendous support and encouragement throughout the entire project; Dawn Hall for her excellent copyediting; my daughter Sophia for helping me to draw up the charts; my daughter Dorothea for always being 'eine fest Burg'; and my wife Kerstin for her meticulous proofreading of the manuscript and her unwavering support.

A substantial part of the work on this book was done during my research leave, supported by the British Arts & Humanities Research Council in 2007–08. I sincerely appreciate the help and support I re ceived through this research-leave scheme.

 Used Translations and their Abbreviations

YA Yusuf Ali, The Holy Qur'an: English Translation of the Meanings and Commentary (Medina: King Fahd Holy Qur"§n Printing Complex, 1410 AH/1990).

AH M.A.S. Abdel Haleem, The Qur'an (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005).

MF Majid Fakhry, An Interpretation of the Qur'an: English Translation of the Meanings (New York: New York University Press, 2000).

MP Muhammad Marmaduke Pickthall, The Meaning of The Glorious Qur’an: An Explanatory Translation (New Modern English Edition, Birmingham: Islamic Da”wa Centre International, 2004).

AB Abdalhaqq and Aisha Bewley, The Noble Qur’an: A New Rendering of Its Meaning in English (Norwich: Bookwork, 1999).

AhA Ahmad Ali, Al-Qur”§n: A Contemporary Translation (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2001).

AA Arthur J. Arberry, The Koran Interpreted, 2 vols. (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1963).

Muhammad Shahrur’s frequent use of quotations from the Qur’an was a particular problem in the English translation, as his understanding of the Arabic text differed considerably from most available English translations. After consultation with Muhammad Shahrur, it was decided to use Yusuf Ali’s version as the default translation in the main text, but it was felt unnecessary to replicate Ali’s antiquated use of English personal pronouns (thy, ye, thou, etc.) and his frequent use of capital initial letters for terms he felt had a particular spiritual resonance. However, in instances when Ali’s translation was either incomprehensible or completely inadequate to render Shahrur’s understanding of a verse, I have sought help from other translations, in particular from Abdel Haleem’s rendering. I have consulted six of the most commonly used English translations from a variety of different linguistic, religious, and educational backgrounds. I indicate in footnotes where discrepancies between their translations and Shahrur’s interpretations occur. In some instances, however, where no translation seemed to offer any resemblance to Shahrur’s reading I have decided to use my own version based on what I thought was the author’s purpose in quoting a specific verse. In situations where I thought it was vital to stress the disagreement between Shahrur’s reading of a verse and its common rendering (including those by abbreviations English translators), I have kept Ali’s version but inserted the Latin abbreviation [sic] in order to highlight Shahrur’s explicit disagreement with such renderings which he regards as erroneous. When the author has not produced an explicit alternative meaning of a word whose common understanding he heavily criticises, the word in question has not been translated but rather replaced by suspension points in square brackets […], followed by Shahrur’s commentary after the quotation of the verse.

 ‘Read the Qur’an as if it was revealed last night’: An introduction to Muhammad Shahrur’s life and work

This edition assembles the essential writings of Muhammad Shahrur, one of the most interesting and innovative thinkers in the contemporary Arab-Muslim world. The success of his first book on Islam, The Book and the Qur”§n: A contemporary reading (1990),[1] made him a household name among intellectuals, students, and scholars of the entire Middle East during the 1990s. Many readers were stunned by the bold, creative, and unfamiliar way of thinking that characterised Shahrur’s writings. People who were neither experts nor full-time students of Islam and the Qur’an were fascinated by the logic of his arguments and gained easy access to rather complex philosophical and theological debates. My own first encounter with his work came during my fieldwork for my PhD thesis in the mid-1990s in Damascus, when I witnessed what Peter Clark, back in 1996, had called ‘the Shahrur phenomenon’: the publication of an extraordinary book that “challenges a millennium of Islamic tradition”.[2] The unusual composition of the book, its peculiar Arabic style, and its original way of presenting logical arguments were so unique that in 1997 Wael Hallaq emphatically stated that the book “is impressive in that it offers both depth and range, virtually unparalleled in modern writings on the subject”.[3] The enormous number of copies sold, the speed by which reprints were issued and pirate versions reproduced, and the extent to which the book’s ideas were circulated in the preInternet 1990s throughout the Middle East inspired Dale F. Eickelman in 1999 to argue that the Shahrur phenomenon reflected the fact that in most Muslim countries a reconfiguration of the ‘public sphere’ can be witnessed, not only in terms of different communication channels used and different kinds of topics publicly discussed but also in terms of the type of actors who now enter the public debate about Islam and the type of listeners/readers who participate in it. The book's success, Eickelman says, "could not have been imagined before there were large numbers of people able to read it and understand its advocacy of the need to reinterpret ideas of religious authority and tradition and apply Islamic precepts to contemporary society". [4]

By the time I seriously began to consider Shahrur's œuvre in 2001, three more books had appeared,[5] and Shahrur was already working on his fifth book, which he eventually finished in 2007 and published in 2008.[6] Thus, it has become clear that 'the Shahrur phenomenon' cannot be reduced to the appearance of only his first book but needs to be explained in a more comprehensive way by covering his other writings as well. This volume is an attempt to present Shahrur's entire œuvre in a single book, covering almost two decades of his publications and (almost) the entire spectrum of his thought. It is hoped that this selection, translated and specifically arranged for an English-speaking readership, with the approval of the author, will help the English reader to understand what has captured the public imagination of Arab readers in the 1990s and, beyond that, why Shahrur's work has been perceived by some as so emphatically revolutionary that Eickelman concluded that "compared to most other Islamic thinkers, Shahrur is a radical",[7] while others, like Rainer

Nabielek, even compared his ideas to the Ninety-Five Theses that Martin Luther nailed to the door of the Wittenberg church in 1517, thereby starting the Protestant Reformation.[8] The following essay which contains a brief summary of Shahrur's intellectual life and a short explication of his major streams of thought provides readers with a first orientation before they embark on the main text of Shahrur's writings.

 Life and Work

Muhammad Shahrur was born in 1938 in the '§liÈiyya quarter of Damascus, the capital of Syria. He was the fifth child of a Sunni dyer who decided not to send his son to the local kutt§b and madrasa, but to the secular primary and secondary state school in al-MÊd§n, the southern suburb of Damascus outside the walls of the old city. Shahrur's childhood was thus spent in a liberal atmosphere in which, even though his father observed the rituals of prayer and fasting and went with his son on the \ajj in 1946, pious ritual observance was seen as less important than the ethical teachings of Islam. His father taught him that the goodness of a religion can only be measured by its practical and moral implications, not its spiritual efficacy. In a reminiscence, given in an interview in 1996, Shahrur fondly recalled how his father had pointed to the stove of the house and said: "if you want to warm yourself, don't recite the Qur'an, but light a fire in the stove."[9]

Shahrur's most formative years coincided with the politically most unstable periods of the Syrian Arab Republic after it gained its independence in 1947. The young Shahrur was, first as a pupil of the natural sciences then as a student of civil engineering, directly and indirectly influenced by the political turmoil (between 1946 and 1956, Syria had twenty different cabinets and four different constitutions), administrative instability (there were ten successful coups d'état between 1949 and 1970), and the ideological chaos that resulted. In 1959, after the Soviet Union became a key ally of Syria in 1955, Shahrur was sent to Saratow, near Moscow, to study civil engineering. There he experienced another phase of political and ideological confusion. While witnessing the dismantling of Stalinism during Nikita Khrushchev's reign as Soviet Prime Minister (1958–64), his religious beliefs were challenged by a confrontation with Marxist philosophy and institutionalised Soviet-style atheism. Sharing with many contemporary foreign intellectuals the disillusionment with the one-party rule and totalitarian tendencies of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, he still battled with atheism and was—according to his memories—so involved in defending his theistic beliefs that all other questions of religion seemed irrelevant to him.[10] When he graduated in 1964 with a diploma from the Moscow Institute of Engineering, fluent in Russian and married to a Russian wife who bore him a son, he returned to Syria. A couple of years before his return, the political union between Syria and Egypt (1958–61) had been buried along with any hope for a pan-Arab union. Trying to explain the underlying reasons for such political failure, Shahrur believed that pan-Arab thought had failed to produce the necessary ideology for a political union as it was too immersed in romanticist nostalgia entrenched in sentimental poetry. His encounter with Marxist philosophy had taught him that any viable ideology needed a fundamental concept of knowledge, that is, a theory about the human perception of things that exist in objective reality. He was determined to put this right with his own philosophical ideas.

Yet at this point in Shahrur’s development, the prospect of a good career as a civil engineer and all that this required, in particular the mastering of mathematics and analytical geometry, proved more attractive to him than his philosophical interests. Thus, in 1968, he left Syria again to study abroad, this time at the University College in Dublin where he earned his master’s degree in 1969 and his doctoral degree in soil mechanics and foundation engineering in 1972. Eventually, he went back to Damascus University, where he lectured as a mudarris, then as an assistant professor before being made a full professor at the Faculty of Engineering. He taught at Damascus University for twenty-six years, from 1972 to 1998, and became renowned as the author of several Syrian standard reference works on soil mechanics and foundation engineering. Beside his teaching obligations he worked as a consultant engineer supplying inspection services for over two thousand building projects in Syria (most famously for the a l-Yalbågha Commercial Complex in Damascus and the capital’s four big football stadiums), as well as the Gulf countries (e.g., the Commercial Centre in Medina, Saudi Arabia).

Despite his full-time career as a university professor and consultant engineer, Shahrur never lost interest in developing his views on logic, epistemology, and theistic theology as a response to the crisis of panArabism and the military debacle of the lost Six Day War in 1967. In this, he was similar to many other Syrian Arab intellectuals during the 1970s and 1980s, who also taught at Damascus University (such as ‘§diq Jal§l al-#Aím, •ayyib •ÊzÊnÊ, Adonis, Y§ssin al-\§fií, Eli§s Murqus, SalÊm Barak§t, Burh§n Ghalyån, et al.), and who had also been influenced by Marxist theories. This is not to say that Shahrur was particularly visible or audible in matters of philosophy or Islam. In fact, his intellectual positions appear to have been developed more or less in private, as evidenced by the fact that before his sudden breakthrough with The Book and the Qur”§n in 1990, Shahrur had not published anything on the subject and was then, at the age of fiftytwo, an unknown author—often tentatively referred to as a l-k§tib al-muhandis, the ‘writer-engineer’. And yet, what distinguished him from his more famous and better trained philosopher-colleagues was the ‘unorthodox angle’ from which he looked at the place of religion and Islam in contemporary Arab intellectual thought.

Although he shared with other Syrian thinkers (in particular •ayyib •ÊzÊnÊ) the belief that Islam possesses a universal epistemology that encourages rationalism, human liberty, and the appropriation of knowledge, Shahrur did not find his inspiration in the classical philosophical heritage nor in the exegetical tradition of medieval Islam, but rather in his work as a natural scientist and engineer. What mattered to him most was not a consistent argument derived from the scholarly discourses of the past, but absolute consistency between the Qur’anic worldview and his own modern and rational experiences of reality. Much of this outlook had already been developed during his Dublin years, where he is said to have devoured the writings of Alfred North Whitehead and his pupil, Bertrand Russell, both mathematician-philosophers themselves, in particular Whitehead’s 1925 Lowell Lectures on “Science in the Modern World”.[11] Through Whitehead’s work, Shahrur also absorbed much of his influences from German positivist philosophy (Kant, Fichte, and Hegel).[12] This synthesis between Whitehead’s speculative philosophy, German rationalist idealism, and the structuralism of his mathematica l-engineering mind has given his work its distinctive character among the work of other philosophical thinkers.

Shahrur’s unorthodoxy is best illustrated by his account of how he came to elaborate his theory of limits, the central and most significant part of his work on Islamic law: “One day an idea occurred to me when I was lecturing at the university on civil engineering on how to make compaction roads. We have what we call a proctor test, in which we sample and test the soil used in fills and embankments. In this test, we follow a mathematical pattern of exclusion and interpolation. We have two vectors, x and y, a hyperbole. We have a basic risk. We plot a curve and put a line on the top of it. This line is the upper limit, and there is a lower limit. Then I thought of the concept of ‘God’s limits’. I returned here to the office and opened the Qur’an. Just as in mathematics where we have five ways of representing limits, I found five cases in which the notion of God’s limits occurred. What they have in common is the idea that God has not set down exact rules of conduct in such matters as inheritance, criminal punishments, marriage, interest, and banking practices, but only the limits within which societies can create their own rules and laws. [Therefore, on reflection I came to the conclusion that] thieves do not have to have their hands amputated."[13]

 The Shahrur Case

The controversy around The Book and the Qur'an started immediately after its first release in Syria in 1990 with a handful of short reviews and culminated in the year 2000 with a 1014-page magnum opus by MuÈammad 'ayy§È al-Ma#rr§wiyya, a "comprehensive refutation" of Shahrur's work, which intended to deal the deathblow to all "contemporary readings of the Qur'an".[14] The debate that took place between 1990 and 2000 generated eighteen books and as many journal articles which specifically targeted the book. It also produced a large number of publications in which various issues, which the book had raised, were discussed without explicit reference to Shahrur's work.[15] The biggest bulk of the polemic against Shahrur was written within the first five years after its publication, and the focus lay entirely on The Book and the Qur'an, while all subsequent writings by Shahrur were more or less ignored. It was the wide and rapid circulation of the book among Arab readers in Syria, the Lebanon, Morocco, and the Gulf states that caused his opponents to respond so quickly. Evidently, the literary and religious elite, who had never heard of an author called Shahrur, were puzzled by the large n umbers of copies sold in the first few months after the book's publication. In 1994, when the sixth edition was on the market, Sheikh Kh§lid a l-#Akk acknowledged that such a development had caused "profound anxiety among the educated public, in particular among scholars and scientists".[16] Undoubtedly, the initial polarization of opinions about the book's 'real origins' unintentionally stimulated wider public interest; in January 1991, the literary critic Na#Êm a l-Y§fÊ wrote gushingly that Shahrur's book "is the most significant work that has been published within the last 1,000 years [!], a work that examines the Qur'an in a sharp-minded manner, reveals a scientific spirit, a holistic vision and a progressive, modern point of view".[17] In stark contrast to such effusive praise, a damning article about the book was published in the journal Nahj al-Isl§m, the official press organ of the Awq§f Ministry in Syria in as early as December 1990. Without naming the title or author of the book, Sheikh Rama·§n al-BåãÊ, one of Syria's most influential #ulam§", informed the reader of a "tip-off from one of the Deans of Libya's Tripoli University that a Zionist organization had produced a new commentary of the Qur'an and now [has found] an Arabic publishing house, as well as an Arab writer whose name can serve as the author of the book".[18] After a l-BåãÊ provided a number of allusions to the content of The Book and the Qur'an, the association was certainly well established. A few months later, in March 1991, a l-BåãÊ's spiritual novice, ShawqÊ Abå KhalÊl, wrote another article in Nahj a l-Isl§m in which he declared that he had come across three books which, although published at exactly the same time and under three different titles, were absolutely identical: "the same ideas, the same preface, method, aims, even the same conclusion!"[19] —for Abå KhalÊl a clear sign that all three were written as part of a well-orchestrated intellectual war against Islam.

However, the official disapproval of the book failed to achieve its purpose—to discourage and prevent people from buying it—and within a short period of time it was sold out. Thus, tactics had to be changed. In a series of five articles by Sheikh MuÈammad ShafÊq Y§sÊn against Shahrur, published in late 1991 and 1992 again in the journal Nahj al-Isl§m, the accusation of an intellectual and religious crusade was dropped and a less aggressive approach adopted.[20] Critics of Shahrur had two options: to ignore his book, thus expressing contempt through ostentatious silence, or to criticise it publicly, although this implied a tacit acknowledgement of its significance. More and more critics opted for the latter. Two further publications in 1991—now available in book format—one by SalÊm al-J§bÊ[21], the other by MuÈammad Haytham Isl§mbålÊ,[22] tried to discredit the book by 'discovering' its Marxist, secular, and materialistic underpinnings. This, in turn, caused a critical reaction by leftist intellectuals, such as Naßr \§mid Abå Zayd,[23] •ayyib TÊzÊnÊ,[24] •§riq Ziy§da,[25] and #AlÊ NåÈ,[26] who all tried to distance themselves from Shahrur's book by demonstrating its lack of real Marxist and secular-materialist analysis. SalÊm al-J§bÊ's polemical assault was also criticised by other like-minded Muslims similarly opposed to Shahrur's book, who initiated a series of publications that wanted to "set the record straight".[27] By 1993/94, it had become a matter of principle and urgency to join the debate. The circle of critics expanded from the group of Islamic scholars who had started the debate to other intellectual and social groups, now including linguists,[28] economists,[29] engineers,[30] lawyers,[31] journalists,[32] and school and university teachers.[33] However, the popularity of the book did not subside. On the contrary, its widespread circulation among young Muslims and the fact that in 1992 the announcement of a (later cancelled) lecture by Shahrur at Damascus University attracted over 5,000 people rang alarm bells among the intellectual establishment. Thus, in 1994, M§hir Munajjid wrote a book against The Book and the Qur'an out of fear that it might become the authoritative source for "a large group of people" who would use it ideologically to justify their own non-Islamic lifestyle.[34]

Many authors regarded their refutations as a kind of 'protective wall' to shield Muslim youths from the dangerous influences of the book.[35] Books published against Shahrur grew bigger and thicker, providing a comprehensive, page-by-page refutation of the already voluminous book by Shahrur. The two publications by #Abd al-RaÈm§n \asan \abannaka al-Mayd§nÊ (1997)[36] and MuÈammad 'ayy§È al-Ma#ar r§wiyya (2000), which concluded the fiercest phase of the controversy, aimed to provide the theological means to prove every argument of Shahrur wrong by delivering a counterargument.[37]

Compared to other cases outside Syria the Shahrur case has been a relatively restrained and civilized affair. It never made it to the civil courts in Damascus, and the author has never been officially accused of blasphemy, disbelief or apostasy as happened elsewhere. There has not even been a public hearing where the author had to defend his position, and there has certainly not been any attempt to arrest him. No one has dared publicly to declare Shahrur a renegade, and although the author has received a considerable amount of hate mail there has been no immediate threat to his safety or life. His books have not been confiscated by the Syrian police even though his first book was officially banned in Egypt and temporarily forbidden in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Following his retirement from his position at Damascus University in 1998, Shahrur accepted several invitations from universities in and outside the Arab world (e.g. the Lebanon, Bahrayn, Morocco, Turkey, United States, Germany), and he could travel to all these places without any interference by Syria's state authorities. The papers and lectures he was allowed to produce after 9/11 furnished the material for his most recent and politically most outspoken publication, TajfÊf man§bi# al-irh§b (Draining the sources of terrorism), in which he refutes the militant interpretations of central Qur’anic concepts by today’s radical Islamists and traces their historical roots in what he sees as the equally militant understandings of medieval Islamic jurisprudence. Given his late entry into the public discourse on Islam and the negative press his first book received in spite of its popularity, it is remarkable to see that Shahrur, not least because of the toleration by the Syrian government and rulers of several Arab countries, has now become a major voice in the debate about a more liberal and tolerant interpretation of Islam and a reform of traditional concepts and understandings of the Qur’an.

 Theory

The philosophical work of Shahrur, as presented in this volume, is a multidimensional undertaking: it endeavours to provide a systematic and entirely novel presentation of the Qur’anic text and, thus, a completely new conception of religion and Islam. It aims to demonstrate that faith and reason do not need to be mutually exclusive, and it also attempts to show that a rational definition of faith is not only more truthful to the modern, universal spirit of intellectual thought but also superior to the particularistic and ritualistic religiosity of traditional Islam. Like reformists such as Muhammad #Abduh and Fazlur Rahman before him, Shahrur seeks to synthesize Qur’anic with modern worldviews. To this end, he points out what to him seems an already existing symbiosis between the Qur’anic notion of religion (called al-isl§m) and a universally applicable and de facto observable form of common (human) religiosity (also called al-isl§m). Finally, he develops the thesis that the eternal verities of al-isl§m and the philosophical perceptions of the world, defining the parameters of morality and religion, are all but identical.

Shahrur’s main philosophical position can be found in his views on general religion (al-isl§m) and on particular religion (al-Êm§n). The former is guided by scientific reason and by what common (human) sense in all periods of history has viewed as good, moral action. The latter was brought into existence during one limited period of time by a prophet’s appearance as God’s messenger and promulgator of a l-isl§m, who was guided by the specific needs and particular requirements of the people he represented. Al-isl§m (religion in its general, ethical expression) is eternal, that is, an ideal code of human action, valid forever and everywhere. Al-Êm§n (religion in its particular ritual, legal, and cultural expression) is contingent, that is, variably and differently realizing in the contemporary ‘here and now’ the eternal ethical values of al-isl§m. It is, according to Shahrur, ethical religion that must provide the motive for humankind’s intellectual and spiritual search, not prayer and fasting. It is ethics alone which constitute the true raison d”être of religion, not ritual, mystical contemplation, or the observance of rigid dress codes. If people begin to regard rituals as more important than ethics, then religion in its ritual, legal, and cultural expressions (al-Êm§n) cuts off its roots from the ethicality and rationality of al-isl§m and becomes irrational, immoral, and fundamentally inhuman.

This is the current state of affairs which Shahrur ‘diagnoses’ for what he calls SalafÊ Islam. Looking nostalgically backwards to the time of MuÈammad, SalafÊ Islam is non-ethical al-Êm§n that clouds people’s rational minds and obscures their moral understanding of life. But ethical religion is rational, concerned with humankind’s future, and composed of human values that are intrinsic to human nature. In Shahrur’s tripartite model of human existence, consisting of ‘being’ (material existence), ‘progressing’ (time), and ‘becoming’ (change and development), it is the latter’s dimension, connoting purposeful and dynamic progression of material existence, which Shahrur associates with the ethical religion of al-isl§m. Historical religion (al-Êm§n), which has lost this third dimension—by replacing ethics with blind ritualism that stifles the rational mind and suppresses intellectual curiosity—must strive to adopt again the morality and innate humanity of al-isl§m in order to allow society to further develop and flourish.

Shahrur’s concept of God is crucial in this respect as his theology supports this philosophica l-ethical understanding of religion. Although based on an empirical model of human perception, Shahrur follows Whitehead’s neo-Kantian idealism by stating that the function of an idea is to serve the criteria by which humans judge the impressions they perceive through their senses. Shahrur’s God is not the personal God of established religion, but a manifestation of an idea that represents the foundation of all existence: its source, its ultimate finalization, and its supreme ethical criterion. God the Creator manifests himself to humans as God the Provider. That is, He continuously provides the material existence of ‘being’, its constant ‘progressing’ day by day, and the ethical standards or limits by which Creation realizes its ‘becoming’. God provides the physical setting and eternal laws of nature that are scientifically discernable by the rational, human mind, enabling humans to pursue an ethical life which will culminate in the realization of the good on earth. In other words, Shahrur’s God is a different God from the one believers want to reach with their prayers and sacrifices (the God that Soviet atheism wanted to destroy). In his concept, humankind postulates its relationship with God through the realization of the ethical good, which is humankind’s eternal and universal task, because both the ultimate goal and the limits set up by God to achieve such a goal are eternal.

God represents what is eternal and immutable, while nature and humankind are subject to change. And yet, because God has created humans and endowed them with reason, He has also created humans’ innate disposition that allows them, even if finite, to translate the abstract, absolute ideals of ethics into concrete, actual reality. These dialectics of the divine-human relationship is at the heart of Shahrur’s epistemological, hermeneutical, and legal theories. On the one side, there is what he sees as descriptors of the transcendent God: immortality, immutability, absoluteness, infinity, abstractness, and sacrality; while on the other side, the exact opposite is true for nature and humankind: mortality, changeability, relativity, finiteness, concreteness, and relatedness. Epistemologically, God’s knowledge of objective reality (cosmos, nature, and society) is infinite and perfect, while human knowledge is finite and deficient. Hermeneutically, God’s revelation to humankind is sacred, objective, and unalterable, but its human interpretation is contingent, subjective, and mutable. And God’s limits of law (its upper and lower boundaries) are immutable and absolute, but human legislation (the move between God’s boundaries) is changeable and relative. Yet, through humans’ rational faculty, which is God-given, human beings are able, though always limited, to participate in God’s knowledge, to understand His revelation, and to follow His law, by which they submit to His ethical code and bring about the realization of the good and sacred on all levels of personal and societal existence. It is only when people forget that they possess such rational faculty—when, for example, dogmatic ritualism takes priority over critical enquiry or when the dominance of the religious class of #ulam§” and fuqah§” marginalizes scientists and philosophers in society—that the bond between God and humans is broken and human society becomes ‘immoral’.

Shahrur’s concept of prophethood is also inseparable from his philosophical notions of ethical religion and God. Many of his critics failed to see that Shahrur did not apply the traditional theological notion of a personal God who sends His revelation down to chosen prophets. In his philosophical concept of revelation there is no space that connotes a vertical dimension of the revelatory event. In fact, the whole process of transmitting God’s knowledge and divine wisdom to humankind does not take so much the form of ‘revelation’ (waÈy) but of human, subjective ‘comprehension’ (inz§l), of what has been objectively ‘delivered’ by God (tanzÊl). And this act of subjective comprehension is not carried out through some extraordinary prophetical gifts or divine inspiration but through logical enquiry and common-sense reasoning. The prophetical era of humankind—from Noah to MuÈammad—witnessed a series of prophets who transmitted the ‘objective’ and taught the ‘subjective’, submitting to their societies an ever more sophisticated ‘comprehension’ of what had been delivered to them (or better, what had been presented to them in front of their eyes). In Shahrur’s vision, prophets were not divinely supercharged geniuses but spokespersons of objective knowledge equipped with the best possible—and until MuÈammad ever more penetrating—rational deduction of objective truth. Revelation in this vision is less a mind-boggling presentation of an impenetrable text of divine mysteries. Instead, revelation not only encourages rational enquiry (the apologetic argument), it also is the creation of reason in understanding objective reality. Only if this philosophical point is understood, can one appreciate Shahrur’s dictum that societies today live in a post-prophetic era in which an ever more sophisticated way of rational enquiry by society’s leading thinkers (philosophers, natural scientists, lawyers, and the like) has succeeded the prophets of the prophetic era in their attempt to rationally understand the truth. “Inspiration came to [Isaac] Newton when he saw the apple dropping and the earth attracting it. He had some unconnected ideas in his mind, but after he saw the apple fall the conscious connection happened.”[38]

The absence of a personal God in Shahrur’s philosophy explains why no prophet, saint, or mystic—not to mention the religious scholar—has a particular ‘nearness to Him’, which would give him a special status because of his religious enquiries. The prophets’ special status is only derived from their own rational enquiries (ijtih§d) into the objective truth and their applaudable application of the universal ethical code (al-isl§m) to the moral conduct of concrete individuals and the legal functioning of particular societies (a l-Êm§n). And the saints, mystics, and the #ulam§” have distanced themselves from God by preferring rituals over ethics and doctrine over critical reasoning. Here, more than anywhere else, the teleological and evolutionary character of Shahrur’s prophetology becomes evident because each prophetic vision turns into historical perspective with the passing of time. Each prophet taught the universal message vis-à-vis the particular concerns of their people, but as the prophetic era has ended, their particular teachings must eventually be superseded by the universal concerns of all humankind. National legislation must become world legislation, and particular ethics must turn into universal ethics shared by all human beings. Given Shahrur’s endeavour to bring historical Islamic religion (al-Êm§n) back to what is shared universally as human, ethical conduct (al-isl§m), one understands his impatience with SalafÊ Islamists who, like medieval scholars before them, regard the particulars of MuÈammad’s time as the universal ideal for all humankind and who, thus, sacrifice the truly universal ethical teachings of the Qur’an in favour of the particularistic interpretations of MuÈammad, his companions, and subsequent generations of Islamic scholarship.

Here lies the root of Shahrur’s bitter anticlericalism and antitraditionalism. He feels that the #ulam§” and fuqah§” of Islam have betrayed the progressive, universal message of al-isl§m in the following ways: by their obsession with the particular details of seventhcentury Arabia; by their imposition of the ÈadÊths onto the Qur’anic text (holding its meanings firmly locked up in the distant past); by their fixation on the details of rituals; by their distrust of the human rational faculty; by their suppression of freethinking; and by their neglect of the common good and what Islam shares with other religions in favour of particularistic, sectarian interests that advocate a sense of spiritual superiority. Even more radically, in idolizing the early generations of Islam, in declaring MuÈammad’s sunna as sacrosanct, and in sacralizing the opinions of famous medieval scholars, the #ulam§” and fuqah§” are fundamentally undermining the dialectical God-men relationship that is based on a sharp distinction between divine-human, immorta l-mortal, infallible-fallible and so forth. For Shahrur, their ignorance of the moral ideals of a l-isl§m and their preoccupation with the ritual elements of al-Êm§n represent the antidote to his rational, liberal, and ethical approach: he deems their approach backward, primitive, entangled in political corruption, breeding fanaticism, superstition, and sectarianism. For all these reasons, Shahrur feels strongly that if the renewal of Islamic religion is to succeed, society must categorically dispense with the #ulam§“s interpretation of the Qur’an (tafsÊr) and, instead, rely on the views of nonclerical intellectuals who are untouched by traditional scholarship.

 The Qur’an

The most innovative element in Shahrur’s work is, however, neither his prophetology nor his philosophical concept of God, but rather the way he synthesizes both into a new understanding of the Qur’an. The mistake that most Muslim critics of Shahrur made was to attempt to impale his linguistic-philosophica l-mathematical system of reading the Qur’an onto the nominalist-transcendent almetaphysical model of traditional tafsÊr exegesis. What they were unable to see is that Shahrur neither projected his philosophical thoughts into the Qur’an (a form of subjective eisegesis, they claimed) nor illegitimately extracted them from the Qur’an (a kind of dilettante misreading), because he always maintained that the Qur’an instead is part of the ontological, cosmological structure (discerned by philosophy) that exists outside the text. This is where his work is most influenced by various models of structuralist thought which had their peak in Western universities in the 1960s and 1970s—exactly when Shahrur started his work on the Qur’an—and which, unlike in Biblical Criticism,[39] never created a lasting impact on the scholarly disciplines of #ulåm al-qur”§n in the Arab-Muslim world.[40] In the l inguist and colleague from Damascus University (English Faculty), Ja#far DÊk al-B§b, Shahrur found a mentor who wrote for him the introduction to linguistic theory in The Book and the Qur’an, which was heavily influenced by linguistic structuralism. However, apart from this collaboration with a l-B§b, structuralism had already found its way into Shahrur’s thoughts through his reading of Bertrand Russell’s ‘structure of a relation’, which is fully developed in Russell and Whitehead’s Principia Mathematica[41] but more readable in Russell’s Introduction to Mathematical Philosophy.[42] He learned from Russell that the structural definition of a relation is extensional, in terms of the things related rather than of the properties of the reaction considered independently of those things. In other words, objects should not be conceived in terms of internal properties, but as a system of relations between unspecified elements whose properties are derived from these relations. What mathematicians call set theory, and which became standard mathematical logic from the 1930s, includes the proposition that knowledge of a mathematical object cannot be gained by analyzing the isolated qualities of an entity, but only by searching for the formal properties of a system entailed in algebraically closed communicative sets. The relations of such a system are in mathematical logic specified as sets of ordered pairs (finite-infinite; limited-converse; inductive-deductive; maximum-minimum, etc.). Shahrur’s next step was then to link mathematical to linguistic structuralism and regard the Qur’an as a semantically ‘closed communicative set’ whose meanings cannot be derived by an analysis of isolated words or passages but by discovering the inherent structures that govern the relationship between the individual semantic units. The concept of ‘structure’ here differs from literary ‘pattern’ or textual ‘arrangement’, that is, from the internal organization, composition, or formation of the text, even though an analysis of this plays in important role in Shahrur’s readings. But ‘structure’ differs from ‘textual pattern’ in that it refers to the hidden or underlying configuration which explains and justifies the more or less visible or obvious pattern of the text. Such a hidden configuration is applied from outside, not from within the text. The text’s meaning is essentially not found inside it but, as Greenwood says, “beside it, at its limits, at the point where the text is joined to its structure”.[43]

xxxxxx

This is where Shahrur combines mathematical and linguistic structuralism with the philosophical structure outlined earlier. The Qur’an’s underlying structure is manifested in the dialectical relationship between a set of binary oppositions, such as divine-human, absolute-relative, objective-subjective, eterna l-temporal, immutablemutable, universa l-particular, infinite-finite, and so forth, comprising the same constellation of the God-men bond as can be found in cosmos, nature, and society. This binary structure explains the arrangement and thus the meaning of the text which, in reverse, fully reveals its underlying structure once its meaning is discovered. Shahrur's exegetically most provocative step is to divide the Qur'anic text into groups of verses that are either ontologically eternal, absolute, and objectively valid, or temporal, relative, and subjectively conditioned. The verses of the first group belong to al-qur"§n, representing objective truth, eternal laws, and absolute knowledge, whereas the second group belongs to umm al-kit§b, the subjective part of the Qur'an (that is, of the whole book as we know it and different from Shahrur's al-qur"§n), constituting the historically contingent, changeable, and what is subject to human interpretation. Likewise, since MuÈammad enjoyed the status of a prophet and messenger of Allah, Shahrur argues, the text structurally reflects these two separate positions (conventionally not perceived as separate); while his prophethood represents the eternal and absolute of Allah's revelation, in contrast, his messengerhood represents its temporal and relative side (rules of jurisprudence, state administration, warfare, etc.).

Relating this fundamental division to a large number of subsets and subcategories (always as binary oppositions, e.g., tanzÊl-inz§l; im§m mubÊn-kit§b mubÊn; qa·§"-qadr; ulåhiyya-rubåbiyya; kal§m-kalima), Shahrur manages to sustain his philosophical vision that all existing objective reality (and that includes the Qur'an) is a reflection of the ontological division between the eternal and universal ethical code of God and the particularistic historical/contingent (legal, political, economic, etc.) concerns of human societies, and hence the d istinction between al-isl§m and al-Êm§n. In this vision the Qur'an ceases to be 'Scripture' whose sacred meanings are firmly locked inside each individual word and which need to be unlocked by the hermeneutically and spiritually most astute reader (normally the trained #§lim-mufassir). Instead, the Qur'an functions as text whose words are simply vehicles of meanings that point to a nontextual structure to be discovered either in cosmos, nature, and history of all humankind (the universal laws of a l-qur"§n) or in the manifestation of humanity in concrete, historical human societies (the contingent laws of umm al-kit§b). The process of discovering the former is called al-ta"wÊl, while the deduction of laws for the latter’s procedures of human legislation is called al-ijtih§d.

As for al-ta”wÊl (that is, the act of interpreting al-qur”§n or better, the disclosing of its objectivity), this is based on Shahrur’s evolutionary philosophy that envisages humans’ increasing participation in God’s absolute knowledge. According to his ‘dialectics between the universal and human episteme’ in a postprophetic era, the only way to link the total, comprehensive knowledge which is in Allah (that is, objective existence), and the relative, partial knowledge which humans possess (because of their subjective understanding of objective reality), is through the existence of a text whose miraculous nature allows a correspondence between its objective nature and the subjective understanding of each historical age. Shahrur calls this correspondence al-tash§buh or ‘assimilatability’, God’s assurance of a permanent harmony (though, not sameness) between the temporal and eternal, relative and total, partial and absolute. Explaining this point, he establishes an analogy between al-ta”wÊl’s dialectical relationship between human readers and their texts (scripture or otherwise) and our perception of ancient wall paintings: “Think of a fresco at the Vatican. The fresco is fixed, objective. But as the viewer changes position, he sees the fresco in a different way. Each time we move, we see the fresco in a different way. The mullahs want us to stand still and see the fresco as it was in the seventh century. We want to move around and see the fresco in a dialectic between text and context. Our interpretation of the fresco as we move around is subjective”.[44]

His critics understood this as a free license to the human mind to read into the Qur’an whatever it finds suitable (which is, i ncidentally, the most often voiced killer-argument against all ‘contemporary’ readings of the Qur’an). What has been overlooked, however, is that in Shahrur’s philosophical scheme of things this ‘whatever humans find suitable’ is not necessarily what is incompatible with ‘what God finds suitable’. This is because God ‘guarantees’ compatibility in a twofold way: by the absoluteness of His being He vouchsafes for the absolute and infinite validity of the text’s form (fresco) and its content/meaning. And by having created human beings and endowed them with reason with which they make sense of the text in each historical period, He also created the inherent warranty that human beings, provided they find a joint consensus or similar understanding, will always correctly concur with what has been said in the text. Since there can be no inherent contradiction between the divine text and its (contemporary) human understanding—if performed on the highest possible rational/scientific level and in full accord with empirical reality—the accusation of an overly subjective, all-toohuman interpretation of the Qur’an is—at least seen from Shahrur’s point of view—beside the point.

As for the second act of interpretation, al-ijtih§d, or the disclosure of a congruence between the divine law of the sharÊ#a, applied in society, and what is intrinsically and universally human in all societies on this earth, this does not involve, as many modern ijtih§d theories have argued, adapting the eternally valid aÈk§m rules of the Qur’an to the temporal needs of contemporary societies. On the contrary, it is the attempt to get the always temporally valid aÈk§m attuned to the eternally valid laws of al-qur”§n, that is, with what each historical period has relatively understood of it (through al-ta”wÊl). In other words, a rigid dress code (such as the total veiling of the female body), for example, which jars with human instinct and deviates from the current social consensus about good etiquette and moral decency, cannot be—by definition—divine law. Inheritance law which discriminates against female heirs and deviates from legal practice anywhere in the world is incompatible with God’s law. Legal injunctions on apostasy, theft, polygyny, jih§d, killing and such like, which are rejected by the majority of people and interpreted as inhuman and in violation of universally accepted human rights, undermine the ethical God-humankind bond and must be reformulated in the light of al-isl§m. Shahrur holds that the rules of umm al-kit§b are in permanent need of active preservation (Èifí), supervision (riq§ba), and confirmation (taßdÊq), while the al-qur”§n is its È§fií, raqÊb, and mußaddiq.

This is the reason why the verses of al-qur”§n and the verses of umm al-kit§b are not separated in the Qur’an (or the Book as Shahrur calls it), but combined. The significance of this aspect lies in the fact that it reverses the current Islamist trend to apply the most rigid interpretations of sharÊ#a law in the name of applying God’s law against man-made law (implying ‘what humans find suitable, not God’) by his conviction that there should not be one sharÊ#a rule that is incompatible with the higher values and overarching principles of a l-qur”§n, that is, the eternal laws of nature and humanity as shared by the majority of people at a given period of time in history, and al-isl§m, the universally valid code of ethical practice that is immutable and even indisputable.

Although Shahrur mentions a number of exegetical principles that he applied in his reading of the Qur’an (e.g. nonsynonymity, nonabrogation), the actual proposed process of interpretation—schematized in the format of a triple movement model—can be summarized as follows:

1. The first movement consists of approaching the Qur’an with a cognitive understanding of reality that is deeply rooted in the most advanced discourse on nature, cosmos, and human s ociety. Once approached in this way, it follows that any reading of any verse in the text must never contradict either human reason (as fed by scientific data from the humanities, social and natural sciences) or empirical reality (that is, globally available to human perception). This implies that the study of empirical data derived from objective reality must always precede the study of concrete passages of the Qur’anic text. It also implies that existing commentaries on the Qur’an which lack the contemporary episteme and fail to consider the most recent discoveries (and this by default includes the tafsÊr work of medieval scholarship) are to be barred from any consultation. Most important, however, is that contemporary readings of the Qur’an regard as irrelevant historica l-critical studies of the Qur’an and any attempt to ask what the text meant to the original readers in seventh-century Arabia. To use Shahrur’s analogy, what the frescos in the Vatican meant for the viewers in sixth-century Rome is rather irrelevant in comparison to the question of how they are perceived today. Following his conviction that one must always read the Qur’an “as if it was revealed last night” and his philosophical premise that the content of al-qur”§n is always contemporary (being part of God’s objective Being which irreversibly ‘progresses’ and ‘becomes’), the readers cannot but access the text from the historical position they occupy. This is to reverse the traditional exegetical dogma which states that the closer the interpreters are to the semantics of the revelatory event in seventhcentury Arabia, the more authoritative their interpretation becomes. In Shahrur’s approach, the exact opposite is true.

2. The second movement consists of attaching the most recent content/meaning available to the immutable format of the Qur’anic text. This proceeds in two steps. The first step consists of creating al-tash§buh, lit. ‘likeness’, between what is currently shared as universally accepted theories about nature/society and the verses of al-qur§n. If both appear to be incompatible, judgement is to be suspended until further research results in more insights, up to a point in history when incompatibility no longer occurs. Inasmuch as objective reality cannot be faulted, no verse of the al-qur”§n can ever be considered incorrect. The second step is to assess the compatibility of the legal verses with the currently applied value systems and universally accepted codes of conduct. If these ethical norms are still within the legal boundaries, that is, God’s limits, their mor al-legal requirements determine how the aÈk§m verses of umm al-kit§b are to be interpreted. If the aÈk§m rules contradict universally accepted standards of behaviour, the latter must take precedence over the former and annul them. The model for this second step is to be found in MuÈammad’s sunna, in that MuÈammad applied the aÈk§m rules for what was then shared as ethically and legally acceptable. It implies, however, that if the sunna contradicts what is today globally accepted as ethical and legal standards (e.g., human rights), none of the actual content of MuÈammad’s sunna must be applied today. Whereas human rights are universal, the sunna is not, as it is deeply rooted in the historical contingencies of seventh-century Arabia. This implies that the application of Islamic law cannot be done purely by an internal revision of the Islamic legal tradition (al-fiqh), as it is primarily based on MuÈammad’s sunna and thus epistemologically located in the past, but rather from outside it (using the parameters of civil law and parliamentary legislation).

3. The third movement is then to move away from the text and return to the nontextual side of objective existence and change human behaviour, state legislation, and political administration in the light of what is compatible with the ethical requirements of al-isl§m.

Once the first two movements have established the general mora lsocial objectives by way of the most contemporary readings of God’s revelation, these objectives must then be applied in the present concrete sociohistorical context. Such application requires that each country determines its priorities differently but makes sure that it nevertheless implements the same Qur’anic values (e.g., currently human rights) as any other country in the world. It also requires that each religion, even if differently shaped by ritual diversity, constantly readjusts its teachings to those mor al-social objectives gained by a fresh reading of the Qur’an. The important aspect of this phase is that law and rituals are not seen as identical with ethics but as its subordinated parts. This corrects the traditionalist and Islamist discourses that regard the moral message of Islam as embodied in the performance of rituals and strict adherence to sharÊ#a law. In Shahrur’s view, religious practice and legal injunctions may or may not correspond with God’s ethical ideals. If, for example, the implementation of sharÊ#a law justifies the violation of the rights of women and religious minorities, or undermines freedom of opinion, expression, thought, and religion, such a law has become immoral and devoid of God’s divine, ethical norms. And if rituals and the law do not correspond with these norms, they have to be changed.

 Applied Theory

A concrete example of Shahrur’s interpretations will illustrate the model just explained and bring together all points brought up so far. Verse 34 in chapter a l-Nis§” has persistently been a difficult verse to reconcile with human rights and gender equality. The Arabic text in transliteration reads as follows:

Verse 4:34:

Al-rij§l qaww§mån #al§ ’l-nis§” bi-m§ fa··ala All§h ba#·ahum #al§ ba#· [in] wa-bim§ anfaqå min amw§lihim fa’l-ß§liÈ§t[u] q§nit§t[un] È§fií§t[un] li’l-ghayb bi-m§ Èafiía All§h wa-all§tÊ takh§fån nushåzahunna fa-#iíåhunna wa-uhjuråhunna fi’l-ma·§ji# wa-”·ribåhunna fa-in aã#anakum fa-l§ tabghå #alayhinna sabÊl[an] inna All§h k§na #alÊy[an] kabÊr[an][45]

Two passages are particularly problematic: 1) Al-rij§l qaww§mån #al§ ’l-nis§”, and 2) wa-all§tÊ takh§fån nushåzahunna… wa-”·ribåhunna. The traditional rendering of these two passages by medieval tafsÊr exegetes can be summarised as follows: 1) Men are in charge of women, because of their physical, intellectual, financial etc. superiority by which Allah favours men over women; 2) If husbands are faced with the disobedience, open rebellion and disloyalty of their wives, it is legitimate to beat them and reinforce their obedience.

Such open misogyny and sexism in Shahrur’s eyes is unacceptable for several reasons. First, it contradicts universally held ethical principles, dominant in gender politics of the twenty-first century, which state that discrimination on the basis of a person’s sex is intolerable. Second, it contradicts the ethical norms held by the text’s objective and unchangeable part, that is, al-qur”§n, as expressed in verses such as 2:187 and 4:1, which emphasise sexual equality in terms of reason, intelligence, religion, and legal responsibility. Given what a l-qur”§n states as an absolute divine norm (sexual equality), it is compulsory for any interpreter to explain 4:34 (a verse of umm a l-kit§b) in the light of 2:187 and 4:1 (verses of a l-qur”§n). Third, the misogyny of traditionalist exegetes reflects the prevalent understanding of medieval patriarchal societies. Since this understanding ignored the divine ethical code of al-qur”§n and clashes with what is currently regarded as morally just, it ought to be abandoned. Finally, the assumption of male superiority is contradicted by recent scientific data which ascribe no deficiency to female persons, intellectually or otherwise. Moreover, beating and physical violence is not only universally condemned as immoral but has also been proven as highly counterproductive for resolving marital crises. And if it is against universally held standards and practice, no religious community (a l-Êm§n) has the right for a moral Sonderweg and to oppose al-isl§m. Verse 4:34, which addresses all believers worldwide, must be “as applicable to men and women in Tokyo or São Paulo as it is to men and women in Cairo, Damascus, or Riyadh”.[46]

Apart from Shahrur, many contemporary Muslim writers have attempted to reread 4:34 in the light of modern feminist thought. As for the first phrase al-rij§l qaww§mån #al§ ’l-nis§”, they stressed that the qiw§ma of men over women, a) is not a biological/anthropological superiority and, hence, not an essential privilege given to the male part of God’s creation;[47] b) is, instead, a financial duty of material protection of women and maintenance of their families; thus, it is not a privilege but rather a responsibility;[48] c) is an ideal, not a defacto description of reality and, thus, conditioned on the actual financial power of men;[49] d) is restricted to those men who have marital responsibilities and cannot be generalised for all men in society;[50] e) is restricted to times when women pursue their “child-bearing responsibilities”;[51] f) is not even linked to protection and maintenance by men but to their “moral guidance and caring”;[52] or g) was a restriction on men’s absolute and repressive power over women in seventh-century Arabia.[53] As for the second phrase wa-all§tÊ takh§fån nushåzahunna… wa-”·ribåhunna, these writers argued that men’s beating of women a) does not imply a repeated, intense, and random use of maximum force but rather a symbolic gesture of rebuke and punishment;[54] b) is a restriction on hard hitting as practiced in seventh-century Arabia and was, thus, an improvement in the women’s situation and not an injunction of universal validity;[55] c) indicates a measure of last resort in a three-step attempt to solve a marital crisis and is, thus, not a way to discipline disobedient wives;[56] d) is a strike of very little intensity, more like a soft stroke with a towel, toothbrush, f an or folded handkerchief;[57] e) does not at all imply ‘strike’ but the “confinement of women”;[58] f) simply means “to create an effect upon her” by employing nonviolent means,[59] or just g) “to strike out of a marriage”.[60]

Given his position as a ‘radical’, Shahrur would regard most of these interpretations as not far-reaching enough and, in spite of their well meaning, still inadequate for a real contemporary reading of the Qur’an. His explicit criticism of those feminists who interpret al-qiw§ma as men’s ‘standing in service’, implying that men are not the masters but in fact the servants of women, shows that he disagrees with the inherent or hidden structural imbalance in such a view. For him, the above-mentioned interpretations still perpetuate an essential inequality between the sexes. The most innovative aspect of Shahrur’s reading of 4:34 is then that he does not subscribe at all to the men-women or husband-wife polarity that this verse seems to suggest. He maintains that the main theme of the verse is al-qiw§ma, that is, leadership or guardianship as such, not the relationship between men and women. In order to prove this point he suggests reading the two terms al-rij§l and al-nis§” not as ‘men’ or ‘women’ respectively. Instead, he reads the two terms in a gender neutral way and proposes that both in fact imply men and women. Quoting verses in which a l-rij§l (24:37) or rij§l[an] (2:239; 22:27) are not exclusively used for male persons, he stresses that rajul-rij§l (sing.-pl.) is semantically not always restricted to connoting maleness. The generic sense of the lexeme r-j-l is ‘to walk’ or ‘to go on foot’, which in neither case is a prerogative of the male sex. Similarly, the term al-nis§” does not only mean ‘women’ but also expresses an ungendered notion of delay, deferral, or postponement. The Arabs say ‘the delivery has been postponed’ or ‘Zayd is late’, both expressions using the related term al-nasÊ” (connoting deferment), as does 9:37 “Verily the transposing (of a prohibited month) (al-nasÊ” [u]) is an addition to unbelief...”.

In the context of 4:34, it refers to a group of people (men and women) who ‘lack behind’ or ‘follow next’, namely behind those al-rij§l (men and women) who possess the authority of qiw§ma (leadership or guardianship).

Such a gender neutral reading of al-rij§l and al-nis§” allows Shahrur to understand the verse not as a prescriptive instruction of a unique ‘Islamic’ gender relationship (and thus not to any preference, men or women), but as a description of a universal type of unequal distribution of talent as well as leadership qualities, which objectively and empirically exist in human society (Islamic or not). Since al-rij§l refers to both men and women, Shahrur argues that high competence, moral strength, determination, education, and strong cultural awareness will always lead to a situation where some men and women are put in charge of other women and men who do not excel in these things at the same level. Bi-m§ fa··ala All§h ba#·ahum #al§ ba#· [in]—the line that follows the qiw§ma phrase—here literally means a preference of ‘some of them’ (men and women) to ‘some others’ (women and men), as the personal pronoun suffix hum is again rendered as gender neutral. The marital context, which has been traditionally seen as the point of reference in this verse, is in Shahrur’s interpretation replaced by a reference to a wider societal context, in which in all spheres of social, political, cultural, and economic life some men and women outperform others and thus assume leadership.

Following this line of argument that circles around an ungendered concept of qiw§ma, Shahrur turns then to those terms that are grammatically feminine. The term q§nit§t refers to those women who faithfully preserve the special skills and power of qiw§ma which God has bestowed upon them: they ‘guard what God would have them guard’. If they keep using their talents for the benefits of all, they are ‘righteous women’ (ß§liÈ§t). If, however, they squander God’s special gifts, they become n§shiza, that is, women who, because of their carelessness, are unfaithful to their talents and abuse their position of leadership. Nushåz is here interpreted as lack or abuse of qiw§ma in all spheres of life where women (or men—as stated in 4:128) assume leadership and responsibility; it does not refer to any kind of marital crisis (or worse, to disobedience, stubbornness, or dislike). Once the marital context is out of the way, Shahrur is able to apply (almost) universally acceptable rules on how to deal with lack or abuse of power: a) admonition and official warning first, then b) avoidance of close (social and personal) contact, and finally c) the withdrawal of the right of leadership/guardianship. Quoting several Qur’anic verses that use derivations of the lexeme ·-r-b, Shahrur maintains that ·araba is such a polysemous word that the most literal reading, ‘to strike’, is too restrictive and inconsistent with any other verse or even most ÈadÊths in this respect. I·ribåhunna thus implies a nonaggressive and nonviolent but firm resistance against any abuse of qiw§ma, a kind of civilised conveyance of discontent and rebuke carried out by men and women.

In sum, Shahrur’s interpretation of 4:34 is able to give women full social and juristic status whereby their entire intellectual, physical, moral, religious, and economic capacity is secured sui juris, and where women are in control of their own agency unchecked by any notion of male leader- or

